"Friend or foe, white or dark man, it is no matter for England. There is no favour or preference given to kith or kin, wherever they may be. If we are to draw closer the bonds of union between the British Empire all over the world, this matter of the trade relations of the Empire is of fundamental importance, and one with which we must attempt to deal."

This view was corroborated by the Prime Minister of Queensland, who declared—

"The first duty of every one of us in every country in the Empire is a duty to the Empire before our duty to any foreign country."

Nor can I forget to quote from a speech by Mr. Service, the distinguished Australian politician. When it was insinuated by one of his colleagues at the Conference that the course recommended might be against the canons of the gospel of one-sided Free Trade, for the support of which the Cobden Club would avow that Englishmen are expressly born into the world, Mr. Service declares—

"I am a Free Trader, but I am not one of those Free Traders who believe in Free Trade as a fetish to be worn round our necks, and who regard it as always indicative of precisely the same condition of things that it was indicative of in the Cobden period, or hold that circumstances might never arise of an Imperial character which might demand a revision of our policy upon that question."

I have to ask the pardon of the House for making these extensive quotations, which are necessary to prove what is the condition of colonial feeling on this question. It has been urged, in reference to another matter which we have been discussing, that we should wait until the people have spoken. In this matter we are urged to wait until the colonies have spoken. I contend that the colonies spoke on the subject, and very emphatically cally, at the Conference of 1887. They have also spoken since 1887, and are speaking to-day through their most representative men. Now, on the 22nd June, 1889, Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner of Canada, who during his residence here has won the regard of all classes of the community, said publicly—

"I believe myself that it is most important that Her Majesty's Government, with the support—the united support—of Her Majesty's Opposition, should take the necessary steps for summoning here in this heart of this great Empire Representatives of all Her Majesty's colonies. Means should be adopted by having a great Convention representing every portion of the Empire here in the Metropolis to consider a scheme in all its details."

With the help of my hon. Friend opposite, the Member for Battersea, steps were taken to press home by influential representations this view upon the Government, though I am sorry to say up to the present time with indifferent success. The development of inter-British trade and the termination of all trade engagements with Foreign Powers was also urged in April of last year upon the Dominion House of Commons by General Laurie, a distinguished Representative of Nova Scotia in that House, and recent events have undoubtedly strongly developed Canadian feeling, expressed eloquently as it was by Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner, and expressed, too, in the heart of the Dominion of Canada by General Laurie. Recent events, I say, have intensified Canadian feeling. Now, it is very easy for right hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the Table to endeavour to persuade themselves that the M'Kinley Tariff will very soon be repealed, but, for my part, I shall only believe it will be repealed when that repeal is an accomplished fact. What has the M'Kinley Tariff done already for the United States. A Trade Convention is in progress of negotiation between Newfoundland and the United States. It has won for the United States a preference of 25 per cent. in the markets of Brazil. Most undoubtedly it has provoked a very serious political crisis in the Dominion of Canada. Here at home it has reduced by 45 per cent. already the trade of my constituents with America. In South Wales, and in parts of Ireland also, working men either find themselves without work, or with reduced wages, in consequence of this M'Kinley Tariff, because we have no means of negotiating with foreign countries for the repeal of duties against British trade, having, as was stated authoritatively from the Government Bench several times in the course of last Session, nothing to give in return. But for the Dominion of Canada the state of affairs provoked by the economic legislation of the United States is far worse. Let me quote the words of Sir John Macdonald, the veteran Prime Minister, who, speaking at Halifax on the 2nd October last, said—

"The United States practically say to us in Canada, 'if you want reciprocity with us or trade with us, there is only one of two things you can do—either annex yourselves to us, or sever yourselves from Great Britain. Start out for yourselves or join us, and we will deal with you; but so long as you are a portion of the British Empire we will not deal with you.'"

Sir John Macdonald went on to say—

"According to the old saying this would be a case of the lion and the lamb lying down together, but with the lamb inside the lion. No such fate threatens us, however, if we are true to ourselves and true to our country, and true to our children and our children's children. We must continue to remain as we are—happy in living under a magnificent climate, happy in the possession of a fertile soil, and a law-abiding population, and happy in being an integral portion of the greatest and grandest Empire known to history."

And then upon another occasion more recently the Canadian Ministry, speaking on the economic condition of affairs produced by the M'Kinley Tariff in the Dominion of Canada, said—

"For trade, for new markets, we will look to Australia, to the West Indies, to the Mother Country."

Communications are already in progress between the Dominion of Canada and Australasia; communications are already in progress between the Dominion of Canada and the West Indies; and will not the House of Commons say that, so far as possibly can be done, the great Dominion of Canada shall not look in vain to the Mother Country? It would not only be a fitting answer to send this evening to a veteran servant of the Empire, whose motto and watchword at the present time is "A British subject I was born, a British subject I will die." But in October, 1889, the leader of the Political Opposition in Canada is reported to have said—

Mr. Howard Vincent

"I would be in favour of a more close commercial alliance of Canada with Great Britain. I would favour it with all my soul."

There is only one more witness I will call: Sir Gordon Sprigg, speaking last year in London, said—

"How are the component parts of the Empire to be held together? Having given a great deal of attention to this matter it appears to me that the basis of the Imperial Federation of the future must be a Customs Union. Supposing you don't bind together your colonies and dependencies by some such bond as a Customs Union, what guarantee have you that you will hold your Empire together? It has been doubted whether the colonies themselves are in favour of such a proposal"— and I particularly invite the attention of right hon. Gentlemen to this: Sir Gordon Sprigg replies—

"I will only say that in travelling through this country upon occasional visits I keep my eyes and ears open, and I sometimes think that if I wanted to find illustrations of men who hold fast to the best traditions of Old England I would not look for them here in the centre, but I would go to the distant dependencies where the sons and daughters of England keep watch and ward over the outposts of the Empire."

And these views are, I know, undoubtedly warmly held by Mr. Cecil Rhodes, the present Prime Minister. I have endeavoured thus to show the House, through the mouth of representative men in Australia—one the present Prime Minister of Queensland, another long the holder of political authority in Victoria, a third for a lifetime the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly in New Zealand; through the mouth of the present Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada, and also of the leader of the Political Opposition; through the mouth of the ex-Prime Minister and other representative men in South Africa—that there is at the present time a growing desire on the part of the great colonies to enter into close commercial relations with the Mother Country and with each other. I might quote Sir Julius Vogel and other eminent exponents of the feeling of the colonies. But it is not necessary. I urge, then, upon the House—in our own interests quite as much as in colonial interests—that early opportunity should be taken of inviting the self-governing colonies to confer with the Imperial Government, not upon a cut-and-dried proposal, not upon some definite scheme, which might or might not be popular; but upon the best means of developing the trade of the Empire. I urge this view upon hon. Members, not only because the colonies expect it of us, not only because it is our bounden duty, but also because the vast growth of inter-British trade compared with foreign trade, now amounting to upwards of £250,000,000 a year, shows that such a union within the British Empire would be commercially advantageous both to the Mother Country and to the colonies. Lastly, I urge it upon the Government, and I do so by reason of the declaration of the Prime Minister at the Guildhall on the 10th November. These were Lord Salisbury's words:—

"We know that every bit of the world's surface that is not under the British flag is country which may be, and probably will be, closed to us by a hostile tariff, and therefore it is that we are anxious, above all things, to conserve, to unify, to strengthen the Empire of the Queen, because it is to the trade that is carried on within the Empire of the Queen that we look for the vital force of the commerce of this country."

And not only have we this authority from the Prime Minister of this country; but I find from the latest publication of the Cobden Club, issued within the last few days, by authority, no doubt, of the hon. Member for Rochdale, under the title Fiscal Federation and Free Trade, which ends thus:—

"The Empire would then be commercially impregnable; the Mother Country, the colonies, and India would reign supreme in each other's markets. . . Such a fiscal federation would require no adjustment; it would avoid all disputes, all jealousies; it would form a bond of union which would defy the threats or blandishments of any scheming Foreign Powers, and prove more durable than any other that could be conceived."

I think I am justified, therefore, in asking the support for this Motion of Free Traders and Fair Traders alike, of both sides of the House, and in asking hon. Members, by acceding to this Motion, to do something, at any rate, towards developing the trade of the United Empire.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, an early opportunity should be taken of inviting the self-governing Colonies to confer with the Imperial Government upon the best means of developing the trade of the Empire."—(Mr. Howard Vincent.)

*(9.38.) MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): I rise to second the Motion. There are two points which are raised by the Resolution. The first is the great desire of the colonies for a closer commercial union with the Mother Country and with each other. What is it that has brought about that desire at the present time? Undoubtedly the trade which they are carrying on, and which is so fast developing in Australia and in Canada, may be, to some extent, a reason for the growing desire that is thus shown. But there is another matter which I think has a much closer relation with this view, and that is, that our colonies have before them, to a greater extent than ever before, as a great object lesson, the prosperity and increasing greatness of the United States of America. The United States call themselves—and, without doubt, to some extent, properly—a Free Trade country. They have a thorough free inter-State trade, and that is one of the points which is regarded, especially in Australia, and to a very considerable extent in Canada, as the cause of that prosperity. They say here are several States which are able to produce everything they can altogether desire. They have no duty at all on goods passing from one State to another. The duties which they levy are on articles brought in from the outside world, and thus raising their required revenue by a tax by means of which they avoid all other taxation. I do not think that could be better illustrated than by a case which was alluded to by Sir Henry Parkes at the Conference held at Melbourne in February last on the subject of the federation of Australia. The State of Maryland allowed Baltimore to levy a Wharfage Duty on all goods coming into Baltimore from other places than those in the State of Maryland. A potato merchant coming in was asked to pay four or five dollars Wharfage Dues, having come from some other State. He refused to pay it, and was taken before the Court, which ordered him to pay. He appealed to the Court of the State, which affirmed that decision. He then went to the Supreme Court, which held that—

“It must be regarded as settled that no State can consistently with the Federal Constitution impose upon the products of other States more onerous public burdens or taxes than it imposes upon like products in its own area.”

This establishes beyond all doubt the
Mr. Staveley Hill

doctrine that America is in this sense a Free Trade country, and allows no duties to be levied as between State and State. That is the great object lesson which is held before Australia and before Canada. Canada is told, “Set yourselves entirely free from the Mother Country, or even keep yourselves still in alliance with the Mother Country, but join yourselves together to levy duties against the outside world, and have an inter-State thorough freedom with us, and you will become a great country.” This matter was brought before the Australian Conference last year as one which would direct their minds on the federalisation of Australia. They would see how, by bringing together Queensland and all the other colonies, they might produce a great country, which might have inter-colonial Free Trade levying duties on the outside world. And when a Free Trade State is told that she cannot profitably enter into a federal connection with Protectionist States, there is one part of the Dominion to which I will call especial attention. It is a very great illustration of what may be done in this way. I allude to British Columbia. Victoria in British Columbia was a free port where no dues were levied, and they were very much opposed to being brought into the Dominion of Canada and being thereby subject to fiscal duties. She joined the Dominion, however, and what has been the result? I took the trouble to inquire into the prices and into the duties that were being levied in British Columbia, and I find that the people there are in a singularly more prosperous condition than they were during the time that Victoria was a free port. Wages are very much higher, the highest probably that you can find in the whole circuit of the globe. The necessities of life, although there are heavy dues, are cheaper than are to be found anywhere else. It might have been supposed that at the Australian Conference there would be a difficulty in discussing this question between Victoria, South Australia, Western Australia, Queensland, and Tasmania, all Protectionist countries, and New South Wales, a Free Trade colony. But that difficulty was dropped entirely. My hon. Friend, in the second part of his Motion, discusses the desirability of a Conference as the best means of developing the trade of the Empire. Can anybody doubt that the tendency throughout the British Empire is to form a federation of the Empire? Can anybody doubt that if this Empire is to hold its own it will be by a closer union between the Mother Country and the colonies? I can only say this for myself: I have gone for many years through the country speaking on different platforms, and I have never, before any part of my countrymen, talked about a closer union with the colonies without finding that it was the one great thing that seemed to interest them more than anything else. The question of the Customs Union must arise whenever this subject comes on, and the question, then, will be; What has England to give, and what has England to gain, by a Customs Union? The colonies will say, "You want customers for your manufactures; look at the M'Kinley Tariff, which is aimed at you," and {who can doubt, who has any acquaintance at all with the subject, that the M'Kinley Tariff is aimed at our supremacy, aimed first of all at the detachment of England from Canada? Do not tell me it was a question of the hour. I was in the United States during the Presidential Election in 1884, and the speeches then made by Mr. Blaine were to this effect:—

"If there is anything that can come into our country which we can produce we shall put a duty on it which shall prevent it being introduced; if there is anything that comes in which we cannot produce, let it come in duty free."

That was the doctrine of 1884; it is the doctrine of the present time; it is a doctrine which has got an immense hold of the people. It was put forward not as a political action at all, because it has ruined to a considerable extent the man who brought it forward. It was put forward as the steady studied resolve of the American people, and it will remain for years to come. We must, then, face the M'Kinley Tariff as an existing fact. In addition to that, Russia, France, and Germany all have recently increased their tariffs. We may well say to the colonies, "We require your aid to take our manufactured goods from us." England will say, "I have tried all arguments with other countries, and I find I can make no impression upon them, in the sense of making them come to our view of Free Trade." The colonies will reply, "You can give us a preference in bringing in our raw material for manufacturers, and in the shape of food. Find out if we in India, in Canada, in Australia, in New Zealand, and in Egypt produce more than enough to feed you without stint, and when you have found that, say that you will give us a preference to your markets, and we will lower out duties in favour of your manufactures." Sir John Macdonald said to me in 1881 that if England would put but a half-dollar duty on corn coming from all countries other than colonies he would undertake that Canada would allow a preferential duty in favour of England. That is the proposition that is made by Canada, and that will be made by Australia and the other colonies, and I say we should do very well to accede to it. I feel sure the time is closely approaching when the working men of England will see that if they are to keep up their wages, and retain their places in this country, it must be by getting better outlets for their manufactures, and they can only get that by giving to the colonies an opportunity of selling {the goods here. I am glad to know that the news that this Motion is made will reach Sir John Macdonald on his electioneering tour. He is a man who, above all others, has the interest of England at heart, and I am sure everyone will wish that Sir John Macdonald may long remain Prime Minister of Canada, and maintain the greatness of the Empire.

*(9.57.) SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): I have nothing to blame my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield for in the way that he has brought forward the Resolution in regard to the Conference, in so much as he has said; but I have some fault to find with him because he has not told us what is the nature of the subject which he is about to bring before this Conference. He could not invite the whole of the colonies to come to a solemn Conference in England without a basis on which the Conference shall go, and he has given us no indication in regard to that basis. So far as the terms of the Motion go, the colonists might be asked to come and discuss with the Free Traders the benefits of Free Trade, and give their views on Protection. Does my hon. Friend want to make a Debating Society by asking the whole of the colonies to come into a solemn Conference in this country without indicating a clear and distinct basis upon which this Conference is to take place? He is asking a very serious question—he is asking the colonies to come and confer, without giving the slightest information as to what they ought to confer about. The basis of discussion ought to have been distinctly laid down. In the course of his speech my hon. Friend showed that he was first a Fair Trader—whom I have always looked upon as a Protectionist wearing a domino—and then a Protectionist. What is the object of this Motion? The right hon. Member for the Isle of Thanet Division of Kent (Mr. J. Lowther) the other day placed upon the Paper a Motion which throws a bull's-eye illumination upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Sheffield. The right hon. Gentleman, in his Motion proposing to invite the colonies to send representatives to a Conference to be held in this country, asserted that there was imminent danger menacing the integrity of the Empire and the interests of all classes engaged in the industries of the United Kingdom, because Parliament has not yet established a differential system of taxation in favour of colonial produce. I have no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman will to-night give the House a thorough-going Protectionist speech in illustration of his Motion. But I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman what are the facts upon which he bases his alarming suggestion as to the danger to the integrity of the Empire and to all classes engaged in the industries of the United Kingdom? The Trade Returns for 1890 show that our trade for that year amounted to some £684,000,000, and showed an advance over that of 1886 of £122,000,000. Therefore the trade of the country is largely increasing. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that the industrial and the poorer classes were being injured by the importation of foreign manufactures, but the published Returns show that employment is general throughout the country, that wages are good, and that poverty and crime are decreasing. In my opinion, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman has not made out that there is any cause for alarm on the ground that our industrial classes are suffering through our free importation of foreign goods, and there is no ground on that score to ask our colonies to send representatives to attend a Conference in this country. It would, therefore, appear that the black cloud which the right hon. Gentleman seems to see hanging over this country is visible to his eyes only. What has really frightened my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend is clearly the Canadian elections. There are, no doubt, serious features connected with those elections. There is one Party in Canada which desires to foster the trade with the United States, and to impose differential duties as against British goods. The other Party has a strong feeling of loyalty to England, and desires to obtain reciprocal trade in natural products with the United States. To this England could not have the slightest objection, because the natural products of Canada reach this country free of duty, and if they reach the United States free of duty also all Free Traders would much rejoice. Personally, I am afraid of speaking about the Canadian elections, and I do not think either Party in Canada would thank this House for discussing the subject. I am glad to see that my hon. Friend (Mr. Howard Vincent), who in the Motion that first appeared on the Paper mentioned Canada, has since substituted the words "self-governing colonies," which is much safer and better. Now, when England gave taxing powers to the colonies she gave those powers without conditions. We did not reserve to ourselves the right of insisting that British goods should enter free of taxation. Some of the colonies are Free Trade countries.

Sir Lyon Playfair

*MR. HOWARD VINCENT: Name them.

*SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: New South Wales is a Free Trade country, and so, practically, is the Empire of India. Other colonies are strongly Protectionist, such as Canada, Victoria, and Western Australia. The average duties imposed on imports, for the purpose either of protection or of revenue, vary from 4 per cent. in India to 29 per cent. in Canada. The real object of the Motion of my hon. Friend is no doubt to secure the adoption of the plan which he indicated as having been brought forward with so much ability by Mr. Hofmeyr in 1887. What that means is that all foreign goods of every kind are to be taxed.

*MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg pardon. I did not adopt the proposal of Mr. Hofmeyr.

*SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: But that is the only interpretation we have of colonial views and wishes. What is it he is aiming at? Is it a general Zollverein? Are the duties in the colonies to be of equal value or of varying value? How is it possible to have a general Zollverein? You have the greatest varieties in the colonies. You have different climates, different soils, different products, and different people, and, as a result, it has been shown that, with all the efforts to make a taxation upon a moderate scale, the colonies differ as much as from 4 per cent. to 29 per cent. in the mode in which they levy the duties on goods. That is because taxation suitable to one colony is not the least suitable to another colony. But there was one thing that in the 1887 Conference all the colonies were perfectly and absolutely agreed upon. All the colonies desire that England should put a tax—moderate in amount, it is true—upon all foreign imports, but that all imports from the colonies which were not employed for our Revenue, such as tea and tobacco, should be admitted free of duty. At the same time, the colonies absolutely refused to be bound in any way to lower their duties upon British commodities. Now I come to Mr. Hofmeyr's proposal. He said—

"We require a Defence Fund for the Empire, and I propose that we should put a 2 per cent. tax upon all foreign imports that either go into England or go into the colonies."

He was careful to explain that taxation of foreign goods would be of no use to the colonies unless England taxed food and raw materials. If we taxed; foreign imports coming into England 2 per cent., the colonies would agree to put 2 per cent. on foreign imports in addition to what they charge now. The product of the tax is to be kept separate, and made into a Defence Fund, and he calculated then and I calculate now that such a tax would produce a revenue of about £8,000,000 [An hon. MEMBER: £7,000,000.] He said £7,000,000, but now it is increased. Therefore, the colonies propose that England shall tax itself for this special Defence Fund. At present we pay all the expenses of the naval armaments. We are to tax the people of England to the extent of £6,250,000 for the purposes of this Defence Fund; for if all the colonies agreed to come in, the colonies would not pay more than £1,750,000. But would they all agree to come in? Just look at the matter in the light of common sense. The colonies have the greatest varieties in their dealings with foreign countries. For instance, Australia only imports 10 per cent. of foreign goods. Canada imports more than 56 per cent., and the West Indies, 40 per cent. Do you think the colonies are all going on this simple and equal method, to have their foreign commodities taxed when there is such variety amongst them? The foreign trade of the colonies amounts to less than £67,000,000, while the foreign imports of England amount to £325,000,000. The proposal is that England should put an additional tax on its people in respect of this £325,000,000, while the colonies should only put a tax on in respect of £67,000,000. There was a significant circumstance which occurred in that Conference. Some of the colonies said that a 2 per cent. tax on foreign imports into England was of no use to them; it must be much more than that. Mr. Hofmeyr said that he only mentioned 2 per cent. to begin with; it might rise to 5, 10, or even to 50 per cent. Thus we are gradually to be squeezed up until we are in the firm grip of Protection once more. The colonies are to be perfectly independent to tax Great Britain as they like, but England is not to be at liberty to put anything but a tax on foreign products of all kinds. England, after one celebrated experience, has been chary of interfering with the taxation of the colonies. We once tried to interfere with the taxation of our colonies in North America, and we therefore lost the United States. But what is this that is proposed? It is that the colonies in their turn shall come and tax England; it is that the pelican shall vulnerate itself in order that with its own blood it may feed its young. The House will understand the matter better if I take as an illustration breadstuffs. The United States send to this country 35,000,000 cwt. of grain calculated as flour; Canada sends 4,000,000 cwt. From what hon. Members know of the United States and its desire for retaliation, do they think that the United States would rest satisfied to see this country taking the 4,000,000 cwt. from Canada free into this country while harassing the former with all the new Customs apparatus and the duty on the 35,000,000 cwt. which they send here? You know perfectly well that there would be such retaliation immediately as would make us bitterly repent. The whole foreign supply of wheat calculated as flour is 66,000,000 cwt., and of that the colonial supply is only 13,000,000 cwt. Take the case of cotton. The United States furnished us last year with 1,344,000,000 pounds, and the West India Colonies, her near neighbours, send us 500,000. We are to put a tax upon the American cotton. Do you mean to say that the United States would not at once put a retaliatory duty on our cotton fabrics? [Hon. MEMBERS: They do.] They would make the duty prohibitive if you taxed their raw material. The hon. and learned Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill) referred to the M'Kinley Tariff. Does he not know that there has been an enormous upheaval in the United States against that tariff? I have studied the question longer than the hon. and learned Gentleman, and I have noticed the splendid education that has been going on throughout the United States with reference to the tariff; and now there is a new Congress which is pledged to make a reformed tariff immediately, and it contains a very large majority against the ultra-Protectionists. Suppose we were at once to accept the policy of the hon. Member and put a tax upon foreign commodities in order to please the colonies. What would result? You would bring Canada and the United States into a most critical attitude, because you would give a preference to the exports of Canada. We ought to encourage the United States as much as possible to go on in their career of tariff reform, and bring about much better relations with the rest of the world, and especially with Great Britain. I have the greatest admiration for Canada. It has shown itself a most energetic nation. It has connected the Atlantic and Pacific by an iron band which has given to England a new route to the East, for which we ought to be very grateful. I do not blame Canada for her protective tariff, indeed, I think she is forced into it by the action of the United States, and I sympathise with Sir John Macdonald in his efforts to establish with his powerful neighbours reciprocity, for natural products. That reciprocity which continued from 1854 to 1868, bound the two countries together so firmly that, although the United States was engaged in one of the greatest wars which any country has ever had, they did not require one soldier more on the frontier or one single ship of the United States to prevent Canadian Alabamas preying on commerce. Most of us have for years been strongly in favour of political and, so far as we can obtain it, commercial federation with the colonies, but there is much more than that involved. I hope my right hon. Friend (Mr. J. Lowther) who runs his politics just as straight as he runs his horses, and who does not hide his views under a bushel, will tell us what his views are. I will tell him what his views were in 1885. In a speech which he made in Lincolnshire, he said: "the monstrous claptrap of the cheap loaf must be described as moonshine." As my right hon. Friend cannot tax moonshine, he is going to tax the cheap loaf by this difference in favour of the colonies. Consider for a moment what better commercial relations we could have with our colonies than we have at present. England is a great maritime and a great manufacturing nation. As a manufacturing nation this country takes all the raw materials and all the food supplies of our colonies free of duty. We convert them into manufactures, and we send them out as cheap manufactures into the colonies. It is the fault of the colonies if those commodities become dear there. The colonies have their own ideas of taxation; England has its own ideas of commercial freedom. This country finds that it has prospered enormously by making its commerce perfectly free, and we are far from blaming the colonies. I think that they will come round to the views of the question entertained in this country, just as the United States are rapidly coming round to those views, and will eventually largely reduce their duties. There is no antagonism between the commerce and the trade of the United Kingdom and the colonies. The economical conditions of the United Kingdom and those of the colonies differ altogether. Their raw materials come to us free; our manufactures do not go to them free, but in spite of the duties they enter to a considerable extent. We have a large capital in this country, and we are glad to invest it in our colonies for the promotion of colonial undertakings; and if we leave things as they naturally are, it is to be hoped that the colonies will benefit us and that we shall benefit them. There are few fairtraders who advocate this policy who dare to say on public platforms that they want to tax food or raw materials. When those gentlemen speak they always say that they do not wish to tax food or raw materials, but the proposal of the colonies is that we should tax food or raw materials. With all this difference of opinion, therefore, with the right claimed by the colonies to taxation, independently of a Zollverein with us, there is no basis put forward on which Parliament can ask the colonies to enter a Trade Conference. I think that it is not unreasonable to hope that the colonies, when they consider the whole question, and knowing the determination of England to have untaxed food for her people and untaxed raw material for her manufactures, will see that a freer recognition of the principles of commercial freedom must add happiness to the people and security to the Empire.

Sir Lyon Playfair

*(10.31.) Mr. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): My right hon. Friend who has just sat down has taken the mover of the Motion to task because he confined his speech to the Motion which stands in his name, and suggested that the Member for Sheffield ought to have extended his speech to another Motion, which does not stand in his name. Now I venture to think that my hon. Friend would have laid himself open to a call to order had he adopted such advice.

*SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: A passed Motion.

*MR. J. LOWTHER: It is a Motion I have been unable to bring forward in consequence of arrangements of business to which I need not refer, but which still stands upon the Order Book. I am bound to say I am under no obligation to decline to answer the straightforward question addressed to me by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman asks me in effect whether I adopt the programme which has been mentioned to-night as instituted by Mr. Hofmeyr, and I reply that the programme of Mr. Hofmeyr is one which in no shape or form am I prepared to endorse. I have not heard of any person in any way responsible for the movement represented on this occasion by my hon. Friend (Mr. Vincent) or who takes an interest in the matter who is prepared to endorse in its details the programme of Mr. Hofmeyr. I have no doubt that Gentleman expressed views on this subject in general agreement with my own. I am disposed to concur with him in his general object, but as to details I most distinctly decline to be bound by his utterances. What did my right hon. Friend go on to say? He said that the supporters of this Motion advocated a system under which this country is to be bound by certain definite obligations to the colonies, while the colonies are not bound by any definite obligations to the Mother Country. Where did he derive that information from?

*SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: From the Conference of 1887.

*MR. J. LOWTHER: Then all I can say, knowing the care and attention my right hon. Friend has bestowed upon that Conference, is, that he must have eliminated chance sentences from the remarks of one or two speakers, and mistaken them for the unanimous opinion of the Conference. I venture to protest against such an idea as that. We have always insisted on something altogether different. We advocate absolute liberty of action, both for England and the colonies, as to the duties imposed on the introduction of all goods into their territories, with this solitary exception—that such duties as are imposed upon any goods coming from another part of the British Empire shall be met with an increased duty upon similar goods coming from other parts of the world. My right hon. Friend mentioned other matters I certainly have never suggested. My right hon. Friend says that there is to be taxation on wool, which, so far as I have ever heard, has never been so much as suggested, although as to broad-stuffs I certainly hold that we ought to be independent of all sources outside the British Empire; and I think when the system comes to be fully considered it will be found that the people of this country will have the advantage of obtaining food supplies from within the limits of the Empire, which are sufficiently wide to include food-producing territories almost boundless in their capacity, and the cry of dear food is a bug-bear we may discard from our minds. My right hon. Friend proceeded to talk with that moderation and good sense which always distinguishes him upon the subject of Free Trade and Protection, an example which might, with advantage, be followed by others who take his view of these questions. My right hon. Friend has convinced himself that Protection is dead in the United States. Well, I thought it was only the other day that the M'Kinley tariff was proposed—an enactment far exceeding in its Protectionist tendency anything that any other country has attempted. My right hon. Friend is labouring under a delusion if he thinks that because the details of that measure have caused dissatisfaction therefore there is any feeling in the United States in favour of Free Trade. There is none whatever—absolutely none, in the sense in which the term Free Trade is used in this country. There is no Free Trade Party in the United States worthy of the name. We have been told that no person is fit to be at large who denies that Free Trade is a universal panacea for all human ills—that the man who doubts Free Trade is a person who doubts the rotundity of the world, or who denies that two and two make four. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale is not present, or I would thank him for supplying me with an unlimited amount of literature in which these and similar sentiments are eloquently enforced. What is the feeling of the world on this question? I presume that we shall not now be told that all the wise men of the world are the advocates of Free Trade, while the advocates of Protection are fools. For what are the facts? All the leading men of all political parties in all quarters of the globe, with one solitary exception, have during the last 25 years or more been staunch and avowed Protectionists. All the statesmen of Germany and Russia have never for a moment swerved from the doctrine of Protection. If my right hon. Friend doubts that statement of mine I will supply him with an authority presently which I think he will respect.

Mr. J. Lowther

In France during the reign of the late Emperor Napoleon there were tentative steps taken in the direction of Free Trade. We used to be told that the despotisms of the world were depriving the people of the great blessings of Free Trade. What has been the case with France? The moment the French people gained popular representation steps in the direction of Free Trade were promptly abandoned, and now in France Protection rules supreme. I might go the world through and point that out. I will go to no less an authority than the Member for Mid Lothian to show that Free Trade is on the decline and Protection advancing. At a presentation which took place to my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale—a presentation in which I would cordially have joined were it not confined to a Political Party—the Member for Mid Lothian, in making the presentation, made some remarks which recall the idea of a skeleton appearing at a feast, and lead one to suppose that he was a doubtful addition to the hilarity of the entertainment, for he said—

“I think we certainly must recognise—I hope you will forgive me for introducing matters that are not those of congratulation—how much ground has been lost by the doctrines of Free Trade within the last 25 years. It is a great and heavy disappointment. I have no doubt that the dreadful militarism which lies like an incubus, like a vampire, upon Europe, is responsible for much of the mischief, but not for all. You must not forget that in other countries where there is no such militarism Protection is gaining ground. It is gaining ground in America, and I regret to see that it is gaining ground also in our own colonies.”

Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

“When we pass over the countries of Europe together with the great Republic of America, we see that, although the doctrines of Free Trade have never been unconditionally accepted in any of these countries, yet there was a kind of qualified progress towards them. That progress was then exchanged for a stationary condition of opinion, and of late that opinion has been actively retrogressive. But I know of two subjects for consolation—at least, I remember only two at this moment in that survey. In some of our own colonies the principles of Free Trade are still cherished.”

These were the statements made by the Member for Mid Lothian in a speech delivered on May 12, 1890, and I advise hon. Members to refer to that speech and read it in detail. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that in one of the colonies—New South Wales—the colonists had standfastly, under circumstances of great difficulty, gallantly adhered to the cause of Free Trade. But if the right hon. Gentleman had made that speech in 1891 he would have had to recognise the fact that at the last election in New South Wales, Political Parties upon this subject were so evenly balanced that I am told on unquestionable authority that at present the majority is only 4 or 5 in the Legislative Assembly there in favour of the doctrine of Free Trade. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to talk about France; but again, I say, if the right hon. Gentleman had to refer to the fiscal policy of France in 1891 he would have to add to that eulogy of Free Trade in that country, that at no period in French history has the policy of Protection been so rampant as at the present time. A proposal involving the addition of a minimum duty of something like 25 per cent. on all British manufactures is now before the consideration of the French Legislature. I will not weary the House with detail, but I think I have shown that my right hon. Friend is, I was going to say, premature—but distinctly he is speaking a day after the fair. Can my right hon. Friend name another colony besides New South Wales, to which I have referred, where Free Trade principles are in the ascendancy?

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: India.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I must ask my right hon. Friend as a candid man first to remember the distinction always drawn between our colonies and our great Indian dependency, and that India acts in this matter as the British House of Commons wills. But I will also ask him to remember that not many years ago Members of this House used to have their attention probably called to the fact that for revenue purposes in India duties were levied on Manchester goods, a condition of affairs which was only changed after strong protest from those responsible for Indian administration. I have shown that in New South Wales the majority in favour of a Free Trade policy is very small. India we may omit, because the people have no voice, and rightly have no voice; they have not the machinery for suggesting their own fiscal policy. I think I have shown, and I think it is admitted on all hands, that the policy of Protection has rapidly superseded that of Free Trade throughout the world. Only in our own country is there retained a decided prejudice against the introduction of Protective Tariffs. The Mother Country, England, is the only part of the world where this doctrine, which falsely passes under the name of Free Trade, is accepted as a dogma. Sir Gordon Sprigg ex-Premier of Cape Colony, to whose speeches my hon. Friend has referred, and himself a Free Trader, has said that when he went out to the colony, he soon found that Free Trade in the colony was considered to be made for man not man for Free Trade, and Sir Gordon Sprigg went on to say that in the colony it was regarded as a system, to be defended by argument, but by no means to be regarded as a fetish. Now, I ask the House to consider the position in which we stand. If we are prepared to say that in no circumstances whatever will we even allow the colonies to place their views before us in a Conference, and state what suggestions they have to make for the development of trade between us and them, the sooner we give up prattling about the British Empire the better. The policy which is promoted by the leader of the Opposition in Canada—of entering into close fiscal relations with the United States and discriminating against the Mother Country—I am happy to think a large patriotic Party declines in any shape or form to assent to is one which, if adopted, must end in the breaking up of the British Empire, and the fact is that if the Mother Country is not prepared to consider some modification of pre-conceived fiscal opinions, the burden of Empire must fall from our hands. What I understand to be the object of this Motion is, not the laying down of any hard and fast line within which alone a Conference should proceed, but that, speaking broadly, it is suggested that it should proceed on the lines of a preferential fiscal system. But I never would presume to dictate to the colonies as to the details by which they should be bound in such a Conference. The House is not asked to express to-night an opinion as between Protection and Free Trade. I do not ask Her Majesty's Government to afford any indication as to which direction their personal views may incline. I do not ask them if they are of one mind on the subject. But what I do ask them is whether they are prepared to entertain this question, as not only a practical question, but an urgent one, without committing themselves to laying down at present any definite programme, without pronouncing at present the exact time or circumstances under which this Conference is to be convened; but that this subject, which is engaging so much attention throughout all parts of the Empire outside these Islands, shall receive some consideration, and that promptly, at the hands of Her Majesty's Government. During the last quarter of a century, I would point out to the House that, of late years a marked change of feeling has taken place in the country on this question. We know that the balance of power has shifted during the last quarter of a century. I have personally incurred no responsibility with regard to that transfer, and, therefore, I may speak with perfect freedom upon the point. But the House knows well that, whereas the old £10 householder was for the most part connected with the retail trade of the country, and as a middleman, he was easily taken in by the specious cry that the producer must be left to take care of himself, and that it was only the consumer towards whom we ought to show any regard. The power has been transferred from the consumer to the producer, and those who possess the power have no hesitation, as I think is borne out by the attitude of hon. Members below the opposite Gangway, in advocating measures which they believe will redound to their individual advantage, however much they may offend against the doctrines of Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill, as evidence of which I may remind the House of the Motion unanimously adopted upon Friday last regarding Government contracts, which, a few years since, would have been denounced as tending to deprive the people of the blessings of cheap lodgings and cheap clothing. The working classes have, however, realised that they have the means of securing their full share of increased prices, and that labour derives advantages from what formerly redounded only to the benefit of capitalists and landlords. There has, moreover, grown up a strong Imperial feeling among all classes of the people, and I think the Government may rely upon it that the old clap-net cries which at one time used to prevail have lost their hold upon the electors, and that there is now among all sections of the inhabitants of these Islands a firm determination in every possible way to advance legitimate intercourse between Her Majesty's subjects in all parts of the globe, and to promote the true interests and greatness of the British Empire.

Mr. J. Lowther

*(11.5.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I could have wished that the chances of the ballot had placed this Motion somewhat later, because, in some respects, it would have been better that the Canadian elections should not have been alluded to during the present Debate. It has been said that if this Motion were to pass, it would be a cordial message to Sir John Macdonald, but whether this Motion be passed or withdrawn, the sentiments of the House of Commons with regard to the Canadian struggle would remain precisely the same. I know that I shall be expressing the unanimous feeling of the House when I say that no inferences should be drawn from the present Debate, or from whatever may happen to the Motion, that we should in any way desire to influence the Canadian people in voting on the one side or on the other. I am disposed to think that we should—I will not say resent, but should dislike during our elections any such influence coming from any of our colonists to us; and I trust that all Parties, whatever happens in the present elections, though we have our predilections, and strong predilections, on the one side or the other, will feel convinced of the loyalty of the Canadian people towards this country. There are some respects in which I may say I cordially agree with the Mover and Seconder of this Resolution. I doubt whether the right hon. Gentleman (Sir L. Playfair) sufficiently appreciated the bearings generally of this question. If it were a question of Protection and Free Trade—if it were simply a question of that kind—then I can quite conceive that he would be perfectly right in almost every word he said, though not in all. But the issue is far wider. I believe, with many of my hon. Friends on this side of the House, and a great many hon. Members on the other side, that the feelings of this country towards the colonies during the last 25 years have become warmer, and that a great desire for nearer relations with our colonies has become distinctly a political feature of the present time. I would be prepared to acknowledge that the statements and sentiments which have fallen from the leading statesmen of the colonies deserve the respectful attention of this House, and that we should certainly endeavour to consider how far this fiscal question may be a political question in the very widest sense. I have from the commencement of my political career been one of those who have always held these views with regard to the colonies. There was a time when those of the extreme Radical school of Free Trade could scarcely be brought up to the proper mark with regard to consideration for the colonies, and when it was thought the colonies might be simply a burden to this country. They used to add up the expenses caused by the colonies and make an arithmetical calculation in respect to imports and exports, and then to consider whether the balance was in favour of our retention of the colonies or not. I am glad to think that any such ideas have ceased to be prevalent. Now, a fair appeal may be made to the country at large to consider fairly what are the interests of the colonies, at the same time with the distinct belief that there are common interests, and that this Empire is more powerful the more closely our colonies are knitted to it. Of course, all this may be difficult of proof, but it is the less necessary to prove it now than it was in times past, because it has become more accepted as a political axiom. I will concede to my right hon. Friend who spoke last that in another respect, too, there has been a change in public opinion. I was much struck by the remarks he made as to the change of sentiment with regard to the item of cheapness which has taken place in the country generally. I think hon. Members opposite will have felt that he was justified in saying that doctrines which used to be held almost as sacred—the doctrines of Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill—have no more that strong hold over the opinions of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite that they used to have. Being myself one who does not hold that those doctrines ought to be banished to Saturn, but who is convinced that they have rendered great service to this country and will continue to do so, I feel that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite have lost much of the firm ground on which they stood, because in so many directions they have abandoned those sound doctrines one of which was Free Trade, but others of which no longer command their adhesion and scarcely their respect. That being so, I must advise them to furbish up all their arguments for defending that sound position in which they still believe with regard to Free Trade. My right hon. Friend was perfectly correct in saying it will no longer do to speak of certain views as simply clap-trap. In these days not only Smith and Mill but every authority in the world has to submit to be questioned; the advocates of orthodoxy in every direction are obliged now to look to it that they are able to defend their case; and the sublimest truths of religion are questioned in sceptical and frivolous conversation. My hon. Friend brings forward this Motion with a view to bringing the colonies and the Mother Country closer together. The right hon. Member for Leeds connected this Motion with one made last year by my right hon. Friend the Member for Thanet. But there is another Motion with which it may be connected, one made in another place about a week ago, and which not only embraced the question of drawing closer together the colonies for the sake of trade, but which extended the object to the desirability of providing a fund for the common defence of the Empire. My hon. Friend has to-night laid no stress whatever upon that point, and those who supported him scarcely endorsed that view; but it is one of the points which has laid hold of the imagination of the colonists, that possibly they might by some re-arrangements of their fiscal systems contribute somewhat to the naval defence of the Empire. I hope I shall not offend any one by saying that I hope the colonial movement as it is called—that is, a movement for closer union with the colonies—will not be prejudiced by any suspicions that its champions have got a kind of sneaking desire to promote Protection at home. The right hon. Member for Thanet carries his badge upon his sleeve; others have not been quite so open. I am bound to say we must endeavour to scent out Protection, if I may say so, because Protectionists lurk in many places where you would scarcely expect to find them. Some of them mingle with the bi-metallists behind their silver robes; others join the Imperial Federationists and wrap themselves round in the folds of the Union Jack. I trust we may be able to keep separate this question of closer union with the colonies, because I am afraid, being in favour of that closer union myself, if it is suspected of too much of the Protection taint, it will not have that influence on the masses which we desire. I am anxious to keep the whole of this great question, in which I feel as deep an interest as any man, out of those questions which may prejudice it when we come to have it argued on platforms. The hon. Member for Staffordshire spoke of what he said on the platform; I presume he was able to put it to his constituents in this way—"Will you pay in the shape of somewhat dearer bread for the consolidation of the Empire?" I think it possible that the advantages of the consolidation of the Empire may be so great that, if the increase in the price of the loaf is extremely small, the producers, with whom the power now lies far more than with the consumers, may not object. I am not so absolutely certain of the answers to be given if the matter was considered at an election time, because the one Political Party would say, "You are going to increase the price of the loaf." If it were made a political question, if it were put as a question of making bread dearer, I am bound to say that no such plan would enter into the region of practical politics. That is my strong belief. But, on the other hand, I cannot deny that I think this country may well be prepared to pay something for continuing the union of the Empire. I hope our colonists will thoroughly understand that you could not put, in my judgment at least, a duty upon corn without raising the price of bread. The feeling among some of my hon. Friends is this. The area devoted to the production of wheat in the colonies is so immense that they would be able to provide for this country with the assistance of our own farmers, so that we might be independent of all other countries. I understand my hon. Friend to say that although the proposed change might increase the price of bread, the advantages gained in the greater consolidation of the Empire will be worth the sacrifice made. I ought, perhaps, to say that, in my judgment, it must raise the price of bread. What is the grievance of the Protectionists with regard to bi-metallism and the imports of wheat from India? It is that the wheat of India, with the bounty given it by silver, has lowered the price of wheat all over the world. What is the converse of that proposition? If the accession of India to the wheat-producing countries is sufficient to lower the price of bread, does it not stand to reason that the withdrawal of Russia or America from the wheat-producing countries from which we purchase will raise the price of bread? I am anxious to carry conviction to the minds of some of our fellow-subjects in the colonies, who think we might legislate in this direction, the extreme difficulties of such a course. What can we do? There are two great systems—one, the system of Customs Union; and the other that of imposing differential or discriminating duties. The hon. Member for Staffordshire pointed out that the United States of America is practically a Free Trade country, because there are no barriers of Customs between the different States. If our colonies were prepared for a Customs Union in that sense—that there should be Free Trade with no barriers of Customs to keep out English goods from the colonies or colonial produce from this country—if that were the case, I should say, "The colonies mean business, and let us see how far we can re-construct any portion of our fiscal system which militates against such results." I should say the difficulties would be enormous, though they ought to be faced for the sake of the great objects to be secured. I differ from the right hon. Member for Leeds, who supposed that if we had any Customs Union or arrangement by which favour was shown to the colonies, that the United States would have a right to interfere. I do not think the United States would have a right to remonstrate or interfere in the way he suggested. The right hon. Gentleman suggested England would be brought to her knees; but I must enter my protest against such an extreme application of the view, that under no circumstances could we make fiscal arrangements with our colonies without injuring other portions of our trade. If we find we could make the whole Empire one as regards Customs, surely we have the same right of Zollverein Union with our colonies as Germany has with Bavaria, or the United States among themselves. I claim for ourselves the same right. I think the right hon. Gentleman opposite will not deny that we have the right; but how near are we to any such consummation? What chance or hope have the colonies held out to us that they are prepared to move in this direction? The most they would do in the way of approaching this suggestion is that they will keep a wall 10 feet high against us and make it 11 feet high against foreigners. Supposing we made immense sacrifices to effect a Customs Union with the colonies, it might be that the opening made for our goods was on such a small scale that it would be but a slight relief against the immense sacrifices of trade we should be obliged to make in other directions, because of the imposition of dues. We ought to have securities from the colonies, not merely that they would put a 5 per cent. extra tariff upon foreigners, but that their tariff itself should be such as would be likely to protect this country from loss. In some articles their business might be sufficient in the quantity of goods taken from this country, but in many cases their tariff might be so prohibitive that the exports from this country might be lessened. What portion of foreign goods would be excluded, and what portion of our goods would be admitted in its place? I am afraid the portion of foreign goods which ours would displace would in many cases be very small. It is suggested that we should put on some duties in this country; but if we were to do that, they must be discriminating duties as against the foreigner. But how can we manage that with our present tariff and with the present items of consumption which we tax? What do we tax? We tax tea, tobacco, spirits, and wine. These are articles which are not produced in any quantity by our self-governing colonies, by Australia or Canada, and therefore it would not affect the position of those colonies as regards those articles. What should we have to do therefore? We should have to have recourse to other articles; we should not be putting a discriminating duty, but we should be putting on a duty for the first time, and there is the great difficulty. There are very few articles which are imported in so great a quantity from our colonies as to really affect their trade largely, with the exception of food stuffs, wheat, and wool. Supposing you put a duty on wool—

Mr. Goschen

VOL. CCCL. [THIRD SERIES.]

AN HON. MEMBER: No, no!

*MR. GOSCHEN: I certainly agree with that. Supposing you put a duty on raw materials—on wool—would not our manufacturers in Bradford and elsewhere have to pay 2 per cent. more for their wool than now?—and, in fact, from the falling off of competition they would have to pay 4 or 5 per cent. more. How then would they be able to compete with the manufacturers from abroad whom they are endeavouring to displace? If we endeavoured to secure a greater output for our manufacturers by imposing duties on raw material which hampered the industry, we should shatter a part of our commerce without getting that increase of manufactures by our colonies which we should all unanimously desire to see accomplished. I think I have put some formidable arguments before my hon. Friends. I do not mean to say that if the colonies came forward with proposals which meant large changes some alteration in our fiscal arrangements might not be brought about; but we have had no proof whatever of a desire of that kind on their part. None of the declarations of Prime Ministers or speeches made in the colonies show that the colonies would be prepared to do more than pay an addition of 5 per cent. on the small amount of imports which they take from foreign countries, or, as Mr. Hoffmeyer said, 2 per cent. That is all they propose, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds was justified in what he said with regard to the defence of the Empire. The arrangement suggested under the Hoffmeyer scheme is such that this country would have to pay £6,300,000, while the colonies would only pay £1,300,000. At the same time, I respect the view of the colonies that something should be done for Imperial defence. I have thought it right to say what I have said, not by way of throwing cold water on the desire of the colonies to come closer to this country, but it is only following a will-o'-the-wisp if we simply utter general sentiment, without pointing out some of the first conditions necessary to closer commercial relations, and some of the difficulties to be overcome. I confess, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, nothing would be pleasanter to me than to see the taxpayers of this country relieved of some of those gigantic sums for naval defence which they almost alone contribute at the present time. I am bound to say that the amounts contributed by the colonies towards naval defence in its broadest sense are extremely insignificant. The cost of defence has increased enormously; every ship, every gun, every article of war, has increased in expense to an alarming extent, and this country bears almost the whole of that increase, while we do protect our colonies, and they know that they can rely on our Navy securing the highways of commerce, and that right of access to all parts of the world to which our fellow-subjects in the colonies believe themselves quite as much entitled as any subject of the Queen living in Great Britain and Ireland. Therefore, I should be only too glad that colonial statesmen should approach the idea that there should be a wider area over which the cost of our Imperial defence should be spread. To come to close quarters with the Motion, I may say that nothing would give me greater pleasure personally than if representative men connected with the finances of the various colonies conferred together, and with me, as to what changes, if any, might be made on both sides. But to invite a formal Conference of all the representatives of the colonies without some basis or ground which would lead us to believe that some progress would be made, and to ask them to meet here without first principles having been settled upon which any arrangement could be come to, would seem to me to be a course which must end in disappointment, and would be unlikely to lead to any practical result. But I can assure my hon. Friends that Her Majesty's Government shares with them their desire that some means should be found to bring the colonies closer to this Empire; and we shall neglect no opportunity of seeing whether, out of the discussions which have taken place, and out of future discussions, some good may come, and such changes may be made as will, if they do not realise the dreams of my hon. Friend, at all events, result in good to all classes of the country. I do not deny that I am glad that it has been put forward to the people of this country, upon platforms and elsewhere, that our Colonial Empire is a matter of supreme importance; and I think the people may be fairly asked: is the House of Commons—are your leaders—prepared to make any sacrifice of convenience or pocket in order to contribute towards the solution of this question? The first thing is that we should decide what is our real object. I think the greater part of the House are agreed that if we could have closer commercial relations with our colonies it would be desirable. I think that even the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds would be glad that we should have closer commercial relations with the colonies. But do not let us ignore the tremendous difficulties, or encourage the colonies to believe that we can achieve impossibilities, or ask this country either to tax raw materials or take any steps which will substantially raise the price of living to the people.

2 M

Mr. Goschen

*(11.39.) MR. S. WILLIAMSON (Kilmarnock, &c.): This Motion, on the face of it, looks a somewhat harmless one; but I am inclined to think that it is not so harmless as it looks, and I sincerely hope the House will not give it much sympathy. It seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has gone quite far enough; but I should like to add a word or two to the forcible arguments against the Motion which have been brought before the notice of the House. We are asked to invite the self-governing colonies to confer with the Imperial Government upon the best means of developing the trade of the Empire. There are two doctrines in this country on the subject of the best means of developing the trade of the Empire. There is the party—who overwhelmingly preponderate amongst our mercantile classes—who believe that the best means of developing trade is by an unrestricted interchange of commodities—in fact, by Free Trade. On the other hand, there are the Protectionists, represented by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet—the party who speak about “the clap-trap of the cheap loaf." I would give one example of what that clap-trap means. It means that in France, with an Import Duty upon wheat, the artisan with a wife, and, say, four children on an average spends £4 10s. per annum, or 2s. per week, more upon flour than the artisan spends in England. To talk, then, of the clap-trap of the cheap loaf is simply monstrous, and I sincerely hope that that style of argument will not be indulged in. Why should we invite colonists to come here and confer with us as to the best means of developing trade? We set them already the best example by admitting all goods free. They, on the other hand, impose on our manufactures very onerous duties. Duties are levied either for the protection of native industries or for revenue purposes. Are we to dictate to other countries the mode of taxation they are to adopt? Are we to say, "You shall depart from your indirect mode of taxation and adopt a direct mode—an Income Tax or something of that kind, though it may be wholly unsuited to you." Let me present to you two examples: Victoria sends wheat, wool, and meat to this country, and the Argentine Republic sends wheat and meat. The Argentine Republic imposes duties on our manufactures for revenue purposes only, but Victoria imposes duties upon us largely for the purpose of protecting her own industries. Therefore she is much the greater sinner of the two. Are we, then, to adopt the measures proposed in favour of a colony which treats us in this way? If we do, what would be the result? Why the Argentine Republic, whose products were taxed by us, would retaliate by raising the duties on our goods or putting an Export Duty on goods sent to us. It is impossible that we can deal with the colonies in the way indicated. It would necessitate the breaking of our engagements with foreign countries who have given us the most favoured nation clause in our Commercial Treaties. The whole policy indicated in the Resolution is utterly unsuitable to this country as a large manufacturing nation, largely dependent upon foreign countries for its food supplies.

(11.48.) MR. COOKE (Newington, W.): I hope the hon. Member for Sheffield will withdraw his Resolution. I should like to vote for a closer union with the colonies, but not at the cost of having to adopt a system of Fair Trade. Who brings this Motion forward? The hon. Member for Sheffield, the hero of the celebrated Conference held at Oxford, where he submitted a resolution in favour of Fair Trade, and got only one supporter. The Conference met again at Wolverhampton, and the hon. Member brought forward his Resolution once more, but he did not dare to put it. The previous question was carried against him.

*MR. HOWARD VINCENT: No, no.

MR. COOKE: At all events, something happened which the hon. Member very much disliked. That not satisfying the hon. Gentleman, he became Chairman of the Land and Labour League, which advocated the principles of Protection. Members of that League came down into the county in which I live, and, in one town, finding me in the street, they asked me to take the chair at a meeting. I did so, although I told them I was opposed to every proposition that was likely to be brought forward. They held meetings of a similar character throughout the county, and I was not surprised, not long after, to receive from the secretary an application for a subscription to help to defray a debt of £20 they were unable to pay. Having, I hope, established the proposition that this Motion comes from a truly Protectionist source, I must congratulate the House on the altered tone in which Protectionists are now being addressed by Free Traders. To a great extent the cry for Protection is to be attributed to the tone in which the Free Traders are in the habit of addressing Protectionists. It would be better if instead of saying to them "Thou fool," we said, "Come, let us reason together." I am opposed to any proposition to reimpose Protective Duties, for Great Britain is an artificial country, which cannot live on its own resources. We are compelled to manufacture in order that we may live. We cannot supply ourselves either with sufficient raw materials for our manufactures or with enough food for our ever-increasing population. As to our trade with the colonies, it is very good now, and I doubt whether it would be any better under a system of Protection. The amount of trade we do with the colonies, and its character, was forcibly put before me the other day by a person who did me the honour of serving in my household very usefully for some years, and who went to the colonies two years ago. I asked her whether it was not a great change to go to Australia, and she said—"No, it was like being at home. If you went to the cupboard there was Colman's mustard and Cadbury's cocoa staring you in the face, and if that is not like being at home, what is?" I do not think the colonies are likely to take any more of our exports under a system of Protection. My hon. Friend was not, I think, quite fair in the quotation he made from a Cobden Club leaflet. I hope that the "forcible feeblers" of the Cobden Club will be able to do a little better than shower pamphlets of this kind among people who do not want to be convinced. I get any number of them myself, but I do not think they circulate among the masses of the people. My hon. Friend, in citing the pamphlet, did not say he quoted from that part of it which referred to fiscal federation based on Free Trade. He omitted the sentence "In any other market we should then compete successfully with all Protectionist rivals," and led the House to conclude that the paragraph actually supported the system of Protective Duties. Now, Sir, is it likely that the colonies will reduce their Protective Duties for the sake of drawing closer the bond between them and the Mother Country? What do they impose Protective Duties for? In order to develop their resources. Our position is very different from theirs. Our mineral and other resources are already developed, and we are in full swing as a manufacturing country. The colonies have not yet developed their mineral resources, and the staunchest Free Trader will admit that it is legitimate to impose Protective Duties in such cases in order to foster new industries. The colonies teem with mineral wealth, and they wish to become manufacturing countries in the course of time. Under these circumstances, it is, I think, hopeless to expect that the colonies, for the sake of drawing closer what is, after all, a somewhat sentimental bond, will so far neglect their material interests as to reduce their Protective Duties against the Mother Country. I do not wish to talk out the Motion, and I would appeal to my hon. Friend to withdraw it, so as not to put us in the invidious position of appearing to vote against that which we all wish to support—a close union between the Mother Country and the colonies—when we are really voting against the imposition of duties on goods imported into this country.

Mr. Cooke

*(11.58.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT: After the sympathetic speech of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer I beg leave to withdraw the Motion.

*MR. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the Motion be withdrawn? [Cries of "No!"]

Question again proposed.

The Previous Question, "That that Question be not now put,"—(Mr. William Henry Smith),—put, and agreed to.

MOTIONS.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Bill to amend the Law relating to Savings Banks, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 230.]

ASSESSMENT OF TAXES (REGULATION OF REMUNERATION) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Jackson, Bill to Regulate the Remuneration payable to Clerks to Commissioners of Income Tax and Inhabited House Duties, and to Assessors thereof, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jackson and Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 221.]

BRINE PUMPING (COMPENSATION FOR SUBSIDENCE) BILL.—(No. 118.)

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee of Seven Members, Four to be nominated by the House and Three by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That all Petitions against the Bill, presented three clear days before the meeting of the Committee, be referred to the Committee; that the Petitioners praying to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard against the Bill, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.—(Mr. Brunner.)

House adjourned at five minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 18th February, 1891.

Mr. SPEAKER took the Chair shortly after 12 o'clock, and at 12.30, as 40 Members were not present, Mr. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) moved that the House be counted. The House was accordingly counted; and 40 Members being found to be present, Mr. SPEAKER took the Chair at 12.33.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FACTORY AND WORKSHOPS ACT (1878),
AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 2.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(12.40.) SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I beg to move the Second Reading of the Factory and Workshops Act Amendment Bill, which seeks to amend the Act of 1878. Before I call the attention of the House to the provisions of the Bill and the object for which these provisions are submitted it will, perhaps, be well that I should briefly explain how it is that I, who have no practical knowledge of factory operations, should have been entrusted with the charge of this measure. It happened that in 1889 I and other Members representing Lancashire and Yorkshire were requested to meet and consider certain propositions which the operatives employed in textile manufactures were desirous of submitting to us. We came to the conclusion that it was our duty to comply with the request in order to discover if there was any particular evil in existence which called for a remedy, and, if so, to endeavour to provide it. I was appointed Chairman of the Committee of Members who met on that occasion, and in that way the Steam Prevention Bill of 1889 drifted as it were into my hands. The Members who were associated with me joined with me in rendering the Bill non-contentious. We communicated with the employers. I take no credit to myself for the manner in which the Bill was framed. It is true that I had to draft it; but the credit for it is also due to my hon. Friend the Member for South Manchester (Sir H. Roscoe), whose great scientific knowledge was of the utmost importance, and also to the hon. Baronet the Member for North-West Manchester (Sir W. H. Houldsworth), whose practical knowledge as an employer of labour assisted us materially. That Bill came into operation in the course of time; but it was a Bill that had a limited operation only, and its application was of a limited character. It applies only to those works into which artificial humidity is introduced. In consequence of the success of the steps which were then taken in the spring of last year, the operatives again placed themselves in communication with the Representatives of the constituencies to which they belong. They desired a further amendment of the Act of 1878, and they had found from experience that the best way of securing the objects they had in view was to enter into no contentious struggle with their employers, but to endeavour to arrive at an amicable arrangement. Under these circumstances, the Members to whom they applied endeavoured to carry out their views and wishes. Communications were opened with the employers of labour in order to accomplish this object, and a Committee selected from Lancashire and Yorkshire Members united in a strenuous and earnest effort to procure an agreement between all those who are interested in the subject. We met upon four days in April last; there was a full and complete discussion between the representatives of the employers and employed, but on certain matters of crucial importance we found that no agreement could be arrived at. Under the circumstances, it was decided that there should be a delegation, and that persons who had a practical knowledge of the subject and of all its details should again meet and endeavour to arrive at an agreement. In July there was such meeting, but no agreement was arrived at. The operatives, finding that they could not introduce a Bill that would be non-contentious, at last decided that they would bring in a Bill of their own. They applied to me to take charge of the measure. I represented to them my want of practical knowledge, but they refused my plea, and almost insisted I should consent to their wishes. Accordingly, I accepted the responsibility of introducing a Bill. A great deal has been said about my presumption in interfering in the matter, but I only reply that I am acting at the special request of those who are most deeply interested in the question. I have now to state, further, that when the operatives presented to me the heads of the Bill, feeling that I was not adequate to deal with the details, I suggested that a Committee of some 12 or 14 in number, many of them employers of labour, should be called together. A Conference was held, at which several Members of this House were present, and we discussed the details of the Bill, various objections being pointed out. I now come to the clauses of the Bill, and I respectfully invite hon. Members to follow me, although this is a Second Reading discussion. First, let me state the general provisions of the measure, and the directions in which they tend. The operatives are desirous that better provision should be made for the sanitary condition of the factories. I feel that that is an object which ought to be encouraged, and which every employer of labour is desirous of carrying out. The words sanitary arrangements include the subject of ventilation, which is of the utmost importance. The operatives also wish in the Bill to deal with the greater safety of the factory hands by affording them greater opportunities of escape from fire. The extent to which that shall be provided may be a matter for discussion, but the principle is one which, I presume, all are disposed to accept. In the next place, it is sought to secure greater protection from injury in consequence of the use of dangerous machinery. Then there is a claim on the part of the operatives that they should have an opportunity of testing the rate of payment for piece work, and there is a provision for a minimum fine in the event of an infringement of the Act, so that mere nominal fines shall not be imposed which will not meet the justice of the case. These are the principal objects the operatives have in view, and this Bill has been framed for the purpose of placing before the House the complaints they have to make against the existing system, and the remedies they wish to apply. There is every willingness to meet objections of a practical nature that may be founded on the possibility of injury to the employers' interest, and the operatives are prepared to make concessions, so as to secure that the measure shall not be taken out of the range of friendly discussion. The first clauses in the Bill relate to the sanitary condition of factories, and I think the House will regard them as reasonable. Upon Sub-section 3 of Clause 4 I believe that some contentious debate may possibly arise. As the present law stands, there is a provision that in every textile factory into which humidity is artificially introduced provision shall be made for the admission of 600 cubic feet of fresh air per hour for every person employed. Objection has been raised to the clause now proposed. It is said, in the first place, that 600 cubic feet of fresh air per hour cannot practically be introduced. I take exception to that statement, but I know it is said that in cold seasons the operatives do not require the introduction of such a large quantity of fresh air. I also agree that anything which interferes with the satisfactory carrying on of the work of a factory will be quite as detrimental to the interests of the operatives as of the employers. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham has made fun of admitting 600 cubic feet per hour of a Manchester fog into a factory, but I may explain that the reason why 600 cubic feet has been fixed upon is that that is the quantum provided in the case of steam factories by the Act of 1889. Still, the operatives are willing that the Inspectors shall lay down the limit, and, at any rate, the operatives of Lancashire have full confidence in Her Majesty's Factory Inspectors. All they desire is that, if increased duties are imposed on the Inspectors, there shall be an increased staff, and that they shall be men of practical knowledge, both in regard to the wants of the operatives and the interests of the employers. The operatives are quite willing to meet the objections of those who may pass a legitimate criticism upon the provisions of the Bill, and I am prepared to substitute for Sub-section 3 of Clause 4 a provision that it shall be the duty of the Inspector of Factories in each district to ascertain the state of ventilation in every room of a textile factory, and direct such arrangements to be made for the admission into such rooms of such quantity of air as may be sufficient to secure the health of the persons employed therein. Are there any employers of labour who can object to a provision of that kind? It is a simple proposal to leave the matter in the hands of the Factory Inspectors, and I think the concession made by the operatives is of a character that ought to bring any discussion upon this head to an end. The reason for the insertion of Clause 5 is, I think, apparent to every one. The duty of seeing that certain provisions of the Act of 1878 are carried out is cast upon the Sanitary Authority, which is composed of local gentlemen, many of whom, as a rule, are factory owners. What the operatives propose in Clause 5 is that where the Sanitary Authority is not sufficiently active the Factory Inspector shall have the power of representing the fact to the Local Government Board, in order that the Board may direct that proper provision shall be made for carrying out the Act. Clause 6 applies to the nature of the machinery that is to be more securely fenced, and Sub-section 5 provides that adequate provision shall be made for the escape of the operatives employed in a factory in the event of fire. It is proposed to amend the clause by making the Act apply only to rooms in communication with which there is not more than one staircase. Every building which provides more than one staircase would consequently be exempt from the operation of the clauses. A suggestion has been made that the clause should only apply to buildings erected after 1892, but I believe that a strenuous opposition will be offered by the operatives to that proposition. If the principle is right, surely we ought not to say that it shall not be applied to any existing structures. All that is asked is that, in the event of a fire in a factory, there shall be adequate means of escape for the operatives. Such a provision is enforced in the case of theatres, and I think it is not too much to ask that it shall also be applied to factories. I now come to Clause 7. It is a clause which does not take away any portion of the hours of labour, but it proposes to devote a greater period of time to the cleaning of the machinery. I am told that such a provision is not required in the worsted or woollen trade, but it certainly is required in the cotton trade and in other trades which require that the machinery shall be cleaned upon one day per week. In the case of cotton mills the cleaning takes place on a Saturday, but only half an hour is allowed, and it sometimes is done while the factory hands are at work and the machinery is in motion, the result of which is that accidents frequently occur. If that is not the system in the factories in which the woollen and worsted trade is carried on the clause need not apply. With that explanation and modification I hope the demand made by the Bill will not be deemed unreasonable. Clause 8 is comparatively an immaterial one, applying only to the question of holidays; and 9 is a clause confined simply to matters of procedure. Clause 10 is, I think, the only clause in the Bill which refers to factories generally as distinguished from textile factories, but I have heard of no objection in reference to it. Clause 11 is one which I believe is objectionable and obnoxious to several Members of this House, whose opinions are entitled to the greatest weight. I hope I may be allowed, in the first place, to say a few words in defence of the clause as it stands. It is said to have been introduced into the Bill in the interests of Trades Unionism, and that it is calculated to inflict great injury upon the commercial interests of the country. I may add that in regard to this clause I have been subjected to a great amount of personal abuse, not only for my ignorance, but for the bitter spirit of animosity with which I must be actuated. There is no foundation whatever for that statement, and I may remind the House that the matter dealt with by the clause has already been the subject of legislation. As far back as 1840 a Linen Manufactories Bill was passed by this House, and, although it only applied to Ireland, it was a Bill which was passed in compliance with the demands of those who were interested in the linen manufacture. Clause 16 of that Act provides that every warp given out by the manufacturer to a weaver shall be accompanied by a ticket signed by the manufacturer or his agent stating the length, breadth, and particular pattern of the work, the number of shots in a weft, the time at which the work is to be finished, and the price agreed upon for every yard of work, imperial standard measure, performed in a workmanlike manner. The fact that such an Act is in existence is, I think, an indication that Parliament has not been of opinion that such a provision ought to be scouted from its doors. I believe there have been numerous occasions in which the operatives have had cause to complain that the payment they have received has not been a correct payment. I ask, is there any other trade in the country in connection with which it would be permitted that the worker should not have the opportunity of knowing whether the payment made to him is a proper payment or not? It is a simple right that these men ask for. The argument against it is that every good employer does it already. But I am proposing to legislate not for good employers only, but for every employer. There is one hon. Member who has criticised the Bill with great intelligence—the hon. Member for Stalybridge. I take it he is one of the “good employer” class. I have had placed in my hand a little document, which reads—

Sir H. James

“Slashers No. 5; sorts 69, width 35, length 34, cuts 19, weft 35, pick 16½, web 30, &c. Materials given out. For Mr. T. H. Sidebottom, M.P.”

Now I ask, can there be any objection to a system which is carried out already in the works of a model Member of this House? But the operatives ask for less than what my hon. Friend thinks it right and reasonable to give as a matter of justice to his own men. When I can appeal to the justice which is done the operatives by men not on my own side of the House only, I think I have made out the case on behalf of those classes. I have received a letter from a representative of the Galashiels Chamber of Commerce, who informs me that this very clause now so much objected to is universally carried out in Scotland. There are Scotch Members in this House, and I venture to say that some representations have been made to them as to the justice or injustice of the clause, and I appeal to them to say whether what I have stated is true as to the practice in Scotland. The Scotch manufacturers, no doubt, are able to take care of their own interests, and their representatives will see that no injustice is done them. I hope I have proceeded step by step to show that this clause is not unreasonable if it is persisted in as it stands; but I will now state the concessions I am authorised to make on the subject. I am anxious to avoid using language which may be regarded as anything approaching clap-trap. When the operatives and those who represent them were informed that there were certain Members of the House who said that if all these particulars were given our manufacturers would be placed at the mercy of foreign competition, and of rival traders, they said, “That is not our object; the trade of the country is sufficiently handicapped already, and we have not the slightest wish to obtain any information which may place any employer in any worse position than he is in at the present moment.” Let me remind the House, in the first place, that this clause does not apply, even in the case of the cotton trade, to all the departments of that manufacture. It says that “every person engaged as a weaver in the cotton, worsted, or woollen trade, or as a winder, warper, or reeler in the cotton trade who is paid by the piece”

Sir H. James

shall have this information. It does not apply to the spinner or to the card-room hand. It is objected that this is rather a Cotton Operatives’ Bill, and that the woollen and worsted trades will suffer if this information is given. But I only want to secure that operatives employed in textile works shall have sufficient information to enable them to ascertain what rate of wages is paid. The concession I shall be prepared to move in Committee is as follows:—That everyone of the persons included in the clause as employed in a textile factory—

"And paid by the piece for work done by him, shall have delivered to him with all such work particulars thereof sufficient to enable him to ascertain at what rate of wages he is entitled to be paid."

A proper authority can be chosen to see that the information given is sufficient. The provision I shall thus suggest will give the operative only the information every good employer now gives him, and the operative will get no information which will enable him to disclose any secret. I can only say that if this question had been approached in an amicable spirit it would have been found that this Amendment would have been earlier proposed, and I think no one will now say that it is an unjust clause. Very little remains for me to say in respect of other clauses. There are some as to minimum penalties which will, I think, be very acceptable, but they are not of sufficient importance for me to deal with them in this discussion. I venture to recommend the Second Reading of this measure and its future stages to the favourable consideration of the House. I am aware that the Government have introduced a Bill which I have only had an opportunity of considering for a few minutes, as it was not placed in the hands of Members until this morning, but it scarcely deals with the matters with which this Bill deals. This Bill is only for textile factories; the Bill of the Home Secretary deals principally with workshops. There is a necessary Amendment which I have prepared and which I will put on the Paper to-day, namely, that the Act of 1878 is repealed only with respect to factories, not workshops. This Bill has been introduced for the purpose of stating what are the demands of the operatives in those matters which are important to them, and to which I now ask the attention of the Home Secretary and hon. Members. They will have to be dealt with sooner or later, and the Bill of the Government scarcely touches them. The fortune of the Ballot has been very good to me in giving me a selection of dates, and I think it will be a failure of duty on my part if I have secured a place I do not make use of the opportunity. I ask the favour of a Second Reading for the Bill now, and

I will put its future stages down according to the opportunities offered me. I hope the House will meet these proposals in the spirit in which they are made. We know the conflicts now carried on between capital and labour. We hear accounts of existing conflicts and rumours of conflicts likely to arise in the future. I know no way in which we may hope to prevent those struggles except by showing ourselves ready to deal fairly with demands which are just and reasonable. I believe there will be a great aggravation of these struggles if Parliament closes its ears to such just demands. To refuse to consider such a Bill as this would be to throw these men into the hands of interested agitators, and the responsibility for the evils which might result would rest upon Parliament if we do not do our best. It is in the spirit I have indicated that I have endeavoured to place the demands of these operatives, many of them being constituents of my own, before the House, and I venture again to recommend to its favour this measure, the Second Reading of which I now beg to move.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this Bill be now read a second time."

(1.30.) MR. OLDROYD (Dewsbury): There will not be lacking ample opportunity for the discussion of the grievances to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury has just referred in his concluding remarks. We have not only the Bill which is now before the House, but also another Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Poplar, and also this morning we have one circulated by the Home Secretary, and I am only apprehensive lest in the multiplicity of the Bills introduced for this purpose the tendency of the House should be in the direction of getting mixed rather than having the subject simplified. I must say that the very temperate speech in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury introduced the measure has very much simplified my position, and, with a little concession, I have no doubt that the almost unanimous support of the House, and especially of those Members who are interested in the technical subject of textile manufactures, will be secured. I have personally been anxious to support this Bill, because I think I detect within its four corners important objects and very worthy ones. I think it aims at achieving several important regulations connected with the conduct of textile manufactures, and will be of essential importance and benefit both to employers and employed. With regard to the clauses bearing upon the sanitary question, I am sure that most hon. Members heartily concur, and so also with regard to the clauses respecting ventilation and escape during fire. With regard to the fencing of machinery, and also with regard to the clause last referred to by the introducer of the Bill—Clause 11—dealing with the subject of specifications of contracts and of prices. I am quite sure that, put as it is in a new form, the House will heartily approve of it. But, although the objects of the Bill are, in my judgment, worthy ones and good ones, I think that there are discernible in the Bill itself and the way it is drafted traces of that want of experience to which the right hon. Gentleman has duly referred. And, more than that, there are indications in the Bill that it has been drafted specially with reference to the cotton trade, because some of the clauses are particularly ill-adapted to the woollen and worsted manufactures. Moreover, I think in some respects too much importance is attached to the opinion and discretion of the Inspectors, and there is a little tendency to depose from authority and control the owners and occupiers of the factories. But, notwithstanding all the difficulties which naturally attach to a Bill of this sort, involving a large amount of technical detail, I shall feel disposed to give my support to the Second Reading, but I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the propriety, the expediency, and, in fact, the necessity of referring this Bill to a Select Committee rather than leaving it to be dealt with across the floor of the House. There are intricacies connected with our textile industries—intricacies that are daily increasing—which it is almost impossible to discuss across the floor of the House, and I think the right hon. Gentleman will take a step promotive of his measure if he consents to it being referred to a

Mr. Oldroyd

Select Committee, because then expert evidence can be brought before that Committee, who will be able to thoroughly digest and understand the points raised. As amended by that Committee the Bill would ultimately be presented to the House in a form not only acceptable to employers, but to employed. I will not detain the House more than a few minutes in referring to some of the clauses which the right hon. Gentleman himself has referred to, and from some of which he has removed very pertinent objections which had been raised already. With regard to Section 4, which deals with ventilation, I would point out that the injection of 600 cubic feet per head employed in each room would mean the removal by displacement of the whole of the atmosphere in some rooms once in eight hours. I believe that such is the case; but there are other cases where larger numbers of hands are employed, and where the 600 feet per head would necessitate the displacement of the total in a given room in one hour rather than in eight hours. It seems to me that in cases of this kind some modification would be necessary. It is very necessary that the atmosphere of such rooms be kept very steady, and, with such displacement, it would be impossible to maintain an equitable atmosphere. My experience now is that in most cases the maintenance of the temperature necessary in winter takes something like 10 or 15 per cent. of what is consumed in motive power; but, if this Bill were passed in its present form, I am quite sure that that would be raised to 20 or 25 per cent. I am sure we should have very general complaints from the workpeople themselves, whose health would be endangered by so constant a change of temperature. But the suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman in his introduction of the Bill gives one the hope that some modification may be arrived at which will be acceptable to all parties. With regard to Section 6, I think there is very little objection indeed; but with regard to the fencing of hoists this is another case where it is impossible in any Act of Parliament to draw up a clause which will meet all cases. There are hoists and hoists. In some cases they are on the premises but in separate blocks of buildings, which are used only as warehouses—where only a few people have access—and it seems almost unnecessary, in fact absolutely unnecessary, that they should be protected. In cases where there is a large amount of traffic there might be danger, but these hoists are attended all day, both in ascent and descent by one man, who is responsible for its proper working. As regards the fencing of machinery, it seems to me that the terms of that clause are very broad. The owners and occupiers would be at the mercy of any nervous Inspector, it might be of an Inspector such as we heard of the other night, who had obtained a gold medal at a University, but who, in the matter of machinery, was ignorant and inexperienced, and who might fancy dangers where dangers do not exist. I am glad to find the right hon. Gentleman is willing to alter Sub-section 5 of Clause 6, dealing with fire escapes. I know that there are sometimes what are commonly called fire-proof mills where it seems that a second escape is entirely unnecessary, and in those cases the modification which the right hon. Gentleman has suggested is a reasonable one—that where two staircases are provided it is not necessary that further security should be taken. But there are in some mills a hoist and a staircase, and it seems to me that those two would perhaps be satisfactory for the purposes of security. With regard to Section 7, I think that even the modification which the right hon. Gentleman has suggested would scarcely meet the case. It seems to me that it would constitute the thin end of the wedge that would lead to an agitation for a reduction of the hours of labour. I am not one of those pessimists who think that such a reduction of the hours of labour in our textile factories would lead to the destruction of the industry; but I do think that, in face of the competition that exists, it seems tempting Providence to reduce the hours of the existing Factory Acts. There are one or two sub-clauses in Section 7 which would also require attention in Committee. I see it is provided that where there is machinery in motion the presence of operatives shall be deemed as signifying that they are employed in that room. I speak within the knowledge of a large number of hon. Members when I say that employers find great difficulty in getting their employés to leave the premises at meal times, and, although some of us have provided dining-rooms, a great many of the operatives are averse to using them. They do not like dining in public, but prefer to do so privately. They do not like exposing what they have in the way of victuals to the scrutiny and criticism of those about them. It appears, also, that there must be a large number of premises in this country where the provision of rooms for purposes of refreshment would be a matter of very great difficulty. And now I come to Clause 11. The right hon. Gentleman has suggested a very important modification of the clause—a modification which I think will meet with the approval of the House—but I wish to point out that the alteration now suggested by the right hon. Gentleman was rejected by a majority of the operatives who met at the Westminster Palace Hotel. As drafted in the Bill Clause 11, although in many cases acted upon by manufacturers, is a provision which is impracticable. It is not possible to draft a clause which will meet every case, and so far as my own works are concerned, I may say that there are several matters connected with weaving, and which bear upon the amount to be paid for the work done by the weaver, which are altogether omitted from the clause. There is one department of weaving—namely, the blanket trade—which I find is conducted on entirely different principles. The operatives in that trade are paid by weight entirely, which shows how difficult it is to draw up a Bill, or even discuss it across the floor of this House, so as to meet every emergency. I am, however, very anxious that the object aimed at by Clause 11 should be secured, because I believe it necessary for the protection of the workmen against fraudulent and ill-disposed employers that this legislation should be enacted, not so much for the good employers as for those who are less scrupulous in their dealings. I believe Clause 11, if acted upon, would be one of the best clauses in the Bill, and would tend to the removal of what now constitrates a subject of considerable friction between employer and employed. But the clause as it ought to be drafted should imply that the workman should have a right to expect and receive from the employer with a batch of work such information as would lead him to know what remuneration he would receive for the work, but no further information which might tempt him to disclose particulars to unscrupulous competitors. I shall be happy after the modifications announced to vote for the Second Reading of the Bill; but I hope it will be sent to a Select Committee, it may be in conjunction with the measure of the Home Secretary. Evidence can then be given both on the part of the employer and employed, so that we may be prevented from passing legislation which may hamper or harass industries which are of such great importance to the prosperity of the country.

(1.50.) SIR W. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I confess, Sir, it appears to me that the objections that have been taken against this Bill, even in its original form, are not at all justified by its provisions. I am quite sure that those of us who are supporting the Bill cannot complain of any criticism that may be offered, but I do think that the objections that have been taken against the Bill, even in its original form, are not at all justified, and have been founded on some misunderstanding, and the practical working of the measure in some instances has not been understood, even by practical men. I am very glad to find that there is likely to be a consensus of opinion with regard to the main provisions of the Bill, and that no serious opposition is to be offered, but I cannot help thinking that although the employers may, in the first instance, have looked upon the Bill as to some extent hostile to their interest, it will really be a protection to the good employers, who at the present time are voluntarily expending considerable amounts of money in the erection of mills and in various improvements for the benefit of their workpeople. It will do a great deal to protect employers who are handicapped by others who are not inclined voluntarily to do the same for their workpeople. Not only will the workpeople be benefited as they ought to be, but the Bill will prevent those who voluntarily give these conditions to the workpeople from being handicapped by competitors who are less scrupulous in the matter. The outcry which has been raised against Clause 4—the Ventilation Clause—has very much astonished me. The clause deals with the 600 cubic feet of fresh air to be admitted, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury has stated is the quantity of air provided in the Cotton Cloth Factories Bill passed a few years ago. Well, if there is one class of workroom in which it has been contended that the admission of a large quantity of cold air in certain conditions of the outside atmosphere will be prejudicial to the work, it is in those very factories as to which Parliament has already legislated, and has provided that that amount of air shall be admitted. After all, practical experience is probably the best guide. I notice that a member of the deputation who waited on the Home Secretary the other day objected very strongly to this ventilation, whilst, as a matter of fact, the quantity of air this gentleman admits throughout his factories is considerably greater than that provided by the Bill. I can also give an instance within my own knowledge where the quantity of air that is admitted into the factory is not less than 9,000 cubic feet per minute, which, under the Bill, would permit of 900 people being in these rooms. That is in an industry of very great delicacy, although I admit that it is not on all fours with the factories under this Bill, but it requires special conditions of temperature and moisture. I think there is some misunderstanding with regard to the mode in which it is proposed that air should be admitted, and I think there is a word in the clause which might well be altered if the Bill is going to stand in its original shape. To my mind, "admission of air" is not the proper way to describe the process which I believe is the true one to adopt in order to secure good ventilation. It is really the exhaustion of air, because if we exhaust a large quantity of air from a place fresh air must find its way into the building, and there must be

Mr. Oldroyd

"admission" of it; but that is a different thing to supplying special openings. There is nothing like a process of absolutely compelling fresh air into a room; and, as a matter of fact, in the manufactory to which I have referred the fanners for exhausting air have been in operation for a considerable number of years, and there has been no complaint of them from the workpeople, who, on the contrary, have experienced very great advantage from them. There was a time when provision was made for the admission of air, and the workpeople objected very strongly and asked that the openings should be closed. They were closed, but the fanners were kept in operation, and the rooms remained well ventilated without the slightest inconvenience to the workpeople. I am glad to find that the argument of expense has not been used very seriously, because I have here a catalogue of mechanical instruments for providing for ventilation, and I find that even in a shed where there are 600 workpeople, the largest number employed in any workshop, for £16 a fanner can be placed there to take out 600 cubic feet of air a minute. With regard to Section 7, providing for an additional half hour for cleaning, I think the best course would be to withdraw the clause absolutely from the Bill. The practical effect of the clause would be to reduce the working time in the factories of this country by half an hour, and it is not in the interests either of employer or employed in this country that the hours of labour should be further reduced. At the Berlin Conference there was an attempt made to reduce the hours of labour throughout the countries of Europe to 66 per week as a minimum; but in this country the hours of labour are only 56 per week, because half an hour is devoted to cleaning, and I am quite sure that both the operatives on the one hand and those engaged in manufacturing trades on the other must feel that they cannot afford to be handicapped any further with regard to the hours in their competition with foreign countries. It seems as though the argument of the operative is that the cleaning is done now at other times, and that if this half hour is taken for cleaning on Saturday these other times will be devoted to work and not to cleaning but I doubt very much if that course would be taken. There are very few factories in the country where the half hour is at present devoted to cleaning at all. It is the custom in an immense number of factories, at the request of the workpeople themselves, that the doors should be opened immediately after the hour at which the engine stops, and as a general rule the workpeople devote part of their meal times to cleaning, and are ready to go out when the engine stops, so that the half hour is not used practically for cleaning purposes, and to increase that half hour to an hour would not mean more time devoted to cleaning, but an additional half hour of play instead of work. Every employer would be glad to give the operatives another half hour for play if he could do it consistently with his own interests and those of the workmen, but under present circumstances he cannot make the sacrifice. If any proposition of the kind is seriously contemplated, I believe it will have to assume an entirely different form, because there are stoppings during the week at present for cleaning purposes, and in many trades it is found to be more convenient to clean twice a week rather than to leave the cleaning to be done entirely at the end of the week. I strongly urge upon those in charge of the Bill that the simplest course would be to withdraw the clause altogether, as I believe it is a clause not desirable in the interests of the trade to pass. With regard to the particulars of work, that is a subject which will have to be very carefully considered. In the great majority of trades, and in those I know best, these particulars are given. The principle, I think, is thoroughly right that the workpeople should know as far as can be what are the wages they are being paid, so as to be able to calculate when put on new work the amount they should receive; and I think it quite right that those who defend the interests of the workpeople should be able from time to time to examine the various lists and data upon which the work is paid, in order to see that there is fair play between employers and employed. With regard to the minimum penalties, I think the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill forgot to mention rather an important matter. As the clauses stand, they are of an excessively drastic character. It has been represented, and very fairly represented, that there are cases where an employer can be brought up for a contravention of the Act when it is not intentional or wilful on his part, and in fact in opposition not only to his regulations but his personal wishes, and in cases of first offence of that character large penalties should not be imposed. But the right hon. Gentleman forgets that there were clauses drafted and practically adopted at the Conference to which he has referred which would have met this difficulty. They would provide that on the first offence the minimum penalty should not come into play, but that it should be left to the discretion of the Magistrate, and that only when a second offence was committed within a period of two years after the first conviction should this high minimum penalty come into force. There is no doubt it is desirable that the law should be enforced, as it is a protection to good employers against bad ones. It is well known that there are employers—and especially Limited Companies, which being Corporations have no consciences—who persistently contravene the law, the fines, which are on a small scale, being paid freely; and I have even heard of cases where those who were interested have actually sat upon the Bench to adjudicate—if not in their own, in their brother's cases—and that most insignificant fines have then been imposed for very grievous offences. If the minimum fines are guarded in the way I have mentioned, I think minimum penalties might very properly be inserted in the Bill. In my opinion, no exception can be made with regard to fire escapes in the case of fireproof mills. The danger is quite as great in fireproof mills as in non-fireproof mills. It is, indeed, a fact that the most disastrous fires take place in fireproof mills. But without arguing the question on that point, it should be remembered that the great difficulty in the way of people escaping in case of fire is not so much the flame as the smoke, and that difficulty might occur just as much in a fireproof mill as in a non-fireproof mill. Care should, therefore, be taken that there are sufficient exits. The clause should not be too drastic, so as to require useless new staircases to be made; but there are many factories, especially old factories, which are complete traps—where in case of fire there is very little doubt there would be loss of life. In those cases the proposal of the Bill is a very fair and reasonable one. I hope the House will accept the Bill, especially with the considerable modifications which the right hon. Gentleman has indicated. The proposal has been made that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. At one time I was inclined to think that would be the best course; but the question has now been reduced to such small proportions, especially after the concessions which have been announced to-day, that I do not think a Select Committee is at all necessary. Of course, when we have an opportunity of looking into the Bill of the Government we may find there are certain points—although from a cursory glance at it I do not think there are—which might make us disposed to send this Bill to a Committee, but after what has taken place I think that would be an unnecessary waste of time. I hope there will be a conciliatory spirit on both sides, and I earnestly trust the House will read the Bill a second time. (2.15.)

Sir W. Houldsworth

(2.32.)* MR. CALEB WRIGHT (Lancashire, S.W., Leigh): I shall be very brief in my observations. I think I know a little of the spinning business as a practical spinner, having been in the trade nearly 70 years, 45 of them as an employer. I have always been in favour of all necessary means to promote the health of the workers; but I must ask the House to hesitate before it make laws which are not likely to improve the trade, but may hamper employers. I object decidedly to the clause dealing with ventilation, though I admit it is essential that all workshops shall be properly ventilated. I think the ventilation of workshops has very much improved in the last 20 or 30 years. My impression is that if 600 cubic feet of air per head per hour were admitted into a mill the result would be great shrinkage in the fine spinning; while in cold, and wet, and foggy weather the breakage would be great, and the resulting work would be very imperfect. I was in favour of the Ten Hours Bill, and have been in favour of reducing the working hours since that Bill was passed. Before 1847 the hours of work were 72 per week, but now they are 56½, which is a reduction of 15½ per week. Although there has been that large reduction of hours the wages of the workers are very much better now, and the purchasing power of their wages is much increased, so that I say the working people in factories have been very much benefited by the Ten Hours Bill. But that is no reason why we should still further contract the hours of labour. We must remember we have keen competitors on the Continent and in other parts of the world, where working hours are very long and where wages are low; and if we in this country are to maintain our pre-eminence in the cotton manufacturing industry it must be by the workmen and the employers doing justice to one another, and avoiding any acts which may hamper the trade. I am very glad some of the clauses are to be modified, and I think the best possible solution of the whole matter would be for the present Bill and the Government Bill to be both submitted to a Select Committee.

(241.) MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.):* I can say of my own knowledge that no measure now before this House has caused more lively interest or deeper discussion outside the House, particularly in the great manufacturing districts of Lancashire and Yorkshire, than the present Bill. In my opinion, it is a wholesome sign of the times that such a measure as the one before the House should be thought worthy of attention. There are several Bills on the same subject as well as the Government Bill. Whether it will be found expedient to refer them all to a Select Committee I know not; but I would venture to urge on those who are responsible for them the necessity of separating questions of detail from the main principle which is involved in them all. It is not generally known that both parties interested in this legislation complain of the provisions of the present Bill. The employers, on the one hand, complain of the harsh and drastic character of the measure, while the operatives think it does not go far enough; and I think the duty of the House will be to hold the balance fairly between the conflicting opinions. On the part of the employers it is urged that in the present days of foreign competition and disputes between capital and labour the conditions under which the manufacturing industries of the country are carried on are already at a point of very severe tension, and that what is required is rather that they should be set free from special legislation than that they should be further hampered in that respect. In that spirit the Bradford Chamber of Commerce, at a special meeting convened on Monday last to consider the provisions of this Bill, passed a resolution to the effect that, while welcoming any reasonable provisions tending to the safety of the workpeople, the Chamber, having regard to the very objectionable nature of Sir Henry James's Bill, requested the local Members to oppose it, except on the condition that a Select Committee should considerably modify the objectionable clauses. I think that resolution might not have been passed if the Chamber had been aware that such a moderate and conciliatory tone would be taken by the right hon. Gentleman in proposing the Bill. The most objectionable clause to employers of labour in the Bradford District is Clause 11, and the proposals the right hon. Gentleman has suggested will no doubt considerably modify the opposition raised against it. It is impossible, in the course of a Debate like this, to do more than lay down certain principles on which legislation shall proceed, for anything like a discussion of the clauses in detail must of necessity be deferred until the Committee stage is reached, or the Bill is read a second time, or referred to a Select Committee. The employers—certainly those in the West Riding of Yorkshire—are, I am sure, anxious to promote the comfort, convenience, and sanitary wellbeing of their workpeople. I believe what are called bad employers are very rare. On the other hand, I must claim for the operatives a disposition to meet the employers fairly and honestly, and to adopt in the negotiations with them a conciliatory and commonsense attitude. As an instance of the difficulty of dealing with this question in a Second Reading Debate, I may mention that Mr. H. B. Priestman, in supporting the resolution of the Bradford Chamber of Commerce, said that if there was one thing a Bradford spinner or weaver objected to more than another it was a draught; while, on the other hand, I have this morning received a letter from a workman urging me to do all in my power to pass the present Bill, stating that at the present time the thermometer in the shed where he is working is at 80 degrees, while in the summer it is sometimes at 105 degrees. He says that in the carding room there is no fresh air whatever, and adds—

“We who work in it are like hothouse plants—poor and sickly looking—and cannot stand cold weather.”

I think such testimony as this must be invaluable to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill, as showing that, with regard to the provisions for the better ventilation of these places, he has the earnest good wishes of a large body of working men. The whole question of factory inspection is involved in the Bill. The truth is that the condition of the Factory Inspection Department of the Home Office has been for a long time past in a most chaotic condition. I obtained a Return in 1887, from which it appeared that the number of Factory Inspectors was totally inadequate for the duties required of them; that each Inspector was enormously overburdened with the population to which he had to attend, and that the areas in which the Inspectors worked were unascertained, and were unascertainable, by the Home Office. There were at that date only 56 Inspectors and Sub-Inspectors for the whole of the country. In some cases the population amounted to upwards of 2,000,000. For instance, the Inspector in charge of the South Metropolitan District, including Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, had to look after a population of 2,905,000. The Dublin District Inspector had a population of 2,221,000 to deal with; the Glasgow Inspector a population of 2,690,000; and the Cork and Munster Inspector a population of nearly 2,500,000. The Return also showed that 37 of the Inspectors were unaware of the areas in which their work was supposed to be done.

Mr. Byron Reed

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): Nothing of the kind.

*MR. BYRON REED: I find it stated in the Return that in parts of Berks, Wilts, and Somerset the area, acreage, and population “cannot be ascertained.” The same is the case with part of the Notts District, part of the North-East District, part of the North-West Division, part of Stirlingshire, and part of the Leicester Division.

MR. STUART WORTLEY: I do not quite know that this is material to the present Bill; but it is a serious matter as regards administrative efficiency, and I cannot allow the hon. Member's remarks to go uncontradicted. The Return does not profess to give the geographical area of the Inspectors' districts; because, as I told the hon. Member at the time, this could not be given, as the districts are not coterminous with the parish or other district boundaries. It was only because we had not had a special and expensive survey of our Inspectors' districts that we could not give it.

*MR. BYRON REED: I am obliged to my hon. Friend, but I note that he does not touch the grievance of the enormous amount of population confided to the care of one Inspector, and the consequent total inadequacy of the staff. I hope in the discussion this question will not be lost sight of, and that the Home Secretary will find it in his power to recommend to the House, as a result of the discussion, an adequate increase in the staff, rather of the sub-inspecting than of the chief inspecting class. For that purpose I would suggest that working men themselves might be advantageously employed in that capacity. Some time ago I took occasion to interview a number of representative working men in my own constituency in regard to this question of factory inspection. One of them said he had been a worker for 40 years, and that he had never for 30 years of that time seen an Inspector. Another, who had worked for 50 years, had seen an Inspector only once. Another, who had worked for 30 years, had not seen an Inspector for 20 years of that time. All of them were in agreement that the present system of inspection was merely an apology for inspection, and, indeed, from the facts stated in the Return to which I have referred, I do not see that anything else could be expected. It will be idle to pass this Bill unless concurrently you increase the number and define the areas of the Inspectors. I think that this side of the House, which has always been honourably identified with legislation for the benefit of the workers in mines, and mills, and factories throughout the Kingdom, will, by carrying into law during the present Session such a measure as this, assisted by whatever amount of experience it may command, add yet one more laurel to the wreath it may well be proud to wear, as crowning the honest hard work it has so well and worthily done for the toiling masses of the country, many of whom are so often unable to help themselves. I beg, therefore, to offer my general and sincere support to the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, which I hope will be allowed to pass its Second Reading to-day without a Division. I trust also that in Committee, and upon the lines laid down by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir H. James) in the very temperate speech in which he introduced the measure, it may be so amended as to meet all reasonable objections, and that in the end a very practical piece of legislation will speedily be added to the long roll of similar measures that have been passed by the British Parliament.

(3.3.) MR. J. A. BRIGHT (Birmingham, Central): It would have been a matter of great pain to me to have felt it necessary to oppose this measure, but as it stood when it was first printed I should have felt compelled to take that course. I am now, however, enabled to offer it a general support. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to me at the beginning of his speech; and I may here say that I am sorry that from a somewhat jocular remark I made when the deputation referred to was before the Home Secretary the right hon. Gentleman should have thought I treated the subject with anything like levity. Nevertheless, I think I succeeded in dispelling a little of the fog which obstructed the question of which we were then talking. The subject of ventilation was mentioned by the hon. Member who preceded me, and it was stated that it would take eight hours to change the amount of air in a room by means of the ventilation proposed. I calculate that in some parts of a factory it would be changed in less than an hour. The hon. Member for Manchester (Sir William Houldsworth) has alluded to the works with which he is connected, and has stated that more than this amount of air is there introduced already; but the works of the hon. Member are very different from those of many other manufacturers of textile fabrics. In most cases a very small number of persons are employed in the rooms of his factory, and it is easy to introduce 600 cubic feet of air per head per hour without making the air unduly moist or unduly dry. 600 cubic feet of air is not a very large amount, but it should be remembered that what is right at one time of the year and under one set of conditions, can hardly be right at another time of the year and under a different set of conditions. The appliances for admitting a certain amount of air should be supplied and kept in working order, but their application and the setting of them to work should be adapted to the circumstances. If the workpeople complain of the air being too close I am sure that every cotton spinner would willingly admit more; because if it were found that the admission of air stopped the progress of the manufacturing process no one would find it out sooner than the working people, and they would be the first to complain of the hindrance thereby caused to their work. From what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury has proposed I gather that it would be left to the Inspector to judge whether the amount of air was sufficient or not, and I suppose the Inspector would be prompted to see to this by the representatives of the workpeople. It is much more likely that the master would be the first to complain of the ventilation than the workmen. According to my knowledge and experience, the workpeople are very slightly educated on the subject of ventilation. They hardly ever open the windows of their houses, and when I have provided ventilators for them I have found that the very next day they have been stuffed with rags or brown paper. Clause No. 6 of this Bill, which relates to the fencing of machinery, is one of the clauses that has attracted my attention. It appears that under it the Inspector will have an arbitrary power to order the fencing of machinery as he may think fit. I think that that proposal is much too arbitrary. The Inspector is, generally speaking, a gentleman of great cultivation and knowledge, but he has not, at any rate when he commences his duties, much practical acquaintance with the things he has to inspect, and it might be that with the idea of increasing the safety of the workpeople he might order a guard to machinery which would practically prove a source of danger to them. I think that there ought to be means of arbitration in regard to these matters, and I am not quite sure whether it is provided in this Bill, and that someone well acquainted with all the facts and circumstances ought to be called in whenever any difficulty arises on these questions. Another point I desire to refer to is the extra half hour for cleaning. I find that the present difficulty is that of keeping the people in the factory when the cleaning hour arrives. They will do the cleaning at any time rather than during the cleaning hour. I should think it would be a great improvement if instead of stopping the engine half an hour sooner than at present the workpeople were allowed to remain in the factory half an hour longer if they care to do so. At present the engine stops at half past 12 on Saturdays, and the people are supposed to leave the mill at one, but if they were to let the people remain and if they liked to clean until half-past 1, the difficulty would be obviated. Another point on which I think the Bill requires amendment is this: during mill hours the owners of factories should not be compelled to turn out the workpeople in wet or inclement weather. Of course, at present if the people remain in factories to eat their dinners it is almost impossible when they have finished eating to prevent their doing little odd jobs to the machinery at which they have been working, such as tying threads and attending to other such matters. If you were to compel the engines to stop during that time, as at present, and not compel us to turn the workmen out, I think it would be an improvement. I remember some years ago when the Inspector came into a factory I was connected with and found the people doing small things in the room during the dinner hour, he compelled the people to go out, and the consequence was that he was hooted out of the place. I think, therefore, that the arrangement I suggest is one that would be welcomed not only by the masters but also by the workpeople. I come now to Clause 11. I noticed that when the right hon. Gentleman (Sir H. James) was mentioning some Act that had been passed a great many years ago referring to the linen trade he said the information sought to be given by this Bill was given then; but I think he will find that in the case referred to the accounts of the warps are not given, which proves that it was not considered necessary that the people should know all the particulars here asked for. I maintain that it is not necessary to give them these particulars, and that if they know the length of the warp, the number of picks, and the fineness of the reed, that is all it is essential for them to know. I understand, however, that the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to modify this clause. The right hon. Gentleman has alluded to the Bill relating to steaming sheds, which is only a small part of the question. This Bill, in reality, deals with a great many trades besides the cotton trade, and I am rather surprised that before bringing it in my right hon. Friend did not consult the representatives of some of those trades, which are so different from the cotton trade. This Bill appears to have been brought on almost exclusively for the purpose of meeting the wants of the workers in the cotton trade. But there are a great many different sorts of textile trades. There are the silk trade, the carpet trade, and the lace, woollen, flax, and jute trades. These are all different and require different regulations. It appears to me it would be absolutely necessary, in order to arrive at any just conclusion in these matters, that the Bill should be considered by some sort of Committee. The questions of ventilation and cleaning and of the information to be given to the workers are all very different in the different trades; and, therefore, I trust the Bill may be submitted to a Committee which will take account of all these differences. Under these circumstances, I shall have pleasure in supporting the Bill of my right hon. Friend, though I must confess that as a manufacturer I naturally feel a little jealous of the multiplication of points it proposes upon which the Factory Inspector may come into collision with us. The hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Byron Reed) spoke as if we who own the factories are a species of ogre always trying to extract more than we ought from the working people, and thereby necessitating the appointment of a vast horde of Inspectors to supervise our proceedings. I fancy, however, that the workpeople would not endorse this view. I think that as it is the Inspectors we already have perform their duties exceedingly well; at any rate, so far as the district in which I live is concerned, the Inspector is most attentive, and some of us have occasionally thought a little too attentive. I certainly should object to an enormous increase of Factory Inspectors, who could do no good, and would probably be led into collision with the working people quite as often as with the masters who employ them.

Mr. J. A. Bright

(3.15.) MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham): I think, Sir, that the conciliatory speech in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury introduced this Bill has gone a great way towards disarming opposition, and I do not suppose that there will now be any serious resistance to its passing the Second Reading stage. The right hon. Gentleman, in his introductory remarks, referred to certain criticisms that had been passed on his action in bringing forward this Bill. I do not suppose that any one of us is altogether exempt from criticism in regard to the course he has taken on this question; and, for my own part, I may say that I have been subject to a good deal of hostile criticism, because some time ago I took upon myself the responsibility of introducing an important deputation of employers to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in order that their views on the matter might be made known. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury made a pathetic appeal to this House to consider and do justice to the claims of the working man. Now, Sir, I do not think that in the present House of Commons there is the slightest fear that the interests of the working man are in danger; perhaps, on the contrary, the temptation to which we are exposed is that we should think the working men are the sole class in the community whose representations are to be considered at all, and that we should go down on our knees to the working men and accept implicitly everything they dictate, because they are to the employers as, perhaps, a thousand to one in the manufacturing constituencies we represent. I, however, introduced that deputation, because I considered that even employers in these days still have their rights, and that it is perfectly proper that they should represent their views to the Home Secretary on a Bill brought in, as the right hon. Gentleman himself has admitted, solely in the interests of the working men. The right hon. Gentleman has made most important concessions in view of the criticisms of that deputation, and I think that this Debate has been a very curious and instructive one, in this respect: no hon. Member has risen to support this Bill in its entirety. On the contrary, it has been so much whittled away by the concessions that have been made, not only by the concessions made by the right hon. Gentleman himself, but by the remarkable concessions of the hon. Baronet the Member for Manchester, who actually proposed that one of the most important clauses of the Bill should be struck out altogether, and said the Bill had been drawn in much too drastic a form, that I do not consider it a matter of great importance whether after the Bill has passed its Second Reading it is sent before a Committee or not. It seems to me that by the time this Debate is over very little of the Bill will be left, and that what is likely to happen will be in the nature of that unfinished Resolution, which was before the House the other night, and of which only the fragment of a sentence now remains. With regard to the character of this Bill, it has been spoken of as if the grievances with which it deals are of a very similar character to those which first induced the House of Commons to interfere with the regulation of the hours of labour in factories. But I would point out that we are no longer called upon, in Lancashire at all events, to rescue working men from the slavery of hard taskmasters. There is no sweating there, and no oppression on the part of employers of labour. On the contrary, as a rule a very kindly feeling prevails, and the employers and workmen recognise that they have interests in common, and that in any discussion which may take place between them it is essential that a mutual understanding should be arrived at; because if by further legislation anything like injury is inflicted on either employer or employed, that legislation will either become a dead letter or it will damage the prosperity of the trade in which both classes are so vitally concerned. At the present time the condition of the working men in Lancashire is as good as in any other part of the world, and perhaps better; they have good wages, their hours of labour are easy, and the mills in which they work are, as a rule, very comfortable. A good deal has been said as to the Ventilation Clause in the Bill, and my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Byron Reed) is seriously alarmed lest there should not be enough Inspectors appointed to meet the wishes of the working classes. For my part, I am quite sure that he need be under no such apprehensions, for, if the Bill is passed, as at present proposed, it would be necessary greatly to increase the staff of Factory Inspectors. In fact, I think that regulations of this kind, which are for the most part vexatious and unnecessary, could only be carried out by having a Factory Inspector to watch over the fortunes of each particular mill. I have myself been in many mills where the air is much sweeter than that which we are often compelled to breathe in the House of Commons, and very much better than that breathed by thousands of bank clerks and others in London who go to the City by the Underground Railway, and work below the level of the street with gas burning all day. We ought to consider whether we have not gone as far as we are justified in going in interfering with matters of this kind. I must say that I applaud the prudence exhibited by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury in altering Clause 4, so as to provide that only as much fresh air is to be admitted as will secure the health of the operatives, although that is a rather vague phrase, but at the same time it is one which we are all willing to accept. The hon. Member who last spoke has told us that it is the operatives who are opposed to obtaining as much fresh air as is needed for the ventilation of the mills. Many of us have probably had the experience derived from going into new houses here in London where the most scientific ventilation is adopted, and have seen that in a very short time the inmates have been very glad to block up these scientific ventilators. That is very much the same view as is taken by the operatives themselves. When the deputation was before the Home Secretary the right hon. Gentleman, with his usual shrewdness, asked whether if the ventilators were blocked up the operatives or the employers would have to pay the fine?

Mr. J. M. Maclean

SIR HENRY JAMES: The question that was put to the deputation was whether if the window was closed it was the operatives and not the master who would have to pay?

*MR. MACLEAN: At any rate, we should be very glad to know who would have to pay. With regard to Clause 11, which introduces an entirely new feature into our factory legislation, I desire to say a few words. Hitherto factory legislation has been mainly directed to the protection of young women and children upon sanitary grounds; but this is a clause which is to protect all work-people employed in the mills not on sanitary grounds, but because it is said that if they do not have the information which is to be given under this section they will be liable to be defrauded by unjust employers. I think that every one in this House will agree to the modification the right hon. Gentleman proposes to make in this clause. He has told us he only desires that sufficient information should be given to the work-people to enable them to know whether they are being paid fairly. For my part,

I doubt whether it will be of any advantage to the workpeople to have a clause of this kind inserted in the Bill. It seems to me that it would be necessary to define very clearly in the Bill what information is to be given to the working man when he has a piece of work given out to him, because otherwise there might be any number of disputes. With regard to the clause which proposes to shorten by half an hour the period during which work is done in English mills, my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester has in a very pleasant frame of mind proposed that this clause be struck out altogether. I was glad to hear this suggestion from him, because to my mind this is the most important clause in the whole Bill. The representatives of the working men are, as a rule, moderate and able men, but, like everybody else, they are liable to make mistakes, and in the present instance they appear to me not to have fully realised—not considered what the effect of such a change would be. The fact is that at the present moment the hours of labour in this country are very much less than in foreign countries; and one of the employers of labour who waited on the Home Secretary the other day has made an important statement on this head, to the effect that so much of the machinery used now is automatic, that with 66 hours' work a German artisan can turn out as much as an English artisan in his 56 hours of work, in spite of the greater skill of the latter. If that is the case, it would be very dangerous to reduce by even half an hour the time devoted to work in mills in this country. Our people now can only keep a few strides in advance of their foreign competitors. I have recently been told by an Anglo-Indian who had a great deal to do with starting mills in India, and made a great deal of money out of them, that nothing would delight him more than the passing of an Eight Hours Bill for the textile trades, because, were such a Bill passed, they would at once be able to double the number of mills in India. That fact ought to be known to the leaders of the working men, and is, I believe; for the very men who have drafted this Bill refused, much to their credit, at the Trades Union Congress in Liverpool, to accept an Eight Hours Bill for the factory operatives of Lancashire. In the existing state of things, we cannot afford to reduce by even half an hour in the week the amount of time given to work in the mills of Lancashire. If changes of that kind are introduced, our trade will succumb to foreign competition, and then our working men will regret having made unnecessary demands. It was my intention to propose that the Bill before the House should be referred to a Select Committee, together with the Ministerial measure which has been circulated this morning; but after the discussion that has taken place, it appears to me that there is so little of the Bill left that it does not matter much what course is taken with respect to it. Such provisions of the Bill as are unobjectionable might be incorporated in the Ministerial measure; and if the Home Secretary could see his way to following that course, we might have a measure which would give satisfaction to both employers and employed, and not leave ill feeling rankling in the minds of any one.

*(3.33.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I think the House is to be congratulated upon the tone of the discussion, for it has been not only eminently practical, but temperate and conciliatory as well. In one respect it has hardly been a Second Reading Debate, because it has not been possible to discuss this measure without entering largely into details. In fact, it is difficult to know what principle there is to discuss, except this—that, by general consent, some amendment of the Factory Acts is requisite in the interests of the health and safety of workmen, and also possibly for the purpose of preventing any irregularity—I use a mild word—in the payment of their wages. The first point which I will consider is the subject of ventilation. I suppose we shall all agree that there are many factories in which the ventilation is not satisfactory. Sometimes the defect is remediable, but in many cases I believe that a complete remedy cannot be hoped for, the conditions of the work being such that an even temperature cannot possibly be maintained. It is well, therefore, not to attempt to lay down a hard and fast rule to fit all circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury has done wisely in proposing that the clause in the Bill shall be altered, and that the requirements shall be that the ventilation of every factory shall be sufficient for the health and safety of the operatives, as far as the nature of the process in which they are engaged permits. But when the right hon. Gentleman proposes that the ultimate judge of the sufficiency of the ventilation shall be the Inspector, I part company from him. The Inspectors are fair men, and, to a great extent, impartial men; but they are, at the same time, the champions of the workmen and the guardians of their interests. Their natural function is to protect the workmen, and to insist upon the law being observed for their benefit. Almost every Inspector appointed since I have been at the Home Office has been a working man himself, and many of them are not men of great scientific attainments. Consequently, they would hardly be competent to point out to an employer what would be the best system of ventilation to adopt in a large factory. For these reasons, I cannot accept the suggestion that the Inspector should be the final judge of the means of ventilation. That he should suggest means in the first instance would be right and proper; but there ought to be another tribunal to appeal to in the last resort, and in the Ministerial measure the machinery of arbitration has been adopted. Under the Coal Mines Act arbitration has been found to work satisfactorily as between employer and employed, and it is only rarely that it becomes necessary to have recourse to it. In nine cases out of ten an adjustment of the question at issue is arrived at amicably beforehand. The next point for consideration relates to the means of escaping from fire. I agree with the right hon. Member for Bury that the operation of a provision for that purpose cannot be confined to future buildings; but I think that there should be some difference between our treatment of existing buildings and our treatment of future buildings. In the case of future buildings, it would be fair to insist upon two exits, but that would be too rigid a condition to impose in the case of every existing factory, for many small factories are so built that to compel the construction of a new staircase would be tantamount to closing them. As the Bill stands, it insists on a separate staircase for every room in a factory.

Mr. Matthews

SIR HENRY JAMES: No; that is not the effect of the clause.

*MR. MATTHEWS: The proposal is too rigid as applied to every existing factory, and some other mode of meeting the difficulty should be devised. I now come to the subject of minimum penalties, and I must point out that the system of minimum penalties is a retrograde system. The House has abolished those penalties deliberately in the case of the last Summary Jurisdiction Act that it passed. Certainly, I am not enamoured of the system of minimum penalties; but I am obliged to admit that cases have been brought to my notice in which the penalties imposed for breaches of the Factory Acts have undoubtedly been inadequate, with the result that justifiable dissatisfaction has been caused in the minds of working men, who are apt to attribute to the circumstance that the tribunal is more in sympathy with the class of employers than with themselves, the fact of the imposition of inadequate penalties. The conclusion which I have come to is that, in cases where a breach of the Factory Acts results in profit to the employer, so that he would gain if he paid only a small penalty, minimum penalties might well be imposed; but that in cases where no profit can result to the employer from an infraction of the Acts, it would not be wise to apply this system of minimum penalties, which in principle is objectionable. The next point is very controversial, namely, the extra half hour a week for cleaning. From the inquiries which I have made, I think that half an hour for cleaning is sufficient in the bulk of the trades which we have in view. That applies to the silk trade, the woollen trade, and the worsted trade. It may be that in cotton factories half an hour is not sufficient, or only barely sufficient. I confess I am strongly opposed to cutting down the limited number of hours operatives now have to work in the face of the daily growing competition which we have to contend against on the part of foreign manufacturers. It would be greatly to be regretted if half an hour were to be cut off from the working hours of Saturday. Perhaps it would be enough to say that on Saturday, as now, every manufacturing process should stop at 1 o'clock, and I believe the result would be that in most cases the cleaning would be done in half an hour, and, if not, some children or young men might stay to finish it as quickly as they could. The next debateable subject is the one with regard to particulars of work. The Member for Dewsbury correctly interprets the Act of 1840, when he states that the ticket given in the Irish linen trade under that Act was a ticket given to the advantage of the employer, and it furnished conclusive evidence against the employé of the quantity of work which was mentioned in the ticket, he getting the benefit of that in order to recover penalties for the proper amount of the work. I think it is to some extent a novel provision in Clause 11 of the present Bill, but I am by no means prepared to say it is for that reason a wrong provision. I listened with the greatest attention to the deputation of masters and of workmen who did me the honour to come to me and inform me on that subject last week. The conclusion I came to after listening most patiently to all they had to say was this—that the real grievance of the operatives is that the particulars are in some cases untruly stated. I can hardly imagine a state of things in which a workman does not hear truly or untruly the particulars on which the payment of his wages for his work is founded, for he could not go on if the particulars were not stated in some way, but the grievance is that the particulars are untruly stated. Everyone will agree with me that to state untruly the particulars is as mean and shabby a fraud as could be; in my opinion, it would be a good ground for civil action; and although at present I believe it could not be brought under the Criminal Law, I would not dissent from the suggestion that so shabby an act should be made punishable summarily by Act of Parliament. If any one untruly states the particulars he might well be subjected to a fine. But I would submit to my right hon. Friend and to other hon. Members that to have the particulars defined in the clause is impracticable, the difference between trade and trade, and between the conditions under which work is done in different places, such as Bradford and Oldham, being considerable. If a dispute should arise as to whether the ticket does contain the necessary particulars, some tribunal ought to be devised for sifting the matter, and deciding between employer and employed. Such a method of arbitration has been found to work well in other industries. It follows from what I have said that I am not prepared to adopt the whole Bill. I do not suggest to my right hon. Friend what course to pursue. It is entirely for my right hon. Friend to say what he will do in the interest of those whom he represents. There is a Bill of my own before the House which I intend to press, and I hope before Easter to get it read a second time, and then to refer it to the Standing Committee on Trade. I believe to refer any of those Bills to a Select Committee means the sacrifice of the Bills for this year, so many details and difficulties would crop up. If the House will content itself with setting forth in the Bill the general principles upon which we ought to proceed it will be much more satisfactory. That was done in the case of mines. The ventilation of a mine is much more difficult than the ventilation of a factory, and yet by means of special rules which have been drawn up the satisfactory ventilation of mines has been worked out without coming to Parliament on every occasion. I do not see why factory legislation should not follow the same lines. Perhaps I might be allowed to suggest to my right hon. Friend that the best way for him to proceed would be to present the clauses to which he attaches importance as Amendments and additions to the Government Bill before the Standing Committee, and if my right hon. Friend will accept the suggestion I will meet him in no unsympathetic spirit. Upon the half hour question I cannot promise any concession; but with regard to the particulars of work, I shall be quite ready to co-operate with my right hon. Friend in framing a satisfactory clause which will secure what my right hon. Friend desires. I really believe, in the interest of those he represents, that the right hon. Gentleman by adopting the course I have suggested to him would carry all the essential objects he has in view much more speedily than if he perseveres with his own Bill, or takes it to a Select Committee.

(3.57.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I think that the operatives who are seeking to promote legislation in this matter are very much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary for the painstaking care with which he has examined every one of the proposals of this Bill. I am disposed also to thank the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury for the modifications he has so promptly and candidly announced, for I think the result will be to do away with any disposition on the part of the House to oppose the Second Reading. Indeed, I take it that that stage will now be formally agreed to. The subsequent procedure upon the Bill has been indicated by the Home Secretary. I agree that there would be great danger in referring it to a Select Committee, and I am in favour of referring it to a Standing Committee, so that legislation may take place as speedily as possible. With regard to the drafting of the Bill, I must say it is evidently intended for the cotton trade, as its main provisions would be inapplicable to other trades. As to the question of ventilation, upon which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury has made a very satisfactory concession, I must say that the great majority of the employers of this country desire to study the well-being of their workpeople in these matters. The conditions under which the work is necessarily carried on do not admit of such rapid changes of air as some might desire. The House must never forget, in dealing with these matters, that they affect an industry upon which the prosperity of the country depends, and that the masters have already much difficulty in maintaining their position against foreign competitors. For this House to do anything that would injure the employers in conducting their business with the only instruments they can use would be cruel, and would prove ruinous to the interest of the masters. I believe there is scarcely one case in a hundred where the employer, when met by the workmen on the ground of some defect or want of provision, has not promptly met the wishes of his workpeople, and that without legislation. As to the question of cleaning, it is the employer who suffers if the machinery is not thoroughly cleaned; and it is, therefore, to the employer's interest to make such regulations in his factory as to ensure, within the hour permitted for that work on Saturday, that the machinery shall be cleaned. For this House to determine by some arbitrary rule that machinery shall be stopped would, in my judgment, be a very foolish and short-sighted policy altogether. English manufacturers are now so pressed by foreign competitors, who have so many advantages in their favour, that England really cannot afford capriciously and unnecessarily to interfere further with the hours of labour. The workpeople of this country are enlightened and sagacious enough to realise that if these industries are not prosperous their own prosperity will come to an end; and if any action of this House were to impose new and severe conditions on employers, factories might have to be closed, and this would prove most injurious to the working classes of this country. The spirit that is manifested by both workpeople and employers shows the immense advance that has been made in these matters, and it is a subject of congratulation that there should be this happy understanding between employers and employed. As time goes on we all desire that the condition of the working classes will be continually improved, and that they will have higher wages. This, however, is a slow process, which will not be accomplished by legislation, but by the growing intelligence and improved understanding between employer and employed. I think that this House will be wise in doing as little as possible to meddle with the industries of the country, leaving the improved good sense and increased power of the workmen to bring about any change that may be necessary.

Mr. Matthews

(4.8.) MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne): I think a more interesting and temperate discussion has seldom occurred in the House of Commons, and I merely rise to direct the attention of the Home Secretary to a request which has often been made to me by some of my constituents. I have had occasion very often to speak to the leaders of the operatives—both spinners and weavers—and they nearly unanimously represent to me the importance of urging the Home Secretary to increase the number of Factory Inspectors. They further desire me to urge on the right hon. Gentleman the desirability of the Factory Inspectors being taken from the class of men who have a practical knowledge of the work. I was extremely pleased to hear that the right hon. Gentleman has been pursuing that policy for some time past, and that he looks upon the Inspectors more or less as the champions of the workmen. In Lancashire there will be no difficulty in finding workmen of the greatest intelligence, moderation, and ability to undertake the discharge of the duties of Inspectors, not only to the satisfaction of the employer but of the employed, and I hope the Home Secretary will take into his consideration the appointment of a large additional number of Inspectors. During the last quarter of a century I have been much impressed with the desire which the spinners and weavers of Lancashire have always shown to consider the interests of their employers. Now, I have to-day received the Bill of the Home Secretary, and I find it is almost impossible to dissociate that Bill from the Bill before the House. There are some matters which the Home Secretary has dealt with, such as that of certifying surgeons, in which my constituents feel a strong interest, and I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on having dealt with them in this 19th century. We cannot discuss the Government Bill now, although after reading it I must compliment the Home Secretary upon a Bill which is more admirably and clearly drawn than any Bill it has been my good fortune to read for a long time. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to press forward the Government Bill, and to give the House a pledge that this matter shall be dealt with during the present Session. There is such an approach in principle between the clauses of the present Bill and the clauses of the Government Bill that it will probably be most convenient if they were considered in Committee at the same time.

(4.14.) MR. HOYLE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): I do not wish to take part in this Debate as an employer. It is true I am and have been for the greater portion of my life part owner of cotton factories. That has compelled me to acquire some knowledge of the matters dealt with by the Bill of the right hon. Member for Bury, but I hope that will not be regarded as an absolute disqualification for speaking on the measure. I am one of those who firmly hold that Thomas Sadler, Richard Oastler, Lord Shaftesbury, and John Fielden of Todmorden, in their devotion to the cause of humanity rendered imperishable service to the country, and I wish to approach the question of factory legislation in the spirit and on the principles which guided them, taking note of the changed and changing conditions of the problem to be dealt with. I wish to speak as the representative of more than 50,000 persons who have committed their interests to my keeping. When the trust passes out of my hands and when I am no longer a representative, I hope I may look my political friends and political foes in the face with full confidence that according to my lights I have tried to do my duty to every one of them. What was the condition of things when the reformers named entered on their work? At that time workhouses were being frequently swept of their juvenile inmates, and under the mild name of apprenticeship young children were subject to great hardship, not to say cruelties. Children grew up to manhood and womanhood with little or no education. The number of adults who could neither read or write was very large. Working people were badly housed, poorly clad, often under-fed, always over-worked. It was to a large extent work and bed, week in and week out, and work, too, in factories ill-constructed and badly lighted, and in unsanitary buildings. There was discontent amongst the mass of the population which sometimes found vent in violent outbreaks. Less than 50 years ago riots broke out in Lancashire, and the industry of the whole county was forcibly suspended. For once Lancashire chimneys were smokeless. The streets of Manchester were held by night and by day by troops of the Line. In county villages the Military were called out and the Riot Act was read. These things I saw and heard myself. These were the facts which gave force and point to the eloquent appeals of Richard Oastler and his colleagues. No one will pretend there is anything analogous to that now. Children of tender age are no longer treated as if their only use is to earn money for those who dispose of their young lives. Now that the cost of education is to be borne by the nation we have a right to raise the age at which children shall be allowed to commence work. I should hail that as an invaluable boon. The evils so rife half a century ago either have passed or are passing away. Discontent has given way to happier conditions, the chasm between class and class has been narrowing, sympathy and sense of common brotherhood has grown up, boards of conciliation have been established to prevent estrangement between manual labour and mental labour, and Chambers of Commerce have taken council with members of Schools Boards, head masters of grammar schools, professors from the colleges, bishops, and clergy, to devise methods for bridging over the passage from school life to industrial life; and now youths may obtain certificates which will enable them to take high positions either in this country or in the colonies. Some who remember former days have been thinking they are living in a better era, and that the old bad days are gone like an evil dream never to return. Employers have learned much, and working men have not been behind their employers. It seems as if the ameliorating, the humanising, processes going on will certainly lead to as great an advance during the next quarter of a century in all that makes for the enjoyment of life as that which has taken place during the last quarter of a century. If that were not a mistaken hope why does the right hon. Member for Bury bring in this Bill? It is only 20 years since Mr. Forster's Education Act came into force. But what changes it has effected. The young people of 17 to 22 are better in every way than their predecessors of the same ages half a century ago. Crime has diminished, the prisons are on sale, and pauperism is steadily diminishing. Why does not the right hon. Member for Bury leave these beneficent forces to do their work? What is the genesis of this Bill? At a meeting held in December last to discuss the draft of this Bill, and presided over by the right hon. Member for Bury, a question was asked why the practical manufacturers were not present—had they not been invited? The answer was given by a gentleman who has the right to speak, for he largely helped to prepare the brief from which the clauses of the Bill were taken. He said they would not meet the masters any more.

Mr. Hoyle

SIR HENRY JAMES: The hon. Gentleman is entirely misinformed. The masters of Lancashire and Yorkshire were invited.

MR. HOYLE: Why were they not there? It was said they did not want to meet the masters any more, and to make it quite clear what was meant the gentlemen said, "Sooner than have a Bill to which the masters would agree they would have no Bill at all." I challenge contradiction. [Sir HENRY JAMES: I never heard it.] The hon. Members for Preston and Bethnal Green will know whether it was said or not. One would have thought that a declaration like this would have given the right hon. Member for Bury warning, and led him to pause.

SIR HENRY JAMES: I never heard it; it is new to me.

MR. HOYLE: I accept the right hon. Gentleman's denial, but I could not be mistaken, because I asked the question, and that was the answer I got. One would have thought the right hon. Gentleman would have said, "If the tension is such that the operatives will not meet the employers, I must meet them myself and hear what they have got to say. I will fairly weigh the evidence on both sides, and I will not give the authority of my name to a Bill based only on one-sided statements." When I saw this Bill it seemed to me that the right hon. Gentleman was inviting the House to enter upon an industrial war. I am very thankful for his speech to-day. It shows that the right hon. Gentleman has made great progress since December. He has abandoned a great part of the Bill which was so very offensive. There are some things to which I think attention should be called. One cannot say much about Section 4, because it is pretty well given up. But this I may say, the fibrous materials used are produced in hot climates, and are therefore specially susceptible to changes of temperature. A west or south-west wind is favourable, while an east wind takes the nature out of them. In an east wind both materials and tempers are brittle—less work is done and the work is inferior. This Bill takes no note of that. Alike at Christmas and at Midsummer Day, 600 feet of "fresh air" must be "admitted." If the machine gets out of order and only pumps 590 feet, the proprietor will be an offender. Clause 5 gives the Inspector power to flout the Sanitary Authority—an authority popularly elected and amenable to public opinion. Her Majesty's Government has given Local Government to the counties. This Bill proposes to supersede Local Government, and set up Centralised Autocratic Government in its place. That is a retrograde step. Clause 6 provides that if in the opinion of any of the persons employed in the factory a machine is not securely fenced, such person may give notice to the Inspector. By this clause the workpeople are expected to become spies on the employer. Of course, every workman can complain now. I am in favour of fencing and ventilation, but I object to the House of Commons taking the management of the business. Here, again, the Inspector is to be the authority. What sort of men may the Inspectors be? I will just read to the House a correspondence which recently took place. One of my constituents, employed in a factory, received a letter, of which I hold a copy. The letter was written on Government paper and was as follows:—

"113, Tweedale Street, Rochdale, 16.10.90.

Dear Sir,

I was away from home when your last letter came, but I suppose you know it has been attended to.

I am very much obliged for the information, and shall be glad at any time to receive further communications from you, and you may rest assured that if I do not seem to attend to them at once it is only because I am watching an opportunity, so that I may succeed when I do move.

I shall esteem it a great favour if you will take particular notice what time they start first thing in a morning during the next two weeks, and send me word next Saturday, and also the Saturday after.

I should like to know when they begin to light up in a morning. I have sent this in a plain envelope, as I thought it better than an official one, and you may depend on me treating any communication in strict confidence.

Please state the exact time they start each morning, so that I may judge what is the best day to visit.

Yours truly,

JAMES PEARSON."

The person to whom this letter was addressed returned it, stating that there had been some mistake. The Inspector replied—

"Rochdale,
16.10.90.

Sir,

I am extremely obliged to you for returning my letter, which was by mistake addressed to Bury instead of Oldham.

I am, &c.,

JAMES PEARSON."

Now, I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman does not want to institute such a system of espionage as that. I hope that the system of inspection may cease to be defective, that it may become a useful intelligence department, to which both employers and employed may turn for information, and for mutual support and guidance in difficulties that may arise. Let me refer for a moment to Clause 11, which contains the matter that was chiefly in dispute on December 10th. It is totally impossible to comply with the requirements of that clause without playing into the hands of one's competitors. At the Home Office the other day a member of the deputation said he would give a thousand pounds any day to get such particulars as are contained in this clause from some of his competitors. I do not know that I would give that sum for the information or that I would attempt to get the information in that way, but this I will say, that there have been occasions in the course of business when I would not have taken a thousand pounds for such particulars as are herein described. Wherever there is a speciality in manufacture the fact of disclosing such particulars lays you open to the competition of your rivals in the trade. The productions of the loom are becoming more and more the work of science and art every day. Year by year looms are improved, and they are made to do almost anything. Wherever a loom is improved and adapted to the production of a special article the statement of these particulars would enable your rivals to compete with you, using all the advantage of your improvements. I object most strongly to such legislation, and I believe it is injurious to employers and employed. We should never forget we have industries in this country which employ large numbers of workpeople; the materials we use come to us from all parts of the world, and the greater part of the manufactures are exported. Legislation of this kind will ruin this trade.

*(4.33.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I may claim a hereditary interest in these matters, for I am a native of one of our large manufacturing towns, and my early recollections are of factories and their operatives. I confess when I look at this Factory Bill now before the House, I cannot but think we may congratulate ourselves upon the progress we have made in a short time. It is an act of presumption on the part of any man to make in Debate allusion to his own career, but I confess I cannot shut out the recollections of my childish days. I remember that the window of my room looked upon a large factory. When I retired to rest the factory children of my own age were still at work, and when I arose in the morning the same children were working under the same conditions at their monotonous toil. Different indeed are the conditions of work for the operatives—men, women, and children, now. Legislation has progressed on parallel lines to public opinion, and whatever proposals are now made to the House of Commons for factory legislation can be but of a supplementary character—finishing touches to legislation which has been in operation with success for many years. In relation to this Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the situation has greatly changed during the last 48 hours. The discussion of last week and the Debate of to-day have been of so conciliatory a character—so many concessions have been made, that I hope we shall hear no more of angry recriminations in the House or outside. In the interest of employers and workpeople I trust these controversies may be left to past history and may not prejudice that accord at which we all desire to arrive. I am glad to hear that it is the intention to leave out the clause excluding workshops from the operation of the Factory Acts. I should like to refer for a few moments to the provision of the Factory Act in relation to overcrowding. It was introduced in 1867 by a Select Committee, on which I had the honour to serve, and I know the great benefit that clause has produced. But at the same time it is impossible to read the Report of Factory Inspectors—impossible to read the Report of the Committee on "Sweating"—without feeling to what extent the evils of overcrowding still exist. Without unduly occupying time I may refer to the Report of Mr. Redgrave, made in 1887. He there says that the amount of space insisted upon where there was overtime was 400 cubic feet and the minimum amount in other cases 250 feet. Then Mr. Redgrave proceeds to give cases where there were only 134 cubic feet allowed for the unfortunate workpeople, and other cases where the largest allowance was 170 and 180 cubic feet. In a subsequent report Mr. Redgrave still speaks of the same evils in what he calls domestic workshops. He says—

Mr. Hoyle

"Instead of large factories and workshops such as we have successfully contended for in many classes of industry we have these domestic workshops dark, dirty, and overcrowded, and they cannot be improved by factory legislation as it now stands, because at the time of the passing of the Act of 1878, the present state of things was never contemplated."

Now, there is sufficient proof of the position I am endeavouring to maintain—that no Factory Legislation can be complete, no future enactment satisfactory, which does not greatly improve the condition of all employment as regards over-crowding. Passing on with my cursory observations let me touch upon the subject of ventilation. I cannot claim to have any large practical experience, but I have the privilege, with its duties and responsibilities, of owning a considerable number of houses in which workpeople dwell, and I know the great difficulty, almost the impossibility, of inducing workpeople to ventilate their own dwellings. As the result of my experience I can say that, though you give the people every opportunity, yet you find every window closed, every opening stopped. When we are dealing with ventilation in factories I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman—

MR. A. J. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Not in workshops.

*MR. F. S. POWELL: I have passed from workshops, I am now dealing with ventilation in factories. I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman has acted wisely in making this clause more general. I believe it is impossible to deal with this matter by specific directions in an Act of Parliament. The knowledge of one day is superseded by the science of the next; defects are remedied as experience widens from year to year, and I believe the best plan is to insert general words and leave discretion with a thorough system of inspection. As an Inspector has pointed out, you may apply the best theory of ventilation and yet find no effect in the room the atmosphere of which you desire to purify. It is a subject full of difficulty, and I am glad that we shall not be bound by rigid provisions in the Act, but that much will be left to the discretion and responsibility of those who administer the Statute. I was glad to hear the remarks of the hon. Member for Manchester, who spoke against the shortening of the time of labour by half an hour. It is impossible, I think, that Parliament can enforce in a manufacture of this kind a diminution of hours of work. That which took place before the Berlin Conference is common knowledge, and I need not refer to it, but I confess I was somewhat struck by the latest information placed at our disposal by the Board of Trade Journal distributed a few days ago. There is some reference to factory work abroad, and we find that 11 hours in Switzerland is not the full extent of the number of hours during which workpeople may be employed. There is in Switzerland a good deal of elasticity in the regulations, and it is stated on authority that the power of lengthening the working day is largely exercised, and that many licences are issued for work on Sundays and at night. I rejoice that here in England the hours have been curtailed; but I believe—having before us the facts which were disclosed at the Berlin Conference, and which are described in powerful language in this report of the Board of Trade Journal—I believe we should be acting rashly if we were still more to impede the motion of our machinery or the discretion of our employers. In reference to Clause 11, I confess that from want of technical knowledge I am reluctant to make any remarks; but I cannot help feeling there is justice in the claim of a workman that he is entitled to know so much of the mysteries of his craft as will enable him to judge of the value of the labour he expends upon it. Nothing struck me more during the discussions of last week than the attitude of the workpeople on this subject. They all with one voice, and in a manner which has been ably represented by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury, disclaimed any desire for the disclosure of trade secrets which might bring upon them dangerous foreign competition or prejudice the interests of one employer in competition with his neighbour. The position is now, I hope, clearly defined, and I hope we may be able to satisfy the claim of the worker that he shall know the nature of the work upon which he has expended his energies. It seems to me that the policy we have to adopt in factory legislation may be described in a very few words. We have to regard the safety of our people in our factories as we have done and are doing in our mines. We have to watch over the health of those employed, as we have through decades of years with a success eminently gratifying and encouraging. At the same time we have to protect the industries of this country against foreign competition, difficult enough to meet under the most favourable circumstances. With these principles as our guide, we have to deal with the interests of employers and employed, and shall do so, I hope, in harmonious discussion; and ere the Session closes I trust we may add another wisely written page to our Factory Legislation.

(443.) MR. A. J. MUNDELLA: It is due to the House, after the speech of the Home Secretary, that something should be said on behalf of those whose names are on the back of the Bill, as to the course we propose to take. But, before saying this, I may be allowed to congratulate my right hon. Friend upon the admirable Debate we have had this afternoon, the temperate character of which, I think, is in large measure due to the lucid, conciliatory, and exhaustive manner in which my right hon. Friend moved the Second Reading of the Bill. I think we have nothing to complain of in what has been said by hon. Members who have criticised some of the provisions in the measure. The criticisms have been of the most moderate character, and I think, with the exception of those offered by the hon. Member for the Heywood Division (Mr. Hoyle), under some misapprehension—and I observe he is not now in the House—have tended rather to the elucidation of several points, while conveying general support. The Home Secretary last week and the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Maclean) again to-day complained that some of the clauses might be infringed by the workpeople, and employers be held responsible for that infringement. There is a plain and simple answer to that objection. In the Factory Act, 1878, there is a clause which remains unrepealed, and which it is not intended to alter, making ample provision for such a circumstance where the occupier of a workshop is charged with an offence which is proved to have been committed by another person. It is in that clause provided that if the occupier proves that he has used due diligence to enforce the execution of the Act, and that the said other person committed the offence without the owner's knowledge, consent, or connivance, then the said other person shall be summarily convicted for such offence, and the occupier shall be exempted from any fine. So there is no danger of an employer being punished for the offence of his workpeople so long as that clause remains on the Statute Book. There are only one or two other matters of detail to which I need briefly refer. The Home Secretary, with reference to the Irish Linen Act, cited by my right hon. Friend, said the provision which furnishes a precedent for Clause 11 in the present Bill was inserted for the benefit of the employer. Admitting that, if such a provision is good for the employer, why should it not be good for the workman in the present case? If it affords security for the one party, why should it not afford security for the interest of the other? There is no novelty in the demand proposed to be recognised under Clause 11 that a workman shall have necessary and sufficient particulars to enable him to judge what shall be his earnings when his contract is completed. I can hardly think that any hon. Member will seriously contend against a provision of that kind. Now the Home Secretary has proposed that the Bill shall be read a second time, for which we thank him, and that then, together with his own Bill, it shall be sent to the Standing Committee upstairs to be considered with his Bill.

Mr. F. S. Powell

MR. STUART WORTLEY dissented.

MR. A. J. MUNDELLA: If that is denied it alters our position very much. We certainly understood that was the proposal. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that it might be possible that clauses from this Bill might be moved as Amendments to the Government Bill, therefore the two Bills would be concurrently considered.

MR. STUART WORTLEY: The Committee cannot consider more than one Bill at the same time.

MR. A. J. MUNDELLA: But the Committee can have the two Bills before them at the same time.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): What I understood my right hon. Friend to contemplate was not that the two Bills should be referred to a Grand Committee, which would be most unusual, but that his own Bill should be referred, and that the right hon. Gentleman's clauses might be moved as Amendments or as additions to the Bill in Committee.

MR. A. J. MUNDELLA: I think the right hon. Gentleman is mistaken. The Home Secretary distinctly stated that this Bill might also be referred to the Standing Committee to be considered, together with his own Bill. That there would be a great advantage in having the Bills so dealt with all of us who have had experience of the work of a Standing Committee know. It is an open Committee, reporters are present, the proceedings are public, votes are taken, and the form of procedure resembles that of Committee of the whole House. It will be a great advantage to have on that Committee a number of practical experienced lawyers, together with representatives of the interests of particular industries, so that every branch of the measure may be considered. I have, therefore, urged upon my right hon. Friend that he should consent to the proposal of the Home Secretary, and I am glad to say he is disposed to do so. The understanding is that this Bill when read a second time shall be referred to the Standing Committee with the Bill of the Home Secretary. I hope the House will now read the Bill a second time.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

(4.55.) SIR HENRY JAMES: With the permission of the House I will now ask leave to take the Committee stage to-morrow, and upon the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair, perhaps the leader of the House will say whether, in accordance with the statement of the Home Secretary, it is proposed to take the Second Reading of the Government Bill before Easter. After full consideration with my friends, I am willing that this Bill should be referred to the Standing Committee, together with the Government Bill.

(4.55.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed for to-morrow."

*MR. MATTHEWS: There are practical difficulties in the way of referring the two Bills to the Standing Committee, which can only deal with one Bill at a time. My right hon. Friend can attain the object he desires by bringing before the Standing Committee on the consideration of the Government Bill clauses from his own Bill, and proposing them as additions to the Government proposals. This will practically be the same thing as the consideration of both Bills. My right hon. Friend will find that many of the clauses are incorporated in the Government Bill already, and other clauses may be treated as I suggest. It is not possible to deal with the Bills together.

(4.56.) SIR HENRY JAMES: But my right hon. Friend will see that I must do one of two things. I must take the Bill into Committee, or I must abandon it. I will not abandon it, so it must go through Committee, either Committee of the House or Grand Committee. The latter is thought to be the most convenient, and, at the same time, I will do all I can so to deal with the matter as to obviate any difficulty arising from having to consider both Bills.

*(4.56.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): A similar course to that now proposed was followed last year in amending the Companies Acts. A Government Bill, and one introduced by a Private Member, were both read a second time and referred to a Grand Committee. This enables the Grand Committee to deal with them by incorporating clauses from one Bill into the other, or by reporting them separately. Clauses from this Bill might be proposed as Amendments to the Government Bill, and when it is seen how much of the present Bill is added to the Government Bill the right hon. Gentleman can judge whether it is necessary to proceed with this Bill.

MR. A. J. MUNDELLA: Still, it will be necessary to send the Bill to the Grand Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill committed for to-morrow.

REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS ACTS.

AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 17.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(4.58.) MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): This is a small Bill, dealing with a technical subject—the payment of the expense of registration in an area between the boundaries of a municipal and Parliamentary borough. Under the Parliamentary Registration Act, 1843, all registration expenses in a Parliamentary borough were made payable out of the Poor Rate. Under the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878, the List of Parliamentary Voters and the Burgess List in a Parliamentary borough were to be made out together, and the expenses incurred by the Town Clerk and the Overseers were made payable, half out of the Poor Rate and half out of the Borough Fund. And the expenses in respect of an area exclusively Parliamentary were made payable out of the Poor Rate. That is to say, that before the County Electors Act the whole of the expenses of so much of a Parliamentary borough as extended beyond a municipal borough were made payable out of the Poor Rate. The County Electors Act, 1888, is to be construed as one with these Registration Acts, and under that Act the Lists of Burgesses, County Electors, and Occupation Voters for Parliamentary elections are to be made out together; and all expenses with respect of county electors incurred by Town Clerks were made payable out of the Borough Fund. Doubts have been expressed, and a difficulty has now arisen, as to the payment of expenses of registration in an area—a parish or part of a parish—beyond the municipal and within the Parliamentary area of certain boroughs; and this Bill provides, following the analogy of the Act of 1878, that half those expenses shall be defrayed out of the County Fund and half out of the Poor Rate. I may say that several Petitions from Municipal Corporations have been presented in favour of the Bill, which also has the support of the Association of Municipal Corporations.

Mr. Tomlinson

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

TEACHERS' REGISTRATION BILL.

(No. 48.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(5.3.) MR. A. H. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I believe there is no objection in any part of the House to this Bill being referred to a Select Committee, to which the Bill introduced by the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple) has already been referred. The two Bills do not largely differ, and it is the desire of a large number of teachers that the whole subject shall be thoroughly threshed out as it only can be by a Select Committee. If the House will allow the Bill a Second Reading, I will move that it be referred to the same Select Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(5.5.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) It is unnecessary, I think, that the two Bills should be referred to the same Committee. They cover, to some extent, the same ground, but I think the Committee will deal more effectually with the subject in considering the Bill of the hon. Member for Evesham than if this Bill is also referred to it. I regret that I had not the opportunity of offering a few observations when the other Bill was before the House, and however the object of this Bill may be approved I do not think the Second Reading should be passed without discussion. I take it the object is to afford some guarantee that those in whose hands the education of our children is placed shall be duly qualified for their profession. The days have long passed when it was considered that a man who failed in other trades would make a good coal merchant or schoolmaster. To a great extent parents are now sufficiently interested in the education of their children to take care where they send their children for instruction. This Bill has for its object the affording of a guarantee of a double character. In the first place, the person to be registered under it is to be duly qualified by education for the office of teacher; and, secondly, he is to be further qualified by practice in teaching. Now, I think I can show that whatever advantage there may be in the first part of the guarantee, the second is absolutely impracticable. The House is probably aware that in the Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham there is a definite limitation as to the classes of schools and teachers to come under the Bill, that Bill being exclusively confined to schools where intermediate education is carried on under the Act, thus not including such schools as Winchester, Charterhouse, &c. But the hon. Member opposite entertains a very different view to that of the hon. Baronet, and no schoolmaster, even at Eton, would be exempt from registration under this Bill. Nobody will be exempt, so far as I understand, but heads of colleges or halls, Professors, Fellows, Readers, Lecturers at colleges; but beyond these the Bill will be applicable to every person engaged in tuition throughout the country. I think the hon. Member might have been content to follow the example of the hon. Baronet, not seeking to include all the schoolmasters in the great schools of England. In the definition of a teacher we find considerable difference between the two Bills. This Bill defines a teacher as any person who forms part of the educational staff of any school. The Bill of the hon. Baronet, in Section 4, provides that it shall apply to elementary schools, not including any school where the fees exceed 9d. a week. Therefore, I take it that, though in some respects the Bills are similar, in other respects they are very different indeed. And now as to the machinery by which the Bill is to be put into operation. I think the House will be amused at the nature of the proposed Council which is to tyrannise over every person engaged in tuition in the Kingdom. It is a curious thing that in the Council to be formed for carrying out the Bill, while the National Teachers' Association of Ireland is mentioned as nominating two members, Trinity College, Dublin, has not the power to nominate one. While the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge have also the right to nominate two members, other Universities have no such right.

MR. A. H. DYKE ACLAND: If the hon. Member will allow me to explain: There is no desire to exclude any University; but it is difficult among so many, in the initial stages, to mention the names of all the bodies, and provision is made for additions.

MR. KELLY: Yes; I know I have called attention to one part of the proposal for the formation of the Council, but I do not know that the hon. Member's remark applies to Dublin University and other bodies in the transition stage. I should have thought that there are claims that come before those of the conference of head masters and mistresses and others to nominations, and I maintain it would in no sense be a representative Council for those who would be vitally affected by the Bill. Out of 23 members of the Council, there would be only four at all representative of the thousands of schoolmasters over whom the Council would rule. Among the bodies who are to elect members to the Council I find the College of Preceptors. Now, I venture to think I do not improperly describe this body as a private speculation for the purpose of carrying out examinations, and I decline to accept a proposal which places the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge on a par with the College of Preceptors. I do not propose to go through the Bill with criticisms and objections that are not proper to this stage; but I wish to point out that the Bill offers no security for the attainment of that object, which no doubt the promoters have really at heart. Although the main object of the Bill is to offer a guarantee of the efficiency of the teachers registered under it, in reality it offers no guarantee or security at all. By Clause 22 all persons who have been engaged in teaching for two years may, within three years of the passing of the Bill, be registered as competent teachers for the rest of their lives, no matter how incompetent they may be. Then after the expiration of three years a person shall not be qualified for registration until he has attained the age of 21, and holds a certificate of having passed an examination in the theory and practice of education. Well, I do not know that a man will be a better teacher from having been taught something of the theory of education. I have been engaged in tuition, and I speak with knowledge when I say no man can be a successful teacher unless he has three qualifications—sufficient education, the necessary amount of tact, and has had some practice. I do not know where a man can get practice unless he gets a junior form in a school, and I can conceive of no machinery which will turn out hundreds of thousands of teachers every year fully versed in the theory and practice of education. The thing is impossible. I think a number of people are allowed to enter the profession who are unqualified for it; but I am at a loss to know how a certificate of examination in the theory and practice of education will help any one. I should have thought that the first qualification—which is carefully absent—would have been that a man should have taken a degree at one of our Universities. The qualification might have been that no man should become a master unless he had taken honours; but it does seem to me monstrous that a man who has gone to a University and followed a University career should be debarred from taking this position, because he has not satisfied the College of Preceptors by examination in the theory and practice of education. Three years after the passing of this Bill no human being, however high a degree he may have taken in a University, will be able to take up the profession of teaching unless he has this certificate from a body with which the College of Preceptors will have a great deal to do.

MR. A. ACLAND: The College of Preceptors will have nothing to do with it. The Bill which refers to the College of Preceptors is that of the hon. Barone^t opposite, which has been referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. Kelly

MR. J. R. KELLY: I saw that some unfortunate individuals under the Bill were to be mulcted in £5 fees, and I, therefore, thought that the College of Preceptors would have something to do with the matter. I notice that another qualification is to be "a teaching diploma of Cambridge University." But who knows anything about any such diploma? It is certainly some years since I was at Cambridge, but when I was there I knew nothing about any such diploma. Another qualification is to be a Fellowship or Licentiate^{ship} of the College of Preceptors. But what does this really amount to? I am not surprised to find it put alongside a diploma of the University of Cambridge. Though I accept the statement that this is not the Bill of the College of Preceptors, I cannot help thinking that, at any rate, the College of Preceptors saw a draft of the Bill before it was printed. The secret of the Bill is to be found in Clause 28, which provides that every duly qualified applicant till 1893 for registration shall pay a fee of £1, and after that date a fee of £5, and that in the case of any other person applying the fee shall be £3. I would ask if the House can approve of a Bill, one of the main objects of which is to create a great fee-making machine? Does the House know what it means to make every unfortunate man engaged in teaching in this country pay £1? Does the House know how many of these men there are engaged in teaching in the country, and what their circumstances are? If it does, I do not think it will allow these penalties to be inflicted on every poor struggling teacher throughout the United Kingdom. I want to ask what the money is wanted for? Perhaps it is necessary to charge some fee; but on what principle £15,000 or £20,000 is to be screwed out of the pockets of some of the most deserving and most hard-working people in the country I am at a loss to imagine. I have consulted several teachers on the subject of the Bill of the hon. Member for Evesham, and they declare it to be monstrous that out of their small salaries of £40 or £50 a year they should be compelled to pay £1 for that which they say will do them no good. The registration fee should be a purely nominal one—not more than 5s. at the most. I suppose we shall be told that the Bill is a voluntary one, and that no one will be called on to pay the £1 unless he chooses to register. Yes; but what will be the position of a teacher if he is not registered? He will be able to teach, but will not be able to recover his fees by law. An unscrupulous parent who has incurred a debt by sending his child to this teacher may refuse to pay, and there will be no means of suing him. In the same way an unscrupulous registered master may employ an unregistered assistant, and, at the end of the term, may refuse to pay him, and the assistant would have no redress. I should like to know on what principle such an outrageous law as that is to be justified? It is all very well for the hon. Member for Rotherham to tell the House that the schoolmasters of the country are in favour of the Bill. I would ask, "When did the schoolmasters of the country see it, and have they expressed an opinion in favour of it?" The Bill of the hon. Member for Evesham is an old Bill, having been before the House Session after Session. The schoolmasters may have had an opportunity of seeing it. But as to this Bill I have been able to bring it before dozens of schoolmasters, and never yet found one who had heard of it before.

MR. A. ACLAND: I have received quite lately a communication from the Schoolmasters' Congress, consisting of delegates from all parts of the country. They say they have carefully considered the Bill, and consider its main provisions admirable.

MR. J. R. KELLY: I can quite understand that the masters like it. They have nothing to object to in it. It is nothing for a man earning £3,000 or £4,000 a year to pay £1 for registration, and it will be to his interest to support the imposition of fees in order to limit competition.

(5.29.) MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put," but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

It being half an hour after Five of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (SCOTLAND) LOANS BILL.—(No. 57.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(5.30.) MR. FINLAY (Inverness): I do not know whether the House will allow the Second Reading of this Bill. It is simply to enable the Local Authorities of Scotland to exercise the powers which they have in a cheaper way, subject to obtaining the sanction of the Secretary for Scotland.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(5.31.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I do not object to the Bill being read a second time, though it is unfortunate that it should be taken at this hour, for it will serve, if passed, a useful and beneficial purpose. Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman will fix an early date for Committee, because within the course of the next few weeks the Local Government Board will have issued some regulations which are provided under the 57th section of the Public Health Act, which will throw considerable light on this subject, and which will aid the Committee of the whole House in considering this Bill.

(5.33.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I consider the Bill of such importance, that I object to the Second Reading being passed without sufficient time to consider it.

Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Wednesday next.

GLEBE LANDS BILL.—(No. 109.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(5.34.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: Will the hon. Member explain the object of this Bill?

MR. MOWBRAY (Lancashire, Prestwich): The Bill has been before the House during the last three or four years. It is to give incumbents who are occupying glebe lands, or rather the representatives in case of deaths, the same opportunities to recover from the successors to the incumbencies which agricultural tenants have under the Agricultural Holdings Act.

Question put, "That the Bill be read a second time."

(5.35.) MR. JOHN KELLY (Camberwell, N.) I object.

Second Reading deferred till to-morrow.

MUSEUMS AND GYMNASIUMS BILL.

(No. 159.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(5.37.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Will the hon. Member for Wigan explain the object of the Bill?

*(5.38.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): At present we cannot have either a museum without a Free Library Act or a gymnasium without adopting the Baths and Washhouses Act.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

M O T I O N S.

MOVABLE DWELLINGS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Burt, Bill to provide for the regulation of Vans, Vehicles, and Tents used as Dwellings, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Burt, Dr. Cameron, Mr. James Campbell, Mr. Elton, Mr. Fenwick, Mr. Matthew Kenny, Mr. John Kelly, and Colonel Makins.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 222.]

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Sir John Pope Hennessy, Bill to amend the Law relating to Outdoor Relief of the Poor in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Sir John Pope Hennessy, Mr. Sexton Mr. Penrose FitzGerald, Mr. Matthew Kenny and Mr. Addison.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 223.]

LAND PURCHASE (IRELAND) ACT, 1885
(ADVANCES).

Return ordered—

"Showing the number of Advances made under 'The Land Purchase Act, 1885,' under the following heads: Advances not exceeding £50; Advances exceeding £50 and not exceeding £100; Advances exceeding £100 and not exceeding £200; Advances exceeding £200 and not exceeding £500; Advances exceeding £500 and not exceeding £1,000; Advances exceeding £1,000 and not exceeding £3,000; Advances exceeding £3,000 and not exceeding £5,000; Advances exceeding £5,000." — (Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

PRESENTATION TO BENEFICES BILL
[LORDS].

Bill read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 224.]

LICHFIELD CATHEDRAL BILL [LORDS].

Bill read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 225.]

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

First Report, with Minutes of Evidence, brought up, and read.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 107.]

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Fourth Report brought up, and read; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Thursday, 19th February, 1891.*COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR STANDING COMMITTEES.

*THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, I beg leave to present a Report from the Committee of Selection appointed for Standing Committees, and I shall not do so in absolute silence for this reason: that the Committee of Selection have not pursued precisely the same course as was followed last year. In accordance with the apparent wish of the House they have this year only appointed one Committee, but they wish it to be distinctly understood that the 72 noble Lords who are placed on that Committee are only to be appointed for a time, probably till Easter, the object being to appoint noble Lords only who are likely to attend up to that period. After Easter it will probably be necessary to re-constitute the Committee, or to appoint again the two Committees, as was the case last year. But I was anxious that it should be distinctly understood by noble Lords who are not placed on this Committee now, that if they desire to be placed thereon, according to the new Standing Orders, there will be no difficulty in the Committee of Selection placing them on it.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR
STANDING COMMITTEES.

Report from, That the Committee have (in pursuance of Standing Order No. L.) nominated the following Lords to serve as Chairmen of Standing Committees:

L. Chancellor.	E. Camperdown.
E. Cadogan (L. Privy Seal.)	E. Kimberley.
E. Derby.	E. Selborne.
E. Belmore.	L. Monk Bretton.
E. Morley.	L. Herschell.
	L. Basing.

And that the Committee have (in pursuance of Standing Order No. XLVI.) nominated the following Lords to serve on the Standing Committee appointed on Thursday last:

L. Abp. of Canterbury.	D. Rutland.
L. Chancellor.	M. Salisbury.
L. Archbishop of York.	M. Abercorn. (D. Abercorn.)
V. Cranbrook. (L. President.)	E. Mount-Edgcumbe.
E. Cadogan. (L. Privy Seal.)	(L. Steward.)
D. Saint Albans.	E. Lathom. (L. Chamberlain)

VOL. CCCL.

[THIRD SERIES.]

E. Derby.	L. Foxford.
E. Chesterfield.	(E. Limerick.)
E. Lauderdale.	L. Colchester.
E. Cowper.	L. Ker. (M. Lothian.)
E. Stanhope.	L. Clanwilliam.
E. Waldegrave.	(E. Clanwilliam.)
E. Spencer.	L. Chaworth.
E. Lucan.	(E. Meath.)
E. Belmore.	L. Sudeley.
E. Brownlow.	L. Houghton.
E. Morley.	L. Romilly.
E. Beauchamp.	L. Kenry. (E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl.)
E. Camperdown.	L. Norton.
E. Granville.	L. Shute. (V. Barrington.)
E. Kimberley.	L. Watson.
E. Wharnccliffe.	L. Brabourne.
E. Northbrook.	L. Hothfield.
E. Selborne.	L. Bramwell.
V. Gordon. (E. Aberdeen.)	L. Monk Bretton.
V. Oxenbridge.	L. Monkswell.
V. Cross.	L. Liogen.
L. Bp. London.	L. Ashbourne.
L. Bp. Winchester.	L. Wantage.
L. Bp. Carlisle.	L. Elphinstone.
L. Knutsford. (One of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State.)	L. Herschell.
L. Willoughby de Eresby.	L. Hillingdon.
L. Zouche of Haryngworth.	L. Kensington.
L. Clifford of Chudleigh.	L. Thring.
L. Balfour.	L. Machnaghten.
L. Boyle. (E. Cork and Orrery.)	L. Basing.
	L. De Ramsey.
	L. Morris.
	L. Field.
	L. Hannen.

Read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE QUALIFICATION

AMENDMENT BILL. [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the law with respect to the qualification of Justices of the Peace was presented by the Duke of St. Albans; read 1st; to be printed; and to be read 2nd on Tuesday the 3rd of March next. (No. 39.)

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY

BILL. (No. 38.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, this Bill is not a stranger to your Lordships. It has appeared for many years before this House. It has made many journeys and has been exposed to many vicissitudes since you first made acquaintance with it. Whether the results have been altogether salutary I cannot say. At all events its fair proportions have been very much diminished, and it is now reduced to an amount, not such as we should wish to pass, but to an amount which, under the existing practice and conditions of Parliament, it is possible to pass. A Bill raising severe controversial differences, although meeting with a large amount of approval and sustained by strong Parliamentary majorities, could hardly be expected to pass in the present state of Parliamentary business unless every unnecessary weight were removed from it. The most important change that has taken place in the Bill since it was first introduced here is the abandonment for the time of all attempts to legislate upon the question of tithe redemption; but it must not be supposed that by that abandonment we in the least degree renounce our opinion that tithe redemption is a subject well worthy of the attention of Parliament, or that there are evils which require remedying. But it is a very difficult and complicated subject, and we have thought it better to consent to refer it to a Commission in the first instance before inviting Parliament to consider it more carefully. The Bill is now limited practically to effecting two changes in the law. One of them is that process before the County Court is substituted for the simple process of distress by which the tithe owner now recovers the money that is due to him. The other is that the landowner pays directly instead of paying through the hands of the occupier. The first of these two changes has, I think, already commended itself to your Lordships, and I do not think that it requires much recommendation. It is evident that process before the County Court is more in harmony with the general character of our legislation than the ancient process of independent distress. The actual procedure, as far as regards the levying of the tithe, will not vary very largely, because in order to secure that the tithepayer shall not be in a worse position than he is now, the Bill limits the action of the County Court to those remedies now open to the tithe owner. By the Act of 1836, in the first instance, distress is to be levied upon such produce as is to be found upon the land on which tithe is chargeable, and if that is not sufficient, in the second place, there is to be an appointment of a receiver to cultivate the land in place of the owner. That is practically the remedy that is given by the Act of

2 P

The Marquess of Salisbury

1836, and, with small differences, that is the remedy given by this Bill. But there will be this great difference—namely, that the processes will take place under the direct operation and sanction of a Court of Law, and will not bring the tithe owner into that close conflict and struggle with the tithepayer which is in all cases a matter to be deplored, and especially in cases where the tithe owner is, as he generally is, the spiritual pastor of the parish, with the result that an unnecessary amount of lamentable friction occurs between the pastor and his flock. We believe that a very considerable amount of the difference which has arisen in some parts of the country with regard to the payment of tithes will be gradually diminished, or, at all events, very much mitigated, by substituting the sanction of a Court of Law for the unsupported and unsanctioned act of the creditor himself. The other change is one of great importance, and is one to which we look for a more wide-reaching and permanent effect, and that change is the substitution of the owner instead of the occupier as the person on whom the tithe is levied. That was the original policy of the Act of 1836, and the present state of things, by which the payment of the tithe and the risk of all alteration in the value of the tithe fall upon the farmer—which is a state of things over a large part of the country—certainly never was contemplated by those who passed the Act of 1836. I do not say that it can be called an absolute departure from the Act, but I think it is entirely at variance with its spirit and intention. What the Act of 1836 says with respect to the relations of the cultivator to his landlord is, that any tenant who shall occupy any lands by agreement made subsequent to the cumulation of any of the rent-charge upon it, shall be entitled to deduct the amount thereby payable from the rent he has to pay to his landlord, and it shall be allowed to him in account with his landlord. Those words, although they do not actually say so, evidently contemplate that the precise sum which the occupier has paid to the tithe owner he shall afterwards recover from his landlord. But that is not the practice throughout a large part of the country. In many places the practice is that the farmer takes upon himself the whole risk of the variation in the value of the produce; that he takes the surplus when it is above par and he loses when it is below par; and that a fixed rent without variation is paid to the landlord. I do not say that the farmer loses on that account, and I do not say that in itself it is an undesirable arrangement, but the evil of it is that in bad times the farmer feels the loss very severely, and is apt to think himself very much aggrieved unless he obtains from the tithe owner the same sort of remission which a farmer under such circumstances expects to obtain from his landlord. It is not just to the poorer clergy that these remissions should be asked for. Their payment is low enough in all conscience as it is, and it was intended by the Legislature that whatever was secured to them by the Act they should receive. But in many districts they have been subjected to the pressure of opinion, which it was almost impossible for them to resist or appeal against, and which forced them, in addition to the loss which they sustained by the fall in the tithe rent-charge, to make considerable remissions to the tithepayer besides, in order to meet the bad times and the suffering which the agricultural classes have been undergoing. I feel that this is one of the practical evils which has resulted from our not following the policy of the law of 1836, and departing, in fact, from the provisions which it laid down. We propose to return to the system which it was intended then to institute, and in making this proposal I must demur entirely to the language that has been sometimes held, as though we were departing from the bargain of 1836, and placing the tithe owners in a more favourable position than Parliament intended them to occupy. That is distinctly not the case. Parliament distinctly intended that they should occupy the position which is defined by this Bill, but the machinery was imperfect, and the intention has been defeated in practice by the custom which has grown up. There is only one more provision to which I need refer. There are, of course, many details and many difficult questions which your Lordships will give careful attention to when the Bill goes into Committee, but I do not think it necessary for me to touch upon them at this stage. There is only one thing which is, in principle, of great importance, and to which I will refer in a few words, and that is the remission which the County Court is enjoined to give where it shall appear that the tithe exceeds two-thirds of the assessed value of the land. I need not say that this will not be of frequent occurrence, but in a few parts of the country there are cases in which it does happen, and the policy which Parliament should pursue in such cases should be as carefully considered as if it was likely to be of general effect. I think that there will be no difference of opinion upon this point, that when we are adjusting the remedies which the tithe owner is to use for the purpose of recovering his tithe, we should be careful that nothing is done which will have a tendency to throw land out of cultivation. If the tithe exceeds the assessed value of the land, it is obvious that the land must go out of cultivation, because the farmer will be giving his pains and his capital to the cultivation of the land without receiving the full return for what he expends, and he naturally will not continue to incur that expense for the benefit of the tithe owner, to whom the money is to go, and therefore will cease to cultivate the land; and when the land is no longer cultivated, there will be no produce upon which the tithe can be levied. In arresting that state of things we are doing the tithe owner no wrong because that condition would deprive him of the produce on which his tithe is to be levied. We are preventing the arising of a condition of things in which not only will the land go largely out of cultivation, which is a great public evil, but there will be no produce which will be titheable, which is a great evil to the tithe owner himself. But we go a step further than that, and, although I quite admit it is open to considerable question and dispute, still on the whole I think that the course we have taken is capable of being adequately defended. We have resolved not only that if the tithe exceeds the assessed value of the land, but that if it exceeds two-thirds of the value there shall be a remission of the rent-charge. Now that difference of one-third represents the expense and the difficulty which the tithe owner would be at if he had to exercise the remedies which are placed in his hands. The remedy, which is practically given to the tithe owner in the case of land like that which is at the very edge of the cost of cultivating it, is to take the land into his own hands and cultivate it and so raise the amount of his tithe. Nobody believes that he could take it into his own hands and cultivate it with a result equal to that which the farmer already in possession, with the experience and with all the convenience which long occupation and skill would give him, would be able to cultivate it in his place. We have measured the difference between the two as being one-third of the assessment. It is a rough measurement, but I believe on the whole it is a fair one. Many persons have pressed us to go as far as one-half ; but without being able to put down in exact figures the steps of the calculation, my impression is, judging from the opinion of persons well skilled in this matter which we have had the advantage of hearing, this remission of one-third will fairly and approximately represent the negative value to the tithe owner of the remedy by which alone he can recover the tithe in that case. We, therefore, give the County Court Judge power up to that point to make such remission within those limits as he shall think fit. There is only one other observation I wish to make, and it is with reference to the Amendment of which notice has been given. Of course I have no right to forecast the nature of the opposition my noble Friend will raise against this Bill. It is possible that it may be entirely different from what I anticipate. He may be the enthusiastic advocate for the tithe owners. He may think that this is a Bill for the confiscation of tithes. He may think that much greater advantages ought to have been given to the tithe owner than are given to him ; but if I am to found myself on the language he has previously used, I gather that he wants in any Bill of this kind to re-open the settlement of 1836. Now, if it is intended to do this on just principles, that is to say, if it is intended to give to the tithe owner substantially that which by the common law he has a right to—the law which has existed for many centuries—namely, one-tenth part of the gross value of the land—the proposal which has been submitted by my noble Friend would be the most disastrous proposal to the landowners that could be made. In the settlement of 1836 the Church agreed to the loss of a great deal for the sake of getting permanence and peace. It is very easy to ascertain that that was the case. The reckoning may be difficult if you follow it into all the possible varieties of crops that can be grown ; but very few figures and a slight consideration will show you that tithes, as calculated according to the principles which prevailed up to 1836, and tithes as levied now at present prices, would be very much in excess of anything that the tithe owner receives. Take corn. The practice up to 1836 was to let the straw represent the cost of threshing and dressing for market. The tithe owner had a right to the corn as soon as it was cut, but for the further process he had to pay, and his practice was to pay for them by surrendering the straw to the occupier. That was a very good bargain for the occupier then, but it would be even better now, for in consequence of the increased facilities in locomotion, straw is a very valuable agricultural product. I do not know whether I have the assent of the noble Lord opposite.

The Marquess of Salisbury

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : It is not so with us.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : Then I pity you. But at all events that was the practice throughout the greater part of the country. I do not know that I shall command the assent of the noble Earl if I say that the price at present rates of an acre of grain of all kinds, leaving out the straw, may be very fairly taken at £5. I think if the noble Earl will make the calculation he will not find I am very far wrong, though, perhaps, I have underrated the price of barley a little. If that be the case it requires very little calculation to find that the tithe of that sum is 10s. ; but it is seldom indeed that the occupier now has to pay a tenth, and 10s. an acre would be enormously in excess of what he has now to pay. That there are cases where 10s. would be paid I am well aware, but they are exceedingly rare ; and in most cases throughout the country 10s. would be enormously in excess. But even if you go to the opposite end of the scale and take a less remunerative crop, the crop of hay. The tithe owner before 1836 had a right to the hay when it was put in cock—he had a right to have it made up to that point. I suppose I am not exaggerating prices when I say that 60s. an acre for hay in cock would be very readily given in most places, and 6s. an acre, though not an unknown tithe is a very large tithe in any part of the country. The more you look at this by the light of the figures the more you will see that the tithepayer made a very good bargain in 1836, and that even now he would make a very bad bargain if he invited a reconsideration of the covenants. What I think misleads people is the fact that parsons in those days were satisfied with much less, and there were all kinds of agreements and practices and customs which had grown up by which the parsons received really and substantially less than a tenth part of the gross value of the produce of the land. But those were agreements to which no person was bound who had not made them. In the then difficulty of communication, in the difficulties which the parson had in disposing of the produce when he had it, it was no doubt to his interest to make agreement of this kind. But it was decided, in a case before the Court of Exchequer, just before the passing of the Act of 1836, and I think that was one of the causes which led to the passing of that Act, that such engagements were not in the least degree permanently binding, that they were purely voluntary acts on the part of each successive clergyman, and that the clergyman could always, if he chose, resort to his Common Law right of having the tenth part of the gross value of the crop. Therefore, for those reasons, the tithe owner would gain very much if there was a re-valuation. And also, you must remember, that if there was a re-valuation, something according to all fair principles would have to be paid for the growing value of the land. That was an element which was entirely neglected and passed over in 1836; but if you intend to behave fairly in the matter, and to deal with it on the principles on which you buy land for any public purpose, I think you would have to take that circumstance also into consideration. But I have no doubt my noble Friend behind me will not condescend to any calculations of this kind. He will simply rely on the distressed state of agriculture, and the right of owners and occupiers to be relieved. He will rely upon the fact that this is a powerful interest, and that the Church is comparatively weak. My Lords, arguments of that kind which have been put forward in more or less disguise are really nothing but throwing your sword into the scale. They are departing from the principle of justice in dealing with others, and that departure will be subject to all the penalties which every departure from the principle of justice involves. The practice of throwing the sword into the scale is one that when once it begins is very contagious, and it is one which certainly the owners of property would not be prudent, by their example, to encourage. I submit this Bill with some satisfaction to your Lordships, because I hope that at last we are in sight of harbour; but I earnestly trust that it may pass through your House without any alteration sufficiently grave to make its success in the other House doubtful. I am well aware that your Lordships will carefully consider the Bill, and I have no doubt that many valuable Amendments will be introduced. We shall have an opportunity of considering it in Committee of the whole House, and afterwards in the Standing Committee, and I earnestly hope that when those deliberations are concluded we shall have produced a measure which will secure the assent of the other House of Parliament, and which will introduce a very much needed amendment in the administration of the law. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD BRABOURNE: My Lords, the noble Marquess, in the eloquent speech which he has just addressed to us, has congratulated us upon the fact that his ship is at last within sight of harbour; but at the beginning of his speech he told us that this measure is only a part of the tithe reform that is contemplated, and therefore I fear that though the harbour may be reached on this occasion, the ship will have to put out to sea again, and that her future setting out may be accompanied by disaster. I know that I am engaged upon a very thankless and hopeless task in opposing the principle of the Government measure on this occasion, but I am emboldened to do so by two considerations. In the first place I cannot forget that, however unanimous Parliament may appear at this moment to be on the subject of this Bill, only five years ago they were equally unanimous in passing a Bill upon the kindred subject of extraordinary tithe of which no one whom I have ever heard speak of it has had a good word to say since. That was a measure which related to the addition made to ordinary tithe on lands upon which crops of a specially lucrative character were being grown, which ceased when the crops were no longer grown. Well, Parliament abolished that tax for the future, but in respect of the past it appointed Commissioners to ascertain in some extraordinary way the gross value of that tithe, and then imposed upon the owners of the lands (who had received no benefit from the crops in question) an everlasting burden by way of rent-charge, and made them pay for setting the law in motion. But there is another reason why I hope Parliament will yet deal with greater caution than it has done with this matter. This is not the first Bill the present Government has introduced upon this subject. I am bound to admit that the second Bill was an improvement upon the first, and that this Bill is somewhat an improvement upon the second; but judging by that happy result I am also inclined to think that if the Government will take back their Bill, make a little further inquiry into the matter, and make it somewhat more like the one previously introduced, it is possible that at last we may have a Bill that is nearer perfection than the one before the House. Now I put it to your Lordships—was there ever in the history of Parliament or of this country a measure brought forward with so little inquiry, or with so little demand for it? Who has asked or petitioned for this Bill, and what statistics have your Lordships had placed before you—what evidence to show that the present system is not working well in England? I may be told—I have seen it stated in the public newspapers—that the reason for the introduction of this Bill is the difficulty of collecting the tithe in Wales. Well, that may possibly be an argument for confining the operation of this Bill to the Principality; but if you are going to change your system, whether it be in England or in Wales, you ought first to show that there is some fault in the present system, and that has not been proved or even alleged upon any statistics which have been presented to this House. I myself asked the noble Marquess last year if he could furnish some statistics in the matter; but he replied that he did not know how or where they could be got. If, since 1836, when this Act was passed, there have been no complaints in this country,—as I maintain has been the case—of the manner of collecting this tax, why is the whole of England to be disturbed and existing arrangements upset because there has lately been a difficulty experienced in Wales? So far as I understand it, though I do not pretend to be very conversant with that agitation, it is due to a different cause altogether. It is not a protest against the manner in which the tithes are levied, but to the application of them after they are levied; and therefore, whatever you may do, however you may alter the manner in which the collection is made, that objection will remain. But there seems to have stolen into the imagination of the Ministry some idea that people who resist and detest distraint at the present moment are going to be entirely satisfied the moment that distraint is put in force by the County Court, and not by the owners, the clergy themselves. That is an entire surmise, and for my part I believe the dissatisfaction arises from the distraint itself, and that the resistance would be the same in vigour and vivacity from whatever quarter the distasteful operation may be enforced. Now, the noble Marquess stated fairly enough what the object was of the Bill of 1836. He said very truly that the object was to make the landlord liable. That is true; and what I contend is that the landlord always has been, in fact, liable ever since the Act of 1836. It is quite true that in many instances the tithe is paid through the occupier, but how does that affect the position? If I give my butler £5 in addition to his wages in order that he may pay bills to that amount for me, I am not increasing his wages by £5; and in the same way if I let a farm for £80 instead of £100 in order that the farmer may himself pay some charge to the estimated amount of £20 upon the land, I am not putting upon that tenant any burden. He is not bearing the burden upon the land; and what the noble Marquess has really done I will describe in a moment. Here let me say how astonished I have been at hearing the claim which has been put forward, not, I own, by the noble Marquess, but by some of his supporters, that this is a great benefit to the tenant farmers of England. A Member of Parliament, more or less distinguished, no doubt, came down to my part of the country the other day and made a speech to an enthusiastic audience of 56 persons, of whom ten were clergymen—in which he said that the present Government had done a great many good things, which I do not dispute, but the greatest boon ever conferred on the tenant-farmers was shifting the burden of the tithe to the shoulders of the owner from the shoulders of the hard-working tenant-farmer. The error of that statement is only equalled by its audacity. If there was any gratitude due to anybody it is due to the Whig Government of 1836, who put the burden upon the shoulders of the owner. Everybody knows that the owner is liable. The process gone through where a tenant is about to leave his farm and has not paid his tithe is very simple: the agent of the landlord goes to the valuer, who is valuing him out, and tells him that he must not pay over the valuation until a receipt has been produced for the rent and tithe. The Government know that they are not benefitting the tenant-farmer at all. What they are doing in this Bill is to say that certain arrangements which have existed, and have answered since 1836, shall no longer be allowed to exist—that is to say, they who have so often on other occasions protested against the violation of private contracts are going to declare that this particular description of private contract shall no longer exist. But I leave the noble Marquess, if he will so far condescend to ask himself one single question—why is it that the rent-charge has been so constantly paid through the occupier, and not directly through the landlord? The question answers itself. This arrangement has grown upon account of its convenience; it is not a thing which has been imposed upon trembling occupiers and fearful tenant-farmers by cruel landlords. It is a simple arrangement which has grown up because it has been found so convenient. This Bill is going to find out the owner everywhere, but I venture to say you will find a little difficulty sometimes in doing that. I do not think the noble Marquess has realised the enormous difficulty of it. Let him go into any house here in this Metropolis, or in the suburbs, and try to find who is the owner. He may find that there is, first, the occupier, then a sub-lessee, probably several, then the long lessee, then a mortgagee, and at last he arrives at the man who has what the lawyers call the "equity of redemption." You may know that he exists but you have to find him, and the difficulty of finding him will be immense. My belief is that without intending it, the noble Marquess will in many instances plunge the tithe owner into a sea of litigation and difficulty of which he has no conception at the present moment. I have said that it is a misstatement to say that the Government are conferring a benefit upon the tenant-farmers. If I thought they were doing so I should be among the first to give the Government credit for it, for I am always willing to give them credit if I can, but in this instance I must deny that there is any credit due to them. The noble Marquess told us that the Act of 1836 was an immense benefit to the landowners, and that great sacrifices were then made by the Church. Now, I utterly dispute that proposition, and I ask noble Lords to read the history of that time as contained in the Debates upon that Act if they wish to know the real state of things. In the first place, from the manner in which the tithe was collected, the system had become so unpopular that many people thought it was time to sweep it away altogether, and the whole system of tithes and the position of the Church were never in greater danger. That Act was conceived in the interests of tithe owners and tithepayers alike. I have here a quotation from a speech of Lord John Russell upon the subject. Lord John Russell's own words were—

Lord Brabourne

"The income of the clergy will ultimately flow from the landowners, and not from the tenants or farmers, and the clergyman will be relieved from an alternative that now often exists, either of making a personal enemy by pressing his demand or injuring himself by abandoning it."

But what has been the loss? I have explained how it was that the system grew up by which the tithe was often paid through the occupier. Let us now ask ourselves how about this great sacrifice on the part of the Church? It was stated in the Debates at that time, and without contradiction, that the opinion of that Bill throughout the country was such that it was popularly called the "Clergyman's Bill." I will not go so far as to say that was correct, but it is certain that one great point which had to be faced by them in the matter was the expenses of collection. The noble Marquess tried two or three times to show, from the manner in which the tithe had to be collected, that undoubtedly a great sacrifice had been made by the Church. I find, however, from the Debates of the time that, while in some instances it was alleged that the costs of collection did not exceed 5 or 10 per cent., in a great many more they constantly came to 40 or 50 per cent., and as the cost of collection was entirely saved to the Church it is not so unnatural, I think, if the noble Marquess will consider what the circumstances of the case were that the measure should have been considered as favourable to the clergy. They had to get the produce from the land and prepare it for market; and to house that produce necessitated the erection of those large tithe-farms which many of us remember, and the maintaining and repairs of these buildings of course involved considerable expense. The Government of that day took evidence upon the matter; they acted with impartiality, and they came to the conclusion that upon the average the tithe owner got, perhaps, £75 out of £100 supposed to be due to him. That is to say, £75 per cent. was the net amount received. Now all that cost of collection was entirely saved to the Church. But there was something besides that. The clergyman besides had the immense advantage of having the land instead of the produce of the land from which to take his claim, and he had the security of the landowner behind him. When the produce of the land had to be looked to, and the clergyman had to take his tithe, every tenth sheep and so on, if any disease attacked the flocks, or if a blight happened to the produce, he was of course a sufferer; but instead of that he then had the hard cash secured to him, which was no trifling benefit to him, and beyond all that he had the security of the landowner who was responsible for the tithe. Therefore to say that the Church made such an enormous sacrifice, and that that Act was for the benefit of the tithepayers is an assertion which in the interests of that justice which the noble Marquess invoked so pathetically just now I cannot allow for a moment to pass. Now, I want to know what is to be the great gain which you are to obtain from this Bill? In the first place, as I understand it, the owner is to pay direct. Has the noble Marquess thought of the effect of that? As far as regards the tenant farmer, there is an idea that he is to be benefited in some extraordinary manner by this arrangement, and that as far as the clergy are concerned friction is to be avoided. I never could quite understand what is meant by the friction between clergymen and their parishioners. I can understand the existence of friction in Wales, because there the people object to the tithe itself; and I can understand friction existing in some parts of England where the tithes are so heavy that, however patient men may have been under them, they will not be patient much longer. But I deny that in most parts of England there is any friction between the clergy and their parishioners. I believe there is the greatest possible good feeling between them; and whether a man is a small owner paying on his own account or not I believe there is little difficulty from one end of England to the other in the collection of the tithes. I think it is strange that those who pose as the friends of the Church should entertain so bad an opinion of the relations between clergymen and their parishioners. I think that argument of friction is an argument insulting to both, and I do not believe there is that friction. And besides, what is it that is objected to? The occupiers are still to pay the tithe yearly, but I am not to be allowed to say to my tenant, "You are to have your land for so much less rent, and you are to continue to pay the charge yourself." I am to pay the charge, and it is specially enacted in this Bill that a receipt shall be given me specifying that so much of the amount paid is "tithe paid to the Rev. Mr. Smith." Of course, you thereby earmark the payment. The farmers are not going to be deceived. This Bill is really an attempt to humbug the tenant farmers into the belief that you are giving them some advantage which you are not giving them; but they will soon be undeceived, and the effect will be to increase the dissatisfaction in regard to tithe. Whether the Rev. Mr. Smith distrains in respect of the tithe, or whether I distrain in my own name on account of the payment which I am obliged to make to the Rev. Mr. Smith, the tenants are far too sharp not to know exactly how it arises, and the friction will be as great as ever it was. The noble Marquess has told you what good this transfer to the County Courts is to establish. Well, I am not so certain of it. The County Courts were introduced, I suppose, to afford the public an easy manner of recovering debts and to give cheap law to the community. They have worked well and are popular; and the noble Marquess should consider whether he is not likely to make them unpopular by converting them into engines for extracting tithes from unwilling people. I am not going into the question of what the effect of a re-valuation might be; but I think it is most mischievous to allow the present state of things to exist. Perhaps many noble Lords have read certain publications which have been recently issued, which state the enormous proportion which tithe in a great many instances bears to rent. I happen to know how it operates in my own county. I will give three instances: In the case of one small farm the landlord receives £35 and has to hand over £18 for tithe; in the next case the rent is 20s. an acre and the tithe 10s.; and in the third (these are only, my Lords, some of many similar instances) the rent which the landlord receives is 12s. per acre, of which he has to hand over 8s. to the clergyman, so that he has to be content with 4s. himself. In the case of large landowners that may be a matter of small importance. The most rev. Prelate has told you in a previous Debate how very many tithepayers are small landowners. If you only consider what this burden of tithe is on the land for a moment, I think you will agree with me when I say that it is an enormous and a cruel one, which ought not to be placed on the producers of food in this country. I do say that in dealing with a big subject of this kind, before attempting to give further facilities for inflicting a burden and enforcing such a tax as this, you ought, in the first place, to see that the burden is placed upon a fair and proper footing. Let us have an inquiry; let us have a Commission. That is the proper constitutional mode of proceeding in dealing with a great question like this, in order to ascertain whether there is not land which is too highly rated, and whether there is not land in respect of which the tithe should be much lowered. There ought not to be such a state of things as the Church taking the greater part of the rent, whether only a half or as much as three-quarters of the value of the land is taken. Such a condition of things is preposterous; and if it does not appeal to your Lordships now and to the House of Commons, it will come home to you by-and-bye, because it is a cry which will come up again and again until justice is satisfied. The proper course to take would be to inquire, by Commission, into the incidence of the tax, with a view to remedying its inequalities and injustice in many cases. If some such course is not taken now the time will probably soon come when the demand for justice in the matter by the country will force it upon your Lordships and the House of Commons. The noble Marquess has spoken of criticisms on the details of the Bill. I do not wish to detain your Lordships by entering now upon those details. The Committee of your Lordships' House, if the Bill goes into Committee, would be the proper stage at which to consider them. Nor do I mean to detain your Lordships by going into the history of abortive measures in the past. I am satisfied that we have a practical measure to deal with to-night. I have stated what are my objections to this Bill. I believe it is an entire mistake to interfere with a system of arrangement which has grown up by itself, and that very fact shows that it has not been a useless or unpopular arrangement. I believe it is a mistake to place the County Courts in the position in which you are proposing to place them by this Bill, and that it is a still greater mistake to deal with a little bit of this large subject when the Government, with a majority in both Houses, might have taken a comprehensive and effective view of it, and have taken the necessary and proper means to find out where justice lies, and how in this matter justice might be done. I do not suppose that any objections which I have urged against the Bill will be sufficient to induce your Lordships to refuse to give it a Second Reading, introduced as it has been by Her Majesty's Government, but I believe those objections will be recognised elsewhere. I believe they will be felt by the clergy themselves when they find that they are obliged either to forego a claim or to place themselves in irritating and unhappy conflict with their parishioners in the County Courts, and that the clergy, before they have gone very far with the Bill, will find that it is not so acceptable as they have been led to suppose. They may find one difficulty in that part of the Bill which refers to three months' grace being given to the tithepayer. It is necessary that you should give it under the circumstances affecting this Bill. That three months' grace is in substitution for what the noble Marquess in the first Bill proposed—that 5 per cent. should be allowed to the tithepayers who paid within a certain time. That 5 per cent. would have been a boon to some of the tithepayers, and also to the tithe owners, because they would not have been kept out of their money possibly for many months, but would have been paid at once. I think, therefore, the clergy will recognise that this Bill is not so entirely favourable to them as they may have supposed. I believe, also, that my objections to the Bill will be felt by the tenant farmers when they find that, under the proposed system of payment of the tithe, their landlords are obliged to expend large sums, and, therefore, will not be able to extend to them that indulgence and consideration with respect to their rents which they do now at present, when probably a large part of the tithe has been paid by the squire and the larger farmers, the clergyman is able to exercise a judicious clemency as to the rest. But if the squire is obliged to collect and pay it all he will be compelled to press his tenant for payment in a manner which has not hitherto been done. There is no class, however, that will feel these objections more strongly than the large class of small owners occupying and cultivating their own land. Those men are a very numerous body, particularly in the South and West of England, and they have always regarded the present Government as their special friends, and have supported them accordingly. Here is their reward! The Government forgets or despises and has ignored their complaints, bitter and loud as they have been, in this matter, and has dealt with the question solely in the interests of the tithe owner. This large class must be more than human if they forget this, and if they do not resent such treatment. I am afraid you will drive those men to only one conclusion, the effect of which will be to make them more readily listen to arguments that justice is only to be secured through the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church, that tithe is national property which should be devoted in a just and equitable manner to national purposes, and which must not be imposed in an oppressive manner upon struggling and suffering agriculturists. It may, perhaps, be thought that I am hostile to the Established Church. Not at all. I speak in no spirit of hostility to that Church. I believe the Established Church of England never stood in a stronger position than she does at this moment in some respects; and that in the history of mankind there has never been an Organisation which has made such rapid and excellent progress in good work as the Church of England during the last 50 years. But that is all the more reason why the Church should not be associated with that which I say again is an unjust burden. These payments to the extent of three-fourths of the whole value of the land were never intended to be given. I do not consider now the questions why they were given, or to whom. This question of Disestablishment will be again brought forward, if justice is not done, and before that time comes we shall hear more about this burden if its pressure is not relieved. It is impossible that the small owners in England should be content to go on for ever under this burden. I promised I would not detain your Lordships long, and I think I have kept my word. It is for the reasons I have given that I believe this Bill to be an unwise and unnecessary measure, that I believe the noble Marquess has begun at the wrong end by seeking to impose this tax arbitrarily instead of first putting it upon a reasonable and just basis, and that I feel compelled to move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Lord Brabourne

Lord Brabourne

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months.")—(The Lord Brabourne.)

*THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, it is no place of mine to go into the general question of tithe or the terrors we are threatened with. I wish to say a few words upon the question of this particular Bill, and to state what I believe to be the attitude of the chief part of the clergy and loyal Church people with regard to it. The wisest thing that can be done when disorder appears in any part of a body material or a body politic is to attend to the symptoms, in order to ascertain the cause of the evil, and to remedy this as far as may be; and, therefore, although I agree with the noble Lord who has just sat down that friction is not characteristic of the relations between clergy and tithepayers at large, yet I believe that it is well, and absolutely necessary in many cases, to diminish friction where it exists now, lest the same cause should begin to act in other quarters. It is not that the County Court alone will diminish friction, or that payment by the landowners will do so; but it is a judicious combination of these two principles in one Bill which I believe will act very widely indeed in the diminution of friction. If the Bill had been brought in for carrying out either of those two principles by itself, objections might have been taken on the other, but it is the combination of the two principles which gives me hope for the working of this Bill. The noble Lord who has just sat down has commended this Bill beyond its predecessors, which is exactly the line which I myself should wish to take. It deals with the question so far as we are now able to deal with it, and it certainly is the most equitable measure of those which have been before us within recent years. But I cannot help regretting exceedingly the omission of that third principle which was expressed before in the Redemption Clauses. The tithe question will not be really settled till the question of redemption is settled. That is a point in which friction is really felt—the payment of very small sums by very small owners—in all directions. They are both difficult for the clergyman to collect and worrying and vexatious for the small owners to pay. But I am perfectly willing to believe that the Royal Commission which is now sitting on the subject will discover upon delicate questions and phenomena relating to the collection of small tithes, so numerous especially in some parts of the country, some means which will enable the Government to bring in a Bill dealing with that subject in a way, perhaps, possible as yet. One of the most equitable improvements in the Bill appears to me to be the omission of that 5 per cent. which was really to be paid to the landowners as compensation for their taking the liability of the tithe on themselves. It gives me confidence in the justice of the country when I consider why that provision has been withdrawn. It really was not, when the tithe agitation began anew, generally understood that the burden was actually laid by the Tithe Commutation Act on the landowner, and that it was intended so to lie. But the testimony of those who were concerned in the drawing of the Bill upon the fair interpretation of the words in it, such clear interpretation as the noble Marquess has enunciated to-night, has satisfied people in all directions that the liability was always really the landowner's. It is satisfactory to feel, that on a better understanding, that the 5 per cent. has been withdrawn from the Bill. There is another point upon which certainly considerable alarm has existed among the clergy. The private letters I have received, as well as the communications made to the newspapers, exhibit it. This alarm is in regard to the concession made in waiving the amount of the tithe rent-charge which exceeds two-thirds of the rateable value under Schedule B of the Income Tax Act. This has been boldly called confiscation; and if it had been pushed to the extent of deducting everything beyond a half when the tithe rent-charge exceeds a half of the value, I think it would have been very difficult and even impossible to defend the provision. I assent to all the noble Marquess said about the difficulty of precisely fixing the ratio which should be established. But in dealing with this property I am certain that a reduction to a half would be a most unfair ratio; but I confess I do not share the alarm of some of the clergy that they will be made sufferers by the provision that, when the tithe rent-charge exceeds two-thirds of the annual value of the land, the excess shall not be paid to them. I do not share the alarm, because at present I feel that the system which exists is one which does tend to keep land out of cultivation; and I believe that in some parts of the country land is actually kept by it out of cultivation. It is very desirable to remove that lion out of the path. It is unfair to the whole population in a certain way, and unfair to the occupiers and the owners of the land that it should be compelled to lie uncultivated by the fact that, if uncultivated land is taken up again, the cultivator has to face two years of tithe rent-charge in arrears. I believe that, with the provisions of the present Bill, the tithe owner, having to lose only the excess over two-thirds of the annual value, will find that lands will come back into cultivation which have been lying uncultivated, to the great benefit of himself as well as of the farmer. The farmer will be disposed to take the land back into cultivation from the hope that his share will increase, and he will endeavour to cultivate the land in the best manner. It appears to me, therefore, that, though it is but a rough-and-ready estimate that can be formed in this instance, the new provision will be a distinct advantage to both parties. The cases may be, I believe are, few; but this we really do not know at the present time. It may turn out that more land may come into cultivation under benignant provisions than we know of; but, at any rate, the provision will be a distinct advantage to both sides. There is yet another point which has created, and is creating, a considerable alarm. That is connected with the new clauses which were introduced in the other House relating to rating; and these clauses will, I hope, be explained here by those who are thoroughly familiar with the subject. It is an intricate subject, on which I should not presume to enter minutely now; but I am given to understand that by these new clauses the tithe owner will only be placed in the same position as every other ratepayer is placed in; and, moreover, he will be placed in the position which he was supposed to occupy by all except minute investigators of the law until a recent legal decision was given. In practice the tithe owner in the past has been liable to this provision; and I do not think that it would be at all wise or just for us to desire to place ourselves, as tithe owners, in a different position from the rest of the ratepayers of the country. I should be most loth to do anything or to say a word which would tend to make the passage of the Bill difficult when it goes back to another place; but there are two omissions which I trust the Government will be ready to take into their consideration, and if possible I hope they will introduce some fresh clauses on the subject: The first of these points is the omission of the present right to take possession of land which the farmer has let, or is about to let, go out of cultivation, because he thinks he cannot produce from it a sum which will enable him to pay the tithe. At present the tithe owner then has the right of saying that he will take the land over into his own possession and cultivate it himself. Now, I do not know whether this has actually occurred very often; but I am in possession of cases in which the power to do this has induced the farmer to try again, to his own benefit and to that of the tithe owner. The tithe owner has real property in the land; the farmer is the person through whom he receives its value. If the tithe owner demands his own property, and the farmer replies, "You cannot have it because I cannot produce it out of the land," the tithe owner ought to be able to say, "Then allow me; for I think I can." I know that the saying of this in the past has often produced a fresh application of industry and intelligence to the land, to the advantage of both sides. I hope, therefore, that that provision may be put back into this Bill. The other point I wish to mention is this—I do not know how the difficulty is to be overcome; but it appears to me as a real difficulty, and I hope the Government will consider it—it is this: the owner of the land may make arrangements for his tenant to pay a small or almost nominal rent on condition that the tenant erects buildings on the estate, carries out drainage, or brings a supply of water from a distance. I have been connected with transactions of that kind myself, and they are very advantageous and generally fair and above board. But they might also be used in the new state of things in a collusory manner; and in any case, whether used in a collusory manner or employed in good faith, there ought to be some provision by which the value which is not paid in rent, but which is actually given in the way of buildings, irrigation, or otherwise, shall somehow be ascertained, and not be withdrawn from what is due to the tithe owner. I certainly hope that these two points may be taken into consideration by the Government, and that some means may be devised for meeting them. In the latter point there is certainly a most real risk and danger. I will not detain your Lordships longer on the present occasion.

The Archbishop of Canterbury

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, I wish to state to your Lordships, and I will endeavour to do so at no great length, my reasons, not only for dissenting from the Motion which has been made to read this Bill a second time this day six months, but also for accepting the Bill as likely, on the whole, to meet the exigencies of a very difficult situation. In the first place, I entirely agree that the Bill is an improvement on those of former years. In two particular points that improvement is marked. One is that it adheres very closely—I am bound to say rather too rigidly, if anything, in favour of the tithepayer—to the principle of the existing Commutation Act, which throws the burden of the tithe upon the property and not upon the landowner personally. One or more of the former Bills proposed to make the landowner personally liable. That certainly was going beyond the provisions and the intention of the Commutation Act of 1836. If anything could have justified the bonus of 5 per cent., which the same Bill proposed, I think, to give in certain cases to the landowner, it was the imposition of that personal liability which is now abandoned. There was another provision in the same Bill, and, I think, more recently repeated, which I have always looked upon with alarm as to the result which in working might possibly follow, and that was to make a remission to the landowner, no doubt on the same principle as some remission is made to him now, but in the case of the land not being cultivated at a profit. Now, nothing could, I think, have been more difficult, and nothing more alarming, than an investigation of that question in a contested case; and I am very glad to see that those difficulties are overcome in the present Bill by assessing the value of the land to the landowner in a simpler way, and in a self-acting way, with reference to a known existing standard of value, that adopted for the public purpose of Income Tax assessment. The adoption of that standard is in itself a security against it being warped or misdirected or used for any improper purpose. In that respect the Bill is also an improvement upon its latest predecessor, which proposed that there should be a special assessment of the value by the authority which acts for rating purposes. A special assessment for tithe purposes only would have been a less satisfactory way of arriving at any calculation than that proposed by the present Bill founded upon the valuation made for the purpose of Income Tax under Schedule B. Having said that, I am bound to say that I acquiesce in, rather than approve of, the 5th clause, which does make a certain deduction in a certain case. I acquiesce very much on the ground stated by the Most Rev. Prelate that the cases are not likely to be very numerous, and it certainly is much better that such a deduction should be made than that the land should become waste and be thrown entirely out of cultivation. I cannot at all adopt the point of view of my noble Friend who moved the Amendment, and who would claim not that deduction, but infinitely larger deductions for the benefit of the landowner, whom he considers to be at present injured by the incidence of the tithe, and to have a first claim to consideration. I will not follow my noble Friend in his general observations, but I must express my entire dissent from the principle on which they were founded, and I will endeavour to do so in the words of much greater authorities than myself. In the first place, I will, in support of my dissent, read some words of Lord Althorp in 1834, which I commend to those who, in the interest of the landowners and landlord, suppose that some general re-adjustment of the tithe rent-charge ought to take place for the purpose of practically relieving the landowners from what they consider to be a burden upon their land. The words which I quote show that it is no burden upon their land at all. It is a share and interest in the property of the country which belongs not to themselves, but to others. The passage is very short. He said—

“Whatever opinion may be held as to the abstract right to tithes, there can be no difference of opinion as to the question that they do not belong to the owner of the land.”

And even in that event, to which the noble Lord referred as a possible event, if the discontented landowner were driven to extremities—the event, I mean, of disestablishment and disendowment—it would be remembered that to whomsoever the tithes did belong, they did not belong to the owner of the land. Well, then, my noble Friend seems to think that there is a great vice in the Commutation Act, because it has not in some way divided the beneficial interest in the land, in some reasonable proportions, between the owner of the tithe and the owner of the land which is subject to the tithe, and he spoke of the word “tenth” as if tithe originally meant a tenth of the clear net value of the land. It never meant anything of the sort. Whether it was a good form of property or a bad form of property, it never meant any proportion—a tenth or any other of the clear or net value—of the land. The whole cost of cultivation always was upon those who considered it worth their while, and found it worth their while practically, to cultivate subject to the existence of this paramount right to tithe, and no deduction from tithe was ever made on account of the cost of cultivation. It is, therefore, quite clear that it is a transparent fallacy to think that the Commutation Act went on wrong principles, because it did not provide for a division in some reasonable proportions between the owner of the charge and the owner of the land subject to the charge. Upon that point I will content myself with reading to your Lordships Sir Robert Peel's words on the introduction of the Commutation Act in 1836. He said that—“Tithe was a payment founded on the basis of actual profit, but rent was not, and, therefore, the two charges were incommensurate, and that being so, an attempt to establish a proportion between rent and tithe must necessarily end in failure and disappointment. He quite agreed with Lord John Russell that it was proper to abandon the attempt to establish a proportion between rent and tithe.”

The very idea, I must be permitted to say, is founded upon a total misconception of the relation of the two kinds of property the one to the other. I will not dwell further upon the argument for the rejection of the Bill; but my noble Friend said something as to the tendency of the Bill to increase rather than diminish friction, and he seemed to take exception almost to those who speak of friction as existing to any extent which made any remedy necessary or desirable. He also spoke of the possibility that the County Court, now a popular and successful tribunal, might be more or less discredited by having this additional duty to perform. Now, I do not think the Bill has the slightest tendency to create or increase friction, and I do think that the working of the Commutation Act under recent circumstances and under the pressure of that uneasiness which naturally arises out of the state of distress existing in the agricultural interest, joined to other causes which I would not wish to particularise, has produced in some places an actual friction of a serious and alarming kind, not only serious and alarming to the owners of tithe, but to the general interests of order in the country at large. The state of things which for the last few years has existed in Wales has brought to a point, which the previous circumstances never did, the question whether it is right, whether it is convenient, whether it is in the interest either of Church or of State that the clergyman's remedy should be against the property of that person who is not treated by the law as the man primarily chargeable with the burden. Now, in that respect, the Tithe Commutation Act was open to some exception, from which it is only relieved by the fact that the difficulty did not arise in practice for a great number of years, during which years enormous benefits accrued to the land, while the Church certainly suffered a very considerable diminution from its former right in respect of income from tithes. But in principle, when the difficulty arises when the friction does take place, when passions are excited, when advantage is taken of that state of things by those, who wish to excite passions, for purposes not in the public interest, is it possible to defend in a manner satisfactory to one's own mind this state of things—that the law says the burden is laid upon the owner primarily, that if the recovery is made from the tenant he may deduct it from his rent payable to the owner, but that if the person who ought to pay it does not pay it the only remedy is by going on the land and taking by distress the goods of the occupier for that which in the intention of law was not the occupier's burden. It may be said, and truly, that that injustice is theoretical and not practical when the occupier has agreed with the owner that he will pay the tithe rent-charge; but it was not meant by the law that it should be his proper burden; and, therefore, any remedy which distinctly applies itself to the interest which ought to bear the burden, and makes the distress available only when it would be available for rent, and when rent is not properly paid, is an improvement upon the existing state of the law, and especially an improvement when you consider who the persons are who are obliged by the present state of the law to put in force that unpopular remedy, which is so easily capable of being represented to the minds and imaginations of men as making a difference in the incidence of the burden from that which the law intended. The clergy as against their own flocks are in this state of the law obliged by their own direct action to put in force that most unpopular remedy, and to encumber themselves with the difficulty and ill-blood which arise from it. Surely it is a great improvement to let that be done when it must be done through the ordinary machinery of a Court as in other cases of the administration of justice, so that there will never be occasion to distrain against an occupying tenant paying a sufficient rent to a landlord, except for that which is due from him to the landlord, and then the Court only comes into the landlord's place for that purpose. I cannot help thinking that my noble Friend was mistaken in supposing that using the County Court for this purpose would have the bad effects he has feared. It is a great mistake to suppose you will create litigation by giving this form of remedy. Things generally will go on as they went on before. Honest people will pay what is due from them as they paid before; and if the landlord pays through the hand of his tenant—not under binding contracts, for that will now be prevented—as long as the tithe owner gets his money, it is all he can ask for. That is all which anybody can require; and in the great majority of cases, where there is no disposition to put other people's money into their pockets, or to resist other people's rights, things will go on quietly and without litigation, as before. It is only when the man who ought to pay will not pay, and thereby forces others to use legal remedies, that this new legal remedy will come in; and when it does come in, I say confidently that it is likely to work far better and create far less friction and ill-feeling than the existing state of the law. The advantage which persons who are misled by others, or not themselves honestly disposed, can take of the existing state of the law has been proved in Wales on a scale which I cannot but think, from a public point of view, very deplorable and very serious, and which, if permitted to go on, most certainly would spread to other places, because, although those who desire to withhold other men's rights are but a small minority, yet I suppose there is no part of the country where some such do not, unfortunately, exist. Now, with regard to the detailed provisions of the Bill, this is not, of course, the time at which one would go into any minute points. I do not feel sure that I quite understand how the new rules about the House going into Committee first, and afterwards sending such a Bill as this to Standing Committee, will operate. Any Amendments proposed in this House will accordingly, I suppose, all have to be gone through over again or be liable to modification.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : They will be liable to be re-considered.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE : The Standing Committee will exercise its discretion ; and I suppose, when it comes back from the Standing Committee, there will be a third Committee upon the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : There will be a Report.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE : I do not know what time the noble Marquess proposes to allow for the consideration in Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : That would be entirely in the hands of the House.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE : I thought that probably Tuesday would be rather too early a day to fix in view of any Amendments which are not yet in form. I think sufficient time should be allowed between the Second Reading and the Committee on the Bill to allow of Amendments being carefully prepared. But, though I do not propose on this occasion to go into details, I wish to reinforce as strongly as I can what was said by the most rev. Prelate upon one point. I do not feel quite so strongly as he does upon the first point he mentioned, and, therefore, I have nothing now to say about it; but that which he mentioned last certainly is one of absolute importance which must, and I venture to say will, be provided for. I refer to those cases in which the remedy given by this Bill might be defeated or postponed by arrangements which may be, and in many cases would be, straightforward and legitimate between landlord and tenant, but which also might be sometimes of a different character. In cases where there may be arrangements of that kind made, if no provision were made for them, you would have taken away the existing remedy without practically substituting any other, and would have enabled the owner and occupier, between them, to keep the clergyman out of his money for an indefinite period of time. There might be a lease granted for a certain number of years rent-free, for family reasons or under certain conditions of service; and though under Clause 5 there might be an amount clearly recoverable against the person liable, yet there would be nothing to be paid by the tenant to the landlord, and, therefore, the clergyman would be kept out of his money during the whole of that tenancy purely by an arrangement between landlord and tenant. There might be cases in which tithe free land and land liable to tithe might be put together, and such an adjustment of rent made that the larger portion should be put on the free part, and the lower portion on the other, and in that way the remedy for the charge would be affected. Another case, not uncommon, of which many of your Lordships may have had experience, (as I have myself) is that in which some outlay is necessary at the commencement of a tenancy to improve the condition of a farm; and the landlord, who will obtain that benefit, grants to the tenant, for one or more years of the tenancy, by the terms of the contract, a remission from or reduction of rent to an extent sufficient to make the rent in those years inadequate for the payment of what is justly due in respect of tithe rent-charge. The appointment of a receiver would not avail, because there would be nothing, or not enough, for the receiver to receive from the tenant, and, therefore, the clergyman would be kept out of his money. The particular mode of providing for that no doubt requires consideration. I have considered it, but I should be sorry at this moment to commit myself as to the exact mode of doing so, which would be the best. I should desire, if I can, to avoid making any proposition on that subject which the Government might think not so good as some other that might be made, but in some way or other I think the cases which I have mentioned must be provided for.

The Earl of Selborne

*LORD BRAMWELL : My Lords, I hope and believe that your Lordships will read this Bill a second time now. I cannot think you will be deterred by anything that has been said by the noble Lord who moved the Amendment, and I think I can show why you ought not to be. This is a matter of procedure entirely. It is not a matter of substance. It does not put a burden upon any particular person more than exists now, and it does not take away from anyone any advantage or privilege or right that he has now in substance. There is a different mode of getting at the due of the tithe-owner and a different procedure is adopted; but it is, as I say, entirely a matter of procedure. Now, the principal argument of the noble Lord who moved the Amendment was a sort of objection to tithe in general, especially to the arrangement that had been made in the year 1836, as between the tithe owner and the landowner, and a kind of suggestion that some alteration ought to be made in the Commutation Act unfavourable to the tithe owner, favourable to the landowner. I trust your Lordships will never accede to an argument of that description. That Tithe Commutation Act was a bargain between the tithe owner and the landowner, ratified by the Act of Parliament itself. Parliament, in fact, made a bargain between the man who had a right to the tithe and the man who had a right to the land, and it was, I do not scruple to say—for I remember perfectly the passing of the Act and what was said at the time about it and what was known by everybody—a most advantageous arrangement for the landowner. I do not ask your Lordships to take my poor word for that, though I remember it distinctly; but you may remember that the present Earl Grey has recently expressed an opinion to the same effect, and he had to do, and very much to do if I remember his own statement on the matter, with the passing of that Act. It may have been a benefit to the tithe owner, and probably was; and it is an exemplification of that which some people cannot apparently be brought to understand, that a bargain between two people may be advantageous to both of them. That bargain was no doubt advantageous to both parties. It was said by the noble Marquess, "If that agreement is to be set aside let us revert to that condition of things which existed before the agreement was made, and the tithe owner will then be entitled to take his tithe in kind." It might not be so advantageous to him as the present condition of things. I believe it would be; but, on the contrary, I believe it would be much more advantageous to the landowner than the present condition of things. And I want to make another remark about tithe in general. The noble Lord who moved the Amendment has called it a cruel burden upon the landowner. It is no burden at all. I daresay the landowner would rather keep the value of tithe in his own pocket than distribute it to any one, but it cannot be called a burden. Suppose there are two persons who are entitled to a piece of land in equal moieties—joint tenants—has either of them the right to say, "That other tenant being entitled to a moiety is a cruel burden upon me." Each of them would be a burden upon the other according to that, and I think the noble Lord would not agree to such a statement of the case. Does it make any difference if the interests of the owners, instead of being divided into moieties, was divided into tenths? The tithe owner has a great deal more than the value of the tenth of the produce, for it is not produced at his expense. But the landowner holds his land upon the terms that the tithe owner is entitled to that share which the law gives him. I cannot think, then, that your Lordships will be influenced by any of those considerations of the character I have referred to which have been presented to you by the noble Lord. I venture to repeat that the question is one of procedure. But the noble Lord proceeded to say there is no question of alteration in the procedure, or, if there is, this is not the best alteration, and he seemed to say that everything went on as pleasantly now as could be except for an occasional little disturbance in Wales. My Lords, I will venture to say that those occurrences which have taken place in Wales have been a perfect discredit to this country, and that something ought to be done to prevent their recurrence by finding a remedy for the dissatisfaction which is the cause of them. Although the noble Lord has paid a very high compliment to the Church of England, and has said that her clergy and their parishioners are on the best possible terms—and I trust they are on very good terms—does anybody doubt that those people, the Welsh farmers, who do not belong to the Church, pay those tithes with the greatest reluctance? The notions of the tithepayer are such that he cannot be got to see that it is not a question between himself who actually pays and the tithe owner, but that it is a question between his landlord and the tithe owner. That they cannot be got to see, and they believe they are supporting a Church from which they differ, which they think is wrong. Therefore, upon all those considerations it seems to me most desirable that some alteration should be made in the law, and I think that nobody who has heard the noble Lord's speech can doubt the expediency of some such alteration being made. For my own part, I have a great misgiving whether the man from whom the tithe is due should not be liable to an action if he does not pay. Everybody else from whom anything is due is liable to an action if he does not pay, and I do not see that tithe is a less respectable debt than any other debt. I know that it might be attended with this consequence: that the tithe owner might be able to maintain an action against a solvent person; whereas if he had nothing but his old remedy of distraining there might be nothing for him to distrain upon. But a remedy for that condition of things might be given by the County Court Judge, and I think it would be a much less elaborate and expensive process if such a remedy as that is given against the landowner. I know that there is a notion prevalent that the landowner might be imprisoned for the debt. Nobody is imprisoned for debt. People are imprisoned for dishonesty. That is to say, when a judgment is got against them, and they have the means of paying the debt and do not pay it, they are sent to prison not because they owe the debt, but because having the means they dishonestly omit to pay it. I cannot see why a tithepayer who is in that position should not go to prison just as much as anybody else. Here I may be permitted to say that I am by no means sure this system of taking out judgment summonses for sending people to prison is an advantageous thing to the community. Upon this subject I would like to call attention to a very admirable article by Mr. Chambers, which appeared in the Fortnightly Review about three or four years ago. I will not trouble your Lordships with any observations upon the details of the Bill, which can be more conveniently discussed in Committee; but I think it might be well to say a few words upon the proposal in Section 5, in cases where the tithe exceeds two-thirds of the value of the land. I do not pretend to say whether two-thirds is the right figure, or whether three-fifths or a half would be a better. That I do not know. I am content to take the judgment of those who have considered the matter and have presented that figure to your Lordships. I want to make two remarks upon that subject. One is this, which the noble Marquess omitted in his statement in support of that clause, that the one-third which is left may very probably be consumed by rates and taxes; so that I think the third is left as a margin partly to give some temptation to the landlord to let his land, though he may get very little for it, and partly as a precaution in order that the tithe and the rates and taxes together shall not exceed the entire value of the land. There is one other remark I would make upon this head. I have suggested it before. As the matter at present stands the question would have to be considered annually. Of course, it is perfectly possible that a reasonable tithe owner and a reasonable tithepayer would go on from year to year unless there was some reason to the contrary; but what I think would be a very good thing to do would be to enable them to come to an arrangement which would last for some years, whether three, five, seven, or what not, and to safeguard it in the same way as leases granted by ecclesiastical owners are guarded. I hope I make myself intelligible. Whether it would be worth while to do that I do not know. I think it would, and I cannot see that any mischief would result from it.

Lord Bramwell

*EARL STANHOPE: My Lords, I must be allowed to say a few words to express the great satisfaction with which I have listened to the noble and learned Lord's speech, partly on account of the great weight and judgment with which he comes before your Lordships, and partly because I rejoice that he has changed his views during the last year or two. Some five or six years ago I had the honour to introduce a small and very modest Bill on this subject, which was to the same effect as the measure at present before this House, namely, to try and impose the burden of the tithe upon the owner instead of upon the occupier. On that occasion the noble and learned Lord took a very strong and hostile view of my proposal, and, in fact, doubled me up altogether. Very pleased I am now to find him blessing altogether the Bill which Her Majesty's Government have introduced. My noble Friend (Lord Brabourne), who opposes the Second Reading of the Bill, will not, I trust, get much following in your Lordships' House. He has not even remained, I regret to see, to listen to the arguments of noble Lords opposed to his views. He asked, in the first place, who is it who presses for this Bill? Why, my Lords, in the interests of law and order we all wish to see the disturbances which have lately been quite a scandal in the Principality of Wales put an end to. Lord Brabourne says it is only to the application of tithes which the Welsh people object. Well, that is so; but the payment of the tithes is made the stalking-horse, and it must be in your Lordships' recollection that so grave had the position of matters become in the year 1887 that a special inquiry was instituted to make out whether or not a real grievance existed. Sir John Bridge, a well-known and leading Magistrate of the Metropolitan Police Courts, went down and made a most exhaustive inquiry and heard evidence. The result of that inquiry, which was held on the spot in the most disturbed districts, was that the alleged grievance was not a real one, and in his Report he puts one sentence which, I think, will answer one objection of my noble Friend Lord Brabourne. After hearing evidence most carefully, he says—

"It is most important that this question of tithes should be settled at once, and not mixed up with graver questions."

That was the opinion of a gentleman accustomed to take evidence, who was not biassed one way or the other, but had in a judicial capacity heard the evidence given in the disturbed districts themselves. Further than that, I must say a few words when the question of settlement is alluded to. Your Lordships must know there has been under the Law of Distraint difficulties found to arise in this country. Distraint is an odious form of the law, and where enforced is often opposed most vigorously. I can say that has been so in the Home Counties, because distraint was felt to be a hard system, and especially so in the recovery of tithes. My noble Friend Lord Brabourne said this measure would render the County Courts unpopular if this unpopular system were connected with them. I have yet to learn that the County Courts have ever elicited much public interest. They were instituted for the recovery of small debts; and I assume that it will be very seldom that cases will arise where the remedy of application to a County Court will be invoked for the recovery of tithe. I quite coincide with the most rev. Primate's opinion that this Bill is only in part settlement of the general question. The larger question of the redemption of tithe is now before a Royal Commission, and I have every hope and confidence that some means may be found, as has been found in Ireland, by which the tithe may be spread over years, and so gradually redeemed without either being a burden to the landowner or doing any injustice to the tithe owner. I have every confidence that some measure of the kind will be carried out. I very much rejoice, and I hope it is a detail of the Bill which will remain unaltered, that two-thirds of the value is enacted in the 5th clause as the full measure for the recovery of tithe—that when no more than two-thirds of the rent is paid, one-third shall be remitted as an abatement in the collection of tithe. Another question has been alluded to, that of rating under the 3rd clause. That will, of course, come before the House in Committee on the Bill. It was raised in another place in Parliament by the hon. Member for the Ashburton Division of Devonshire. I think, though at first sight it may appear a hardship, that the Act which we all stand by, the original Act of 1836, should be altered; because, undoubtedly, that gave a sort of favoured nation clause advantage to the tithe owner, yet it is only equitable and right that all the ratepayers should be put on a similar footing. Not only in another place, but here, exemptions are not considered favourably, and therefore I think, on the whole, that that clause may remain as it is, as I believe cases will arise very seldom indeed where the rates will be demanded much before the actual receipt of the tithe. I am exceedingly glad that this Bill, which I, too, venture to think a very great improvement on the former Bill introduced by Her Majesty's Government, has received the concurrence of the House of Commons, and I earnestly hope that the Amendment of my noble Friend, though it has been ably argued and well brought forward by him, will be rejected by the House.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I do not desire to detain your Lordships above a very few minutes, because everything that has been said in favour of the Bill runs very much in the direction in which I should myself have spoken if I had spoken earlier. I believe the Bill will be an exceedingly useful measure; I believe it is, on the whole, a just measure; I believe it will be a very great help to a large number of the clergy in disputes in these matters; and that it will tend very largely indeed to bring peace, where at present there has been a great deal of disturbance and trouble. It may be said that disturbances in Wales ought not to affect us here; that they have not happened in England; but the sentence—applies to this case with a great deal of force; and when you have these disturbances in Wales, if you allow them to go on it is quite certain they will not be confined to Wales. It is the plain duty of the Government to provide against such a danger, and it is necessary to secure that the administration of justice shall be made as effective all over the country as it can possibly be made. I venture to think the method proposed is the best method that can be adopted. It is, in reality, nothing more than putting the law into such a shape as to make the real incidence of tithe visible to all concerned. It is a matter of great importance to do this, because there are so many who act upon the mere appearance of things and will not be induced to consider anything which gives the opposite impression to that which they think the law at first sight appears to convey. I shall have some observations to make upon the details of the Bill—not that I wish to say anything which would in any degree embarrass the Government in carrying the Bill through Parliament. One of the things which struck me most—namely, the operation of Clause 5—has been already dealt with in such a way that I am quite sure the Government will carefully consider the effect of that clause. But there is another thing which has been cursorily touched upon by the Primate and by Lord Stanhope just now, which I should like to say a few words about, because I have received so many earnest letters from the clergy concerning the subject. It is proposed to make a great change in the old law in regard to rating. The rate which has always hitherto been properly by law levied on the occupier is now to be levied on the tithe owner: he is to pay it directly. Your Lordships will observe by this change the tithe owner becomes what he has never been before—personally liable for the rate. At the same time you are taking great care that the landowner shall not be personally liable for the tithe; but you are putting upon the tithe owner a personal liability which is altogether new. This is entirely a new departure in the law, and, of course, ought to be very carefully considered, for it will unquestionably operate very hardly in certain cases. The landlord wants time for the payment to be made by him, but meanwhile there is no provision as regards delay in the collector collecting the rate; and I think it is only just that the tithe owner should have the same delay of three months before the rate is collected from him as the landowner has in regard to the payment of the tithe. I would like to point out that in Clause 3, Sub-section 2, it is acknowledged that the ultimate source from which the rate is to come is the landowner. The tithe rent-charge is in his hands. If it cannot be got from the clergyman the rate collector is then to have the power of taking the tithe in the landowner's hands and demanding that a sufficient portion of it shall be paid to him. I cannot see why the rate collector should not go directly to the landowner in the first instance, and tax the tithe there, instead of first going to the clergyman and then going to the landlord afterwards. Difficulty, of course, will only occur in very rare cases. In most cases the clergyman will be able to pay his rates as he has hitherto paid them, and he will pay them without demur; but when it becomes a case of real difficulty, and the man has not the money to pay, what does the new proposal mean? What is the result? Why, the rate collector is to have the power to come in and sell the poor man's property—his spoons, his crockery, and the like—in order to satisfy that rate; and then, after the poor man has been sold up, the collector is to go to his property in the landowner's hands. Why is there to be this intervening step? Why sell up the poor man first, and then go against the tithe which all the time is his property, though he has not yet received it? It is obvious, also, that the proposal may work injustice in another way, and that is in cases where there is a remission by the Court under the 5th clause. There will be the assessment upon the tithe owner already made; he will be charged a rate upon property which is not his at all, which under the law is taken from him. That seems rather a hardship. I am told that there must be hardships every now and then. That is true certainly, but I do not see why hardship should fall upon a poor clergyman in such a case. It is not merely the hardship of being required to pay a rate in advance before he has received that upon which it is levied, but of being required to pay a rate levied upon property which was supposed to be his, but which the Court may pronounce not to be his at all. I do not propose to introduce any Amendments myself in this matter; but I want to see it very carefully considered, because from the letters I have received, I know the clergy are very sore upon this matter. I have received a very large number of letters within the last few days from clergymen, and I have no doubt some consideration will be given to their complaints, and some attempt made to meet the objections which I venture to put before the Government. I regret very much that we have only the clauses contained in this Bill, instead of having in it the redemption clauses, which I believe to be almost as necessary for settlement as the questions which are dealt with by the Bill, because the mischief which is caused by the trouble and friction of collecting very small sums in the way of tithe—5s. from one man and 2s. 6d. from another—is very great indeed, and some mode of redemption, by which all those small sums should be compulsorily bought up and so the difficulty entirely put an end to—some measure of that kind is, I think, really needed to make this work complete. I cannot help feeling also that it would be a real advantage if we could still retain, at any rate in certain cases, as the Primate has pointed out, the power of seizing the land. I do not see how the power of seizing the land and working it could do any harm, at any rate in cases where the land is going out of cultivation. If it is to be given up and not cultivated at all; in such a case it seems not unreasonable that the tithe owner should be allowed to step in and see if he cannot get his tithe out of it. These, however, are matters which ought not to impede the progress of the Bill, and I am too grateful to the Government for having introduced it to have any wish to put any impediment in its way.

“Mea res agitur cum proximus ardent,”

Earl Stanhope

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do not know whether the noble Lord opposite intends to press his Motion to a Division, but if he does, I must tell him that I shall consider it my duty to vote for the Second Reading of the Bill, and upon the one plain principle that in future it places the liability for the rent-charge on the landowner instead of directly and independently upon the occupier. If I could find anything in the details of the Bill with the object of placing the payment not absolutely on the owner, I should be in favour of the noble Lord's Motion and not for the Second Reading. Probably this Bill would never have been heard of had it not been for the unfortunate disturbances in Wales. I agree with my noble Friend opposite, who moved the Amendment, that there is no serious dissatisfaction existing in England between the payers and the receivers of tithe. As a general rule the tithe is paid freely, and, although there may have been a certain amount of grumbling, especially on account of the working of the seven years' average, which has, for a considerable time, caused the tithe to be high when prices of the produce of the land are low, I do not believe that on the whole there would have been any necessity for a change in the law, though there might have been a desire for some improvement in its operation. In passing, I may say I regret not to see in the Bill a proposal made by the Government in one particular as was done in one of the former Bills, to alter the seven years' to a three years' average. I know there was a difficulty in regard to that, but if it could have been done without injustice to present tithe owners and payers it would have been an advantage to have made a provision of that kind. While, on the one hand, a seven years' average presses hardly on the tithepayer, it presses hardly also on the tithe owner, if the prices of produce were now to rise it would be a long time before the clergy got the benefit of them, and I think, therefore, it would be much better to have a three year's average. I only mention that in passing. Apart from the principle of the Bill, which I believe to be sound, and apart altogether from the disturbances in Wales, I do not believe the Bill is of great importance as regards England. As regards Wales, I believe it is. I feel the greatest regret, as everyone must, at the state of things which has prevailed in the Principality, and I most sincerely hope that this Bill may succeed in pacifying the agitation which has prevailed there, though I have considerable doubts whether it will succeed in doing so. I am not personally much acquainted with Wales, but I should imagine that a great portion of the lettings there are from year to year, and not under lease. If that be so, under the provisions of this Bill the tithe will have to be paid, in fact, under another form, that of rent, and, therefore, I exceedingly doubt whether this will, in point of fact, persuade payers of tithe. It may to some extent lighten the difficulty, because the landlord will be interested in getting a settlement of the matter, and in some instances he may have to forego payment. If one of the earlier clauses was rightly read by the noble Lord, and if the payment is to be earmarked upon the receipt as a payment of tithe, a provision for which I do not see the necessity, then I think you will have provided for almost the same amount of friction between tithepayers in Wales, who are largely Nonconformists, and tithe owners, because they will say to the landowner: "This is for the tithe, and we refuse to pay it." That would be a result which, I think, every one would greatly deplore. It may, I think, be found in Committee that that is not the right reading of the clause, but if it be, I commend that matter to the attention of the Government, as I think it might be a serious difficulty in the measure. My noble Friend Lord Bramwell argued the question of tithes on high and somewhat abstract terms, and had we been discussing the question together at the Political Economy Club I might have agreed to a great deal of what he said; as, for instance, when he spoke of tithe not being a burden upon the land. Scientifically speaking, the arguments of the noble and learned Lord were, no doubt, perfectly true; but these matters are not settled upon scientific principles. We must deal with facts as they are. What we have to deal with here is the existence of a number of men with small holdings throughout the country, and I venture to tell my noble and learned Friend that his arguments will not be of the slightest avail with them. What everyone desires is that there should not be friction between the tithe owner and the tithepayer. I agree with my noble and learned Friend that this tithe is in no sense the property of the owners. They have no right to it, and so far from desiring to whittle the tithe down, if I may use the expression, I am as strongly against it as anyone. I am free to confess that subject to its present use by the Church I regard tithe as national property, and regarding it as national property I certainly could not be a party to reducing it below its fair and real value. With regard to what the noble Marquess said as to the present value of the tithe, which I think he came to the conclusion would probably be more if calculated according to the method employed before 1836 than under the present system, I think he omitted from his calculation one consideration, and it is this: one of the principal arguments, and a very strong and sound one for the measure of 1836, was that the tithe being levied upon the gross produce of the land discouraged expenditure in the improvement of it. That was a perfectly sound and just argument. What I would point out is this—partly from other causes and partly from the relief which has been given to landowners, very large sums indeed have been expended in improvements upon the land. Drainage, for example, has amounted to from £6 to £7 an acre, and in the East of England, where I live, which is most heavily burdened with tithes, enormous expenditure has been made upon buildings. That expenditure upon buildings and drainage must, I contend, be taken into consideration in comparing the old tithe system with the present, because, to my mind, the Church has no right, under the agreement of 1836, to look to the result of those improvements as conferring value upon the land in which the Church ought to share. Therefore, to that extent, I think the calculation of the noble Marquess should be reduced. I do not say, of course, that in some cases the amount of tithe, if calculated on the old system, would not now be more, but I think you must give full consideration to the large expenditure made by landowners for what has been necessary in the shape of permanent improvements upon the land. Now I come to what the noble Lord opposite said as regards the very heavy pressure of the tithe upon some, and especially upon the smaller landowners. I do not think it is quite a sufficient answer to say that there was a bargain made in 1836, and that a bargain having been made in 1836 there is no kind of reason now to complain. If you look at the thing as a whole, if you look at the payments to the Church and the value of the land throughout the country as a whole, I am not disposed to say that there is anything in the agreement which was then made that ought to be disturbed. I quite admit that it is a very dangerous thing to disturb particular portions of a large composition. If you disturb it on one side you ought, in strict justice, to disturb it on the other. If the Church is to be deprived of a portion of her right where the value of the land has fallen, she ought to be compensated in other cases where the value has risen. But there is one class of cases in particular in this country where the hardship is very much felt, and that is the case of land the value of which depends specially upon the price of wheat. There is some land in England which is properly burdened with a very high tithe because it produced a large amount of wheat, as is the case in the East of England; but it so happens that the greatest fall which there has been in agricultural produce has been in wheat, and land which formerly produced a very high rent for the production of wheat has fallen in value to such an extent that, as in Essex for instance, it has not been cultivated at all. There is no doubt that in the case of those particular lands the heavy tithe imposed, because they were thought to be specially valuable, does fall with crushing weight. That I think is the defence, and a very sound defence, for the clause in the Bill by which the Government intend to introduce, at all events, a certain amount of remedy for those hard cases. The right Rev. Prelate who has just sat down referred to some of the details of the Bill, and thought that in one or two of the points he mentioned they were well worthy of consideration, and there are other points of detail which, of course, at another stage will require to be looked into carefully; but as they do not involve any question of principle, I need not trouble the House on those points of detail. Sending the Bill to Standing Committee may be found to be very salutary, because the Bill contains some pitfalls—not, I think, intentionally left, but arising from there not having been sufficient consideration of the various cases which may arise, and they will require to be dealt with. There was one point specially mentioned by the noble and learned Lord Selborne as to cases in which very little would be left for the clergyman, and I quite conceive that there might be some cases in which there would be nothing left for the clergyman at all. Those are all points of detail which will require very careful consideration. Upon the whole I think the Bill will be an improvement in the law. I do not think it will be a hardship upon landlords to pay directly what they have always had to pay indirectly. They must always have paid it in the long run. Also in England I think it may remove any ill feeling on the part of occupiers that they are specially burdened. It is a singular thing that some people have conceived the notion that the burden falls upon them, whereas it is quite obvious that the burden ultimately falls upon the owner. It is a distinct advantage that the law should really and in fact correspond with the fact. That in itself would be, I submit, a useful change; but, as I said before, I am greatly afraid that the Bill may not be found to have the effect which we desire in Wales, and I hope that those parts of it which seem to press on the occupier as apparently making him pay rent in the form of tithe or anything that might tend to excite his jealousy will be carefully considered with the object of removing the difficulties which now exist, in order to render the relations between tithe-payers and tithe owners less strained and to restore good feeling between them. We are all interested in seeing that order is preserved and that no more unseemly riots and disturbances shall take place, such as those which have occurred in Wales of late in these matters.

The Earl of Kimberley

*EARL FORTESCUE: I will not detain your Lordships for many moments, but I wish to express my entire concurrence with the noble Earl who has just sat down, in considering that this Bill, if passed, as I trust it will be, is a decided improvement upon the law as it stands. I desire to say particularly that I speak with absolute disinterestedness on this subject; its passing into law will not affect either my payments or my receipts in any respect. I thought it as well that one who is absolutely disinterested in the matter should bear his testimony in favour of this Bill. The wisdom of my predecessors ever since the passing of the Act of 1836 led them, and I have merely followed their example, to undertake the payment of the tithes on their estates and thus to let their farms tithe free. The result is that there is no ear-marking of tithes in the rent and I have no intention of introducing that alteration in my dealings with my tenants. I am bound to say that though this Bill will leave me absolutely unaffected in pocket and in every respect I prefer it, speaking as I have explained quite disinterestedly to the Bill which would have given land-owners the benefit of a certain per centage; because the object of my predecessors in establishing, and mine in continuing, this practice was to remove, as it happily has now for over half a century, occasions of difference and complaint between a number of tithepayers and tithe owners in the different parishes, by the landlord taking upon himself the burden of paying the tithes, thus facilitating good relations, which I am happy to say I have the testimony of several clergymen showing that it has and does, between them and those members of their congregations.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, the Bill has been received so favourably that I am not tempted to take great advantage of my right of reply. As to giving time for the consideration of Amendments I shall be very glad to postpone the Bill to Thursday, if that will suit the noble and learned Lord in order to give sufficient time for consideration before Committee. I do not think it is necessary that I should refer to many of the observations which have been made. There is no doubt there are pitfalls in the Bill, as the noble Lord opposite (Earl of Kimberley) has just said, for the avoidance of which we must examine the clauses very carefully. No doubt they might raise serious difficulties, and none more serious than that pointed out by the noble and learned Lord, which, I think, it will tax all our ingenuity to provide a remedy for. But I hope the Bill will be rendered more workable in that respect. The Right Rev. Prelate who presides over this diocese has raised some important points, and I do not in the least dispute that in those directions we may find some Amendment necessary. I thought there was a good deal of force in his request that the clergyman should not be exposed to the demands of the rate collector until he has received the tithe for which the rate is levied. There might be some inconvenience and injustice in that respect. I should like to have considered carefully also the power of re-introduction and taking over the land. At present a receiver has the power of taking the land, and if necessity arose would probably, therefore, take it. So that practically the remedy provided by the Act of 1836 is given in this Act. Whether it should absolutely be introduced into this Act is a question which I should desire to reserve for Committee. With regard to the assessment, I hope the Right Rev. Prelate will not interfere too much with Clause 3. I regard that as a very precious clause. It provides that any rate to which the tithe rent-charge is subject shall be assessed in like manner and by the like process as in the case of any occupying ratepayer. It is within the knowledge of your Lordships that that is not the way in which tithe is assessed now, that it is assessed upon very different principles, and that the tithe owner is the one owner in the country who pays on his gross receipts. I hope that grievance will be remedied.
The Earl of Kimberley

in Committee, but I hope nothing will be done which will affect the principle of the Bill.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Does the noble Marquess mean a deduction for the cost of curates. I should object to that.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: What about the cost of collection? However, I do not think there is any other matter which it is necessary now to refer to. When we are in Committee of the whole House we shall be able to deal best with any considerable Amendments, while matters of mere detail and drafting had better be reserved for the Standing Committee.

On Question, that ("now") stand part of the Motion, resolved in the affirmative: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

BREAD.

Address for—

"Copies of Reports recently received from Her Majesty's Consular Officers in Austria and Italy, relating to the price of bread in those countries.—(The Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

House adjourned at Seven o'clock till to-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 19th February, 1891.

QUESTIONS.

EX-SULTAN ABDULLAH OF PERAK.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, having regard to the fact that the ex-Sultan Abdullah, of Perak, has now been exiled for more than 14 years in the Seychelles Islands, and bearing in mind the peculiar circumstances connected with his trial, the Government are prepared to re-consider the answers given on the 5th of May and 1st of August, 1890, and to consent to re-open the case; whether, if they decline to adopt that course, they are prepared to allow him either to be set at liberty, or to visit England; and whether they are aware that Sir Benson Maxwell, formerly Chief Justice of the Straits Settlements, is of opinion that the ex-Sultan is innocent of the charge which resulted in his sentence?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to re-consider the decision formerly conveyed to the hon. Member against re-opening the case of Abdullah, or allowing him to visit England; but the Secretary of State is again in communication with the Governor of the Straits Settlements as to whether any steps can be taken to ameliorate the ex-Sultan's present position. It is known that Sir Benson Maxwell held the opinion attributed to him in the hon. Member's question.

DISTURBANCE AT CAMBAY.

MR. BURT (Morpeth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State will lay upon the Table of this House all Papers connected with a disturbance which occurred in Cambay, in Bombay, in September last, in the suppression of which British troops were employed and 15 cultivators were killed, 150 wounded, besides hurt occasioned to numerous women and children, and houses and a temple looted and plundered of cash and ornaments; whether the Bombay Government have recently sanctioned the remission of increased land taxation imposed by the ex-Dewan, Mr. Shamrao Narayan Land, the imposition of which was said to be the cause of the disturbances; and whether he will grant a public inquiry into the origin of the disturbances which are alleged to have arisen through misgovernment?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): Yes, Sir; the Secretary of State will lay upon the Table all the Papers relating to the disturbance which occurred in Cambay in September last. The hon. Member will find from those Papers that the description of the occurrence which has been given to him, and on which he has founded the question, is inaccurate. In answer to the second paragraph of the question, I have to say that the Bombay Government has given instructions that will have the effect of reducing the land taxation. In reply to the third paragraph of the question, I have to say that a very full public inquiry into the origin of the disturbances has already taken place, and the result will be found in the Papers presented.

THE FACTORY COMMISSION IN INDIA.

MR. KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the fact that the recent Factory Commission in India was composed chiefly of natives, and confined itself almost entirely to examination of native operatives, and did not give the millowners or managers any adequate opportunity of stating their side of the case, the Government proposes to legislate on the basis of this investigation; whether, before interfering seriously with the existing conditions of Indian factory labour, the Government will consent to have a fuller inquiry; whether, on the whole, the Commission reported against any extensive interference with the existing regulations; and whether, before any legislation is undertaken, the Report of the Commission will be issued to Parliament, and an opportunity will be given for a discussion of such proposals in this House?

SIR J. GORST: The inquiry and Report of the recent Commission were intended to supplement the information already before the Government and Legislature in India; and it is proposed to legislate on the basis of the whole of the information available. It is not proposed to have a further Commission of Inquiry at present. The recent Report of the Factory Commission was presented on the 6th of February, and is now being printed.

SIR W. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): Can my right hon. Friend say when the Report containing this information is likely to be in the hands of Members?

SIR J. GORST: I can only inform my hon. Friend that the Papers are in the hands of the printers, and that I am doing everything in my power to push them on.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN INDIA.

MR. KING: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is correctly reported in the Times to have said at Chatham on Thursday, February 12th—

Sir J. Gorst

"He contended that the State might very well limit the hours of labour of their own employés, of railway servants, those engaged in unhealthy occupations, and also of the natives employed in the mills in India;"

and whether the Government contemplates any further interference with the conditions of labour in Indian mills than is necessary for the protection of women and children, or intends, as appears to be suggested by his remarks, that all labour in Indian mills shall be placed within the category of exceptional legislation?

SIR J. GORST: The report quoted is an epitome of what I said. It is not intended to legislate for the protection of adult male labourers in India beyond providing for the fencing of machinery in factories and for the general stoppage of all work for half an hour in the middle of the day.

THE INDIAN FACTORIES ACT.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I had intended to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table the Correspondence between the Authorities in this country and the Government of India on the subject of the Indian Factories Act? As the right hon. Gentleman is not in his place, perhaps the Under Secretary of State for India is in a position to answer the question.

SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir. The Correspondence has not yet been laid upon the Table, because it is not yet completed; but there has already been laid upon the Table the Report of the Factory Commission, and if the hon. Member will move for the Correspondence which took place last year that also shall be laid on the Table.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I think the House ought to be in possession of the documents by which certain views of Her Majesty's Government were pressed upon the Government of India.

SIR J. GORST: Those are exactly the Papers which I ask the hon. Member to move for. I have said that the hon. Member can have the Papers in which the views of Her Majesty's Government were pressed upon the Government of India.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Will they be laid upon the Table in the ordinary course?

SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir, if moved for.

THE VOLUNTEER FORCE.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he is in a position to state the number of officers wanting to complete the establishment in the Volunteer Force; and bearing in mind the increased duties and expenses falling upon those serving by a reduced number, what steps he proposes to take in the matter?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The vacancies for officers of Volunteers are at present for 46 field officers, 161 captains, and 1,194 sub-alterns. This deficiency of officers is engaging my serious consideration; but it is very difficult to devise a remedy, and I shall be extremely glad to consider any suggestion my hon. Friend may have to offer.

THE MILITIA.

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what alterations in the scale of Militia camp equipment have been made to provide greater comfort for Militiamen under canvas?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: By recent regulations tents are issued to Militia when training at the rate of one for every 10 men, instead of, as formerly, one for every 12 men; and a wooden tent-bottom or waterproof sheeting is issued for every tent, instead of the issue being limited to cases of very inclement weather.

THE SCOTCH-AMERICAN MAILS.

SIR T. SUTHERLAND (Greenock): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in the event of the Scotch-American mails of Wednesday missing connection at Warrington (as they have recently done on more than one occasion), he would think fit to give orders to send these mails to London and despatch them by the German steamer leaving Southampton on Thursday?

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): May I ask whether the Postmaster General has considered the feasibility of sending the Scotch-American mails to Queenstown by the Stranraer and Larne route, rather than by the Holyhead route as at present; and whether he will take into consideration the not infrequent missing of connection at Warrington as an additional reason for re-arranging postal facilities between Great Britain and Ireland by improving and further utilising that, the shortest route, between the two Islands?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to the last question, I can only say that I will look into the matter and see whether any advantage can be gained by sending the mails from Stranraer. In regard to the question on the Paper, I have to say the course proposed by my hon. Friend for meeting the accidental delays to which he refers had already suggested itself to my Department, and is now under consideration. I will communicate further with him when I have made some necessary inquiries on this subject.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Has not the service from Queenstown to America given the greatest satisfaction?

*MR. RAIKES: I believe that is so Sir.

ROYAL NAVAL RESERVE.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has appointed a Committee to inquire into the condition of the Royal Naval Reserve; and whether the scope of the inquiry includes the Coastguard, so that the Committee can consider and report upon the whole question of Naval Reserves of all sorts; and, if not, whether he will enlarge its scope to that extent?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (LORD G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): In the Memorandum attached to the Naval Estimates of 1891-92 I fully explained the object and scope of the inquiries of the Committee I propose to appoint. Their work must necessarily be confined to questions relating to the Royal Naval Reserve—that is, to the officers and men of the Mercantile Marine who compose this force. It would not be advisable to mix up with this inquiry any questions affecting the officers and men who are part of the effective permanent force of the Royal Navy.

CEMETERY AT HYDE.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the Town Council of Hyde, acting under "The Public Health (Interments) Act, 1879," has applied for the sanction of the Local Government Board for a loan to provide a cemetery in the borough, and that such sanction has been refused on the ground that the Town Council has not agreed to the consecration of part of the cemetery; and whether, inasmuch as the Public Health (Interments) Act leaves the question of the provision of consecrated ground to the discretion of the Sanitary Authority, he can state on what legal authority the requirement of the Local Government Board is based?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Town Council of Hyde have applied to the Local Government Board for sanction to a loan in respect of the provision of a cemetery for the borough. A local inquiry was held by an Inspector of the Board, and it was represented that a large proportion of the ratepayers were members of the Church of England, and that it would be an injustice to them to require them to pay for a cemetery which would not be used for burials according to the rites of the Established Church unless a part of the land was consecrated. The Board were desirous that some arrangement should be adopted by which the reasonable objections of those who protested against sanction to the loan might be met, and the Inspector of the Board again visited the district with the view of conferring with representatives of the Town Council and the clergy. After this conference the Bishop and the clergy of the borough, as I am informed, distinctly pledged themselves that, if a portion of the cemetery were consecrated, the control of that portion should remain with the Town Council, and that any expense arising from the consecration should be borne by the Church people of the borough. I regret to say that this arrangement has not yet been accepted by the Town Council, I feel strongly that in the face of such protests as I have received it would be inequitable that the ratepayers who are members of the Church of England should be required to defray the expense of providing a cemetery which, on the ground of conscientious objections, will not be used for burials according to the rites of the Established Church, and the Board have not been prepared to make themselves a party to such an arrangement as would have been the case if they had sanctioned the loan. I cannot but hope that on further consideration the Town Council will come to the conclusion that the compromise which has been proposed is a reasonable one, and that the objection which has been urged on behalf of a large proportion of the ratepayers may thus be removed.

Lord G. Hamilton

MR. SUMMERS: Am I to understand, then, that the Local Government Board insist on a condition which is not in the Act of Parliament?

*MR. RITCHIE: No money can be borrowed for these purposes by a Town Council without the sanction of the Local Government Board, who, in considering an application for a loan, have to consider all the circumstances of the case. I do not feel justified in assenting to a course which, in my opinion, is manifestly unjust to a large portion of the population.

MR. SUMMERS: Do I understand that the Local Government Board insist on foisting into an Act of Parliament a section which is not contained in it?

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Member is not to infer anything of the kind.

HOUSE OF COMMONS READING ROOM.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been called to the extremely crowded and inconvenient character of the Reading Room, where it is often impossible to secure a seat or even standing room; and whether he can see his way to providing a more suitable apartment where Members can consult the newspapers?

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I did provide an additional Reading Room on the Terrace a short time ago; I am sorry to say that I have not any space at my disposal for another.

THE NEW MILITARY PROMOTION BOARD.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, as the system of selection for the rank of Colonel and Major General is now gradually coming into operation, he is able to give the House any details as to the constitution of the new promotion Board which is to be established?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am not surprised that my hon. and gallant Friend has called my attention to this matter, which is of great importance. I am afraid it would not be possible to explain the constitution of the proposed Board within the limits of an answer; but I will deal fully with the subject in the statement I am about to make to the House.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION.

MR. LEAKE (Lancashire, S.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why the undertaking of the Government, made through the Leader of the House on the 22nd of August, 1889, on the withdrawal of the Superannuation Bill, that it was "their deliberate intention to legislate upon the whole question at the earliest possible moment next Session," was disregarded, and legislation superseded by an Order in Council of 15th August, 1890, dealing with the Upper Division of the Civil Service; why Civil servants who were appointed before the date of the Order in Council, who have been justly exempted from the operation of Section 4, and whose rights have been reserved in Section 7 of the Order, have not also been exempted from the operation of Section 10, which provides for the compulsory retirement of officers at the age of 60; and whether, seeing that the Order in Council practically violates the undertaking of the Government to promote Civil Service reform by legislation, and has prevented the case of the Civil servants being discussed in the House, he will remove the widespread dissatisfaction of the Service by amending Section 10, so as to maintain the rights of all officers engaged before the date of the Order in Council?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Some portion of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service could be carried out by Order in Council, and others could only be dealt with by a Bill. The only reason for not proceeding by Bill in 1890 was that there had been insufficient time at our disposal, as every hon. Member will acknowledge; but we were not prepared to let the whole question drag on, and we therefore proceeded to deal, as we were entitled to do, by Order in Council with so many of the recommendations as would not require fresh Parliamentary powers. Civil servants appointed before the date of the Order in Council were exempted from so much of the operation of the Order in Council as would have clashed with the previous practice or their previous claims, but they were not exempted from the possible retirement at the age of 60 (a recommendation of the Royal Commission), because it was only a formal statement of existing practices. It is now competent for the head of a Department to call upon any officer in the Department to retire at the age of 60. Heads of Departments have for years exercised their power, and in some Departments it is a formally promulgated rule of service. It is, therefore, impossible to amend Section 10 in the sense desired by the hon. Member.

LICENCES UNDER THE INTOXICATING LIQUORS ACTS.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been drawn to a statement made by George Thorp, one of the clerks to the Manchester Justices, in the case of "M'Ewan v. Justices of Manchester," reported in the Manchester Guardian, 11th November, 1890, as follows:—

"I may say that I see scores of these little bogus documents produced at each Court."

The documents referred to being those which the police obtain from each person who applies for a licence under the Intoxicating Liquor Acts, and which are duly sworn to; and also to a letter from the Chief Constable of Manchester, dated the 11th February, 1891, and published in the local Press, in which he states—

“These documents contain information regarding the ownership, and various interests which the applicant may have in the premises for which he applies for a licence or transfer, and such information is only contained in the agreements between the applicant and the brewer or owner of the premises. . . . I have little doubt that in many cases the answers are untrue, but it would be quite impossible for the police to prove them to be so;”

and if he will inquire into the state of affairs so described, in order, if the statements are true, to provide means to check such abuses?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have had my attention drawn to the statements referred to. It appears that the Manchester Justices are accustomed to require from applicants for licences answers upon oath to a variety of questions which they consider material for their judgment. The clerk to the Justices and the Chief Constable are both of opinion that in many cases untrue answers are given, but that it would be quite impossible to prove them to be so, as no evidence whatever is forthcoming. It is not possible for me, or for the Director of Public Prosecutions, to procure evidence in such cases; and it is for the Justices to insist on the production of further witnesses or to make further inquiries, or to refuse the application in any case in which they think they are being misled.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any protest has been received from the Colonial Government of Newfoundland against the modus vivendi agreed to by Her Majesty's Government with reference to the fishery rights claimed by France on the coast of Newfoundland; whether Her Majesty's Government will seek to enforce that modus vivendi; and if they will lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence and other Papers on this subject?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Papers which are about to be presented will show what has occurred, and the steps which are being taken by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Rowntree

MR. STAVELEY HILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government has refused to ratify a Convention entered into between the Colonial Government of Newfoundland and the United States; whether the Colonial Government has protested strongly against this refusal; and if Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table of the House the Papers in this matter?

BARON H. DE WORMS: A colony cannot enter into a Convention with a Foreign State. Her Majesty's Government assented to Mr. Bond, a member of the Colonial Government, visiting Washington for the purpose of communicating the views of his Government and seeing what terms of arrangement could be made. A Convention acceptable to the colony and to the United States was drafted, but Her Majesty's Government have delayed (not definitively refused) to authorise Her Majesty's Minister at Washington to sign it, because it is necessary to consider further the wishes of Canada and the effect on Canadian interests of the provisions of the draft Convention if now concluded independently of Canada. The Government and Legislature of Newfoundland have strongly protested; and the Papers, now in preparation, which will shortly be presented, will show the reasons for which Her Majesty's Government do not think that protest justifiable.

MR. S. HILL: When may we expect the Papers?

BARON H. DE WORMS: As soon as possible.

MR. S. HILL: Within a few days?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I cannot pledge myself to the exact date.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that the Colonial Vote will not be taken until hon. Members have had an opportunity of seeing the Papers?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I think the Papers are sure to be printed before the Vote comes on.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, when the sanction of the Imperial Government was given to the mission of the Hon. R. Bond to Washington on behalf of the Government of Newfoundland, it was clearly understood that no arrangement could be come to with the United States on the part of one portion of the Empire which should be directly prejudicial to other portions; whether Papers can be presented to Parliament explaining Mr. Bond's mission; whether he can also present further Papers on the general question of Newfoundland, in continuation of those presented last June; and whether such Papers would give any further information as to the progress of negotiations for the friendly settlement of the French Shore controversy?

BARON H. DE WORMS: This question does not state correctly the conditions under which the negotiations referred to were conducted. A full explanation of the position of Her Majesty's Government in respect of these matters was given by the Secretary of State on the 17th in another place, and will be found in the Papers about to be given.

DISCHARGED AND RESERVE SOLDIERS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will favourably consider an increase in the grant to the National Association for the Employment of Discharged and Reserve Soldiers, taking into consideration the fact that the Inspector General of Recruiting attributes the falling off in recruits to the want of employment for old soldiers, and that this is the only institution in the country which provides employment for reserve and discharged men?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I should be very glad to help this deserving institution, but, after full consideration, the Government find this difficulty in the way. The total expenditure of the Association of late years has not been much over £500 a year. To increase the Government grant from £200 to £500 a year would practically amount to a transfer of the whole of the current expenditure of the institution to Votes of Parliament. We have also found that, concurrently with the receipt of a Government grant of £200, the outside subscriptions have steadily dwindled from £633 in 1886-7 to £314 in 1889-90. The principle we desire to lay down is that the institution must be supported by outside subscriptions supplemented by a Government grant bearing some proportion to the subscriptions. Personally, I shall be glad to co-operate with my hon. and gallant Friend and others interested in gaining increased public support to the institution; and I hope that the prospect of success will be all the greater if it is understood that the Government will be inclined to meet it by an increased contribution.

PETROLEUM.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is prepared to submit to the House a tabular statement of the number of fires which have occurred during the last year traceable to the storage of petroleum lamp oil; also the number of fires which have been traced to petroleum spirit, already safeguarded by stringent legislative control; and fires arising through defective lamps, or through accidents to lamps; and if he is in a position to state how much additional cost per gallon this proposed enactment will entail upon the poorer classes, who are the principal consumers of petroleum lamp oil?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have not the materials to supply a full and complete tabular statement of the number of fires due to petroleum spirit and defective lamps. None of the classes of fires referred to are required to be reported to the Home Office. I am not prepared to admit that the use of petroleum spirit is already sufficiently safeguarded. I am informed by the Chief Inspector of Explosives that there seems no reason to anticipate that the cost of petroleum lamp oil will be sensibly, if at all, increased by the proposed legislation.

NATAL

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, inasmuch as the Australian Colonies passed Acts establishing Responsible Government, in pursuance of Acts of the British Parliament enabling them to do so, there has been, or will be, any such enabling Act for Natal; whether Her Majesty's Government are advised that the Colonial Legislature can establish Responsible Government, and Her Majesty's assent can be given without reference to Parliament; whether Her Majesty's Government have led the Colonial Legislature to believe that they are willing to advise assent to Responsible Government, practically confined to a white population of about 37,000, out of a total of upwards of 500,000; what would in that case become of Zululand, and who would pay for it; and whether, looking to the civil and military questions involved, Her Majesty's Government will give Parliament an opportunity of discussing the matter before anything final is done?

BARON H. DE WORMS: No legislation by this Parliament is necessary for the purpose of conferring Responsible Government upon a colony, unless there has been Imperial legislation with regard to such colony requiring modification in order to enable the political change to be made. The Colonial Legislature has been informed that, subject to the enactment of special provisions for the protection of inhabitants not of European birth or descent, Her Majesty's Government are willing to grant Responsible Government to Natal. Zululand will remain under the direct control of Her Majesty's Government. No military or civil questions present themselves in this case which would afford ground for the unusual course of inviting Parliament to discuss this subject. When Responsible Government was granted to the Cape Colony in 1872 the procedure was the same as is now being followed in Natal, and the Imperial Parliament did not intervene. Papers will be presented, which may satisfy the hon. Member that the points to which he has called attention have not been overlooked.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: In consequence of the statement that the Government intend to deal with this important subject without inviting Parliament to consider it, I shall, on the Estimates, move the reduction of the Under Secretary's salary.

SWINE FEVER—COMPENSATION FOR SLAUGHTERED CATTLE.

MR. FELLOWES (Huntingdonshire, Ramsey): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether, taking into consideration the great loss which is entailed on farmers, small holders, artisans, and others, through swine fever, he can see his way to advise the payment of increased compensation for animals which have been slaughtered, and especially when the animals slaughtered are free from disease themselves?

Sir G. Campbell

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I think there is much to be said for the view which the hon. Member has embodied in his question, but until I can obtain fuller information on the subject than I have at present I cannot express a definite opinion. It must be borne in mind that the value of the animals varies greatly in different districts. The subject is being inquired into.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): Is it the fact that the compensation for the slaughter of swine is not uniform all over the country?

MR. CHAPLIN: That is a matter which rests entirely with the Local Authorities. The maximum of compensation is uniform all over the country.

BETHNAL GREEN BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I had intended to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the failure in February, 1889, of the "Bethnal Green Bank," in which the deposits amounted to a total of or about £10,000; whether he has been informed that the effects of the bankrupt, Mr. T. F. Braybrook, and the estate of the "Bank" realised the sum of £4,000; whether any portion of these assets have been distributed to the depositors; if so, how much; and, if not, will he explain for what reason; and whether he can inform the House what the total costs of the bankruptcy proceedings have been, and what amount is left for the depositors? At the request of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to postpone the question until Monday.

INHABITED HOUSE DUTY.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the appeal "The Surveyor of Taxes, v. Amelia Hobkirk," which is a case of appeal against the decision of the local Income Tax Commissioners to relieve the said Amelia Hobkirk, who is the owner of a tenemented house, from payment of Inhabited House Duty, under the Act of 1890; whether he is aware that the said house was originally built for two tenants, having a common door in the street, but separate tenants upstairs and down; that the house is now, and has always been, inhabited by two tenants, each paying less than 7s. 6d. per week; whether this is a case expressly provided for by Sub-section (2), Section 26, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1890; and whether he will state why the Government have acted thus towards this house owner, the decision of the local Income Tax Commissioners, who know the facts, and the intentions of the above-named Act?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The Board of Inland Revenue consider that the decision of the local Income Tax Commissioners to relieve the owner of the tenemented house mentioned from House Duty is incorrect, as they do not think that the house is one

"Originally built or adapted by additions or alterations, and used for the sole purpose of providing separate dwellings," so as to bring it within the scope of Section 26 (2) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1890, there being internal communication throughout. A case has accordingly been demanded, under the statute, for the opinion of the High Court; and the hon. Member will see that it would not be proper for me to answer his inquiry as to whether this is a case expressly provided for by the Act, inasmuch as that is the precise point on which the opinion of the Court is desired.

WEST HIGHLAND COMMISSION.

COLONEL MALCOLM (Argyllshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can give any indication of the course the Government intend to pursue with regard to the recommendations of the West Highland Commission?

*MR. GOSCHEN: In the absence of my right hon. Friend I will answer the question. I must refer my gallant Friend to the answer given by the First Lord on this subject on the 29th ult., who then stated that until we came to the House for the necessary funds, we were not in a position to furnish any useful information as to the decision of the Government on the West Highland Commission's Report; but, meanwhile, I can assure him that the subject is under our earnest and immediate attention, and, no later than yesterday, my right hon. Friend, the Secretary for Scotland, and myself were engaged in the final consideration of some of the principal recommendations of the Commission.

THE FACTORY ACTS.

SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I beg to postpone my question—(to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to move the Second Reading of the Bill for the Amendment of the Factory Acts before Easter?)—in consequence of the absence of the right hon. Gentleman.

REFORM OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) postponed until to-morrow the following question:—To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Ministers propose to bring in in the present Session the Bill for the reform of the House of Lords which they introduced in 1888, or in any other manner to give effect to the Resolution, to which they then declared that they attached much importance, to introduce some change in the composition of that House?

DETECTIVE OFFICER FRENCH.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if there is any truth in the statement that Detective Officer James E. French received money to the extent of several thousand pounds from the Constabulary Force Fund; and, if so, how much, and for what reason; whether Mr. J. E. French's costs in the action brought against him by William O'Brien, Esq., M.P., were defrayed from this fund, either wholly or in part; and, if so, what the expenditure under this head was; and what sum was paid Mr. J. E. French for his public services, and whether any of this money came from the Royal Irish Constabulary Force Fund?

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): May I ask the Chief Secretary to state at the same time whether the costs in the action brought by Mr. William O'Brien against the Marquess of Salisbury have been defrayed from any fund?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Constabulary authorities report that the statement in the first paragraph of this question is wholly unfounded. The reply to the inquiry in the second paragraph is a negative. Mr. French received only the pay and allowances attached to the positions he held in the Force and voted annually by Parliament. The sole grants received by him from the Constabulary Force Fund were obtained by him when serving in Belfast in 1870 and 1871, being rewards of £20 and £10 respectively given on the recommendation of the Reward Board for good police service.

GREYSTONES HARBOUR.

MR. WILLIAM CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware of the slow progress being made with the Greystones Harbour Works; and if he can state how many men, on the average, are employed daily upon them, when may the fishermen expect to see them finished, and what is the cause of the delay in carrying them out?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am informed that there has been no delay in connection with the Greystones Harbour Works, beyond that which is necessarily incurred in carrying out works of this kind. I believe that every progress that can be made with the works will be made. There is no reason or desire for delaying them, and they will be got on with as fast as possible.

ARRESTS UNDER THE CRIMES ACT.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will give a list of the persons arrested under warrants issued from the Court constituted under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, and presided over by Mr. Brady, R.M., at Castlereagh, County Roscommon, showing the hours at which the arrests were made, and distinguishing the cases in which summonses were served before the warrants to arrest were issued?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Member to defer this question until to-morrow

Mr. Johnston

STREET PREACHING IN ARKLOW.

MR. WILLIAM CORBET: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the continuance of street preaching in Arklow every Sunday, to the serious disturbance of the peace of the town, whether any representations have been made to him with the object of having a stop put to these occurrences; whether he is aware that recently an assistant of the street preachers presented a revolver at a person who objected to the preaching; whether it is true that on Sunday last 130 soldiers and 150 police were drafted into the town to preserve the peace; and whether he will do anything to put a stop to these disgraceful scenes in the otherwise peaceful town of Arklow?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Representations have been received in regard to the continuance of street preaching in Arklow. I understand that a man has been returned for trial for presenting a revolver. It is the case that on Sunday last two companies of infantry and 150 police were drafted into the town to preserve the peace. As regards the last paragraph of the hon. Member's question, I have to say that the greatest exertions have been made by the Government to secure the peace of the town. Whether it will be possible to continue indefinitely these extraordinary precautions, and, if not, what steps should be then taken, remains for consideration.

POLICE BARRACKS AT FORT STEWART.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is intended to make permanent the police barracks at Fort Stewart in Donegal, which was established for a temporary purpose?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary report that the barracks have been taken on a yearly agreement, and they see no reason to recommend that they should be discontinued.

THE 1st MANCHESTER REGIMENT.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the War Department whether he is aware that the Colonel commanding the 1st Manchester Regiment, stationed in Tipperary, issued orders to the men of the regiment that they were not to partake of any refreshment in the house of John A. Carew, grocer and spirit merchant of that town; that on the 4th instant, two soldiers, having entered the premises of Mr. Carew, they were placed under arrest, stripped of their belts, and put under charge of the picket, but subsequently released because of their ignorance of the Regimental Orders; whether any charge of misconduct has ever been brought against Mr. Carew in the management of his house; and what is the reason for Mr. Carew's house being forbidden by the Military Authorities?

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): May I ask whether the Order issued by the Commanding Officer in question is not strictly within his power, and whether it would be conducive to good order and discipline to interfere with his discretion in such matters?

MR. E. STANHOPE: As I have already stated, the Commanding Officer of the 1st Manchester Regiment did forbid his men to resort to the house of Mr. J. A. Carew in Tipperary; but I am informed that the soldiers were not arrested under the circumstances alleged in the question. In reply to the question of the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Waring), it is within the province of any Commanding Officer to forbid any soldier from visiting any particular house in the locality if their so doing would, in his opinion, be injurious to discipline. The officer in command of the Manchester Regiment has simply exercised this power.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Would it not be fair for the right hon. Gentleman to give me and the House some information as to the reason why this house was forbidden to the Manchester Regiment? Does not the right hon. Gentleman consider it rather a slur upon Mr. Carew as to the management of his house? Mr. Carew desires, through me, to say that he challenges any investigation with regard to his conduct. I want to know also whether the two men in question were not put under arrest by Sergeant O'Brien, and whether the right hon. Gentleman will receive affidavits or statements made by several men who were present, and who witnessed the two men being placed under arrest?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I decline altogether to go beyond the discretion of the commanding officer. That discretion was vested in him. If the hon. Member thinks it worth while to send me affidavits I will look into them. I believe the commanding officer exercised his discretion in the matter.

ST. MICHAN'S CHURCH, DUBLIN.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been directed to a letter of the Rev. Thomas Long, M.A., rector of St. Michan's Church, Dublin, appearing in the Irish Times of 16th January, 1891, stating that the tower of St. Michan's Church is in a dangerous condition and fast going to decay, but that the Ancient Monuments Board will do nothing for its repair unless the Church Body will consent to to give up the use of this tower to them; whether he has seen a letter in the Spectator of the 29th November, from Mr. W. G. S. Bagot, commenting on the defects of the administration of "The Ancient Monuments Protection Act, 1882," and stating that out of a sum of £150 voted by Parliament for the year 1889-90 for the preservation of ancient monuments in Ireland, only £17s. 6d. was actually spent on them, the balance going back to the Treasury; and whether he will take some step, either by the amendment of the law or otherwise, so as to prevent the tower of St. Michan's Church, which was built in 1036, and is from its historic associations one of the most interesting structures in Ireland, from falling into ruin from want of funds for its repair, when moneys voted by Parliament for the preservation of ancient buildings are actually paid back to the Treasury?

MR. JACKSON: The Tower of St. Michan's Church is, I am informed, in a dilapidated condition; but as the church is in the custody of the representative body of the Church of Ireland, and is used as a place of worship, the Commissioners of Public Works have no power to expend Public money on its repair. The works necessary for the preservation of the ancient monuments which have been placed under the guardianship of the Commissioners of Public Works, under the Ancient Monuments Protection Act, 1882, have been carried out under the supervision of Sir Thomas Deane, an architect who has devoted much time and attention to the subject, and to whose professional reputation it is not necessary for me to add my testimony. I am not aware of the qualifications possessed by the correspondent of the Spectator for criticising Sir Thomas Deane. The sum of £150 voted in 1889-90 was not expended, as the owners of the monuments on which it was proposed to expend it declined to permit any work to be carried out in connection with them.

Mr. MAC NEILL asked whether any of the large surplus of the £5,700 placed in the custody of the Board of Works, to be expended by them on ancient monuments in connection with buildings which formerly belonged to the Irish Church, could be devoted to repairing St. Michan's Church?

Mr. JACKSON said the difficulty was that this money could only be applied to monuments which were under the care of the Board of Works. The law would have to be amended to enable the money to be applied to a case such as this, but he would be glad to consider the subject.

THE OLDCASTLE BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

Mr. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that the Oldcastle Board of Guardians have erected 154 labourers' cottages within the Oldcastle Union, County Meath, at a cost, including legal expenses, of about £137 10s. per cottage, for which they have to pay to the Treasury an annual sum of £6 2s. 7d., that, in addition, they have to pay various annual charges, including the rent of the land, amounting to £1 10s. 6d. per cottage; and that, although these cottages are let to labourers at a weekly rent of 1s., entailing a loss to the union of £5 1s. 1d. yearly for each cottage, the Income Tax Authorities claim Income Tax on each house; and whether, having regard to the circumstances of the case, he will take steps to remit the tax in this and similar cases?

*Mr. GOSCHEN: I am informed that the Oldcastle Board of Guardians have been properly assessed to Income Tax on the Poor Law valuation of the cottages in question. But upon their proving that the cottages had been built with money borrowed from the Board of Works, and that the interest on this money exceeded the net profit on the cottages, instructions were given to charge the tax upon the head rent alone; and the Guardians will, of course, be entitled to deduct the tax in the usual way when paying the head rent to the superior landlord, so that no portion of the tax will really fall on them.

Mr. Jackson

*Mr. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Will the same rule be adopted in the case of all labourers' cottages where the taxes and charges are in excess of the rents received?

*Mr. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member had better give me notice of that question.

IRISH DAY SCHOOLS.

Mr. CONDON (Tipperary, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will grant the Return relating to Irish Day Schools which stands on the Paper this day?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid that it will not be possible to give the Return asked for, as no record has been kept.

POSTAL FACILITIES BETWEEN SLIGO AND BALLINA.

Mr. PETER McDONALD: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a resolution of the Board of Guardians of Dromore West, County Sligo, urging on him to lay a line of wire from Ballina via Enniscrone, Easkey, and Dromore West to Ballysodare, so as to give facilities for telegraphic communication between Sligo and Ballina and the intermediate towns; and whether he has come to a decision thereon?

*Mr. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that the Board of Guardians of Dromore West requested that telegraphic communication might be established between that place and Ballina via Easkey and Enniscrone, and that I have had careful inquiry made with a view to ascertain whether it would be possible to meet the wishes of the applicants. I regret to say that, from the Reports I have received, it appears that the revenue likely to be derived from telegraph offices at Dromore West, Easkey, and Enniscrone would fall considerably short of the annual cost of maintaining and working the telegraphs. The applicants may, however, be prepared to furnish a guarantee; and the necessary information shall be furnished to them to enable them to consider the matter.

IRISH DISTRESS.

MR. MORROGH (Cork, S.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a resolution passed by the Courcey's district, Kinsale Union, in which it is stated that—

“Considerable distress is likely to prevail in this district,” and for the purposes of preventing the same, the meeting was of opinion that—

“No work would be more calculated to meet the requirements than the construction of a pier at the strand near the Old Head of Kinsale;”

whether he is aware that this work would be of permanent advantage to the locality; and what attention he is prepared to give the subject?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A copy of the resolution in question has been received and is engaging attention.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has instituted any works to relieve the distress in the unions of Loughrea and Portumna; and, if so, will he state the number of persons employed; and whether he has received resolutions, about two months ago, from the people of Woodford, in the Loughrea Union, demanding employment to meet the distress occasioned both by the almost entire failure of the potato crop and the great number of evictions carried out by Lord Clanricarde in the district?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No relief works have been opened in the unions mentioned, nor do the Government expect that such will be necessary.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Will the Government give a table showing the extent and population of the distressed areas and the number of men employed on railways?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the Member will put on the Paper the form of the Return he desires, I will consider the matter. I think there will be no difficulty in supplying the particulars asked for, except that the amount of employment varies from week to week, and a Return for one week might be very inaccurate the next.

MR. PETER M'DONALD (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has received a copy of a resolution recently passed at a meeting held at Clifony, County Sligo, and presided over by the Very Rev. W. Crofton, P.P., calling attention to the general failure of the potato crop in that district, and to the consequent necessity of providing employment for the people, so as to enable them to purchase other food during the ensuing spring and summer, and further calling for the construction of a light railway from Sligo to Bundoran; and whether he is able to authorise the construction of the proposed railway? I also wish to ask the Chief Secretary whether he has received a Memorial, signed by over 600 ratepayers of the County Sligo, in favour of the construction of a light railway between Arigna and Collooney; and whether he is in a position to authorise the construction of that railway?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A copy of the resolution referred to has been received, and the district is engaging attention. With regard to the railway suggested in the question, and a railway between Arigna and Collooney mentioned in the second question, I fear I ought not to hold out any hopes that the Government will be able to undertake them.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he requested an interview at Letterkenny with the Most Rev. Patrick O'Donnell, Lord Bishop of Raphoe, a favour which was accorded to him by that Prelate; whether his attention has been directed to the Lenten Pastoral of the Bishop of Raphoe, in which his lordship complains that, although an investigation into the wants of the people had been instituted and work and wages promised to them, these promises have not been fulfilled, and asks is employment to come to the people when they have been broken in health and spirits; and whether the Government intend to take any steps in the near future towards developing the resources of Donegal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen the Pastoral referred to. Some 700 or 800 men are given employment on relief works. The Government are engaged on two railways in the county, the length of which will be about 43 miles, the cost of which will be about £220,000 or £230,000. Donegal will also share in the advantages which will, I hope, be conferred on the poorer parts of Ireland by the congested districts portion of the Land Bill. If the hon. Member will point to any Government which has done one-tenth part as much to developing the resources of Donegal I shall be grateful to him.

MR. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the severe distress in the parish of Ardara, in the County of Donegal, there being no fuel and no potatoes, and no credit being given to the people to buy meal; whether this parish was one of the districts through which he passed last November, and to whose inhabitants he gave promise of relief works; and when he will fulfil his promise to institute relief works in this district?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Relief works are already in progress in the district adjoining the parish of Ardara, and if further works are necessary they will be undertaken.

MR. MACNEILL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in his recent visit to the district he gave a distinct promise to the parish priest of Ardara that he would repair the roads?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already given the hon. Gentleman a clear answer to his question.

BELFAST GAOL.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Corporation of Belfast have protested against the proposed alterations of Her Majesty's Prison in that city, upon the ground that they "Will not only have the effect of injuring the appearance of the prison itself, but affect the uniformity of the frontage line of the buildings in the neighbourhood, deteriorating their value, and causing a public eyesore;"

whether, nevertheless, the Prisons Board have refused to alter the plans; and whether the Government have made up their minds to use the power of the Crown in this case to override the rule of municipal law and the decision of the Local Authority?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Irish Government are in communication with the Prisons Board on the subject.

THE OLPHERT ESTATE EVICTIONS.

MR. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the report of the prosecution at Bunbeg, County Donegal, on 13th January, of District Inspector Hill, and Sergeants Reynolds and Clarke, and other constables and emergency men, on a charge of riot and assault, on the occasion of the evictions on the Olphert Estate on 15th November last, in which the Magistrates, Messrs. Hamilton, R.M., and Beresford, R.M., held that Sergeant Reynolds and Clarke, and three constables, and three bailiffs, had been proved to have thrown stones continuously at the house from which Mr. McGinley was being evicted, but that the stone-throwing was, under the circumstances, justifiable: and whether he still adheres to the following statement, made by his authority, in a letter to an anonymous correspondent, directed from 4, Carlton Gardens, dated 25th November, and published in the Morning Post of 4th December, with reference to this occurrence—

"Mr. Holliday makes certain serious allegations against the police. As reported by you they are somewhat vague, but if he intended to state that the police threw stones at the people, or acted as emergency men, or went beyond their duty in protecting those who were carrying out the evictions, Mr. Balfour desires me to say that Mr. Holliday is stating what is not the fact."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have caused inquiries to be made into the matter, and I find that the letter referred to was written by my authority on the date mentioned. Unfortunately, no researches have enabled me to recover the letter to which it was a reply; but though I am thus prevented from speaking with certainty on the point, I have no ground for supposing that my statement was in any way either inaccurate or calculated to convey a false impression to my correspondent. It appeared, not by my direction and without his letter, in a newspaper some time after it was originally written. In that shape the correspondence is unquestionably ambiguous and possibly misleading, and if it has caused any misunderstanding I regret that misunderstanding.

MR. PERCY MAGAN, J.P.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland what steps were taken to recover from Mr. Percy Magan, J.P. for the Counties of Roscommon, Westmeath, and Wexford, the amount he was alleged to have obtained under the Arrears Act of 1882 by false representations; what amount, if any, has been recovered, and in the case of what tenants; what amount of rent was sworn by Mr. Magan to be due by these tenants up to 1st November, 1881; what is the actual amount which has been found to be due; whether any inquiries have been made as to whether money may have been similarly obtained in the case of other tenants on the same estate; has Mr. Magan's conduct in this matter been brought under the notice of the Lord Chancellor; does he still hold the Commission of the Peace and act as a Magistrate; have any steps been taken to prosecute Mr. Magan and recover the penalties provided under the Arrears Act; and in how many cases have prosecutions under the Arrears Act been instituted; what were the charges, and what was the result?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University) said an action was brought by his directions against Mr. Magan at the suit of the Crown under the provisions of the 7th section of the Arrears Act of 1882 to recover two sums of £31 and £15 respectively, paid to him by the Land Commission in respect of two tenancies. Mr. Magan did not defend the action, and the amount was paid over to the Land Commission. The application under the Arrears Act was a joint one by the landlord and the two tenants, and the amount sworn by both landlord and tenants to be due up to 1st November, 1881, was given as £62 in the one case and £31 in the other. The result of an investigation showed that in the former case £15 10s., and in the latter one nothing, was legally recoverable by the landlord from the tenants at the date of the claim. The residue was made up of a penal rent which was certainly reserved by lease, and might, as contended by the landlord, have been due, but it was not recoverable as between landlord and tenant at the time of making the claim. It appeared the applications were verified by the tenants as well as the landlord, and the Commission had now no reason to make any further inquiries. The answers to paragraphs six and seven were in the affirmative, and the answer to paragraph eight in the negative. He had come to the conclusion that the case was clearly not one for a criminal prosecution, but for a proceeding, the nature and result of which he had stated. He was informed that there had been three prosecutions for misrepresentations under the Arrears Act. In two of these cases there had been convictions and sentences of one and two months respectively, whilst the third case was dismissed.

MR. SEXTON said the right hon. Gentleman had found that Mr. Magan had defrauded the State, that he had made no defence to the action brought against him, and he desired to know did the right hon. Gentleman approve of a person who had so acted continuing in the Commission of the Peace?

MR. MADDEN said the hon. Member was not to draw the inference from his statement that there had been any defrauding of the State. There were complicated transactions in regard to a penal rent between Mr. Magan and the tenant, and he (Mr. Madden) came to the conclusion that the claim of the landlord was in law unsustainable, and the amounts he claimed were not recoverable. He did not come to the conclusion that Mr. Magan and his tenants had entered into a conspiracy to defraud the State. If he had come to that conclusion he should have directed a criminal prosecution against the landlord and the tenants. He did not, however, come to that conclusion.

MR. HAYDEN: Is there any foundation for the statement that a penal or any other rent was due?

MR. MADDEN repeated the terms of his answer. He said the transaction was a complicated one, but it did not follow that there was anything in the nature of a fraud on behalf of the landlord or of the tenants.

MR. SEXTON : We shall claim on the Vote for the Civil Service the discharge of this gentleman from the Commission of the Peace.

MR. M. KENNY : Why did the right hon. Gentleman reserve the investigation of a complicated case of this description to himself, and not give Mr. Magan the opportunity of clearing his character before a Bench of Magistrates?

MR. MADDEN said the matter was brought before him, and very properly as the result showed. He came to the conclusion that, under the Act, the amount paid to Mr. Magan was recoverable from him. He accordingly brought an action against him, which Mr. Magan did not defend, but paid the money. He also came to the conclusion that there was no conspiracy to defraud the State, and the matter ended.

MR. HAYDEN : On my furnishing the right hon. Gentleman with documents showing that no rent was due whatever, will he further inquire into the matter?

[No answer.]

THE WHITECHAPEL MURDER.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.) : I wish to ask the Home Secretary whether his attention has been called to certain paragraphs published in the public Press purporting to be a statement from the wife of the man Sadler, now on his trial for murder, and if such statement has not a tendency seriously to prejudice the case ; whether, also, it is not contempt of Court, and if the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to interfere to prevent the publication of such statements, which are calculated to bring about a failure in the administration of justice?

MR. MATTHEWS : I am sorry to say I have not been able to see any papers to-day, and, therefore, have not seen the paragraph in question. I think it is very much to be regretted that the newspapers should seek to gratify public curiosity by publishing any statement not made upon oath with regard to a case pending before a tribunal of the country, especially when those statements are prejudicial to the accused. I will not take upon myself to assert more than this, not having read the paragraph ; but I do not hesitate to say such a publication does seriously interfere with the proper administration of justice.

ELECTORS REGISTRATION (ACCELERATION) BILL.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby) : May I ask whether it is intended to proceed in Committee to-night with the Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill, which is the Second Order on the Paper? The Government have undertaken to give ample notice of their Amendments before the Committee stage shall be taken, and I would urge that sufficient notice has not yet been given.

MR. RITCHIE : There is no intention of proceeding with the Bill to-night. In fact, having regard to some of the Amendments which have been put upon the Paper, it is extremely doubtful whether the Government will be able to proceed with it at any time.

LICHFIELD CATHEDRAL [LORDS].

Ordered, That the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills do examine the Lichfield Cathedral Bill [Lords] with respect to compliance with the Standing Orders relative to Private Bills.—(Mr. Tulbot.)

ARMY GUNS (RIFLED IRON, AND STEEL).

Address for—

“Return, showing the number, description, name of designer, place of manufacture, and actual cost of the various Rifled Iron, and Steel Guns supplied by the War Department to the Naval and Land Service during the year 1889-90, showing whether each Gun is Land or Naval (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 400, of Session 1890).”—(Mr. Duff.)

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they do communicate Statement of the total fees of the House of Lords on each unopposed Scotch Private Bill since the year 1885, as desired by The Commons.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

ARMY RECRUITING.

(5.0.) MR. HANBURY (Preston): I desire to call attention to the pay and position of the non-commissioned officers and privates of the Regular Forces. I have had once or twice, perhaps more than once or twice, placed on the Paper notices hostile to the administration of the War Office, or, at all events, to particular departments of it; but this Motion is not offered with any intention of that kind, and I hope my right hon. Friend will not deal with it in a controversial spirit. The Motion deals with the facts admitted by all who take an interest in the Army—facts which will have to be faced sooner or later, and the sooner the better. We have had, within the last two or three years, serious intimations that the supply of recruits has been falling off. We find that in 1885 we were able to recruit 39,500 men; in 1886, 39,000; in 1887 the number dropped to 30,700; in 1888 it fell still further to 24,700; but in 1889, under the extreme pressure of lowering the standard, it rose to 29,000. Last year it was 31,400, or nearly 8,000 a year less than it was five years ago, and we have 34,000 to be recruited during the present year. I think this decrease in the number of recruits available constitutes a very serious fact, and it becomes the more serious when we take it in connection with the fact that there is an increase in our land frontiers, which therefore require a larger Army to defend, and that our wealth also is enormously increasing, so that what has to be guarded by the troops becomes more valuable as time progresses. We have, too, an increasing population, yet we cannot get a larger number of recruits. It is rather difficult at the present time to ascertain the exact increase in the number of men of military age, because the Census Reports only give the ages in periods of five years. We know that between 1871 and 1881, the population of men between 15 and 25 years of age, grew at the rate of 43,000 a year, and I think it is only a fair and reasonable estimate to state that at the present moment the population of the military age—that is between the ages of 18 and 25—is increasing at the rate of 30,000 a year. With such an increase in the number of men from whom we naturally expect to draw our recruits, the fact remains that, notwithstanding the inducements of every kind offered by the War Office, we are unable to enlist the number of men we require yearly. Undoubtedly, men now have a fuller knowledge of the conditions of service, and can tell whether a military life is, or is not likely to suit them. During the last year we have had almost despairing appeals sent out from the War Office to the officers at recruiting districts praying them to use every means to attract men into the Army. The Inspector General of Recruiting himself gives a most remarkable instance of it. He tells us that there is immense difficulty in getting 1,000 men a year for so popular a force as the Foot Guards, although 15 non-commissioned officers are stationed on recruiting duty at the most favourable spots throughout the Kingdom, and although special terms are offered to the recruiting officers at regimental districts, seeing that 5s. is given for a recruit for the Guards, while only 2s. 6d. is given for a recruit for the Line. In addition to all this, we have what is a much more serious matter, and that is the almost ridiculously reduced standard both of height and chest measurement. I find that in 1870, the last year of long service, the standard for Infantry stood at 5ft. 8in. What is it now? The Foot Guards themselves last year reduced their standard from 5ft. 8in. to 5ft. 7in., an inch below what was the regular standard of the whole of the Infantry during the last year of long service. But putting the Foot Guards on one side, how about the other branches of the Service? I find that Artillery gunners have reduced their standard from 5ft. 6in. to 5ft. 5½in.; the standard for Drivers has been reduced from 5ft. 4in. to 5ft. 3in., and the chest measurement of 34in. is put down to 33in. I do not know what sort of a soldier you can get with a chest measurement of that kind. Your present Infantry standard is 5ft. 4in., with a chest measurement of only 33in., and a weight of 115lbs. One would think that that is as far as the authorities would have ventured to go. But will the House believe that this is merely a nominal standard, and by no means the real standard. I was surprised to see in the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting last year that over 6,000 men—or rather boys—between the ages of 18 and 19, who were below this standard were actually passed into the Army, below a height of 5ft. 4in., and having less than a chest measurement of 33in. I am sorry to see that exactly the same thing has been going on during the last year, although, unfortunately, the Inspector General of Recruiting does not give us the figures. I do not think the War Office Reports should gloss over matters of this kind. We should have the figures put plainly before us, so that we might know the exact number of these utterly worthless recruits. I hope that in the course of his speech the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War will give us this information. It must be recollected, too, that these men whom we do not get in sufficient numbers, do not represent the total number of recruits. They are really the cream of the recruits, for they are those who pass into the Army after two selections have taken place. A certain number are first rejected by the recruiting sergeant, and then we find that no fewer than 47 per cent. were rejected by the medical officer. Yet I repeat that with all this you do not get a sufficient number of recruits. In 1890 the Establishment was short of a little over 4,000 men, and I am sorry to say that in January, 1891, it was short of 4,692 men. That, of course, is the Establishment of the Regular Forces. It is a startling fact that even with this ridiculously low standard we cannot keep up our Establishments. Then what about the other branches of the Service? If the Regular Army is short of men how about the Auxiliary Forces, to which we have to look to support them? I find the Militia are 1,865 less than last year, and 22,559 below the Establishment. My right hon. Friend says the Yeomanry are stationary; but the expression with regard to that force means a very bad state of affairs, because although the Yeomanry Establishment should only be 14,000 strong yet its present strength is 3,500 below that number. The Volunteers, too, have fallen off in number by 3,000. I believe that, to some extent, is due to the weeding out of inefficient men, possibly a step in the right direction. And with regard to the Militia, it is necessary to bear in mind that even with their reduced numbers no fewer than 28 per cent. of the men were absent from training altogether. Again, I find another source of difficulty in the facts dealing both with men entering the Service and men who are at the end of their service. These facts bear upon recruiting, as it were, at both ends of the scale. I find that 1,313 purchased their discharge within three months, against 1,042 in the same period in the preceding year, so that it does not look as if the Service is becoming most popular. Again, the number invalidated was at the rate of 9·7 against 6·5 per cent. in the previous year, and it does not appear, therefore, as if we were getting stronger men into the Army. I am sorry to say that that is the conclusion at which the Inspector General of Recruiting has himself arrived, for he says that even the reduction of the standard has made no appreciable difference to the number of recruits. Then, again, take the men leaving the Service. Only 20 per cent. of the men leaving the reserve join again for the supplemental reserve, and thus in five years we have lost 38,000 men, a most invaluable body on whom we might have relied for fighting our battles. The Inspector General of Recruiting, while admitting these facts, suggests the possibility that we shall have to pay our soldiers more money in the future. If we are obliged to do so I believe there is nothing within the scope of the Army Estimates upon which the people would most willingly expend money than the pay of the private soldier. Undoubtedly, a great deal of money is spent in our Army Estimates, and a great deal of it is wasted; but I think that an increase of pay is our last resource. Let us see whether there is not some other inducement which can be offered to men of good physique and character to join the Army. The other day I came across an article in a magazine by an officer who knows more about private soldiers and takes more interest in them than any other man living. I refer to General Sir Frederick Roberts. He wrote an article in one of the magazines so long ago as 1884, and I am sorry to say that hardly one of the recommendations therein made has been attended to. He laid great stress upon the uncertainty of a soldier's position, and especially a non-commissioned officer's position. He laid stress, too, upon the fact that a soldier is more or less deceived when he enlists in the Army. That is a very strong statement for a man in his position. He says that under the present system there is no esprit de corps in the Army. If that is true, it is an alarming state of things. He says the Army does not offer now, as it used to do, a career to good soldiers. That, too, is a lamentable state of things. Then, again, he says the social status of a soldier is not what it should be. There are a good many bad characters in the Army, and they are not driven out as rapidly as they ought to be. Then he mentions a whole series of petty annoyances, such as an unnecessary amount of "sentry-go," an almost ridiculous amount of drill, and a mania for mere parade movement. If all this be true it appears to me that a good deal might be done before we are reduced to the necessity of raising the soldier's pay. What is it Sir Frederick Roberts has to say upon this question? He lays great stress upon the uncertainty of a soldier's pay. I believe this is a grievance which is felt by officers as well as by men. They say that by the constant issue of royal warrants it is utterly impossible for a man to know what his position is from day to day.

Mr. Hanbury

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Will the hon. Member give an instance?

MR. HANBURY: I believe my hon. Friend the Member for one of the London divisions has a Motion on the Paper with regard to the position of officers, which raises this very question.

MR. E. STANHOPE: But will the hon. Gentleman give me an instance with regard to private soldiers?

MR. HANBURY: No, I cannot do that, but I can quote the words of Sir Frederick Roberts. He says that he has time after time wanted men to take stripes, or desired a sergeant who has completed his term to remain in the Army, and the reply has been, "No, Sir, we do not wish to stop in the Army any longer; it is the uncertainty that is driving us out of it." I shall be willing to show that quotation to my right hon. Friend if it will have any effect upon him. But what is far more serious than the uncertainty of pay is the fact that you do not keep good faith with the soldier after you enlist him. The soldier after all is not a keen lawyer. He is not a highly educated man, and as Sir Frederick Roberts says, "he is misled by the pamphlets which invite him to join." He takes the language of the posters, and these posters tell him that on his joining the Army the soldier is supplied with clothes and free kit, and whilst in the performance of his duty he receives a daily free ration of meat and bread. But although the soldier is led to believe he will get a free kit and free rations, we know very well that that it is not what is meant. We are told that he ought not to be satisfied with reading the posters, but should go to the post office and get a pamphlet that describes the advantages of the Army. But if he were to read the pamphlet I do not know that he would be any the wiser. What does the pamphlet say? It says that in addition to money wages the soldier receives a ration of bread and meat, lodging, fuel, light, medical attendance for himself, and, if married, for his family. That on joining the Army he is supplied with a complete outfit of clothing and a free kit, and afterwards he is supplied periodically with the principal article of clothing without charge, but that he is required to supply his own under-clothing and other necessities and to pay for repairs as well as for groceries, vegetables and washing, but not for his bedding. Now, let us take the question of food. The ration is valued at sixpence, but I should think it only represents one-half or two-thirds of soldiers' food in the course of the day.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): One half.

MR. HANBURY: My hon. and gallant Friend says it only represents one-half. Then I think it ought to be made very distinct in the posters and pamphlets that a free ration only means one-half of the food a man requires. I have no doubt a man gets an adequate supply of bread. It is in the matter of meat that he falls short, for certainly the three-quarters of a pound (including bones) which is provided cannot be considered sufficient for youthful and growing recruits. Then it is questionable whether a soldier gets all he is entitled to. The contracts are not always given to the most respectable or responsible men.

They are given to the men who will supply at the cheapest rate; and the year before last I find that the average contracts for the whole Army was only 4d. per pound. That is a very low rate. I believe there are documents in the War Office which would convince my right hon. Friend that before the meat reaches the soldier a good deal of pilfering goes on. Then, again, some of it is spoiled by bad and inefficient cooking. Would it not be possible, in order for the soldier not to be misled in any way, for the Government to supply him with the whole of his rations? That would reduce the uncertainty of his position. Now, I will go a step further, and take the case of his lodgings. The soldier is told by the pamphlet that he is going to have free lodgings, but he would not assume from the words of the pamphlet that he practically takes the barracks upon a repairing lease.

MR. E. STANHOPE: No, no.

MR. HANBURY: It is all very well for my right hon. Friend to call "No, no," but in the first place a soldier has to pay a considerable sum for barrack damages, and what galls him more than anything else is the belief that the money he pays does not go to repair the damages. Either the Government is unfairly treating the soldier, or somebody is dealing unfairly with the Government. Again, take the case of fuel. Has not a soldier to buy it in the winter?

MR. STANHOPE: No.

MR. HANBURY: My right hon. Friend says he does not, but the evidence is that a soldier has to buy a considerable amount of fuel in the winter time. Then, again, take the question of medical attendance. He is told he is to have medical attendance free. I am not quite sure, but that if he had his full pay and free medical attendance it might not lead to a great deal of shamming and maligning, but that might be carefully guarded against, and I do say that the deductions from a soldier's pay ought not to take place when he is in hospital from no fault of his own. The regulations already provide that if he is in hospital suffering from wounds or from illness contracted during service in the field, he is not to be subjected to these stoppages; and I say that that provision should be extended to every soldier who goes into hospital through no fault of his own—suffering, perhaps, from inflammation of the lungs caught while on sentry-go. Again, the man is promised a complete outfit of clothing, together with periodical renewals of the principal articles of clothing. But what interpretation do the War Office put upon that regulation? They say that a shirt is not a principal article of clothing. Will my right hon. Friend deny, therefore, that a soldier's shirt has to last for seven years? Then my right hon. Friend will not deny that a soldier has to pay for his sea-kit when he embarks on board a vessel, and also for a great part of his Indian uniform when he goes to India. Is that in accordance with the promise of the War Office? I was present at a lecture at the United Service Institution a little while since, when an officer from Woolwich gave some very interesting statistics on this point. He took the case of a driver in the Horse Artillery who was sent to India. By the time the voyage was completed and he had been in India two months, his pay would have amounted to £5 7s. 6d., but out of that he would have been called upon to pay £3 8s. 10d. for clothing. Surely that is distinctly contrary to the promise made to the soldier that he shall have a free kit. Again, the soldier is promised the use of the library free. But he does not get it free; he has to pay so much a month. I know the War Office contribute a certain amount—I think it is £2 10s. 0d. per Company per year—towards the support of the library. But why is it not stated to the recruit that he will have to pay for the use of it? Then, again, he is told that he will have an opportunity of learning a trade. But we know that, with the exception of mounted branches, in which trades are taught useful to the War Office itself, and with the exception of some few regiments, there are no workshops for the men, and no inducements are held out to them to learn a trade. The teaching of a trade to a soldier is, perhaps, the most important thing in connection with his recruiting, and one of the things that is more likely to act as an inducement to him to enlist than anything else. I hope, therefore, fuller opportunities will be offered men to learn a trade when they get into the Army. Then comes the question of clothing. Soldiers feel a very great grievance in regard to the return into store of their old clothing. Knowing, as I do, what becomes of the clothing, what a miserable sum is paid into the Exchequer every year for the old clothing of the Army—a sum of, say, £40,000 or £50,000. Knowing the way in which the clothing is disposed of to a ring of Jew contractors, and the way in which the Army is disgraced by the use of worn-out uniforms by sandwich men and others, I do say it would be wise to grant to the soldier the small boon of letting him use his old clothes for the more dirty work he has to perform, and thus save him many a 6d. or 1s., to the extent of which he is now out of pocket. There are many other complaints in connection with clothing. It is utterly impossible to drive into the mind of the soldier that it is fair and wise that he should pay for non-expired clothing. He often thinks a coat is a great deal more worn than the War Office think it is, and that he has to pay a great deal more for the non-expired portion of its use than he ought to pay. He does not understand either why, when he has supplied himself with clothing at his own cost and it is lost, he has to refund the War Office for the unexpired portion of its use. Could not a great many of these grievances be swept away? Why not find a soldier a full and sufficient kit at starting, and give him enough money to keep him in clothes during his time of service? Such a system would teach men carefulness, cleanliness, and thrift. Another point on which Sir Frederick Roberts lays great stress is the want of esprit de corps in the Army. Sir Frederick Roberts says—

Mr. Hanbury

“Instead of being able to settle down in some corps and make it his home, he must be prepared to join a strange battalion in the East and West Indies, as if he had no more feeling than a bale of goods. He finds himself suddenly separated from his friends and acquaintances, and being thrown amongst an entirely new set of men has, so to speak, to begin the world again.”

Sir Frederick Roberts adds, that even the smartest man in the battalion has to go, and all the thanks he gets is to hear himself spoken of as “one of that wretched draft we got the other day from the home battalion.” It is perfectly clear that if comradeship and love of regiment is to have any influence in the Army, this system is about the worst you can adopt. Again, I do think that if you are going to make the Army popular, you must get fewer bad characters in it. I believe that if you got more men of good character in the Service, even if you paid them more, you would save in the end, as you would have fewer desertions and less imprisonment. Sufficient care is not taken to keep up the social status of the soldier. We are too ready to recruit anybody we can get. I have already said we are too ready to recruit men who are physically unfit for service, and it is a still greater evil, to my mind, to recruit men who are morally unfit. I would much sooner see the Army short of a few thousand men if, as a result, we got a better class of men than we do now. No doubt a large proportion of those who enter the Army now are men of good character; but a few bad men, a few fraudulent enlisters will carry mischief, evil, and insubordination from one battalion to another, and these are the men we must take every possible means of keeping out of the Army. I do not know how we are to accomplish this. We have done away with branding, and I would not advocate returning to it, but if some mark—even if it were only a vaccination mark—were placed on all men in the Army, from the officers downwards, you would know that you were not recruiting men who had fraudulently enlisted. If you cannot do this you might send Army recruits to one or two large stations where they would be likely to be recognised if they had been there before. You will have to deal also with the question of drunkenness in the Army a great deal more thoroughly than you have done up to the present. Drink is the cause of 19-20ths of the crime in the Army. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has taken any steps with regard to the sergeants' mess. From all I can hear the sergeants' mess which originally was intended to add to the position and dignity of the sergeant, has been for a great many years used as a mere dram shop. If the right hon. Gentleman will study the recent work of Colonel Buckstone he will find that one of the greatest curses in the Army is the sergeants' mess. Although they are forbidden to do so the sergeants serve men with drink during the forenoon, and make a profit because they sell at enhanced prices. How the evil of drunkenness is to be grappled with I do not quite know, but I think a check would be put upon the amount of liquor consumed in the sergeants' messes—it is out of all proportion to what the sergeants require for themselves—if the drink was bought through the Canteen Fund, and the bills paid as they ought to be by some commissioned officer. I also believe you would prevent a great deal of the drunkenness if you were to feed the soldier a little better. I have a keen suspicion that drink after all is the cheapest form of food the unfortunate soldier can find. It is not that he has any inclination to drink when he enters the Army, but he finds he is not properly fed. Having to buy his food he buys the cheapest, which he finds to be drink. I think this is a great argument why you should take the whole of the provisioning and rationing of your soldiers into your own hands. Again, if you are to raise the moral standard of the Army you will have to give the soldier more privacy. At present the soldier can hardly be by himself for a single hour in 24. He dines and sleeps in the same room. I find that 45 years ago a most important Commission set to inquire into the proper way of re-arranging our barracks, and the first recommendation they made—the one they laid most stress upon—was that soldiers should have a dining room distinct from their sleeping room. That is the case in some barracks, and I hope that in the new barracks he is building the right hon. Gentleman will see that the private soldier has separate dining and sleeping rooms. Whether you can grant him that or not there is at any rate one thing you ought to grant him: it is what is granted to every soldier in the German Army and in the English Army in India. At present the private soldier has no means of putting his things under lock and key. He has only a shelf and bag, and if you have bad characters in the regiments there is a good deal of stealing and pilfering. The recruit's kit especially is liable to plunder, and the recruit is not the man to dare to make his grievance known. Moreover, what career does the Army offer to a man? Sir Frederick Roberts says you have deliberately chosen the worst system, both for the convenience of the soldier and the interest of the country. He points out that seven years with the colours is not a short enough period to give you an adequate Reserve and it offers no career to the soldier. He takes the case of the artisan who joins the Army just at the time that he would be about finishing his apprenticeship. When he has spent seven years in the Army it is too late for him to begin work again. The same with the labourer. When he leaves the Army he cannot find employment, and is dissatisfied with his lot. Then there is the loafer. You might make something of him; but you treat him in the same way as the artisan and labourer, and he goes back to be a waif and stray. And you actually give £21 when a man, after seven years' service, leaves the barracks. You induce men by every means in your power not to make the Army a career. The bulk of the men, who have not learnt habits of thrift, spend the £21 in drinking and debauchery, and possibly in two or three days it is all gone, and when it is gone they cannot re-enlist because they cannot pay back their Reserve money. These men form the army of scarecrows who go through the country under the name of Reserve men, doing more than anything else to deter decent men from enlisting in the Army. And what is your Reserve? It has now been in existence 20 years. In 1870 you had 20,000 Reserves, and now you have 58,000. 6,000 or 7,000 have joined by means which are not usual; that is to say, they have been allowed to leave the colours before the seven years had expired, in order to enable you to form a large Reserve. You have only obtained the increase of 38,000 during 20 years. How many of the 38,000 are trained? None of them are trained. How many will turn up if necessity arises? To begin with, how many are in the Militia? That is a fact about which we ought to have some information. I think if we had all our Militia and Reserves called out at the same time, we should find that men belong both to the Militia and Reserves. I also wish to say a word upon the question of pay. I believe that deferred pay is to a great extent wasted. At any rate, if you are going in the last resort to increase the pay of the soldier, I do not believe the Army Estimates need be one penny bigger. There are many ways in which you might retrench. Deferred pay is one way. The great clerical staff is another. Some of the honorary colonelships are another. The great expense incurred in moving troops from one place to another is another. It is right that regiments should have the best quarters in town, but I hope that the building of new barracks will obviate the necessity of a frequent moving of troops. There is one set of men to whom you must pay more than you do now, and they are the non-commissioned officers. The non-commissioned officers are the very backbone of the army. Their responsibility now is very great; under the old system, when the non-commissioned officers were very old soldiers, I am afraid the subalterns threw a great deal of work on them, which ought properly to have been performed by others. If such a system worked with old seasoned soldiers, I doubt whether it will work with young soldiers under the territorial system; especially, you should do everything you can to enhance the condition of the non-commissioned officer. He often comes from the same neighbourhood as the privates, he may meet the privates when he goes home on furlough, and it is essentially necessary he should be able to enforce discipline. Then, again, there are certain payments with regard to the non-commissioned officers which ought to be attended to. A lance-corporal, for instance, ought under the regulations to receive 3d. a day extra during the whole time he is lance-corporal, but I understand that as a matter of fact he only receives the same pay as a private soldier. How can he exercise discipline under such cases? Take the case of a man who has gained good conduct pay. If the man becomes a sergeant, I am told his good conduct pay is stopped. That surely ought not to be done. I am actually informed that the total pay of the married sergeant, whose wife is unable to do any washing for the company, is less than the pay of the married private, whose wife can do washing. The importance of the non-commissioned officer in the Army is so great that everything ought to be done, even by increased pay, to get them to remain longer in the Service.

Mr. Hanbury

It may even be necessary to increase the pay of the private soldier. What is the pay of the private soldier? I have heard different statements: I have heard different commanding officers draw up different scales. The War Office make it out that a man is able to put by 4s. 3d. at the end of the week. I think the sum is more like half that amount. People compare soldiers to porters and others, putting aside altogether the fact that a soldier may sacrifice his life and sacrifices his liberty to an extent which hardly any other person does except, perhaps, the private servant, who has his wages and all found. Taking figures of the War Office, the soldier only gets between £12 and £13 a year and all found. Would you get a manservant for £12 or £13 and all found? Although I do not advocate it, I believe you would do the right thing for the Army and a popular thing in the country, if you were to offer greater inducements, such as those I have mentioned, and even by raising the pay of the soldier get better men to join the Army. The private soldier cannot strike like the average labourer; 'he cannot make his grievances heard like the average labourer, and yet he gives his life to the service of his country as the average labourer does not. The English soldier takes a part in war that no other private soldier does. Most of our great battles have been soldiers' battles, and the private soldier in the English Army runs a greater risk of losing his life than the private soldier in any other Army in the world. This is especially the case with picked men. This country is almost perpetually engaged in small wars, and therefore picked men run greater risk than men in other Armies do. Under such circumstances, we have a right to demand that the Government shall make the soldier's position as comfortable as they can. I do not only deal with the question of pay; I go further, and say you are bound to raise the social status of the soldier, to drive the bad out and get the good men into the Army. The honourable nature of the service counts for something, and there are no soldiers in the world called upon to fight more honourable battles than the soldiers of the British Army; they fight for defence of their country, for the commercial position of this country, upon which the trade and welfare of their fellow-subjects depend. Proper means, therefore, should be taken to remove this slur from the Army. Let the Army occupy as proud and honourable a position as the Navy, and there is no profession in the world to which a man should be more proud to belong.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in view of the increasing competition of civil employment, the present conditions of Military service urgently require to be so far modified as to provide a more regular and adequate supply of suitable recruits,"—(Mr. Hanbury),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(5.30.) MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): In seconding the Motion I propose to do so with extreme brevity, and without any technicalities and details that can be avoided. The stereotyped War Office reply to these complaints is that though the conditions of life for the soldier leave much to be desired, yet he is better off than when the present Secretary for War took office, or much better off than in the Anti-Crimean War period. That may be so; but what we say and what General Rock, the Inspector General of Recruiting, says is, we cannot get good men for recruits while the rate of pay compares so unfavourably with the rate of wages in the labour market. The soldier does now serve under better sanitary conditions—except, perhaps, in the Royal Barracks, Dublin—he is better looked after. We know that in the Anti-Crimean period, he received a bounty of £4, and then his kit cost him £6, and stoppages were levied at the rate of 1d. a day for three or four years. Things are different now, and though the stoppages are sufficiently heavy, they are not so bad as they were. We know that 40 years back the old soldier had 2d. a day to live upon, and he now gets 5d.; that he has better quarters, recreation rooms, and his rations, though deficient in quantity, are better in quality than in former times. Yet the soldier is not happy, and I appeal to the recruiting test as indicating a grave dissatisfaction with the present state of things. Forty years ago we could get as many men as we required of the height of 5ft. 10in., with a chest measurement of 35in., and now we have to reduce the height to 5ft. 4in., and the weight to 8st. 2lb.; the class of men we get are extremely indifferent, and even then we cannot get enough, for there were 5,000 short on January 1, 1890, and this year I believe we are 2,500 short. I propose, if the House will permit me, to call attention to the grievances which the soldier has to submit to during the three periods of his existence; that is to say, when he enlists and does his soldier's duty, when he passes into the Reserve, and after he has been discharged. The first grievance he suffers, when he becomes a recruit, is that whereas he expected free rations he finds he does not get them, and so he feels he has been done, as he has been. He begins his service with a grievance, and he does not forget it all the time he is under the colours. There are several other minor grievances with the details of which I will not trouble the House, but which spring from the red tape and hide-bound way in which the Army has been managed for years past. Some of these hide-bound regulations have been relaxed by the influence of the present Secretary for War, especially in reference to passes and furlough, but several grievances remain. One is that when sent on foreign service a soldier is charged 13s. for a sea kit and the dress he wears on ship board on a voyage to India, the Cape, China, or elsewhere. Now, the soldier does not go to please himself; he goes in obedience to orders; and, therefore, it is rather hard that he should be mulcted in the sum of 13s. for the clothes to wear on duty. Then there is another point in reference to time-expired clothing. It does not sound like a very big thing, but it gives rise to much complaint, and gives considerable trouble to officers commanding regiments. I fail to understand why a soldier should not keep his old time-expired clothes. He might use them on shipboard, instead of having to pay 13s. But he is forced to give them up, and the only object I can see is to put a certain amount of money into the pockets of Jew contractors who buy them, and pay an infinitesimal sum into the War Office. The clothes go on to the backs of sandwich men in the streets, or they are sent to the East End, put under a "devil," as it is called, worked up into shoddy, and exported to South America. Very little out of the whole transaction goes to the Government. Another and more serious grievance is that the men are only half-fed. This is a matter which has frequently been brought before the attention of the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeenshire; but the House cannot be too often reminded that, although some £17,000,000 sterling are annually voted to the Army, yet the men are kept in a state of almost semi-starvation. The daily rations given to the soldier are 1 lb. of bread and $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of meat. I do not advocate an increase of the meat rations, for probably that would be too expensive, and the right hon. Gentleman would not entertain it; but the pound of bread is certainly insufficient, and the result is that the young soldier of 18 years of age, whether he is big or little it does not matter, eats all his bread for breakfast and dinner, and gets nothing else from 1 o'clock one day until 7 o'clock the next morning. It is absolutely useless providing the soldier with moral books, recreation rooms, bagatelle boards, and all the rest of it, while he has a vacuum under his belt which he cannot fill with bread and cheese, for the stoppages in his pay will not allow of it. Then there is the last grievance the soldier suffers when he enters the Reserve, or when he is discharged. All the other questions I have mentioned, or that my hon. Friend the Member for Preston has alluded to, are but "leather and prunelli," are as nothing compared with the grievance there is in want of employment for Reserve men and discharged soldiers. There is an institution called "The National Association for the Employment of Discharged and Reserve Soldiers," the Chairman of which is Sir Donald Stewart, and the secretary Lieutenant Colonel Boyes. This Association has spent some £400,000 in the course of five years in assisting Reserve and discharged soldiers to obtain employment, and the Government aid the Society with a grant of £200. To-day I ventured to ask the Secretary for War if this grant could be increased, and I confess I fail to understand the argument in his reply that, because the public do not come in with their subscriptions, and the funds of the Society are at low water, therefore, it is impossible for the Government to increase this miserable grant of £300. Last year, with a stroke of the pen, the right hon. Gentleman gave the Volunteers £190,000. I have no objection whatever to that, but surely it is the duty of the Government to find employment for Reserve men. There are about 450,000 men who have passed through the Army. Of these some 59,000 are in the Reserve. 100,000 have emigrated or have died, and some 300,000, roughly speaking, are scattered over the country seeking work, haunting the docks, crowding the casual wards of our workhouses, tramping the streets, and generally bringing the Army into discredit and disgrace, because the Government will not assist in finding employment for these men. "General" Booth says—and I suppose it is possible to believe some of his statements—that, taking a sample of 2,000 men at the East End, he found that fully two-fifths of them were discharged soldiers. To the Reserve men the Government say, "Here is your 6d. a day; we do not want to be troubled with you unless you are called out; you must not leave the country." So the Reservist, unable to find employment, wanders over the country and becomes a scarecrow and terror to recruiting wherever he goes. The result of all this is that the standard of recruits has to be lowered, with the alternative of not getting any at all. It has been reduced to such an extent that absolutely we cannot get men big enough to work the guns of the Garrison Artillery, and the height for drivers in the Engineers has been reduced to 5ft. 3in. Indeed, special men are taken at a height below that, and men are enlisted not much bigger than the African pigmies of whom Stanley has written. The worst of it is that in the last 10 years the standard has been gradually going back, and the fact is that in this country there is every component requisite for an Army except the men. An Army which relies upon voluntary enlistment depends upon its popularity, and that popularity it will never have until the men are better fed, better treated, until their general status is raised, and they are not, at the end of service, cast off like an old shoe. There is hardly a respectable man now to be found entering the ranks. ["No, no!"]

Mr. Hanbury

I take my stand on the Report of the recruiting officer. Notwithstanding a redundant population, the ranks are being filled with men of 5ft. 3in. and 5ft. 4in., and unless the Government increase the inducements to enlist by providing for the employment of discharged soldiers the Army will not get a better class of recruits than it get to-day.

MAJOR RASCH: May I be permitted to explain that when I said just now that respectable men were not enlisting, I meant men of respectable physique? I was making no reference to moral character.

*(5.45.) COLONEL NOLAN: I support the Motion though I do not agree with the hon. Member who moved it in all the details of his speech. I hope the time has arrived when something may be done. I do not attach much importance to certain points of administration raised by the hon. Member. Taking the case of rations, I have always found less complaints in the Artillery and Cavalry than in the Infantry. When the hon. Member said the extra messing cost 1s. 3d. of the value of the rations, I thought this might be true for the Infantry, but one-half would be nearer for the Artillery. The proposal I would make is an extremely simple one: that the pay should be increased by 4d. a day and the deferred pay at once, so that each man should have a clear 6d. a day extra. This would cost about £750,000 a year, but it would very greatly increase the efficiency of the Army. There would be a set-off also under reductions of charges arising out of desertions, cost of escorting and removing deserters, and expenses of recruiting. Foreign critics say that our Army is not what it was; that the men are too young; that they are not to be compared to the long service men; and I do not want the statistics of the Inspector General of Recruiting to confirm my own experience, when I see regiments at Aldershot or elsewhere and observe that the men are below the average height of the race inhabiting these Islands. This is due to the inadequate pay, which does not attract a better class of men. After making full allowance for the soldier's rations and housing, what he is being paid is practically 13s. a week. It is possible, I know, so to manipulate the figures and include the pay of Non-commissioned Officers, the payment for good shooting, and good conduct pay, and so to raise the apparent average; but, as a fact, more than three-fourths of the men receive value at 13s. a week. For this they submit to restrictions and loss of liberty, to which men in civil life are not subjected, and at Aldershot or at times of active service, the men do a fair day's work, though, of course, I do not mean to say that in a quiet country town the life of a soldier is an arduous one. Now, take the working classes all over the country, are they satisfied with wages of 13s. a week? We know they are not, and that they combine and strike for 4s. or 5s. a day, and they are quite right to get as much as they can by fair means. But the soldier is obliged to be content with his 13s., though he is dissatisfied, and the effect is shown by your recruiting statistics. The men have a fair claim to an improvement in their pay, and they are right in doing what they can to get it. Certainly, I would not advise soldiers to strike; the partition between a strike and a mutiny is a very thin one. But this they may do: they may make every effort to get their pay raised by representations among their civilian friends, and especially among Members of this House. They may stop recruiting as much as possible, and insist that Members shall take up their cause, and soldiers have many friends among the electors of this country. They may bring pressure to bear on Members of Parliament through their civilian friends, and if intending recruits hold aloof I do not doubt that their claims would soon be recognised. This latter was the course pursued a few years ago in the medical branch of the Service, with the result that the pay and status of the medical officers were improved. Similar pressure the private soldier might bring to bear, and it would be foolish for the War Office to lay themselves open to such pressure. How can you expect to get good men when the pay is so small? The men you get are young and immature; how do you think they could successfully defend, for instance, the North-West Frontier of India against the race of men who might attack it. Your only method of getting the men you want to effectually use your new and expensive rifle is to raise the pay and convert the deferred pay into ordinary pay. You give the deferred pay to the men at the worst possible time. No doubt it would be difficult to abolish the system, inasmuch as the Chancellor of the Exchequer would object to its being converted into ordinary pay, and to the charge being unexpectedly thrown on this year's Estimates. Any conversion which takes place should be spread over three or four years. You are gradually getting a worse and worse class of men in the Army, and it is fortunate that the officer superintending recruiting has especially drawn attention to it this year. The reason is that you are only paying 13s. a week—at least, that is my allegation, and if my calculation is not accurate, I should like to hear it specifically contradicted on figures. In the West of Ireland the United States Army competes with the British Army. The young men know that the pay in the United States Army is better than in our own Army, and the bulk of them see the advisability of going to America to enlist in preference to enlisting at home. England and the United States are the only two countries which have well paid Armies, but the United States pay better than we do. They give something like the market rate of wages, whereas we do not.

Major Rasch

*(6.5.) GENERAL SIR E. B. HAMLEY (Birkenhead): The hon. Member who moved the Resolution has set himself a very difficult task—that of exciting public interest in the condition of the Army. That it should be a difficult task is very unfortunate, and I despair of seeing the Army put on a sound and satisfactory footing so long as that difficulty prevails. Let us hope that the startling nature of the present emergency may be promptly and widely recognised. It is nothing less than this: that the sources from which the Army is recruited have for some time been failing us, and that at a rate which must cause extreme anxiety, and for which a remedy cannot be too promptly devised. Let me put this question: If you cannot keep an Army by voluntary enlistment what is the alternative? Is there any kind of effort which should be spared if we can thereby avert it? First, let us look to the failure in mere numbers.

The body of recruits obtained for the year was, taking it in thousands, 39,000 for 1885, and had declined to 25,000 in 1888. I will mention the subsequent years presently. Now there is a circumstance which always renders it easier to obtain recruits, and that is a depression in trade. Accordingly, the years in which trade is worst are those in which most recruits are forthcoming. This fact is most unsatisfactory as showing that only in a dearth of other employment can we get a sufficiency of recruits. But there is another fact which renders the prospects of recruiting peculiarly gloomy. It is that while recruiting is declining the population is steadily increasing. Every year the numbers of young men suitable for the Army increase. Almost every year the numbers qualified for enlistment diminish. There is one way in which this decline has from time to time been met. There is always, of course, a standard fixed of what should be required physically from recruits, but this standard may be lowered. A new stratum of material is thus reached, composed of what would have before been rejected. This lowering process has been found necessary even in the years when trade is most depressed. The numbers of 1885 were only procured by lowering the standard in 1884. Let me remind the House that the Infantry soldier carries a rifle which cannot be called light, together with ammunition, knapsack, and great coat; that he ought to be fitted to bear these on a march of from 15 to 20 miles, or rather on a succession of such marches, without being unduly fatigued, certainly not exhausted; and it will be seen that the minimum of physical competency has been reached—nay, that we have got below it. In fact, we have long since touched bottom. It is hardly possible, therefore, to tap a yet inferior class for our Infantry. But there are two branches of the Service which require men of greater strength and stature—the Artillery and Foot Guards. In 1889 the recruits were brought up to the number we then obtained by lowering the physical requirements of these branches, and that lower standard still prevails. The consequence is that many men are in the Artillery who are unequal to their work. Now, it is true that there was an increase of enlistments last year, when 31,000 men were procured. But how? By admitting immature youths below the standard—admitting them in thousands—in the expectation that they might grow up to the mark. But for this the supply would have been at its lowest ebb. It is, therefore, the bare truth to say that the supply continues to fail. All this time, besides the general waste of the Army, there is the constant loss to regiments of men who complete their term of service and pass into the Reserve, including all of seven years' service and a few of five and of three. And how are these trained soldiers replaced? By recruits, most of whom are not fit for service for two years. We have a fixed establishment for the Army of men fit for service, and that is not maintained even in numbers by counting as efficient all those who will be inefficient for two years. Judged by efficiency the Army is always really short of its establishment by a great part of the recruits of two years. It is now short by a great part of the recruits of 1889 and 1890, and it must be remembered that our estimate of what is required for the Military Service of the Empire is habitually the lowest possible. Yet, even counting the actual numbers, we are short of the establishment by some thousands, which of itself constitutes a real peril; while what we lose in strength by the inferiority of the troops is not to be calculated. I do not object to the enlistment of immature youths; I only insist that the establishment ought to be kept complete without counting these or other inefficient men. Now, what is the working of the system under these conditions? Each battalion abroad must be kept prepared to take the field and must be maintained in its number of men—say 900—all efficient for service. Each is linked to a battalion at home of 700 men, which is to keep the other supplied with trained soldiers. Therefore, these home battalions are mainly composed of the residuum—that is, of insufficiently-trained men—and are always in a state of transition. They are the nurseries of the others. Now, I would ask the House to consider how important it is that commanders of regiments should feel an interest and pride in them. These are the strongest incentives to the exercise of the zeal and energy and constant vigilance which have produced the famous battalions of the past. But what commander can be expected to feel an active interest and pride in training men who are to be taken from him and sent to do credit to others? This is the situation of the Colonels of our home regiments. I hope the Reserve is better than my hon. Friend has depicted it; but I would here note respecting it a strange piece of improvidence. We have a Supplementary Reserve, in which men can enter after completing their service in the Ordinary Reserve. But only 20 per cent. of them join it. And why? Because the pay in the Reserve is 6d. a day; in the Supplementary Reserve only 4d. Thus, for the saving of the 2d. per diem, we lose the chance of getting the other 80 per cent. of these men, none more than 32 years old, and thus thousands of trained soldiers in the prime of life disappear every year in the general population. It would seem impossible to save our pence more ruinously. It would be unjust to throw altogether on the Secretary for War the responsibility for the unfortunate condition of the Army. It is a matter which presents many formidable difficulties. But then we must also remember that it is for a Secretary for War not to evade or gloss over such difficulties, but to meet and overcome them; else, why a Secretary for War? And what more pressing duty can he have than to maintain the Army in essential and indispensable strength? No doubt the right hon. Gentleman will say he does his best. But what if, while he is doing his best, the Army is crumbling around him? What if he should wake up some day to find that the failure of our military strength has placed us in imminent danger, and that the country knows it? Then he will hear the terrible question, "What have you done with my legions, Varus?" I doubt not Varus will be able to give a reply which will be highly satisfactory to himself; but, for all that, I fear that in that day things may go very hard with Varus. It is in the hope that a calamity of this kind may be averted by prompt and wise measures, and that the attention of the public may be aroused, that I now offer these few and brief remarks to the House.

General Sir E. B. Hamley

* (6.22.) VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield): The hon. and gallant Gentleman has described the present state of affairs as amounting to no less than a grave emergency, and I believe that in so describing them he has done great and real service to the country. It is not, in my opinion, possible better to summarise the situation than it was summarised by him, when he said the Army was habitually short of the recruits of two years. He also stated—and the Inspector General's Report shows the accuracy of his statement—that the Army would not at the present moment be only 2,700 men short if it had not been filled by children, who can in no sense be regarded as physically capable of bearing arms. I confess I think the House of Commons ought to feel very grateful to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) for all he has done for the Army during his tenure of office. He has completed the armaments of the coaling stations and put guns in them; he has re-armed the Artillery with the best field gun in Europe; he has, at any rate, endeavoured to provide the Infantry with the best magazine rifle, and he has for the first time grappled with the question of the better housing of the troops. All these are national services, and I hope he will add to them by grappling in the same spirit with this question of recruiting. I wish to enter my protest against what seems to me to be the excessive and absurd amount of "sentry-go" the soldier has to go through. In the Guards half the men's time in the Service is occupied in pacing up and down opposite St. James's Palace or some other building. In the name of common sense what is the use of surrounding St. James's Palace, the Home Office, the Horse Guards, and the Foreign Office with sentries? If they are placed outside these offices, why are they not placed outside the Charity Commission or the Education Office? The system is excessively foolish. It wastes the health of the soldier, wastes the money expended on the training of the soldier, and makes the Army unpopular. Every Member of the House will feel that wherever Her Majesty or the Prince of Wales is there should be a guard of sentinels.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

* VISCOUNT WOLMER: Because in a great nation like this you require to keep up the state of the monarchy; but it seems to me absurd to surround St. James's Palace all day and night with sentinels. There is no doubt the Brigade of Guards is unpopular, and I believe that statistics show that many men are invalidated from colds and weak chests which are brought about by sentry duty. Sir Frederick Roberts, in an article in the Nineteenth Century, entirely confirms the view which I have put forward. The hon. and gallant Member for Birkenhead (Sir E. Hamley) made a great point when he asked why we should wilfully deprive ourselves of the services of men of the Army Reserve, who refused to go into the Supplementary Reserve. Here you have the highest possible class of trained soldier who, for want of adequate remuneration, refuses to enter the Supplementary Reserve. You are losing every year thousands of the best soldiers in the world, who, probably, for a small additional reward might be retained in the Service of the country. With regard to the general system of recruiting, the country has been covered at great expense with regimental depôts, each of which has a staff of officers and non-commissioned officers. In theory you could not possibly have a better system through which to get at every hamlet and village in the country, and exhaust all the resources of the country for supplying the needs of the Army. But does the country get the full benefit of the money spent every year on this system? Do the officers go to the depôts meaning to work, or because they think they will have two years of easy time? It is perfectly notorious that many officers only go to them because they believe they will have little or no work to do. Is not this quite natural when the War Office and Horse Guards make no difference in the career of the soldier who has been very successful at his depôt, and that of the man who has been very unsuccessful? I know a very extraordinary case in point, which I can vouch for from my own experience. In one depôt an Adjutant worked as I should think no Adjutant at a recruiting depôt ever worked before. The consequence was the results were so good that the Inspector General of Recruiting, in his Annual Report, was obliged to take notice of them. Did he give credit to the officer who had brought about these results? No; he did not. He gave credit to his successor who had held the post for a few weeks. Here was an officer who for five years had worked in this way and then had to leave the Army because he saw no possibility of getting on in it, and take to another career in which I believe he has done well. Why, I ask, does not the War Office treat the work of successful and hard-working recruiting as a subject worthy of promotion and reward? It is my firm conviction that if they did this they would find a great and satisfactory difference in the Returns from many of the depôts. It is a notorious fact that at many of the depôts the officers are more frequently out on leave than at work in the depôts; and I cannot help saying that if it were known that a hard-working and successful depôt officer might look for promotion, recruiting would considerably increase. The best test of this that could be adopted would, I think, be to take a well-known successful officer and put him in charge of the recruiting at the worst of the depôts. In that case I should be surprised if the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War did not find that in a very short time the Returns from that depôt would be altogether different and far more satisfactory than they have been hitherto. With regard to what has been said as to the pay of the soldier, it is impossible that any terms which this country could offer him would at all compete with the wages he can get as a miner or as a skilled artisan. The Army can, in reality, only compete with the respectable but unskilled labour of that class of men who are employed in agriculture or in the lower branches of our great industries. Regarding the matter from this particular standpoint I would put it to the House: Are the present wages of the soldier too small? For my part, I am not quite clear that they are; but, at any rate, the subject is one that requires a good deal more investigation than it has as yet had. And there is also the question of the great mass of deferred pay, which the universal testimony of all soldiers of experience absolutely condemns in its present form. I think I am

Viscount Wolmer

right in saying that hardly a case can be given in which the deferred pay is of any real value to the soldier. Yet there is an enormous sum at the disposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War derived from the detention of 2d. per day for 12 years, because the deferred pay is continued during the Reserve service as well as during the service with the colours. The chief reason for doubting whether the terms are really too low for the class of labour performed by the soldier is one which I derive from my own experience as to what occurs in my own constituency. I do not think there is a constituency in the whole Kingdom in which more is known about the Army than in mine, nor is there one in which the Army is more popular. We have Aldershot at one end and Portsmouth at the other, while on one side we have the Winchester depôt, and on the other the depôt at Guildford. The recruiting sergeant has little or nothing to do there, for the Army recruits itself. In the parish in which I live there is hardly a single family which has not one or more of its members in the Army; and when the hon. Member opposite talked about only the scum of the population going into the Army—although he afterwards stated that he meant the scum, physically—I would reply that in my constituency it is a most respectable class of young labourers who enlist in the Army. Not only do such men go into the Army of their own free will but they do so because they prefer the Service, knowing, as they do, all about it, and when they have left the Army they go back to their old avocations. I do not know of a single case in the whole of my parish, which is a large one, where a Reserve man is not in employment. The great bulk of them in my constituency, and they are not to be numbered by dozens only, but by scores, are in good and permanent agricultural employment and do not meet with any special difficulty in obtaining it as soon as they return from the Army. I speak from experience when I say that if the nature of the Army Service were properly known in the agricultural constituencies where the higher rates of wages paid to the miners and artisans do not compete with the Army pay, the terms now offered to the soldier would be found to be good enough. If the officers commanding the depôts and those under them would exercise more vigilance and display a little more keenness and resource, I believe the results would in many cases be very different to what they now are, and that in different parts of the country we should find that, as is the case in my own constituency, the Army would recruit itself. I do not propose to trespass any longer on the attention of the House; but I may be allowed in conclusion to point out that that branch of the Service with which I am associated—the Militia—in respect of its recruiting occupies a similar position to that of the Regular Army. It is, I believe, some 23,000 men short. This is not wholly, but it is to some extent, due to the want of enterprise exhibited by the recruiting officer; and my last words to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War on this occasion will be to commend very earnestly to his attention the desirability of making successful recruiting and zeal at the recruiting depôts a real step to advancement in the Service, at the same time taking care to provide against successful officers being treated as my friend was, when his successor was named as the man to whom all the credit for what he had done was due, while my friend himself had to leave the Service.

(6.35.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I think that if every hon. Member who has taken part in this Debate had approached the subject under discussion in a similar spirit to that which has pervaded the speech of the noble Lord who has just sat down, great advantage would have been gained; because, I hope that every hon. Member, who rises to speak on such a topic, does so with a full sense of responsibility. There certainly is a considerable amount of responsibility devolving on those who bring before the House what are alleged to be the grievances of the private soldier. Every one who does this, does it with the responsibility derived from the knowledge that the words he uses in this House may go forth to the world, and that unless his statements are founded on fact and are uttered in something like the spirit of moderation, which has characterised the speech of the noble Lord, there is great danger that they may lead some ignorant men to expect things they are never likely to get. I must confess that, I was very sorry to hear the speech of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan). The hon. and gallant Gentleman speaks in this House with great authority on Military subjects, and the occasions are rare on which I differ from him, in the main, in the views he expresses on such matters. It was, therefore, with exceeding regret that I heard the hon. and gallant Gentleman say that, unless an increase of pay was granted to the men of the Army he would recommend all our soldiers—not to strike—but to do their best to bring the business of the Military Service of the country to a standstill by preventing recruiting to the utmost possible extent. I am afraid that my hon. and gallant Friend was carried away by that sort of spirit of insubordination, which sometimes takes possession even of an old officer, and I must repeat that I was very sorry to hear one who is so high an authority on Army matters speak in that way. My hon. Friend who introduced this Debate (Mr. Hanbury) made one of those characteristic speeches to which we are getting pretty well accustomed in this House, but about which I will utter no words of complaint. There were, however, two things in his speech this evening which struck me as matters to which I ought to allude. In the first place he spoke of a Return which has been issued by the War Office, as one of those peculiar Returns which the War Office was accustomed to issue. That Return was issued on the Motion of Lord Dundonald in the House of Lords, and had reference to the ages of the non-commissioned officers. How it is that my hon. Friend could suggest that there could have been any intention on the part of the War Office not to present the exact facts I am really at a loss to imagine.

MR. HANBURY: The War Office itself does not know the ages of those men.

MR. E. STANHOPE: The hon. Member is wrong in that statement. We do know the ages of these men. The hon. Gentleman may say it is not so, but we say that it is so. We have given, to the best of our power and with absolute accuracy, the ages of the non-commissioned officers of the Army. The second point contained in the speech of my hon. Friend, on which I wish to say a few words, is this: It is suggested that the position of the private soldier is altered from time to time, just as the hon. Member has said the position of the officers is altered by Royal Warrants. I challenged my hon. Friend to mention a single instance in which the pay of the private soldier has undergone any change in its conditions from the action of the War Office.

MR. HANBURY: I said it had been so stated by General Sir Frederick Roberts.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I know that my hon. Friend said so; but I say that Sir Frederick Roberts has never said any thing of the kind, and when I challenged my hon. Friend to give a specific instance he was unable to do so. But I do not care to argue this matter in the same spirit as animated the speech of my hon. Friend or as generally animates the speeches he delivers on these subjects. I prefer to meet the points that have been raised, and to consider what those points are and how far they may be consistent with the facts. First of all it is said that the soldier is deceived; that in the attractions which are held out to the soldier to enter the Army we offer him certain things which, as a matter of fact, we do not give him. Now, Sir, let me examine this statement. I fully admit that the poster mentioned by my hon. Friend—the large poster which is put up in many parts of the country—is imperfect, and by no means a full statement of what the soldier has to expect. Of course it could not contain a full statement; it could not include every condition affecting the soldier's life. It may be that the poster is not full enough and does not contain a sufficiently complete statement of what the soldier has to expect—indeed, I think that this is so, and I have lately taken steps to alter the terms of the poster with the view of explaining somewhat more fully to the soldier the terms he has to expect on entering the Army. But I do not admit for a moment, even now, that the man who enters the Army has not the fullest opportunity of knowing what he has to expect. Reference has been made to the small pamphlet that is available to any man in the country at any post-office. It is perfectly well known—it is clear in its terms, and I do not think there can be any possible misunderstanding, as to what we offer to any recruit. I will venture to read to the House two or three passages from it. Hon. Members will find the information in that portion of the pamphlet that relates to the general advantages of the Army. The soldier is told this in paragraph 58—

Mr. E. Stanhope

“A soldier may be said, on joining the Army, to receive in pay, rations, clothing, lodging, &c., the equivalent of not less than 15s a week.”

And paragraph 57 explains exactly what it is the soldier does receive. He is warned and expected—

“To keep up his underclothing and necessities at his own cost, and to pay for repairs to his clothing while in wear, and for his groceries, vegetables, and washing :”

and, as a result, in paragraph 59, it is explained—

“After deducting all stoppages, a well-conducted soldier has at his own disposal about 4s 6d a week.”

That is the statement made in the pamphlet issued throughout the country, and I say in the main the statements are absolutely true. There may be cases in which a man has not the whole amount of 4s 6d; but it is utterly impossible to account for the particular circumstances of every regiment in every part of the country. In the main, however, that statement is absolutely true, and is borne out by every possible information that is at my disposal.

MR. HANBURY: Does it say anything about the sea kit?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am coming to that by-and-bye. According to this estimate the English soldier receives 15s a week, or £37 10s a year. I was reading the other day an interesting pamphlet issued some years ago by Major Ardagh. In that pamphlet he put side by side the following results as to the value of the advantages gained by the soldier in this country as compared with foreign countries. He showed that in England an Infantry soldier costs £37 10s a year. In France the Infantry soldier costs £21; in Germany, £18; and in Russia, a country which is sometimes held up to us as a country we ought to imitate in economy, the Infantry soldier costs only £7 4s a year.

COLONEL NOLAN: How much in the United States?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am sorry I have not the figures. I now pass from that general statement. It has often been said, and it has been said to-night, that the pay of the soldier has not improved. I venture to say, Sir, that in the course of the last 25 years it has very largely improved, and I will give figures of undoubted authority, because they were worked out by the Committee which sat two years ago—figures which, I should think, may be taken as conclusive upon the subject. The Report of that Committee showed that whereas in 1886, after all deductions, the soldier never had more than 3½d. a day, he now makes, under favourable circumstances, very nearly 7d. a day. Therefore the soldier has undoubtedly gained between 1886 and the present time something like 4d. a day. Now, Sir, what are the deductions that are made? The question of hospital deduction has been mentioned, though I think my hon. Friend raised a very moderate amount of objection to the hospital deduction. As a matter of fact, I think it is a very dangerous thing if you treat a soldier in exactly the same manner when he is in hospital as when he is out of hospital. If you are to give him exactly the same advantages in hospital, I am afraid there would be likely to be a very considerable amount of malignering. The soldier while he is in hospital is practically getting himself into a better financial position. Then, Sir, the library subscription has been mentioned as a hardship. First of all that subscription is optional. No soldier is bound to subscribe to the library fund unless he chooses to do so. If he does subscribe, his subscription only amounts to about the tenth of a penny per week, and, considering the enormous advantage he gets by joining the library, I do not think that is a very great amount for him to be called upon to pay. My hon. and gallant Friend also mentioned the sea-kit. Well, Sir, I am bound to say that among all the points which I have investigated in connection with the condition of the soldier, this question of the sea-kit is one which seemed to me to be the most doubtful. It is a point which I have only recently been able to investigate personally, and I think it does require some remedy on our part. Although I cannot say in what direction we shall look for a remedy, I will undertake that it shall by no means be overlooked. Another grievance that has been referred* to is that the soldier does not learn a trade. Well, Sir, in that respect we are holding out no undue prospect to soldiers. We tell him plainly, in the posters we circulate, that on some stations he will have the opportunity of learning a trade, but that is all, unfortunately, that we are able to do. There are many stations where we can teach the men a trade, and where we are very glad to do so, and in recent years the opportunity has been very largely extended. But there are other stations where the barrack accommodation is such that we cannot offer the soldier that advantage. Then it has been objected that the soldier has to pay a sum for repairs to barrack furniture, but I think, Sir, on that no grievance can be sustained. All that the soldier has to pay for is wilful damage, and when it is said that he has to pay for the repair of barrack furniture generally, I can only say that that is entirely contrary to the fact. It is always desirable that there should be every possible motive on the part of the soldier to assist in keeping the barracks in good order. When you come to the ordinary repair of the barracks, that is the duty of the State—a duty from which the State has never shrunk. The State has always paid for it, and ought always to pay for it. Now, Sir, I come to the question of rations. A Committee has reported on this subject—a very influential Committee presided over by Sir Redvers Buller, then Quartermaster General, who was himself specially responsible at the time for these matters. In their Report they say—

“The soldier's pay is of a composite character. It consists of pay proper, and an allowance, in the nature of partial board wages, estimated at 5d. a day, which is supposed to be, and which, according to regulation, may be expended on his diet. The question to be determined, therefore, is not whether 1lb. of meat and 1lb. of bread are in themselves sufficient, but whether these supplies, supplemented by other articles provided out of the messing stoppage, afford a sufficient diet for the soldier.”

Now, Sir, the Committee proceeded to make a most careful inquiry into the whole question of the sufficiency of the soldier's food. They took evidence from different parts of the country and issued questions, in answer to which they received information which enabled them to present the Report they afterwards presented, and the upshot of their Report was this:—

"That the soldier's ration at home-stations, supplemented by a smaller sum than the authorised regimental messing contribution of 5d. a day, affords, under proper regimental arrangements, a sufficient diet."

That is a very strong statement, and at the same time a very satisfactory statement, made by a very responsible and careful Committee. They add—

"We are of opinion that the chief defects in the soldier's diet are due to the fact that it has been too much left to the custom, and that too little attention has been paid to it by those in authority."

They followed this up by specific recommendations. The first related to the bread, and it was a very important and a very useful recommendation. To that recommendation full effect has been given, and we hope and believe that in that way many of the complaints that have arisen with regard to the bread have been got rid of. Then they recommended a course of instruction for officers in connection with the supervision of the food of the soldiers. Upon this point again we have taken advantage of the recommendation. First of all, with regard to the supply of food for the soldiers, we have appointed Inspectors, who have gone about the country to see whether the meat supplied is as good as it ought to be. We have had very good reports from these Inspectors. They have in several cases, I am afraid much more often than I should like, detected deficiencies, but the result of their inquiries has been that the quality of the supplies, with regard to meat especially, has improved to a remarkable extent, and I am sure there is every possibility of that improvement continuing. The officers, too, are giving themselves to the work of supervision with an energy that satisfies me that we may look for greater improvement in the future. My hon. Friend also mentioned the question of the meat, and he says that the prices at which we are able to obtain it prove at once that the meat cannot be of good quality. Now, Sir, I asked one of the first butchers in London whether he would be prepared to supply the Army at the rate we are now paying, and he said that, assuming that we did not want the prime joints of beef and mutton provided, he was perfectly prepared to supply the whole Army at the current contract rate then being paid.

Mr. E. Stanhope

MR. HANBURY: How much was that?

MR. E. STANHOPE: About 4d. Then reference has also been made to various changes in barracks for the comfort of the soldiers. I may say at once I am very glad to consider any suggestions for changes in this direction. Everybody is aware of the wide scheme by means of which great improvement is now being made in the general condition of our barrack accommodation, the progress of which I will explain presently. But probably hardly any one knows all the minor improvements. Some of them, not outwardly noticeable, which have recently been and are being carried out, are unquestionably adding much to the comfort of the soldier. In the new barracks we are proposing to introduce "mess requisite cupboards," which afford to each group of soldiers places for their bread, their butter, and other small articles appertaining to their meals, the pattern being the invention of a private soldier as being specially suitable to their wants. A proposal is also coming forward to introduce experimentally boxes for each man to keep his clothes in. If successful this scheme will be extended, it being, of course, not intended to allow these boxes to be moved from the barrack when the soldier leaves it. We are introducing into the new barracks waterproof floors, which will get rid of that very great evil in existing barracks of dirt under the floor. There are also minor sanitary details connected with each barrack-room which have long been, and still are, a source of controversy, but to which we are giving special attention in all barracks. I now come to the issue of fuel, and I will at once admit that the old regulations as to fuel certainly seem to have had the effect of making the amount of fuel at certain times of the year insufficient and at other times unnecessarily large. By the new regulations the greatest elasticity has been established, so that all coal allotted may be burnt at the time and in the manner most convenient to the men. I noticed the other day, when a lecture was being delivered by a quartermaster-sergeant at the United Service Institution, he explained that the new regulations were of a most beneficial character. He found that with the free hand the regiment now possessed much more could be done with the fuel than under the old regulations, and I was glad to see he expressed himself thoroughly satisfied with the change that had taken place. Great attention has been given to the cookhouses, formerly very defective, and even now in some cases unsatisfactory. A few years ago an effort was made to substitute new patterns of ranges and apparatus suitable for all the minor purposes of a soldier's cooking, as well as for cooking his dinner. But no greater or more important improvement has been suggested than that which in the form of regimental institutes has gradually provided the soldier with a warm and comfortable club. This work is more advanced in India than in this country, though, here too, the new Barracks Act affords scope for its rapid development. The recreation room, the coffee room, the reading room, and the canteen afford comforts formerly unknown to the soldier. And so with the non-commissioned officers much has been done to elevate their character and increase their efficiency. Sergeants' messes are already nearly universal, and we are following now with messes also for corporals. And in many barracks, where there is space, regimental workshops for carpenters, or for training in other work, are in existence. My hon. Friend asked a question as to separate dining rooms. Many of our barracks do not admit of providing a separate room for dining. We are, however, glad to be able to do so, and in a good many cases it has already been accomplished. Then there are the quarters for married soldiers. Within the lifetime of men of my own age the accommodation given to married soldiers was only separated by a curtain from that of the unmarried men. Now quarters, insufficient, indeed, but still decent and separate, have been largely provided, and will be in many places improved under the Barracks Act. We are, for the first time, asserting the principle that the great improvement in accommodation, which has most happily for the country been so generally provided for the agricultural labourer, ought to be extended to the soldier, and the new quarters, while thoroughly economical, will show that much better provision has been made. And, lastly, the system of granting furloughs to soldiers, out of the regular drill season, has been largely extended and brought within the reach of much greater numbers by the introduction by the Railway Companies of cheap fares for their conveyance to their homes. I think we owe a considerable debt of gratitude to the Railway Companies for the readiness with which they have met our wishes. I have several times been urged to introduce legislation on this subject, and I am glad that the voluntary action of the Railway Companies themselves has rendered such legislation unnecessary. They have met us in a manner which reflects credit upon them, and which, I believe, will eventually turn out to be to their advantage. I hope that this very brief summary, which by no means exhausts all the points which I might have mentioned, will serve to show the great attention which has been paid to every detail of the soldier's life. There remains the question of clothing. It is surrounded by very considerable difficulties, but it undoubtedly offers a field for improvement, of which I hope to take full advantage. Of the main articles of clothing supplied to the soldier, hardly any serious complaint is now made; occasionally, of course, the greatest difficulty is found in reconciling the practical requirements of field-work with that amount of smartness in pattern which tends, undoubtedly, to the popularity of the Army. We have made very considerable improvements in favour of the soldier in respect of his dress. Twenty years ago we gave the soldier a smart tunic every year; now we give him one in every two years, and we give him every year a Service frock, which is more useful for orderly and similar purposes. In the year 1890 we introduced another thing in respect of clothing, which inquiry has shown to be absolutely necessary in this climate—we gave him a jersey, to wear under his tunic, and this, I know, has largely added to his comfort. As regards the mode of issue of clothing, I do not want to enter into much detail, because we have lately made a very careful inquiry into all its aspects, which is likely to result in considerable simplification. I fully admit that the present mode of keeping accounts

presented, and the upshot of their Report was this:—

"That the soldier's ration at home-stations, supplemented by a smaller sum than the authorised regimental messing contribution of 5d. a day, affords, under proper regimental arrangements, a sufficient diet."

That is a very strong statement, and at the same time a very satisfactory statement, made by a very responsible and careful Committee. They add—

"We are of opinion that the chief defects in the soldier's diet are due to the fact that it has been too much left to the custom, and that too little attention has been paid to it by those in authority."

They followed this up by specific recommendations. The first related to the bread, and it was a very important and a very useful recommendation. To that recommendation full effect has been given, and we hope and believe that in that way many of the complaints that have arisen with regard to the bread have been got rid of. Then they recommended a course of instruction for officers in connection with the supervision of the food of the soldiers. Upon this point again we have taken advantage of the recommendation. First of all, with regard to the supply of food for the soldiers, we have appointed Inspectors, who have gone about the country to see whether the meat supplied is as good as it ought to be. We have had very good reports from these Inspectors. They have in several cases, I am afraid much more often than I should like, detected deficiencies, but the result of their inquiries has been that the quality of the supplies, with regard to meat especially, has improved to a remarkable extent, and I am sure there is every possibility of that improvement continuing. The officers, too, are giving themselves to the work of supervision with an energy that satisfies me that we may look for greater improvement in the future. My hon. Friend also mentioned the question of the meat, and he says that the prices at which we are able to obtain it prove at once that the meat cannot be of good quality. Now, Sir, I asked one of the first butchers in London whether he would be prepared to supply the Army at the rate we are now paying, and he said that, assuming that we did not want the prime joints of beef and mutton provided, he was perfectly prepared to supply the whole Army at the current contract rate then being paid.

Mr. E. Stanhope

MR. HANBURY: How much was that?

MR. E. STANHOPE: About 4d.

Then reference has also been made to various changes in barracks for the comfort of the soldiers. I may say at once I am very glad to consider any suggestions for changes in this direction. Everybody is aware of the wide scheme by means of which great improvement is now being made in the general condition of our barrack accommodation, the progress of which I will explain presently. But probably hardly any one knows all the minor improvements. Some of them, not outwardly noticeable, which have recently been and are being carried out, are unquestionably adding much to the comfort of the soldier. In the new barracks we are proposing to introduce "mess requisite cupboards," which afford to each group of soldiers places for their bread, their butter, and other small articles appertaining to their meals, the pattern being the invention of a private soldier as being specially suitable to their wants. A proposal is also coming forward to introduce experimentally boxes for each man to keep his clothes in. If successful this scheme will be extended, it being, of course, not intended to allow these boxes to be moved from the barrack when the soldier leaves it. We are introducing into the new barracks waterproof floors, which will get rid of that very great evil in existing barracks of dirt under the floor. There are also minor sanitary details connected with each barrack-room which have long been, and still are, a source of controversy, but to which we are giving special attention in all barracks. I now come to the issue of fuel, and I will at once admit that the old regulations as to fuel certainly seem to have had the effect of making the amount of fuel at certain times of the year insufficient and at other times unnecessarily large. By the new regulations the greatest elasticity has been established, so that all coal allotted may be burnt at the time and in the manner most convenient to the men. I noticed the other day, when a lecture was being delivered by a quartermaster-sergeant at the United Service Institution, he explained that the new regulations were of a most beneficial character. He found that with the free hand the regiment now possessed much more could be done with the fuel than under the old regulations, and I was glad to see he expressed himself thoroughly satisfied with the change that had taken place. Great attention has been given to the cookhouses, formerly very defective, and even now in some cases unsatisfactory. A few years ago an effort was made to substitute new patterns of ranges and apparatus suitable for all the minor purposes of a soldier's cooking, as well as for cooking his dinner. But no greater or more important improvement has been suggested than that which in the form of regimental institutes has gradually provided the soldier with a warm and comfortable club. This work is more advanced in India than in this country, though, here too, the new Barracks Act affords scope for its rapid development. The recreation room, the coffee room, the reading room, and the canteen afford comforts formerly unknown to the soldier. And so with the non-commissioned officers much has been done to elevate their character and increase their efficiency. Sergeants' messes are already nearly universal, and we are following now with messes also for corporals. And in many barracks, where there is space, regimental workshops for carpenters, or for training in other work, are in existence. My hon. Friend asked a question as to separate dining rooms. Many of our barracks do not admit of providing a separate room for dining. We are, however, glad to be able to do so, and in a good many cases it has already been accomplished. Then there are the quarters for married soldiers. Within the lifetime of men of my own age the accommodation given to married soldiers was only separated by a curtain from that of the unmarried men. Now quarters, insufficient, indeed, but still decent and separate, have been largely provided, and will be in many places improved under the Barracks Act. We are, for the first time, asserting the principle that the great improvement in accommodation, which has most happily for the country been so generally provided for the agricultural labourer, ought to be extended to the soldier, and the new quarters, while thoroughly economical, will show that much better provision has been made. And, lastly, the system of granting furloughs to soldiers, out of the regular drill season, has been largely extended and brought within the reach of much greater numbers by the introduction by the Railway Companies of cheap fares for their conveyance to their homes. I think we owe a considerable debt of gratitude to the Railway Companies for the readiness with which they have met our wishes. I have several times been urged to introduce legislation on this subject, and I am glad that the voluntary action of the Railway Companies themselves has rendered such legislation unnecessary. They have met us in a manner which reflects credit upon them, and which, I believe, will eventually turn out to be to their advantage. I hope that this very brief summary, which by no means exhausts all the points which I might have mentioned, will serve to show the great attention which has been paid to every detail of the soldier's life. There remains the question of clothing. It is surrounded by very considerable difficulties, but it undoubtedly offers a field for improvement, of which I hope to take full advantage. Of the main articles of clothing supplied to the soldier, hardly any serious complaint is now made; occasionally, of course, the greatest difficulty is found in reconciling the practical requirements of field-work with that amount of smartness in pattern which tends, undoubtedly, to the popularity of the Army. We have made very considerable improvements in favour of the soldier in respect of his dress. Twenty years ago we gave the soldier a smart tunic every year; now we give him one in every two years, and we give him every year a Service frock, which is more useful for orderly and similar purposes. In the year 1890 we introduced another thing in respect of clothing, which inquiry has shown to be absolutely necessary in this climate—we gave him a jersey, to wear under his tunic, and this, I know, has largely added to his comfort. As regards the mode of issue of clothing, I do not want to enter into much detail, because we have lately made a very careful inquiry into all its aspects, which is likely to result in considerable simplification. I fully admit that the present mode of keeping accounts in detail in respect of every soldier is troublesome, and open to considerable objection. There is a great deal to be said again in favour of making the clothing, in part at least, the property of the soldier. The Military Authorities were afraid that if any change were made in this respect, and the soldier got his clothing, he would parade about the country in old and worn-out clothing. There is still more to be said for introducing a system more elastic than the present one, which may have the effect of giving to the careful soldier some greater encouragement than at present. I hope the House will forgive me if I do not now state any definite opinion on this subject, because all the facts are not before me, and on these matters I desire to reserve any final opinion until the facts are fully brought before me. My hon. Friend has spoken about the sergeants' mess, and I have already told the House that sergeants' messes are almost universal. My hon. Friend has called attention to the alleged abuse of the regulations controlling these messes and to the suggestion that liquor is sold to outsiders. The regulations which permitted the sergeants' messes to sell liquor to outsiders have been made the subject of very careful inquiry, and I especially asked the attention of Sir E. Wood to those regulations. The result of the inquiry is that, although there have been at times some abuses, the regulations now laid down will, in Sir E. Wood's opinion, absolutely prevent any such abuses in that respect in future, and I am in hopes that the improved supervision now in force will enable those regulations to be effectively carried out. And now the question comes—Is there anything in the present position of recruiting which necessitates the offer of further inducements to enlist, or which is especially alarming? I have seen so many alarmist articles in the Press that the House will not think I am unduly detaining it if I ask leave to state quite plainly the best opinion which I have been able to form on the subject, and I do so with extreme diffidence, knowing too well the great difficulties which surround it, and the tremendous difference of opinion which prevails amongst the highest authorities about it. Anyone who looks at the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting will see that, as regards mere numbers, so far from having had a slack year, we have had, upon the whole, a substantial increase to our numbers. Hon. Members point to the fact that the number of recruits went down two or three years ago; but they should bear in mind the fact that the number of recruits required depends on the number of men whose time expires in a given year or are passing into the Reserve, and at the present time that number is very large. Recruiting has been brisk; and the Inspector General is able to say that, in his opinion, "evidence exists on all sides to show that the popularity of Military Service is not on the wane." This is the satisfactory side of the matter; but the unsatisfactory side is—and I state it with perfect frankness—the youth of the men enlisted and the difficulty of completely filling the ranks of certain corps requiring men of superior physique. When we hear of the standard being lowered, we must remember that we maintain a higher standard than is maintained in any foreign country. I do not know whether, as a matter of fact, the height of the population of these islands is any less than it was; there are some people who say that men are shorter than they were a certain number of years ago. Whether that is so I do not know; but I think that everybody will agree that in the Report of the Inspector General, though there is a good deal that may cause alarm, there is a good deal that tends to prove that that alarm ought not to be exaggerated. From various districts we have the Returns of the generals commanding in those districts, and in many of them we find that even now they are perfectly satisfied with the physique of the soldiers they have obtained. Aldershot is an exception. Sir E. Wood expresses himself as not altogether satisfied; but the Inspector General, in his Return, points to one reason for that—namely, that Sir E. Wood has this special difficulty to encounter—that the battalions under his command have to be recruited under high pressure, because they are first to go on foreign service. That is a difficulty for which a remedy may be found, and we propose to begin the improved recruiting for regiments which are likely to go on foreign service a little sooner, so that before the men are called upon to go abroad they may have been longer in the ranks and become more seasoned. Passing from that, I say that if we were able to look upon our Army as solely intended for home defence, and without reference to its obligations to serve in India and the colonies, the present supply of men could not be described as generally unsatisfactory. But, of course, we cannot limit our views to that. The large drafts annually required for foreign service, which must necessarily be composed of men of at least 20 years of age, do create a most formidable difficulty. It is very easy to say at once that it can be effectively met by an increase to the pay of the soldier, but that is a matter which requires the most careful examination from several points of view, and all the more because, while in the case of ordinary trades your wages may fall as well as rise, it is pretty certain that, once you increase the pay of the soldier, you cannot in any circumstances retrace your steps. If it be true that the present scale of remuneration fails to attract the right class of recruits—it cannot be said that it fails to attract recruits—then we must look a little further into the matter and examine why it does so. The value of the immediate and direct advantages of a private soldier may be taken, as I have already said, at 15s. a week. That does not include various prospective advantages, and does not include deferred pay. This sum, with the prospective advantages, compares not unfavourably with the earnings of agricultural labourers, from which class the recruit is still so largely drawn, even though the actual enlistment may take place in a town. Moreover, the effect of our system of short service is to attract to the colours young men who have not yet entered any trade, and who are ready to serve for a period not too long to exclude them afterwards from entering one. A moderate increase in the pay of the Army would not have the effect, as it seems to me, of attracting those who have joined a trade. In other words, if you want skilled labour in the Army you must pay the price of skilled labour, as, indeed, the Royal Engineers do for skilled work done by many of the men that they require. But for the work of the ordinary soldier a skilled labourer is not required, and the addition to the total cost of the Army, which would be involved in the offer of any such terms generally, would be enormous, and I doubt if it would be justified by anything short of absolute necessity. Indeed, I am confident the House would not entertain it unless we proved the absolute necessity. I was struck with the fact that when the hon. and gallant Member for Galway advocated an increase of £750,000 a year only 35 Members were ready to listen to the grievance. But may it not be true that, if you do not necessarily improve the pay of the soldier, you may improve his position, or, at any rate, meet the difficulty in some other direction? I allude, of course, to the difficulty of foreign service. I refer first to the length of time for which men are enlisted. I am not going to discuss the merits and demerits of short service generally. It has, at any rate, done this. It has given us recruits in numbers which, without it, we could scarcely have hoped to obtain, and it would be madness now to abandon it. But it involves no departure from the general principle of short service if I say that the mode of its application to the special need and requirements of foreign service has always created considerable difference of opinion. It would not be difficult to show that upon the details of the best mode of applying it, the opinions of the highest authorities are most divergent and almost irreconcilable. I do not know that I ever read a better statement of the difficulties we have to encounter, or, in my opinion, a more impartial one, than what appeared in a letter from a military correspondent published in the Times newspaper in August. It stated the problem which we have to solve in a fair and reasonable manner, and showed in a conclusive manner that the real problem was whether the average service with the colours was too short or not, and whether any changes could be made without drawing unfairly on the Reserves which would meet the difficulty. I thought that the article stated the matter in a very reasonable and fair manner, and certainly on the whole, on the best consideration I have been able to give to it, I have come to the conclusion that facts show that if the time has not come for action, at any rate the time has come for some further inquiry as to whether a change ought not to be made. Now I come to another much controverted question which closely bears upon the same difficulty—I mean deferred pay—and I will venture to state to the House very briefly the present state of the case. Before 1876 a soldier discharged or transferred to the Reserve received 5s., and 5s. only, to start him in civil life, and to enable him to travel home—a most ridiculously inadequate sum according to our present notions, and a relic of the time when every effort was made to keep a soldier with the colours as long as possible. But in 1876 different ideas began to prevail: 12 years' service came to be looked upon as the limit of real efficiency, and the development of an adequate Reserve became the prime necessity. Deferred pay was the outcome of this change of policy. It was to enable the State, with a clear conscience, to send the man back to civil life, at the expiration of six or 12 years, with a substantial sum in his pocket to make a fresh start in life. These objects, it is fair to say, have been mainly secured by deferred pay, and we have now obtained a Reserve, not free from obvious defects, but affording a real and substantial addition to our military strength. And it is further maintained that deferred pay is in some form an inevitable condition of short service, that it has a direct influence on recruiting and rendering a military career more popular, and that the ultimate prospect of deferred pay has a good influence on the character of the soldiers and tends to prevent desertion. On the other hand, it is also true that the bulk of military authority is absolutely opposed to deferred pay, at any rate in its present form. That must be admitted. They contend that the half million of money now spent on it is to a large extent wasted, because many a soldier, instead of using it for his advancement in life or his maintenance while unemployed, is immediately tempted by the possession of what is to him a large sum of money to waste it without any permanent advantage to himself. And it is added that it is a mistake to suppose that the reckless soldier will be kept from misconduct or desertion by the prospect of ultimately forfeiting it. These arguments, which I have most imperfectly summarised on each side, and upon which I purposely refrain from expressing any opinion of my own, seem to me to establish a case for inquiring into the facts now in dispute. And accordingly I propose to assemble a Committee, somewhat on the lines of the well-known Committee presided over by Lord Airey—composed mainly of soldiers—to consider the question of deferred pay, and also to refer to it certain questions as to the present terms of service with the colours and with the Reserve respectively, which I have already, perhaps somewhat vaguely, indicated. I feel sure that an inquiry of this description, and the conclusion arrived at by a strong Committee, would serve the invaluable purpose of collecting the experience of the past few years, upon which the foundations of any changes in our system ought to be laid. It has been suggested that a Royal Commission might be preferable; but, upon the whole, I think that a Committee will be more effectual, and will be able to report more quickly. I have already alluded to the opinion of the Inspector General that military service is not losing its popularity. I am in great hopes, on the contrary, that the increasing attention which is being paid to the daily comfort of the private soldier—to some points of which I have alluded—will render it more attractive. The one or two instances to the contrary, of which so much has been made during the past year, only serve to bring out more clearly that, in spite of the avowed attempts of certain agitators to spread disaffection in the Army, its discipline remains satisfactory. Much has been most justly said about the necessity of seeing that your non-commissioned officers should not be too young or too inexperienced. But probably some hon. Members will have seen a Return which was presented to the House of Lords, on the Motion of Lord Dundonald. It is a most valuable and interesting Return, and it shows that the average age of corporals in the Line is 25 years and 8 months, with nearly 6½ years' service; while the sergeants average 28 years and 10 months, with 9½ years' service. These figures speak for themselves, and prove that the youth of our non-commissioned officers has been much exaggerated. Reference has been made to the pay of non-commissioned officers. I must say frankly that it has not been proved that the pay of non-commissioned officers is insufficient to draw into the Service and keep in the Service thoroughly efficient non-commissioned officers. Their pay is considerably higher than that of the private soldier, and they are also in a position to earn pensions. I am not satisfied that any case has been made out for increasing the pay of non-commissioned officers. It may be that the lance corporal does not always get the full advantage of his position, but it is only temporary, and is due to more lance corporals being appointed than are provided for. I am also able to add that crime in the Army has rapidly diminished of late years. The number of men in possession of good-conduct badges has increased in the last four years by 19 per cent. Our military prisons are seldom more than half full, and have been diminished in number, while the number of Courts-martial, of minor punishments, and of fines for drunkenness show a most satisfactory decrease. I attribute much of this improvement to the great attention which has been paid to the subject of temperance in the Army, a work which will be enormously facilitated by the system adopted in the new barracks now being constructed. Much also may be due to the excellent work being done by the ministers of religion, the vast importance of which may be judged, not only from its effect within the Army itself, but from the fact that its influence must be felt in the localities to which our time-expired soldiers return. I have endeavoured to deal as comprehensively as I could with almost all the points that have been raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Preston. No doubt there are some points of great importance which I have not touched upon, but which I shall be prepared to deal with in Committee. As we are substantially agreed that some changes and improvements in the terms of the soldier's employment are desirable, and that they should be carried out so soon as they have, upon inquiry, been clearly established, I hope it may not be thought necessary to put the House to the trouble of a Division. We wish to deal with perfect fairness with this matter, while recognising that, as trustees of the public, we should not make any increases in the pay or allowances without adequate proof that it is required by the condition of the labour market, and being agreed on the substantial point, that we must do justice to the claims of the soldier. I trust the House may not be put to a Division, but that, after hearing what I hope may be regarded as a frank statement from me, the Resolution of my hon. Friend may be withdrawn and we may be allowed to go into Committee.

Mr. E. Stanhope

Mr. E. Stanhope

*(7.38.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I presume that after the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman this Debate will not be long continued, but I wish to express my opinion that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman will, I think, not only be regarded as eminently satisfactory by the House, but by the public outside. It may, perhaps, be said that the right hon. Gentleman takes the usual official optimistic view of the whole matter. A little optimism is not unwholesome as an antidote to the pessimism which prevails on Army matters in quarters where military questions are largely discussed—in clubs and in military and other newspapers. The right hon. Gentleman has shown that he is not deaf to many of the complaints that have been brought forward, and that he is anxious to do what is possible to meet such of them as are well-founded. Now, there are only three ways practically in which we can hope to improve the quality of the men attracted to the Army and offer greater inducements to men of a more suitable character and qualification. We may alter the terms of enlistment, we may increase the pay, or we may improve the conditions and comfort of the Service. Now, the terms of enlistment, so far as they affect the Service of the country, cannot, I believe, be very much altered. My idea is, and I believe the opinion of most authorities on the subject, at all events of the more moderate school, is that as we have a voluntary Army, no man should have the idea while he is serving in the Army that he is a prisoner, and has to look forward to a long period of service against his will. There ought to be, and there are at different stages, opportunities afforded for a soldier either to leave the colours and go into the Reserve, or remain with the colours, according as his inclination prompts him. That I believe to be the principle which ought to be maintained. In his Report the Inspector of Recruiting points out that men were occasionally lost to the Foot Guards owing to the terms of the original enlistment being restricted to three years with the colours, and that His Royal Highness with the concurrence of the Secretary of State had decided that recruits for the Foot Guards should have the option of enlisting for three or seven years colour service. The Commanding Officers were directed to ascertain from the recruit, before final approval, that the period for which he had contracted was what he really desired; if not the attestation was to be altered. Since the date of that order there have been 621 enlistments in the brigade, of which 193, or 31 per cent., have elected to take seven years' service with the colours. I quote this as an instance of the kind of arrangement which appears to me to suit best our voluntary system. When only 31 per cent. of the Guards elect to serve for the longer period, and the rest prefer to begin with the shorter period, it is obvious that short service has certain attractions of its own. With regard to the common assertion of the extreme youth of our soldiers, I should like to call attention to certain figures in the Annual Returns which show that whilst in 1871, the year following the introduction of short service, and, therefore, not yet affected materially by it, there were in every 1,000 men 190 under the age of 20 and 320 over 30, in 1890 there were only 147 under 20 and 101 over 30. Military experience shows that from 20 to 30 is the best period of a soldier's life, and that it is not desirable to have in the ranks too many over 30. The returns therefore show that the proportion of men at the best ages is better than it was 20 years ago. As to the expediency of increasing the pay of the Army, the right hon. gentleman has pointed out the objection to an inconsiderate adoption of that proposal. Wages throughout the country may rise and fall, but you can never go back when you have once increased the pay of the men in the Army. It may be that a case could be made out for increasing that pay, but it is a thing to be done only in the last resort. The right hon. Gentleman is taking a judicious course in instituting an inquiry as to deferred pay. It is certainly desirable that when a man retires from the colours he should have something in his pocket, so that he may not be launched into civil life without resources. If there were no deferred pay men would be tempted to remain in the Service on account of the dismal prospect immediately before them on leaving the colours; but as it is there are no fewer than 71,000 men in the First Class Army Reserve. That shows what a very serious addition is now made to the fighting strength of the Army, and we ought not to do anything which would artificially stop the tendency of the Reserve to increase. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) suggested that we should abolish deferred pay at once and increase the pay of the Army, but the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) said one of the grievances of the Army is the constant change to which they are subjected, and how much would a man's position be altered if he found his deferred pay suddenly taken away from him? It is quite obvious that with regard to the men now serving you must hold to the bargain of deferred pay, and you cannot deprive them of the advantages you covenanted to give them when they joined the Service. If, therefore, you forthwith increase the pay you will unfortunately, as has happened in so many cases, have the expense of the two systems overlapping each other. It is, however, possible to do much, and I am glad so much has been done, to improve the treatment of the soldiers in respect of food, clothing, and barrack accommodation. The Army might also be made more popular by mitigating the excessively irritating discipline which has prevailed. We must remember that nowadays we are not taking into the Army, thank goodness, men of the same sort as formerly filled it, but men of a better class. They are men of better education than formerly, because everybody is more or less educated now; they have a better idea of themselves and of their own dignity than their predecessors had; and they will not willingly submit to the petty and unreasonable restraints of old times, which are extremely irritating and do no good to any one. A great deal has been done in the way of reducing the number of petty offences visited with punishments, which caused much discontent; and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will proceed further in the same direction, and will as much as possible mitigate the discipline of the Army, remembering that the soldier is nowadays a reasonable, educated, self-respecting man. There is not much to be said after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, but I am sure the House may anticipate the best results from the inquiries he has instituted.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

(7.54.) SIR W. BARTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I am extremely glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Preston has brought the subject of recruiting before the House. I give my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War credit for all he has done in the interest of the Army, especially in connection with the new barracks he is building all over the country, and I was glad to hear from him what he proposes to do with regard to the fitting up of those barracks. But I think I may say that my right hon. Friend has hardly gone into the one great difficulty under which we labour at present. The most important question of all is not pay or barrack accommodation, but the class of men we get, and the danger we are exposed to on account of their rawness, youth, and inexperience. I should like to know whether the Return respecting the ages of non-commissioned officers included those who have gone from the Army into the Militia. We have heard from all quarters how young the modern non-commissioned officers are, and how much less respected they are than was the case in former days. I think my right hon. Friend will not deny that if there had been more experienced non-commissioned officers in the second battalion of the Grenadier Guards we should have been spared the unfortunate events of a few months ago. In our First Army Corps I wonder how many recruits there are at this moment who would be unfit to be put in line of battle.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I have here the Return from Lord Dundonald as regards non-commissioned officers, and I see it refers to non-commissioned officers of each rank "at present serving with the colours."

SIR W. BARTELOT: Well, that is, if correct, a very satisfactory Return. The 2nd battalion of the Rifle Brigade some year and a half or two years ago passed over 1,000 men through its ranks in two years to supply the wants of the three other battalions of the brigade then serving abroad. This is a very serious state of things. How, under such circumstances, is my right hon. Friend to keep up the Army at home in an efficient state and be able to put his 1st and 2nd Army Corps into the field without sending out young and inefficient men? I venture to hope that when my right hon. Friend makes his statement we shall hear something very satisfactory on this point. That is the point to which the country is looking. War may come upon us at any moment, and we should have our army ever ready and fit to undertake any duty it may be called upon to perform. (8.0.)

(8.30.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I do not in any way wish to minimise the importance of the questions brought before the House this evening, nor do I fail to recognise the great ability of the right hon. Gentleman who has laid his views before us in a speech of such force and importance, but I cannot but carry my mind back a little way and remember how Army Debates were carried on a few years ago. I remember that we used to come down to the House and, on the Motion that you, Sir, do leave the Chair, we were allowed to have an open night, so to speak. Everyone was allowed to talk at large, and as much as he pleased about military matters. But now, Amendments are put down on the Paper, and if a Member does not happen to be sharp enough to get one down, he is tied down to a specific Motion, and until that is disposed of with other Amendments after it, he is unable to bring on that particular matter in which he is specially interested. I am bound to say I think the old plan was a good one, as it enabled us—to use a familiar expression—to blow off a certain amount of steam, which, if confined for too long a period during the Session, is wont to lead to a violent explosion when we get into Committee. Those who have had considerable experience in the House know that the uncertainties of these occasions are disconcerting to private Members, and that Members are inclined somewhat to accentuate their views when they have the opportunity of dealing with the Votes in Supply. The particular Votes on which they wish to speak they find put down for inconvenient times, and very often they are away—sometimes in bed—when the items in which they are interested are reached. I recognise to the full the ability of the hon. Member who brought this Motion before the House. I think this Amendment most important and most opportune, because reading between the lines I think we cannot but regard General Roche's Report as to recruiting with alarm. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that a little too much has been made of the question of recruiting at the present moment. I do not think things just now are as bad as they are painted. General Roche says that the number of recruits for this year is not unsatisfactory, because there are 2,000 more than there were last year. My right hon. Friend opposite read from General Roche's Report the statement that "evidence exists on all sides that the popularity of the Military Service is not on the wane." My right hon. Friend stopped there. He should have gone on a little further, for General Roche proceeds:—"And that eligible recruits would be forthcoming in ample numbers if they could see their way to them," that is to say, if the inducements in the Service were sufficient to enable recruits to come forward, they would come forward as they used to, in the matter not only of numbers, but also of quality. Though things are not so bad as they are painted, General Roche has indicated that there may be dangers in the future, and he thinks the quantity of the recruits and their quality will not be so good in years to come as they have been in the past. The Secretary for War told us that there is great difference in the numbers of recruits engaged in successive years, and no doubt that is the case; but General Roche tells us that the number of recruits wanted next year to complete the regimental strength of the Army will be 34,000 or 35,000. That is a very large number, and that statement should be remembered in considering this question. My right hon. Friend was, I think, somewhat Utopian in his views when he came to consider the present condition of things, and no doubt it is well to be so, taking a full official standpoint; but I am bound to say he was successful in attempting to show that the condition of the private soldier is really better than that of the agricultural labourer. However, notwithstanding these Utopian ideas, there have been some practical points brought before us by the hon. Gentleman who introduced the question which are worthy of consideration, and I agree that we should regard the matter from three points of view—as affecting the recruit, as affecting the soldier, and as affecting the retired Reserve man. I have always taken an interest in the question of rations, and I would go into it now mainly from the point of view of the recruit. I think the Secretary for War a little minimised the importance of the point brought before us by the hon. Member for Preston, and the quotation he made from so eminent a soldier as Sir Frederick Roberts, when he said that the recruit was, to a certain extent, deceived when he entered the Army as to this question of rations. It is all very well to argue in a metaphysical way that a free ration means a free ration up to a certain point; but from the way it is put by the recruiting sergeant to the man who is thinking of entering the Army there can be no doubt that the idea the recruit has is that he is to get his food absolutely free. The Secretary for War tells us that the recruit has the means at hand of informing himself on the subject; but how can a comparatively uneducated agricultural youth gather the necessary information from a pamphlet of the very existence of which he is unaware? The information a recruit gets on entering the Army is that which is conveyed to him by the recruiting sergeant, and I am speaking from authentic information when I say that the recruiting sergeant gives the information, I will not say in a dishonest manner, but in a manner best suited to his own interest, and the recruit receives the impression that he is to have his food free. If anyone in this House doubts that statement let him do what the enterprising journalists do nowadays; let him put on an old suit of clothes and go to a recruiting station and let him be recruited there or get into conversation with a recruiting sergeant. He will then find what the inducements held out to the recruits to enter the Service are, and I will undertake to say that he will be of opinion that the representations made to him are such as would lead an uncultivated agricultural labourer to believe that he was about to receive free food. Of course, when the recruit joins the Service the illusion vanishes, and the result is great disappointment and dissatisfaction when the man finds that the food he expected to get free of cost has to be largely paid for by himself. This is a fruitful source of desertion, the men feeling that they have been "done." The recruiting sergeant has a direct incentive to securing a recruit, for he gets for a militiaman, 2s. 6d., for a linesman, 5s., for a foot guardsman, 10s., and, if he is fortunate enough to bag a brace of "blues," £5—or £2 10s. in each case—slip gently into his pocket. Therefore, the object of the recruiting sergeant is to bring down his man; and I dare say, although he puts the matter to the recruit textually and literally accurately, the recruit receives a false impression as to the terms on which he is entering the Army. Another point which has been noticed by one or two Members is the food of the soldier generally; and here I am glad to be able to offer my meed of praise and approval to the Secretary for War for what he has done, especially in the direction of improving the meat and the bread rations. I think it was a good thing to appoint a Committee, and I think that up to a certain point the recommendations of that body were thoroughly practical. They do not, however, go far enough, and if we could only get something to bridge that terrible gap between the dinner one day and the breakfast next morning the state of things would be much more satisfactory. And, I think, in this matter, the question is much more important as affecting the recruit than as affecting the grown-up soldier. The latter, no doubt, has enough food, but the recruit has not enough, seeing that he is growing in all his tissues, and in his case it is hard to give difficult and anxious work to do and not allow him enough food. I do not like the principle of giving the recruit money in place of food. He is mostly surrounded by persons who like to meet with a lad with money in his pocket, and the result is that he is more apt to spend his money in drink and amusement than in food, and to suffer in health and ruin his constitution. I think it would be an advantageous thing if arrangements could be made by which, at any rate, the recruits could be supplied with more food of a nourishing kind. Many other questions have been raised in the course of the Debate. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs has pointed out that it would be desirable to relax many of the irritating restrictions of discipline which press hardly on the soldier. You must remember that the working classes have different ideas of labour and independence to those they used to have, and they do not like being bullied as school boys. I think, therefore, it would be found in the long run that a relaxation of the restrictions would lead to economy. Formerly a soldier had a career before him, but that is no longer the case. He is turned out into the world when he has perhaps got into rather idle habits, and he finds it difficult to secure employment. I think, therefore, that the Government should endeavour to confine certain occupations to ex-soldiers such as work in the Post Office and in small Departments of other Government offices. Employers make some difficulty in giving work to Reserve men. We cannot, in the matter of pay, compete with the labour market; but, although we have increased the soldier's pay by 4d. a day, the improvement in the labour market has been greater. A shilling a day is very poor terms for a man going to be killed or to be sent to a bad climate. I think we must make our terms somewhat better; but I admit that if we propose to make any substantial addition to the Estimates—say to the extent of an increase of 6d. per day—we shall be met with an uncompromising opposition. I have no doubt the Committee that has been promised may do something to suggest a remedy although I do not know that it can do much to improve the position of the soldier. Abroad the status of the soldier is much better than it is in Great Britain, where he is frequently snubbed and treated as if the Army were composed of nothing but ne'er-do-wells. I hope that the feeling against the soldier will pass away, and, with the many improvements the right hon. Gentleman has made, and those he will make in the future, I have no doubt recruiting will much improve and the condition of the Army will become much better. I would direct the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the very bad accommodation there is at St. George's Barracks for the examination of recruits. The room in which the examination has to be made is much too small and the premises altogether are very unsuitable for the purpose. I thank the right hon. Gentleman for what he has said to night, and what he proposes to do, and I have no doubt, after the right hon. Gentleman's statement, the hon. Member for Preston will withdraw his Motion.

Dr. Farquharson

(8.52.) GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): I think my hon. Friend the Member for Preston has done good service in calling attention to this subject. I am one of those who consider that the soldier at the present moment is altogether underpaid. This is proved by the fact that we do not get all the recruits we want, and that those we do get are not of the stamp we require. I shall not be satisfied until the position of the private soldier in this country is that it is the envy of everybody who is not a soldier. You are supposed to be very particular with the physique of your men, and the fact that 47 per cent. of those who enlist are rejected shows a very lamentable prevalence in this country of people who are not fit to be soldiers. Soon after I entered this House I drew attention to the fact that a soldier had been prevented riding in an omnibus because he was in uniform. I want to see that feeling pass away and to see the uniform respected by everybody. The best way to get the uniform respected is to induce the best class of men to enter the Service. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) that recruits are better educated now than they were formerly, but of course the whole population is better educated. There must be something wrong, however, when there is a falling off in the number of recruits. What is wrong very likely the Committee about to be appointed will ascertain; and I have no doubt that some little hitches in the administration will be amended in consequence of the Report which the Committee will present. I also agree with the right hon. Gentleman opposite that there are some irritating regulations which had better be done away with. The question of the soldiers' old clothing ought to be considered and dealt with. The original reason why the soldier was not allowed to keep his old clothing was that he was very likely upon his discharge to wander about the country wearing his old uniform, and being practically in the condition of a pauper. That reason does not apply, however, to the time when a man is serving with the colours.

Dr. Farquharson

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I may point out that every commanding officer may keep the uniform as long as he likes.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY: I am glad to hear that statement, and I think the permission thus accorded to commanding officers ought to be acted upon in all cases. With regard to the rations, it was the unanimous opinion of the Committee that the soldier had enough to eat if the proper regulations were carried out; but of course the carrying out of proper regulations is the difficulty, and it needs constant vigilance on the part of everybody to see that they are satisfactorily acted upon. My hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) spoke of esprit de corps. Of course, under the present system you cannot have the same esprit de corps as was possible in old days, when the trumpeters in a regiment were the sons and perhaps the grandsons of men who had been in the same regiment before them. You must, however, do your best to encourage esprit de corps. With regard to drink being supplied to the men from the sergeants' mess, I may say I have known instances of it myself, and I am glad the question has not escaped attention. I must compliment the Secretary for War upon all he has done for the Army. He has improved the position of the private soldier very materially, although all his improvements have not yet come into operation. To my mind, with the object of making the Service more popular in the country, both the Army and the Navy should be made the stepping stones to civil appointments. Why cannot you get the telegraph boys to enter into the Army by refusing to allow anyone to act as a telegraph boy unless he promises to enter the Army, and then, when he has served his time in the Army, why should not he pass on to the position of a letter carrier. Having said so much, I have only to express a hope that my hon. Friend will withdraw his Motion.

(9.1.) MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): In expressing my agreement with the Motion of the hon. Member for Preston, I desire to call attention to one matter which I think deserves the serious consideration of the right hon. Gentleman the head of the War Department. I refer to the billeting system which is adopted in this country, and in regard to which I think our soldiers deserve more generous treatment. I am told by an innkeeper who sometimes has soldiers billeted upon him that when he has found them their beds he has also to find them their breakfasts, but that he has to find the breakfasts out of his own pockets, otherwise the soldiers would go away without any breakfast at all. I think the House will agree with me that this is a very bad system, as it is very undesirable that our soldiers should have to start upon a long march without any food in their stomachs. It is the want of proper food which is the fruitful cause of intemperance in the Army, and I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War does not wish to see intemperance encouraged among our soldiers. The War Office ought at least to make some arrangement by which the men who are billeted in this way should have at least a cup of tea or coffee and some bread and butter. Another point on which I wish to say a word is with reference to the difficulty experienced by the soldier with regard to promotion. Under the present system promotion from the ranks is practically barred. The men are allowed to rise to a certain point in their stripes; and although it is now allowable for them to receive commissions, it is very seldom that promotion from the ranks is carried as far as that. From a Return for which I moved in this House of the number of promotions that have been made from the ranks, I find that during the last five years in one case six commissions were given in a particular regiment, and that in other regiments only one commission had been conferred. I say that this is not enough, and that greater inducements ought to be held out to men who join the Army. There are many good men who would not mind roughing it for a few years in the ranks if they felt that they were almost certain to reach the higher grades of the Service in the long run. The hon. and gallant Member for Hammersmith, who has just spoken, has suggested that both the Army and Navy might be made the means of advancement to posts in the Civil Service, but for my part I am opposed to the taking away of men from the Army and putting them in Civil Service employment. If they are to be promoted they ought to find that promotion in the Service to which they belong, and I think the hon. and gallant Members who are best acquainted with that Service will bear me out in saying that we have no better officers in our Army than those who have had their early training in the ranks. I think that if these two grievances were removed — if the men were better fed and were offered better prospect of promotion the difficulties we now experience in obtaining recruits will at once disappear. We are all under an obligation to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War for the steps he has already taken in the direction of ameliorating the position of a soldier, and I trust he will also take into consideration the suggestions I have just ventured to make.

*(9.9) GENERAL C. FRASER (Lambeth, N.): In my opinion it is very desirable that the present momentous condition of the recruiting question should lead to longer service. At the present time, just as a man has become a capable soldier, he is turned out into the world with no choice. I think that this is a mistake, and that a longer period of service would prove a useful remedy. I am very glad to hear that the War Office is about to institute an inquiry into the state of the Reserve, and I trust that it may lead to beneficial results.

*(9.10.) COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince): We seem now to have arrived at a very critical period in recruiting for the Army. We approach within a few hundreds the total Reserve anticipated by Mr. Cardwell, namely, 60,000 men, and I am glad to hear that there is to be an inquiry into the recruiting system. We have had opportunities of testing, among other things, the effect of our present system upon troops on foreign service. The number of men on that service is very large, there being about 70,000 men in India, and I think the system is one which requires alteration. At present a man enlists in the Line for seven years with the colours and five with the Reserve. A man who remains in the Army for seven years has been divorced so long from his habit of labour that when he returns to civil employment he is not able to earn his living at his own employment, as he would have done had he remained in civil life. I was one who advocated short service before it was adopted—and if our Service was a Home Service, like that of Germany, a short service Army would suffice; but I think we must meet the double obligation here. I think that a man should enlist, for instance, for two or three years. After having been in the Service for six months, he should have the opportunity of adopting the Service. After serving with the colours 12 years, instead of serving the remaining nine years, he should be allowed to serve double that period in the Reserve, in order to obtain a pension. Any man in the Reserve should be allowed to re-enlist for general service and go to India. I have found men in the Reserve perfectly capable and of the age desirable in India, and yet they are men who cannot be enlisted for Indian service. I strongly urge that these questions should be considered by the Committee. I think it is probable that some recruits are deluded by the advertisement which is issued; but hon. Members have also to consider the recruiting sergeant, who is sometimes a man of resource, and puts a gloss upon the poster. Sometimes recruiting is stopped at many stations; and I have heard it said that this is very objectionable. As to the standard height for recruits, the standard of the Grenadier Guards over many years, though often above it, has been 5ft. 8in. as a rule. The standard of the Line must have been in early times 5ft. 6in.; but 5ft. 3in. for the Line is not a proper height for a soldier of the British race. He is too small, and is not really a well-developed man. That is a point which I think ought to be looked into in considering this recruiting question. We not only want numbers, but we want men of good average physique.

General C. Fraser

*(9.14.) MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I have many soldiers amongst my constituents, and I approve the Motion brought forward by my hon. Friend. I have often heard that recruits say they have been mistaken in the terms of their engagement, which was 1s. a day and free rations, as they believed. But when they entered the Army they found that the rations consisted of 1 lb. of bread and $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of meat, including bone. Although the bread may be sufficient, healthy men do not think $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of meat weighed with the bone is enough except for one meal. No doubt the men get a good dinner in the middle of the day. I have been at their messes and seen the dinners cooked, and I think that where the officers do their duty and see that the men have what is allowed under the Regulations, this meal is sufficient. Having had their dinner, they reserve a small portion of their bread for their tea, which they have to pay for themselves. Out of the 1s. a day at least 3d. a day goes for their groceries and vegetables. They are left with 9d. But there are various stoppages, such as, for instance, if they damage their clothes; so that the soldier is left with a very small amount per diem. After the men have had their tea, they have to go from 4 o'clock to 8 o'clock the next morning without food, and then they are provided with a scanty breakfast. That is far too long to go without food. We have a number of very young men in the Army, and they require more food than the older soldiers, who have become accustomed to the régime, though, I am sorry to say that a good many of them do not feel hunger so much because they drink more than the young soldiers. The young soldiers make great complaints, and they hope that the Government will give them something in the way of a free tea in the afternoon. I do not pretend to say that this would not cost the country a considerable amount; still, it should be recollected that in all other walks of life, including that of the agricultural labourer, wages have gone up, while for years the soldier has been kept at his 1s. a day and the same quantity of rations. If there has been a falling off in the number of recruits, it must be because the Service is not sufficiently attractive. I do think it would be useful to increase the amount of food given to the men.

MAJOR RASCH: May I ask the Secretary for War whether he will include in the inquiry to be made the case of Reserve and discharged soldiers?

MR. E. STANHOPE: It would be inconvenient to discuss that point before we get into Committee. I have no right to answer that question now; perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to answer it in Committee.

MR. HANBURY: The right hon. Gentleman has not only done so much for the soldier, but he promises to do so much more, that I do not think it would be fair to him to press this Amendment. I, therefore, beg leave to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question again proposed.

RANGE ACCOMMODATION.

*(9.20.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I rise to call attention to the immense difficulty Her Majesty's regiments of the Standing Army, the Militia, and the Volunteers stationed in the large towns of Great Britain have in finding adequate range accommodation to fulfil the requirements of the authorities in rifle shooting; and to move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider whether the compulsory acquisition of land for this purpose, either by the Government or Local Authorities, is not essential to adequate preparation for the National Defence."

This Motion is, I am afraid, of a very much less interesting character than that which we have just been discussing, still, it is one of very considerable importance to the training of the Army, the Militia, and Volunteers of England. No troops can be considered properly trained to their duties unless they are trained every year in the use of the rifle. In the case of the Standing Army, there is usually ground available in the neighbourhood of the quarters of the troops. For the Volunteers the case is different. The shooting time of the Volunteers is usually restricted to a chance half-holiday, which very often falls upon a wet day, or at a time when our foggy climate makes shooting impossible. Then the Volunteer has often to travel long distances to the ranges, which makes the matter still more difficult, besides adding to the difficulty of earning the Capitation Grant. Take the case of the Metropolis. I have here a return of the number of ranges in and about London. I find that of the 22, no less than eight have been recently closed as dangerous, others are subject to floods, while many of them are closed for a month, at the very time the Volunteers can use them, for the purpose of hay-making. The rents of all ranges in and about London are enormous, and the tenure is most insecure. And what applies to London I believe holds good of all the large towns of the country. It is true that there are ranges at from 19 to 30 miles from London, but it takes a long time to reach them. I ought also to mention that efforts are being made to acquire a range at Staines, 15 miles from London. Whether those efforts will be successful is doubtful, but the Volunteers are none the less grateful to those who are making them. The regiment which I have the honour to command has five ranges, and the rent they have to pay is far more than they can properly afford, for one day a week. I have had correspondence on this matter with commanding officers in every part of the country, and every one of them dwells on the great difficulties experienced with regard to ranges. Colonel Methuen, of Bristol, states that the Volunteer range there has just been destroyed by a Railway Company, and he says there is no possibility of obtaining another in the vicinity. The new magazine rifle is to be issued, and before the Committee on this subject last year, Sir Redvers Buller, the present Adjutant General of the Forces, said that quite half of our present ranges would be useless for the new rifle, and that evidence is strongly corroborated by Major Waller of the Royal Engineers. He was asked this question—"The Volunteers have great difficulties with the ranges, have they not?" "So great," was the answer, "that for class firing men have sometimes 40 or 50 miles to go to fire ten rounds of cartridges." It is quite unnecessary for me to press the point. I would only ask the Secretary for War, who has done so much for soldiers and Volunteers, to give his serious and anxious attention to this matter, and appoint either a Select or Departmental Committee. So rapidly does building and population increase that the longer this matter is delayed the greater will be the cost; and so long as this House recognises the maintenance of a Volunteer Force the means must be provided for giving it proper training. I beg, therefore, to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to consider whether the compulsory acquisition of land for range accommodation, either by the Government or Local Authorities, is not essential to adequate preparation for the National Defence,"—(Mr. Howard Vincent),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(9.28.) COLONEL LAURIE (Bath): Mr. Speaker, I beg to second the Amendment; and I would remind the House that one of the conditions imposed upon Volunteers is that they shall undergo target practice. Three years ago, when the new regulations were issued, the Volunteers were severely affected, especially in the Metropolis; and I find, according to the Memorandum of the right hon. Gentleman, that the number of Volunteers has decreased by 3,000. That decrease is attributed in some degree to the retirement of the older and less energetic men. But that is a course which has operated all along, and the number has been filled up by the recruits always to hand. I attribute the diminution to the difficulty of getting ranges, more especially in London. The time of the Militia, when they are out, is entirely at the disposal of the Military Authorities. Volunteers are only able to utilise an occasional half-holiday to go to some range, often having to cover a distance of 20 or 30 miles. It is extremely hard on the officers. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will carefully consider this appeal of my hon. Friend, and will be able to see his way to obtain ranges, especially in the neighbourhood of London. With respect to the financial part of the matter, I think the amount which the Volunteers already pay for ranges should be taken into consideration. Surely the very heavy expense might be taken into consideration of the Government assisting in finding the necessary money. I believe I am right in saying that the diminution in the strength of the Force, especially in urban districts, is due to the want of ranges. I am sorry we have not the Volunteer Returns before us, and I do appeal to the Secretary for War to arrange that in future years the Annual Returns of the Volunteers shall be issued to Members of the House before the Army Estimates are taken.

Mr. Howard Vincent

(9.33.) MR. E. STANHOPE: With regard to the point just mentioned by the hon. Member for Bath that this year the Army Estimates have been brought forward earlier than usual, he will remember that in the public convenience we are taking the Estimates earlier, and it has been impossible to get all the Returns in. Otherwise I quite agree that the Annual Returns of the Volunteers should be presented, if possible, in time for discussion with the Estimates. No doubt they will be ready before we reach the Vote for the Auxiliary Forces. I am very glad that the hon. Member for Sheffield has brought this Motion before the House, for I fully appreciate the importance of the question. It is of enormous importance both to the Regular Army and the Volunteers. Difficulties exist in many places in finding suitable ranges, and therefore any suggestions which can be made to overcome those difficulties will be welcomed. At the same time, I am not prepared to admit that there is any difficulty in the law in reference to the acquisition of land for ranges; it may be obscure, but I believe the law does provide means by which sites may be obtained compulsorily by the War Office, both for the Regular Army and the Volunteers. Nor am I prepared to admit that it is the duty of the War Office to provide the necessary funds for ranges for all the Auxiliary Forces in all parts of the country. At the same time, I fully recognise that the subject requires investigation, and that it would undoubtedly be a great advantage if the various difficulties connected with it could be inquired into by a Select Committee, who might make suggestions of great value, and thus assist Parliament to deal with the whole matter in a satisfactory manner. In these circumstances, although I am not prepared to accept the Motion on the Paper, I shall be very glad to consult with the hon. Member for Sheffield at a later period as to the terms of a Motion to be placed on the Notice Paper asking the House to appoint a Select Committee, and with that understanding I hope the discussion will not be continued.

(9.36.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I am very glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield put this Motion down, for the matter is one of urgent importance and it is satisfactory that the Secretary for War should receive it in so favourable a spirit. The difficulty of securing ranges is by no means confined to the Metropolis; it exists all over the country, and seriously affects the efficiency of the Auxiliary Forces. I have three rifle ranges on my own property and I am glad to give what facilities I can; but, at the same time, any arrangements I may make are liable to be upset by any old woman who is going along the road and is afraid she may be hit by a bullet. I think, of course, it is necessary the Military Authorities should take the necessary precautions for the safety of the public, but too much weight should not be given to alarmist views by local people. At present, moreover, a very heavy tax in connection with ranges is imposed on Volunteer officers, and I think they should be relieved of it, to some extent at least, by the State, as ranges are necessary to enable the men to make themselves efficient.

*(9.40.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): As a Volunteer officer who has suffered from this difficulty I should like in a very few words to thank my right hon. Friend for the reception he has given to this Resolution. The force was greatly inconvenienced last year by the closing of our local range. The result is that much inconvenience and expense are caused to Volunteers who are obliged to go to ranges at a long distance. It should be remembered that ranges become dangerous, not only from not being of sufficient length, but from the lateral deviation of bullets which strike the ground before reaching the target. Under the circumstances, I would suggest that the Committee to be appointed on the subject should inquire also into the possibility of providing short ranges for recruits, who might be able to fire at short distances with small charges, and thus learn the elements of shooting before going to the long ranges. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give this matter favourable consideration.

(9.42.) SIR H. FLETCHER (Sussex, Lewes): As Vice Chairman of the National Rifle Association, I feel deep interest in this question, and I think the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War is well advised in consenting to full inquiry into it. With the permission of the House, I will point out the facilities which the Association are prepared to offer to the Volunteers. The Association are prepared to receive applications from Metropolitan and Home County Volunteer Corps for the use of certain targets at Bisley throughout the year 1891, excepting during the time when preparation is being made for the annual meeting and when the ground is being cleared after the meeting. They propose, also, to provide targets available for both class firing and match shooting, with 20 third-class targets and 24 first- or second-class targets. Those ranges have lately been extended to 300 and 800 yards respectively. The Council of the Association propose to allow class firing up to 300 yards at the 90-target butt, and field firing will be allowed on the long-range ground. Sleeping accommodation will be provided in the huts and barracks at nominal charges. Shelter contiguous to the ranges will be provided in the event of bad weather. It has been arranged that railway third-class return fares from Waterloo or Vauxhall to Brookwood shall be 1s. 6d., and the London and South-Western Railway Company have agreed to endeavour to give a more satisfactory service. The Council have also decided on the following rates of charges, which, however, will be re-considered if they prove either insufficient or excessive:—One ordinary target (class match or volley firing), for a whole day, 9s. with markers and 6s. without; for a half-day (forenoon or afternoon), 5s. with markers, 3s. without. Any pattern target will be supplied on due notice being given. The National Rifle Association is doing everything to encourage the Metropolitan Volunteer Corps to go down to Bisley. Barrack accommodation will be afforded at the rate of 9d. a night, and furnished rooms can be obtained at 2s. 6d. a night. Ordinary food and refreshments will be obtainable at reasonable rates, and arrangements have been made for the provision of ammunition on the ground. Regiments intending to fire any portion of their allowance at Bisley can have such portion delivered to the National Rifle Association at Bisley on intimating the same on their annual indent. Ammunition so received at Bisley will be stored in a suitable magazine, and will be ready for issue on the ground as required. As one who has been a Volunteer for over 30 years, and Vice Chairman of the National Rifle Association for a great part of that time, I can say that the Association have endeavoured to carry out not only the suggestions of the hon. Member for Sheffield, but also the suggestions of the Secretary of State for War, in endeavouring to provide suitable ranges from 300 to 800 yards for those who wish to go down to Bisley, which, after all, is not very far from London.

Sir H. Fletcher

(9.48.) MR. BRODRICK: The discussion has been extremely valuable, if only on account of the announcement which the hon. and gallant Member for Sussex has been able to make. Yet it must be remembered that these facilities offered to Metropolitan Volunteers have only been rendered possible by an Act of Parliament, allowing the roads to be stopped where necessary. I desire to emphasise that fact, as it bears directly on the Motion of the hon. Member for Sheffield, and shows how the needs of other localities may be met. With regard to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Preston, although it is most important that ranges of full distance should be made available where possible, the Secretary for War will be ready to consider, in cases where this is not possible, the practicability of some such arrangements for short ranges as has been suggested.

(9.50.) GENERAL SIR F. FITZ-WYGRAM (Hants, Fareham): I have always been of opinion that, after men have been through their musketry training, all shooting should be at unknown ranges, and before shooting the men should run at least 100 yards at full speed. In war everything is bustle and haste, and those who have learned to shoot in the tranquil atmosphere of Wimbledon would not, I think, fare so well on active service. The proposal that rifle practice should be carried on with a small-bore rifle in a room simply reduces rifle practice to a perfect absurdity.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question again proposed.

THE MAGAZINE RIFLE.

(9.51.) MR. MARJORIBANKS : I do not think the right hon. Gentleman opposite will grumble if I ask leave to refer for a few moments to the subject which the House discussed at some length a few days ago. There are very few subjects in which the House of Commons should take a more keen interest than the question of a complete re-armament of the Forces of the country with an entirely new weapon. The House of Commons is in duty bound to do all that it can to insure to the soldiers and sailors not only as good an arm as can possibly be obtained, but an arm which is unequalled by that of any other country. This is not too much to ask, seeing that England is the first country in the world in regard to the manufacture of small arms, and if we cannot turn out a better weapon than any other country we have no right to the position we now hold in regard to gun-making among the nations of the world. The House is specially interested in this question also, because it is the guardian of the public purse; and when such a change of weapon is effected, at a cost of many millions to the country, the House is bound to secure that the weapon selected shall be one that is, while really effective, of not too expensive a character. Since the last Debate on the subject I have had the opportunity of examining many rifles, and within the last two or three days I have had placed in my hands the rifle which has been just adopted by the Belgian Government. It is the latest form of the Mauser rifle. As the hon. and gallant Member for Galway will admit, the rifle is a very taking weapon in appearance. It is of very ingenious construction, quick-loading, and simple. The Secretary for War has again and again stated that the contract price for the British rifle as supplied by private firms in the country is £5 10s. I am in a position to give the exact contract into which the Belgian Government has entered for a supply of 150,000 of the new pattern Mauser from a private company in Belgium. The price is 81½f., including bayonet and sheath. The bare allowance for these accessories is 5½f., thus reducing the actual cost of the rifle to 76f., or practically £3. This price covers all the patent rights, and, further, out of this contract the company expect to recoup themselves for £112,000 expended in fitting up the new machinery for the manufacture of the rifle. The weapon is very much less complicated than the Lee rifle. The number of processes necessary for its manufacture is about 700, as against 1,600 in the British rifle. I do not wish to raise again the question that has been debated by the House, and I intend loyally to accept the decision which the House came to on that occasion. But I think the House has some right to feel that the Committee who selected the Lee-Enfield rifle were very much enamoured of the offspring of their own brain. Really a service is being rendered to the right hon. Gentleman and to his colleagues in stiffening them a little against accepting as absolutely correct all the conclusions arrived at by the Small Arms Committee. I will recapitulate some of the principal objections against the Lee rifle. In the first place, the bore is too small, especially because it necessitates the adoption of a bullet with a metal case instead of a simple leaden bullet. The system of rifling, again, though admirably suited to a plain leaden bullet, is not suited for a hard metal-cased bullet. The right hon. Gentleman the other night stated to the House, and very rightly stated, that the bore adopted is approximate to that which has been approved by all foreign Governments. That is true enough, but no foreign nation has adopted the system of rifling selected by this country. The system we have adopted is one in which the bullet is taken by the sharp edges of the grooves, and so is given the necessary spin; but the system adopted by foreign nations is one in which the bullet itself is moulded into the shape of the grooves, and is taken by the flat sides of the grooves. Objections are taken to many of the details of the rifle—to the magazine itself, to the system of the breech action, its complexity and method of working, to the necessity of having two methods of loading, and to many other details. I only refer to them roughly and briefly, but if even a few of the objections urged against the rifle are well founded, it is certain that the decision of the Committee ought to be reviewed. The right hon. Gentleman and his advisers have admitted that, though they have issued and are issuing every week large numbers of Mark I, and have already sent out some 50,000 or 60,000 of them, yet they have decided it is necessary to manufacture a hundred rifles of Mark II., in which changes of a very material character are to be introduced for the purpose of experiment. I do not find fault with that decision. On the contrary, I think it extremely wise and proper; but what I want is that the Government will, at the same time as they make these trials, also make trials of other patterns of magazine rifles. I have been enabled to see many patterns of magazine rifles, but I am not an advocate of any one of them, and no inventor has got hold of me. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman there is an immense number of patterns which in many points resemble the pattern adopted by this country, and from those rifles I think the Government should endeavour to glean improvements for their own rifle. The Mannlicher, the Kruka, and the new pattern of Mauser, adopted by the Belgian Government, for example, in many ways run on the same lines as those of our new magazine rifle. In every one of those rifles there are faults. But they all have good points in which they excel ours. I admit the Government, having adopted a particular pattern, cannot go back upon it, but they can and should make improvements on it. My own view is that to bring these outside weapons into the experiments would be useful from another point of view, as they would supply a standard of comparison with the Government weapon. To take only one point of detail, I believe there can be no doubt the Government rifle can be improved in its method of closing. It requires no great mechanical knowledge to see that if a bolt locks in the breech where the explosion takes place, that form of locking will be stronger than a locking which takes place four or five inches back, as it does in the Government rifle. I think an improvement might be obtained in that respect easily, and without at all changing the system, or necessitating any change in the machinery for making the rifle. I make these suggestions as a well wisher to the War Office, and with the sole desire that the Army and Navy shall have the best possible weapon.

Mr. Marjoribanks

(10.8.) MR. E. STANHOPE: There was one point at least in the right hon. Gentleman's speech with which I can entirely agree—indeed, we are all agreed, in desiring to obtain the best rifle we can. I cannot, however, go so far as to agree with the argument the right hon. Gentleman has addressed to the House with regard to the Belgian rifle based on its price. I do not mean to deny it is an advantage that a rifle should be cheap, but I do not admit that it is possible to make a real comparison between the cost of the Belgian rifle as made in Belgium, and the same rifle if made in England, especially having regard to our requirements as to interchangeability of parts.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I ought to have said the parts of the Belgian rifle are interchangeable.

MR. E. STANHOPE: At any rate, it is very difficult to compare the price of a rifle as made in Belgium with the price of one as made in this country. With regard to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, the Committee which chose the magazine rifle for the British Army did examine every rifle then in existence. It had every single form of magazine rifle before it, with the result that the principles contained in the present rifle were adopted as on the whole best suited for a military weapon. We have gone on improving. We have adopted all sorts of improvements up to the time of manufacture, and we shall not stop. I have no doubt that in a year or two other suggestions will be made tending to a simplification and cheapening of the cost of manufacture, but I cannot undertake to do what the right hon. Gentleman asks. We are going to try Mark II., but to try all other weapons against it would be as much as to say we propose to abandon the rifle and adopt a totally different principle. That is not contended for by the right hon. Gentleman, who is now prepared, partly perhaps because he cannot help himself, to adopt the rifle and adopt improvements to it from foreign weapons. The only effect of adopting the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion would be to throw back the manufacture now being carried on. Before we chose a new rifle we tried the Mauser rifle against it, and we were always trying other weapons. I hope these experiments will lead to improvements which will be to the advantage of the weapon as a whole. I have consulted the Adjutant General of the Army on the point, and he has stated with very great force that of course we cannot aim at finality in these early days of magazine rifles, and if we were to adopt another pattern it would be at least three or four years before the rifle could be issued to the troops. The Adjutant General concluded his Minute with these words—

"This is the satisfactory position we now are in—we confidently believe that in Mark I. we have a good useful military weapon, and that Mark II. will be a thoroughly satisfactory arm in every way."

The Government are willing to submit the weapon to any fair test, but we cannot re-open the question by any fresh experiments, and so delay the general issue of magazine rifles to the Army. While I am willing to make every use of the suggestion made, I cannot consent to re-open the general principle of the weapon which has been adopted.

COAST DEFENCE AND SUBMARINE MINES.

(10.15.) ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I give notice that I intend on the Vote to call attention to the question of fortifications and submarine mines. I find I am unable to do that in the Navy Vote because if my views were carried out there would be an augmentation of that Vote. If, however, these are carried out on this Vote the Vote will be decreased, and therefore I am at liberty to move my Motion. The position I take up is justified by the fact that not only has the Chancellor of the Exchequer lumped the two Services together, but one of the Admiralty officers has said that although we are not building ships we are building forts, as if the one in every way takes the place of the other. I hold that nothing that we can do in the way of fortifications and nothing that the Army can do enables us to reduce the Navy, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer says that he is expending money on the Army and cannot expend it on the Navy, then we must look to some reduction in the Army Vote to augment that for the Navy. In 1801 the Army Vote was £17,750,000, and that for the Navy £17,250,000; that is to say, there was only a difference of £500,000. In the Waterloo year £22,000,000 was voted for the Navy, our population was 16,000,000, and our sea trade £4 per head of the population; now the population is 37,000,000, our sea trade £17 per head, and we have $1\frac{1}{2}$ tons of shipping for every person in the United Kingdom. The value of our sea trade in 1800 was £70,000,000 and now it is £100,000,000,000. In 1890-91, when the area to be protected by the Navy is enormously increased, the gross Army Estimate is £21,000,000, and the gross Navy Vote is only £14,500,000. Attention has been called to this disproportion, not only by naval men, but also by military men; quite recently by no less an authority than Sir D. Jervis, at one time the Inspector General of Fortifications. He was also curiously enough the Secretary of the Commission in 1859 which came to the conclusion that, should the Fleet be unable to keep command of the Channel, our insular position would be at a disadvantage as it would enable a superior Naval Power or Powers to concentrate a large body of troops on another part of our coast more rapidly and secretly than would be done in the case of any neighbouring country having only a land frontier. And they then go on to report that it is necessary either to augment greatly the regular Army or to justify what has taken place. That Commission voted £11,000,000 for fortifications, and by a Return granted last Session, I find that the sum of £17,639,000 has been spent on fortifications, the greater part of which, if not all, are now utterly useless, being more obsolete than the iron-clad ships which were built about that time. If the Vote for the Navy is adequate for the defence of the Kingdom no amount of alternative measures can make good the deficiency. Who is going to land an invading army on our shores? It is known, I suppose, to those who have studied the question that to land 75,000 men on our coast would require 120 transports at least, varying up to 4,000 tons, and having 50 men-of-war to protect them. If such an invasion were to take place, say in the Thames, where there are sands and shoals, and various other impediments, the Fleet would have to be far larger. I ask any gentleman who talks about the invasion of England, is it possible that such a fleet could congregate in any port within reach of England, get up steam and move the troops necessary without our knowing the circumstances well in advance? Such an invasion would require long and careful preparation. Transports would have to come from different ports, and after the commencement of war, it would be our fault if any nation had transports. It is assumed you must either increase the Army or fortify. I have shown that a vast sum has been spent in fortifications. The fortifications at Portsdown have never been finished, and would be useless, and at Devonport and Dover things are equally bad, while at Malta some of the defences are as useless as those which I have seen at Gibraltar, where there is a spot which the engineers say requires a gun, in which no gun has been placed, because it would cost £500 more to place it there than in the place where it has been put. Guns are so placed that vessels with long-range guns could shell Gibraltar without themselves being within shot from the land. With regard to submarine mines, at present naval men dread a zealous engineer. If engineers did nothing, it is quite possible we might get our ships with safety in or out of our ports, but at the present time the whole aim and object of engineers seems to be to block our harbours when rapid egress and ingress would be needed. There are many places here where defences are not needed in the least. At Malta a few ground mines would be sufficient, and at Jamaica the system at present adopted is of little or no use. The latest and most ridiculous, perhaps, of all these submarine entertainments is the attempt to mine across the Severn Mouth where there is a considerable rise and fall of the tide, and where mining operations are dangerous principally to our own vessels. There should be some fixed policy on which these submarine mining operations should be carried out; and I maintain that if there is any mining at all, the scale of defence should be fixed by the Admiralty. If this were done there would be great saving. The Brennan torpedo has been worked on the principle that as a large sum was paid for it, it is necessary to spend more. The ridiculous system of defences for London never should have been undertaken. We are now going to starve the Navy, but the strength of the Navy cannot be reduced by one vessel though all our harbours are sown with torpedoes. I hope the Secretary for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty will take into consideration the transfer of the control of both forts and submarine mines and that being done that some definite system will be adopted for the protection of our coasts, and the defence of our ports by sailors.

Admiral Mayne

*(10.31.) MR. BRODRICK: My hon. and gallant friend has taken the opportunity of making his speech after my right hon. Friend has exhausted his right of reply, and when the time is very far advanced for making the statement which is desired and expected upon the Army Estimates. If it had not been for the extremely ingenious piecing of the hon. and gallant Gentleman nobody would have connected the speech he has just delivered with the Army Estimates. It was in reality a speech in favour of the extension of the Navy. I will only say that, although my hon. and gallant Friend takes such a very low view of the advantages of fortifications, he stands in that opinion, if not in an absolute minority of one, at all events in a position very radically opposed to the vast majority of those who advise the War Office and the Admiralty in these matters. My hon. and gallant Friend says that any amount of fortifications will not enable us to reduce the Navy by a single ship, and I may add to that that with any addition to the Navy there still remains the necessity for fortifying our ports and the access to our dockyards, coaling stations, and arsenals. No naval strength can prevent the danger of bombardment of these places. There never has been the smallest thought of starving the Navy in order to improve the military defences. On the contrary, I think the Army might, if anything, have reason to complain of the enormous amount of attention that has been paid to naval affairs during the present Parliament. What the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said and what has been the tendency of our policy has been to devote to each Service the expenditure required.

ADMIRAL MAYNE: What the Chancellor of the Exchequer said was that £38,000,000 were spent on the two Services and the Government could spend no more.

*MR. BRODRICK: Just so. Upon each the expenditure has been to meet requirements, and if anything the Army might complain of undue expenditure upon the Navy, though I do not put in any such complaint. But I make an appeal to my hon. and gallant Friend. My right hon. Friend is anxious to make his statement. We have to-night had a general discussion on a variety of military topics; and surely if the special discussion which my hon. and gallant Friend has initiated is to be carried on, it should be begun at an early hour of the night, and upon a concrete Motion, upon which we could come to a decision. Surely it is not convenient at a time when no formulated Motion can be put, and it can be but a haphazard, half-hearted discussion. I therefore appeal to my hon. and gallant Friend and to my hon. and gallant Friend who was about to follow him not to continue the discussion at full length, but rather, if they still wish to discuss the matter, to bring it forward on another occasion, when my right hon. Friend can reply to them.

*(10.35.) SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I do not intend to occupy more than a few minutes, but after the speech of the hon. Gentleman I think it is incumbent upon me to point out the real question at issue. The drift and object of my hon. and gallant Friend's remarks went to show that there is included in the Charges coming before us a considerable sum for fortifications, garrisons, and stores for sea coast defences, which should fall within the Navy, and not the Army, Estimates. I think the subject initiated by my hon. and gallant Friend is very germane indeed to the general discussion on the Army Estimates, and I contend that the attitude taken up by the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken is not a proper attitude, though I appreciate his desire to terminate this discussion. The object of my hon. and gallant Friend is to point out that these charges as to sea defences ought to go into the Navy Estimates and not into the Army Estimates. First of all these charges are in some sense for the maintenance of a fleet, and all questions connected with the fleets are naval questions. Secondly, upon the distribution of British commerce depends the distribution of the coal depôts of the fleet and that is another detail of a purely naval character. Again, in the matter of the coaling stations, the coal-carrying capacity of the ships on each station has to be considered as a determining influence on the number and nature of depôts necessary, and that cannot be said to be a question for the War Office. Then the provision for the works and maintenance of a sea base depends upon the probable nature of the attack, and, inasmuch as all these ports can only be attacked by sea, that becomes a question for the Admiralty, not for the War Office. Under the Admiralty we have a body of specially trained officers for work which the War Office insist upon appointing military officers to do. For garrison purposes the War Office control entails the employment of an expensive staff; the Marine Forces under the Admiralty can and does do such duty, at a limited expense, so that, on economical grounds, there is an advantage. Again, the coaling stations abroad are a part of the organisation of naval stations, and under the present system there is a dual control. The Admiral on the station should have control, as he has knowledge of the requirements of the station. With mixed arrangements under the direction of the War Office you get duplication of stores. There is no reason why stores for the defence of coaling stations should not be under naval administration, and instead of the War Office sending special transports you would have unification of stores, economy, and the prevention of confusion. I think that the hon. Gentleman who has rather harshly criticised my hon. and gallant Friend will see that there is a very serious matter involved in this question. In my opinion, my hon. and gallant Friend is entirely justified in bringing the matter before the House on this occasion.

(10.43.) LORD HENRY BRUCE (Wilts, Chippenham): There are certain points in the Memorandum issued by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War upon which I should be glad to have information.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I rise to order. My Memorandum relates to the Army Estimates, and I am perfectly unable, by the rule of Debate, to answer questions now upon the Memorandum. I respectfully submit that questions upon it should be raised in Committee.

*MR. SPEAKER: No doubt it will be more convenient if the observations are made in Committee.

ARMY EXAMINATIONS.

(10.44.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I have a little matter to bring before the attention of the right hon. Gentleman. I have not had the advantage of hearing the whole of the Debate this evening, but I did hear considerable complaint from hon. Gentlemen opposite of the difficulty of obtaining officers. Now, in connection with those complaints, I want to understand why it is that the right hon. Gentleman has decided that Latin shall be a compulsory subject for all students entering Woolwich and Sandhurst. Knowledge of Latin may be valuable, but I think it is infinitely more important that a military officer should know French or German, or, in fact, any modern language rather than Latin. In times gone by this was never a compulsory subject, and, in fact, my hon. and gallant Friend tells me that, though he passed creditably in Latin, it was not a compulsory subject. But the right hon. Gentleman has issued his ukase declaring that Latin shall be a compulsory subject, and why? On account of the Report presented to Parliament last year by the Director General of Military Education, and the demand is based upon the opinion expressed by the Civil Service Commissioners. This change has apparently been made at the suggestion of the Civil Service Commissioners, who say it is "unfair to the public schools" not to make Latin obligatory, because Latin is taught in those schools. Now, I am not one of those who desire to see the Army restricted to the upper classes, and those who receive what is called a classical education and a Latinist is not necessarily a better officer. A thorough knowledge of mathematics, French, German, Italian, and Russian, if you like, is of more value, and a man should not be refused entrance to Woolwich or Sandhurst on the assumption that, not having knowledge of Latin, he is not qualified for the specific training to fit him for an officer. I passed some ten years of my life in learning Greek, but I could not now pronounce a single Greek word, and certainly I could not translate a passage from any Greek author. I have found, if I may venture to say so, that I have increased in wisdom and sense since I devoted myself to other things than Greek. But, seriously, it is a cause of great complaint that Latin is made a compulsory subject, because it shuts out so many young men of the middle classes. We are told that the new regulation is to put public schools upon an equal position with others, but it really gives the boys from public schools a superior position. But the consequence is you have not officers enough. But do away with the absurd regulation, do not yield yourselves bound hand and foot to the masters of the great public schools. In these schools the education of a lad costs at least £100 a year, and generally more, and there is no doubt there are large numbers of young men perfectly eligible for being officers in the Army whose parents cannot afford such an outlay on their sons' education. Take the case of sons of officers. They are brought up in the traditions of the Army, and in all probability would make very good officers. But their parents are on half pay, and cannot afford the heavy outlay for a classical education. They give their sons a good practical education, but then they are told they cannot compete for entrance into the Army. Would it not be infinitely better for an officer to speak French or German than to talk Latin? I have been in various parts of the world, but I have never been addressed in Latin in my life. The only advantage is being able to read classical books, and I cannot say I appreciate that very highly with the miserable knowledge of Latin I possess. This change is really in the interest of the classes, and in order to keep up the aristocratic tone of the Army. But I say you should throw open the Army as wide as possible in accordance with the democratic ideas of the time. I do not wish to take a Division on this matter, but I do wish to call serious attention to it, and I do trust we may have an assurance that this regulation shall be swept away, and that we shall go back to the old system under which Latin was not an obligatory subject.

Sir John Colomb

(10.50.) SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I hoped somebody from the front Bench would have given us a favourable answer. I have a notice on the Paper upon this subject, and I hoped I should find the opportunity of showing the absurdity of the new regulation, but my hon Friend has raised the question in a better manner than I could have done. I thought we had advanced to the extent that we were beyond the reverence for monkish Latin, but now I find the Government taking this retrograde step, and making this concession to the classes and the schools of the classes. There is no doubt that it is hard upon many intending candidates. A certain notice was given, I know, but the matter was forcibly brought to my attention in connection with a particular candidate, an enlightened man, who was preparing for the Army according to modern ideas, but who now finds that entrance is barred from want of knowledge of Latin. Knowledge of Latin may be useful, I admit, if taught in a reasonable manner, but I object to its being made obligatory, especially in the case of military officers who may spend their time so much more usefully learning other subjects of practical utility in their profession. I hope I see indications from the right hon. Gentleman that he means to reply, and I trust we may receive some satisfaction on this point before we reach the Education Vote for the Army.

(10.53.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I have no right to speak again, but as I may be thought to be wanting in courtesy if I do not reply to the hon. Member for Northampton I ask leave of the House to do so. I confess, I never expected to find myself in controversy with the hon. Member on this subject. The question before the House is really one between the crammers and the schools. I represent the schools, the hon. Member the crammers. ["No, no!"] That is the view I take. I am still more surprised to hear the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy decrying Latin, for I have always understood that the children in every middle class school in Scotland are taught Latin.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: We are getting wiser now.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am sorry to hear it. I have always thought that the success of the hon. Member's countrymen in various professions was largely due to their system of education. But seriously let me tell the house our reasons for the step. The fact is, that in 1888 the Civil Service Commissioners reported that the number of successful candidates from the public schools was less than it ought to be, and that Latin not being an obligatory subject, gentlemen who had received a liberal education at public schools were discouraged from competing.

COLONEL NOLAN: No, not discouraged, but given greater advantages.

MR. E. STANHOPE: We are doing our very best to get high scientific acquirements from the officers of the Army, and for that purpose candidates must have a good substratum of a really sound education. For that reason we think that boys educated at public schools ought certainly not to be discouraged.

COLONEL NOLAN: Nor are they.

MR. E. STANHOPE: They are the kind of candidates we want. To meet this state of things it was suggested by the Civil Service Commissioners that Latin should be made one of the obligatory subjects. They pointed out with great force that there was this further advantage that if a boy thus educated failed after examination as a candidate for entrance into the Army he was still well qualified for another profession. We submitted this to the consideration of head masters of public schools, and found they were almost entirely in agreement with the views of the Commissioners. This change has accordingly been made. But I must dispute the suggestion of the hon. Member for Northampton as to this being a change in the interest of the aristocracy. Since I have been at the War Office I have done all I could to make the Army easier of access for poor men. It is desirable that the successful candidates for the Army should have a sound and really liberal education in all subjects in which boys are ordinarily instructed at the present time, because such an education is found to be the best foundation for that technical training which Army officers now require. It is said that this change will handicap boys who are educated abroad. That will not wholly be a disadvantage, for a boy intended for the Army will be all the better for being educated in England and under English traditions than in a foreign school. That being so, I have laid down the regulation which I believe will be for the advantage of the Service. That being so I believe the regulation is one that will be found of much advantage to the Service. I know that it would bring into the Army a good class of men, and that at the same time it would not keep out of the Army a poorer class of men. I trust, therefore, that the House will without any hesitation agree with me in thinking that the regulation is a good one.

(11.1.) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): I believe it is possible that, if the 10 years the hon. Member for Northampton thinks he had wasted upon Latin had been devoted to other topics, it might have produced a formidable addition to the number of questions put in the House; but, nevertheless, I must join the hon. Member in protesting against the making of Latin a compulsory subject. I do not think that any good is done by enforcing the study of Latin for purposes for which it is not necessarily an indispensable qualification. As far as I can judge, an officer in the Army would so seldom find any use for his knowledge of Latin that there is no need to make it a necessary qualification; and the possible amount of knowledge of Latin a man would obtain in order to qualify him to pass an Army examination would in any case be worthless indeed. The opinions of the head masters of public schools ought not to be taken as decisive in this matter. Naturally, they recommend what best suits the system in use at the schools. I have not a word to say against Latin as a public school subject; but for many professions and occupations in life a really good knowledge of French and German would be infinitely better; it would be more useful, and to students themselves the modern languages would be more genial subjects of study. It is not wise at all to make Latin a compulsory subject for Army examinations. It may be desirable that the study of it at public schools should in no way be discouraged, but that is a different thing from making it compulsory for Army examinations, and thus making it difficult for men to enter the Army who might make good and useful officers. As far as my opinion may be worth anything, I give it entirely against either Latin or Greek being made compulsory subjects for examination for the Army.

Mr. E. Stanhope

CAPTAIN BETHELL (Holderness): I am glad the Secretary for War has resisted the hon. Member for Northampton on this subject, because a grounding in Latin is necessary to those who do not succeed in entering the Army and have to go to other professions, and the knowledge of French and German acquired at school is so superficial that it is a farce to examine candidates in those languages.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Supply considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

ARMY ESTIMATES, 1891-2.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 153,696, all ranks, be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland at Home and Abroad, excluding Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892."

(11.9.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid I shall have to ask the indulgence of the House, first of all because I have had occasion to address it many times and at great length this evening, and also on personal grounds, because I am afraid I hardly feel equal to doing justice to the very considerable task before me. I have more than once appealed to hon. Members to allow me to make the statement I have to make earlier in the evening; but I make no complaint on this score, because I have no doubt hon. Gentlemen felt that they had no other opportunity of alluding to subjects of importance; and I therefore cannot complain that they preferred to discuss them instead of giving me the opportunity I desired. On the present occasion I hope to be able to compress my remarks within very reasonable limits, for I hope to be able to explain very shortly the progress that is being made with the three great works which have been undertaken during the past three years. And here I venture to claim very considerable credit for our Finance Department. Although within the last four years we have been undertaking improvements in every direction, involving a large expenditure of public money, it may fairly be said that substantially we have never had a real Supplementary Estimate. We have been able to give such accurate information to Parliament as to all the steps which we have proposed, that practically the House has not been called upon in any case to vote additional sums in consequence of any excess of expenditure. For this result I feel that I owe—and that the House owes—a debt of gratitude to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary and to the Civil Staff at the War Office. The first great work which has been undertaken has been that of improving the defences of our ports and coaling stations. It will be recollected that the Imperial Defence Act of 1888 made provision for this object, and it was then estimated that the work would be completed in three years. I am happy to say that this anticipation will be almost exactly realised. The armament of our coaling stations, according to the accepted programme then laid down, is on the verge of completion, with the addition of Table Bay, as to the armament of which an agreement was come to between Sir Thomas Upington and myself at the Colonial Conference. It is not necessary to dwell upon the enormous additional advantage which these protected coaling stations will afford to the Navy in all parts of the world. The armament has now gone out to Singapore, Hong Kong, Table Bay, Simons Bay, Colombo, Jamaica, St. Lucia, and Sierra Leone; and the last guns for Aden and the Mauritius are now awaiting shipment. The armament is also ready for Esquimalt, for St. George's Sound, and for Torres Straits; but in none of these three places, I am sorry to say, have the Colonial Governments yet undertaken the preparation of the necessary works for mounting the guns when sent out. The task of adding modern guns to the armament of our great fortresses at home and abroad is also nearly complete. For obvious reasons I do not think it right to enter into detail, but I have no reason to doubt that the end of three years will find almost every item of the work disposed of, and within the estimates originally explained to the House. I cannot allow this work to come to that state of completion without expressing the great obligation which the country owes to the Inspector General of Fortifications, General Sir Lothian Nicholson, for the energy which he has thrown into the work and for the extreme pains he has taken to insure—a matter of no small difficulty in works going on in all parts of the world—that the expenditure shall be kept within the sums assigned. I do not think that the House will feel that I am informing them of anything which they would not be glad to hear, when I say we are now going to avail ourselves of Sir Lothian Nicholson's services in the command of the important fortress of Gibraltar. Nor can I omit to congratulate the Director of Artillery, General Alderson, upon the satisfactory completion of the necessary armaments. The new Naval programme, undertaken since the contracts were put out for the guns for the Imperial Defence Loan, has thrown much additional work on his Department and on the Director of Contracts, and it is all the more creditable that so little delay has been experienced. The result of this expenditure has been that, whereas three years ago no modern guns were effectively mounted in any one of our fortresses or coaling stations, except the four big guns at Malta and Gibraltar, now a powerful modern armament has in all cases added largely to their security. Amongst the places so strengthened are Portsmouth, Plymouth, the Thames, Malta, and Gibraltar. Any one who looks at the table which I presented to Parliament three years ago, showing all the places where improved armament was to be mounted, will see that the work that we then undertook and which we are now completing is work which undoubtedly will tend to give increased strength to our fortresses in every part of the world. The second great work which has been undertaken is the improvement of barrack accommodation. The changes that are being made are not, however, limited to the funds provided by loan, because the increased attention paid to barracks generally, and to the comfort of the private soldier, has caused so many urgent demands for sanitary and other services, that I have found it necessary considerably to increase the sum provided for these purposes in the Estimates of the year. The work of barrack improvement has, unfortunately, been considerably delayed by the long and severe winter, and the preparation of plans is a long and troublesome process, which is, however, being actively pushed on, while in many directions considerable progress has been made in building. Visitors to Aldershot during the summer will see the new brick camps rapidly springing up, and I hope that the occupation of some of the new blocks early next year will enable the much-needed work of demolition to begin. The increase of the troops at Aldershot has necessitated an addition to the hospital accommodation, which is being provided partly at the Cambridge Hospital, and partly on a new site in North Camp. Active work is also going on at Shorncliffe, while at Dover the improvements are nearly complete. In London, the large alterations required at the Albany Barracks will be almost immediately begun, and the additional officers' quarters provided at Wellington and Chelsea Barracks are in active progress. In Ireland the opportunity has been taken to re-consider, upon comprehensive grounds, the distribution of the reduced number of troops to be maintained in that country. Lord Wolseley has, with great activity, visited almost all districts, and a scheme of distribution has been agreed upon. Its main features are included in the endeavour to concentrate as much Royal Artillery and Cavalry as possible at Newbridge and at the Curragh, which afford the best places of training. The garrison of Dublin will be reduced by one cavalry regiment. In the meantime, improvement is going on in all the Dublin barracks. The question whether it is desirable to discontinue the use of the remaining portion of the Royal Barracks has been very carefully threshed out by the Sanitary Committee and at the War Office. The result is a decision to occupy the barracks, after complete sanitary overhauling and partial re-construction, with a battalion of Infantry and the Army Service Corps, leaving the rest of the buildings to be occupied as storehouses, for which they are very conveniently situated. Good progress is being made at Wellington, and the new barracks at Grangegorman will be partially occupied by cavalry in a very few months' time. Work is also going on at the various fortresses and coaling-stations where improved or additional barrack accommodation is required; though, in several cases, the negotiations with the Colonial Governments for the necessary land have caused very considerable delay. But, taking the work all round, it will be seen that very considerable progress has been made in barrack improvement. Now I come to the third head in which progress has been made. We have during the past year pushed on in all directions measures for the speedy mobilisation of our defensive forces in time of war. These measures are based, not upon preparations for sending a large force abroad—and for this reason alone they cannot properly be compared with those of Continental armies—but upon the idea that, while we ought always to be able at short notice to send a comparatively small force abroad, and while we must make provision for strengthening certain colonial garrisons, our duty also is to organise all our Defensive Forces, Regular and Auxiliary, into the most effective engine for the defence of the country against invasion. It is not necessary for me to recapitulate the general features of the scheme, which have already been explained to the House, and upon which we are working. We have taken stock of all our available resources, and after making full provision for the necessities of the garrisons of ports and coaling stations at home and abroad, we are organising all our remaining home forces into an army of defence. The general officers of districts have received detailed information as to the composition of its various sections, and as to the points of mobilisation, concentration and storage; and at the War Office itself every effort has been made for as complete decentralisation as is possible, which will put it in the power of district authorities to carry out the steps necessary for mobilisation, without reference to headquarters. That decentralisation of stores in particular has, to a large extent, been effected. The stores, for instance, required for the troops at Aldershot, which, under the old system, might have taken six weeks to get out of Woolwich, are now actually stored between Aldershot and Southampton, at which latter place some of the heavier equipment is placed, so as to be ready for immediate shipment in case of the Aldershot troops having to be sent abroad. There are other centres, also, where the scheme of decentralisation is practically complete. I hope that the House fully understands what is intended, and what is, to a large extent, actually carried out. On the occurrence of an emergency the troops (mainly drawn from the Regular Army) forming the first line of defence will concentrate at the appointed stations, which are all situated at important railway junctions, enabling them to be transported, with the least possible delay, to the threatened district. Every detail necessary for this purpose is being laid down, and when our store arrangements are quite complete the stores necessary for them to take the field will be either at their peace stations or in magazines situated at or near to the points of concentration. Behind the Army is the great Volunteer Army, consisting of 19 brigades of Infantry with 80 batteries of Artillery, who will assemble at the points where danger is principally apprehended, and who will find there all that they require for encampment. In this country, with the immense variety in the conditions of service, the details of such a scheme are specially difficult to arrange. But they are all being worked out so as to leave nothing uncertain when the emergency arises. Among the many points in which advance has been made—because in this year I have to speak mainly, not of new principles, but of the manner in which these principles have been applied—I may mention the attention which has been paid by the Army Medical Department to the formation of base hospitals, and all the necessary organisation required for the wounded. A system has also been devised for providing in every Volunteer brigade a bearer and a supply company, so as to render them independent of the Regular Army in these respects. Much progress is being made in both cases. The demand for horses on mobilisation has been thoroughly dealt with by the Remount Department, which was founded three years ago. We have now actually upon the register 14,000 horses, of which over 3,000 are riding horses, broken to bit and bridle and suitable for cavalry. And here I cannot help saying how much we are indebted to the masters of hounds who have registered to a great extent the horses under their control, which every one will admit to be the horses exactly suited to our purpose and such as our cavalry would require on an emergency. An increasing number have been registered by masters of hounds, whose patriotic action in the matter cannot be too highly commended. And when it is remembered that of the large number of horses required by the cavalry on mobilisation a very large proportion are draught and not riding horses, our position will appear still more satisfactory than it does at first sight. I may add that the great experience now gained by the officers of the Remount Department will enable them at a critical time to lay their hands on the remaining horses necessary for home defence with very little delay. We have now by law obtained the power to take those horses whenever any difficulties may arise, and therefore in this most important matter of horses it is difficult to exaggerate the improvement that has taken place during the last two years. But in the course of framing a scheme for the general defence of the country we have been led very carefully to consider the question whether we are satisfied that the number of regular troops asked for is really necessary, and whether the increased strength of the Navy and the advancing efficiency of the Volunteers do not justify some reduction. Having regard, therefore, to the purposes for which our regular Army is required, I would venture to make the following remarks upon the different arms of the Service. We have sufficient cavalry for all expected requirements. In an enclosed country like England cavalry could not easily operate in large bodies, and after providing for the modest requirements of any force we should send abroad we should still have enough left for the work they would have to do. The cavalry manoeuvres sanctioned last year have been of very great value. They have exposed certain defects, and they have taught useful lessons. To what changes, if any, they ought to lead in cavalry organisation is a question to which much consideration is being given. But upon that point I am not able at present to give any information to the House. We have barely enough Royal Engineers for the requirements of colonial garrisons and of home defence; and the demands upon this corps for all sorts of practical purposes in every part of the world tend rather to increase; but here we have a considerable body of Volunteer engineers, upon which we could rely for assistance in the work of home defence. We have just sufficient Horse and Field Artillery for our requirements. It is assumed, of course, that it is not necessary to associate batteries of Regular Artillery with our Volunteer Army. Indeed, the steadily increasing efficiency of the new batteries of position makes this an assumption which can be made with safety. With regard to the Garrison Artillery, it is more difficult to speak, because its whole position has been materially altered by the introduction of the new and complicated armaments now in use. Everything points to the necessity for coast defence of a small picked body of men with special acquirements and practical knowledge of the armaments of each place to be defended, who must be supplemented by a larger body of less skilled, and to a large extent of Auxiliary Troops. I hope, in the present Session, to be able to make proposals in this direction, but it is in the meantime premature to discuss the matter further. It is upon the strength of the Infantry that difference of opinion is most likely to arise. I state the case, therefore, as it is presented to me from a military point of view. According to the principle accepted by Parliament at the time of the introduction of the territorial system, it was always intended that for one battalion maintained abroad one should be kept at home to supply the necessary drafts. This is not, and has never been, the case, though the disproportion between the number of battalions abroad and at home is beyond the normal, in consequence of the occupation of Egypt. It may be added to this that it has been found necessary first of all in 1885 to add 10,000 men (of which 8,000 are Infantry) to our Indian Establishment; and, secondly, since that time, to increase somewhat the strength of certain colonial garrisons, and to make also provision for further reinforcement at short notice in time of emergency. At this moment we have 65 battalions at home, besides the Guards, and 76 abroad, the drafts for the extra battalions being provided by larger depôts maintained at home. I think that mere statement from me without one word further will show that no reduction in the number of battalions can be thought of. Then it may be asked whether they are maintained at an excessive strength. The establishment of the battalions first for service is fixed at a much higher figure, but the regular home establishment now is 720 rank and file. Looking to the fact that we have annually to provide as drafts for the battalions abroad no less than 170 men who must all be over 20 and have had six months' training, and that we must at least be able to maintain our home battalions, after providing for these drafts, in a reasonable state of efficiency for home defence and for the other purposes of our Army, it is, I think, very difficult to avoid the conclusion that the establishment we maintain is no more than adequate. There are just a few other points as to which I ought to say a few words. They shall be very few, because I think I have trespassed at enormous length on the attention of the House to-night. As to the division of the Vote that took place a few years ago between the Army and the Navy, the Navy has accepted the responsibility of accounting to Parliament for its portion of the Vote; and, in respect to the division of the stores, both the Army and Navy will co-operate to carry out what is desired. Similar steps to those we have taken at home remain to be taken on foreign stations, but that matter requires further investigation, and I do not think I am entitled to express an opinion on the subject at present. And there is one other question I should mention. The Committee will remember that when I spoke last year of the changes that were taking place in the administration of the War Office, I also undertook to take an opportunity of mentioning the changes we propose as to Promotion Boards. Though I cannot even now give any details—for I should be detaining the Committee too long—I can state, generally, the effect of the changes we propose to make. Everybody will understand that under the present system Lieutenant Colonels will not be promoted to be Colonels, except by selection; and, therefore, we find ourselves in this state: that Lieutenant

Mr. E. Stanhope

Mr. E. Stanhope

Colonels, after promotion abroad to regimental commands or service on the Staff, will be placed on half-pay, unless they elect to take retired pay. It would be obviously unfair to allow officers in that position to remain on half-pay, unless, in the opinion of the Authorities, there is a chance of their obtaining employment or promotion. A Promotion Board is, therefore, necessary. We propose to appoint a Board which will be composed of five general officers, three of whom will be senior Generals holding command in the United Kingdom—not, of course, connected with the War Office. Independent of that, three senior officers, for the time being in command in the United Kingdom—and who are willing to serve—will be members of the Board, and the remaining members will be two general officers added according to the particular branch of the Service which is under consideration. That is to say, if a question of promotion in the Cavalry is under consideration there will be two Cavalry officers on the Board, and if a question of promotion in the Artillery is under consideration there will be two Artillery officers on it, so that such arrangements have been made that each branch of the Service will have the opportunity, through its representatives, of taking care that the claims of any particular officer are fully considered before they are rejected. As far as practicable, in making selections, seniority will be observed in order to avoid supersession, but where a younger officer has special qualifications to meet special requirements his selection must necessitate supersession. I believe the Services would recognise that the Board has been framed with an earnest desire to give every officer, whether he has seen foreign service or not, the fullest opportunity of selection. There is one change contemplated during the year as to which I have not been able to enter into details; I refer to the change introduced into the Royal Artillery. I have taken money in the Estimates to enable that change to be carried out, but until the House can be placed in possession of this very important change in its complete form, I think the best thing I can do is to abstain from speaking of it. I think I have stated enough to the Committee to show that the past year, certainly the three years that have passed, have not been inactive, and that we have done much, at any rate as much as we think we could do with all the great interests that we have to protect on one side or the other, to improve the general defensive position of the country, and to increase the efficiency of the defensive forces to whom that defence is intrusted.

(11.51.) COLONEL NOLAN : I always admire the statements of the right hon. Gentleman, because he always manages, as on the present occasion, to tell us extraordinarily little, but to make that little extremely interesting. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that he has placed his heavy stores between Aldershot and Southampton instead of at Woolwich. I rather doubt, however, whether stores can be obtained with such extreme rapidity from the new station if it takes so long a time to get them from Woolwich. I agree that the acquisition of the horses mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman is a valuable one, but as to the scheme of organisation put forward by him I would point out that it was purely a paper organisation. The War Office produces every year a new scheme for the defence of the country. I wish the right hon. Gentleman had gone a little more into figures. His usual custom is to be extremely explicit, but in his speech to-night he has sketched out everything vaguely. He told us he had organised 19 brigades of Volunteer Infantry, but he did not tell us how many men there were in them. Then he told us there were 18 batteries of Volunteer Artillery. Does he mean that they all have field guns, or that they are batteries of garrison artillery? I did not know that there were 18 batteries of Volunteer Artillery at the present moment. The right hon. Gentleman has also been extremely vague on the question of barracks. As an Irish Member, I positively object to the policy of Lord Wolseley in Ireland, as sketched out by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman says the greater part of the troops in Ireland are to be concentrated at Newbridge and the Curragh.

Mr. E. Stanhope

MR. E. STANHOPE: The Cavalry and Artillery.

COLONEL NOLAN : In that case it is a matter of less importance, but it is still of considerable importance. The troops are accustomed to be in town quarters, and like to be there for a large part of the year, whilst the inhabitants of the towns like the troops and make money out of them. I do not say the men will not be better instructed if concentrated in camps; but the system is very much against the interests of the inhabitants and against the comfort of the troops, whilst it is opposed to the custom of every European nation.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

MUSEUMS AND GYMNASIUMS BILL. (No. 159.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday next.

POSSESSION OF GAME BILL.

On Motion of Sir John Dorington, Bill to amend the Law in reference to the illegal possession of Game, ordered to be brought in by Sir John Dorington, Mr. Mount, Mr. Whitmore, and Mr. Darling.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 226.]

House adjourned at ten minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 20th February, 1891.

LORD TRIMLESTOWN.

Petition of Christopher Patrick Mary Barnewall of Trimlestown in the county of Meath, and of Turvey in the county of Dublin, Esquire, claiming a right to vote as Baron Trimlestown at the elections of Representative Peers for Ireland; read, and referred to the Lord Chancellor to consider and report thereupon to the House.

THE EDUCATION CODE.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD NORTON: My Lords I beg to put a question to the noble Lord the Lord President of the Council of which I have given him private notice. It is to ask if he can account for the fact that although the New Education Code has been delivered to Members of the House of Commons, and has even been reviewed in the newspapers, it has not yet been distributed in this House? This is a matter of special importance, because it is only within 40 days of the Code being laid on the Table that attention can be called to any of its provisions with the view of taking the opinion of Parliament upon them before it becomes law.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, I am very sorry I cannot account for the Code not having been delivered. It was laid on the Tables of both Houses at the same time, and I suppose the printers have been unable to distribute it to the Members of both Houses simultaneously. I believe, however, it is now in course of distribution to your Lordships.

FACTORY AND WORKSHOP SANITATION BILL. [H.L.] (No. 28.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD THRING: My Lords, I shall detain your Lordships a very short time upon this occasion, in asking for a Second Reading. This is a very unambitious Bill, but I hope it will prove a profitable one. Its chief object is to remove the greatest of the evils which were shown to exist in the course of the inquiry before the Sweating Committee in the foul dens—no words are strong enough to describe the horrors of them—in which the humbler classes only too often have to work. It will only be necessary for me to explain very shortly what the existing law is, and then to state briefly the amendments which I propose to make in that law. The existing law is contained in two Acts, one is the Public Health Act of 1875, and the other is the Factory Act of 1878. The stronger sanitary regulations are contained in the Factory Act; and, as I propose to consolidate the law, I have set out those clauses in Clause 2 of my Bill. Those regulations comprise the maintenance of cleanliness, and freedom from effluvia arising from drains, they provide against overcrowding, and secure ventilation, the removal of gases, and other injurious products. There is also a further clause providing for whitewashing and painting within certain times. This law the facts of the case, as given in evidence, show to be sufficient, where it is properly administered, and the remedy that is required is not so much in relation to the law as to its administration. With respect to the administration of the law, workplaces—for that, perhaps, is the most generic term to use—are divided into two classes: first, workplaces under the Factory Act, and, secondly, workplaces under the Public Health Act. Workplaces under the Factory Act are really and truly, in the first place, factories which are not used as dwelling-places; and, secondly, workshops in which children and young persons are employed. Those are the only class of workplaces to which, under the Factory Act, the Sanitation Clauses apply. All other cases come under the Public Health Acts. First, I must explain very shortly what the factories are. They are defined to be buildings in which mechanical power, such as steam, is employed in conducting certain processes, or used in certain trades which are unusually unhealthy, and, therefore, are considered necessary to be included in the Act, such as calico-printing and bleaching processes. Workshops, on the other hand, are workplaces to which the employer has the right of access. With respect to the places I have mentioned, the only ones under the Factory Acts are those which are not used as dwelling-houses. All the rest are under the other Act. Now, as to the remedies. The mode of dealing with these places proposed is principally by inspection. Inspection under the Factory Acts is conducted by the Inspectors appointed for that purpose; inspection under the Sanitary Acts is conducted by the ordinary Sanitary Inspectors. In these cases inspection is absolutely necessary. With respect to the factories, I have left them as they are now under the Act; but I have also added workplaces with more than 50 people; so that all large workshops will be under the Factory Inspectors, and all other workplaces will be under sanitary inspection. It is perfectly certain that at the present moment the local Sanitary Inspectors are, on the whole, slack in their duties, and there is great difficulty in enforcing the regulations. Therefore, what I propose to do is to place the inspection of workshops entirely under the County Councils—to give them full control over the whole of the local inspection. By full control I do not mean to appoint the local Inspectors; but I mean, if the local Inspector does not do his duty the County Council may remove him and replace him by another person. Now, with respect to the proceedings by which this law is enforced apart from inspection. They are principally proceedings at Petty Sessions. If the regulations are not complied with the Inspector may take proceedings in Petty Sessions, and the Court of Petty Sessions may make an Order that the Local Authority shall do what is necessary if it thinks fit. Those proceedings have, I think, so far acted pretty well, and I have retained them. I have also added here an important clause. The Inspector may himself desire the person who has neglected to comply with the regulations to do so. He may say, "So-and-so ought to be done; such-and-such filth ought to be removed," the person having the right to appeal; but if that direction is not appealed against the law will immediately become operative. The man may say, "I do not think this is legal," and he may appeal against the Order, but if not the Court will confirm the Order. The truth is that in these cases what is wanted in the way of remedial measures is in respect of what we should call trivial matters, and what is principally required is that they should be cheap and ready and easy. So far with regard to that part of the Bill. What I have endeavoured to do is to put under the Sanitary Law all the large workshops. I have taken away the exemption which existed, that if used as dwelling-houses they are not to be inspected. With respect to workshops, I have not altered the ordinary law, but I have provided for enforcing that law by making the County Councils masters of the situation. Then with regard to the other matters, they are not very material to notice now. Clauses 5 and 6 were taken from the Victorian Act on the subject. This was found in Victoria exceedingly beneficial for the purpose of preventing sweating; that is to say, that the heads of factories should keep a list of outworkers which should be open to the inspection of proper officers. The truth is that in a great many of these wrongs which are committed, these evils which exist, you will find that a man keeps a factory which is very well regulated, but, at the same time, he has a great number of outworkers—these miserable people of whom we have heard so much, and whose dreadful state is so much to be deplored. In Victoria, owing to the fact that the Inspectors can ascertain who those workers are, they are enabled to make the necessary inquiries, and to find out their condition; and that has been found to operate as a great check upon sweating. I may refer to the recent book of Sir Charles Dilke, on Greater Britain, in which he notices this Act of Victoria and its beneficial results. Then Clause 15 prohibits women using hammers in workshops. The necessity for that provision arises from this fact. In the Cradley Iron Works the women use an instrument called an "oliver." This instrument is used by means of a treadle, and when the hammer is of great weight it puts a pressure upon the strength of women which is altogether more than they should have to endure. It was also proved to us upon the Sweating Commission that it was a very unhealthy employment in the case of women. On the other hand, I do not think the prohibition in regard to work of that kind ought to be altogether absolute, because when the treadle is used and the hammer small it is perfectly innocuous. I have put the limit of weight at 4 lbs., but if that is objected to it can easily be altered for any other figure that may be desired. Then it was proved to us that a great many women are employed in welding heavy chains, and they have also to cut cold iron for that purpose. Such an operation is certainly beyond the strength of women, and I have therefore inserted a clause prohibiting it, when the weights are too heavy and the links beyond a certain size. That is, in reality, the whole of my Bill. I believe that, as a practical measure, it will have a very great beneficial effect indeed. In the first place, it removes the difficulty which has been found to exist under the Factory Acts. Under those Acts the Inspector has great doubts as to his jurisdiction. Another defect arising under the existing Acts which it will remove is that there is a dual authority. The Factory Inspector and the Sanitary Inspector have jurisdiction over the same place. The Factory Inspector is directed by that Act, for instance, to apply to the Sanitary Inspector when any defect arises from drains. It is quite clear that such a dual authority is extremely injurious, and, therefore, I have entirely removed it by giving the Factory Inspector complete jurisdiction wherever it is required. I do not think I need say much more in explanation of the Bill. I have not attempted to shorten the hours of labour, or to go further into the many difficult problems which are connected with the labour question; because I do not myself think we had sufficient evidence before the Sweating Committee to enable us to judge of what would be the proper course to be taken with regard to those most difficult and complex questions. I conclude by recommending this Bill to your Lordships, as I believe it will bring light and cleanliness into those dark spots of which we heard so much on the Sweating Committee, and brighten and make healthy what must be admitted to be the harsh and unlovely existence of many a humble artisan and many a hard-working woman. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

VOL. CCCL. [THIRD SERIES.]

Lord Thring

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Thring.)

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, I should like to say a few words on this Bill, not as your Lordships may imagine to endeavour to dissuade you from giving it a Second Reading, for I hope it will be read a second time, not only on account of the intrinsic merits of the Bill itself, but because, if it is not read a second time, another Bill, which perhaps I may be pardoned for thinking far superior to it, will not be given a Second Reading. But there are one or two matters connected with this Bill which it appears to me will militate against the very object which the noble and learned Lord opposite wishes to bring about. My noble Friend spoke of the necessity for inspection. I wish to point out to him that the condition precedent of a thorough inspection is a complete system of registration; because one of the difficulties which was most clearly proved in evidence before your Lordships' Select Committee on the Sweating System was the great difficulty that was experienced in discovering where the smallest class of workshops commonly called "sweating-dens" were situated; and this Bill contains no provision whatever for registering workshops or workplaces. Factories, of course, are registered under the existing law, but workshops are not. Almost the same remark affects Clause 5 of the Bill. That is a very useful clause, which requires a record to be kept of outside workers—or work that is put out, work that is sub-contracted for, the work, in fact, that goes into these small sweaters' dens, and places of that kind. But the noble Lord has in this Bill made a new definition of what he calls "workplaces," that is to say, all workshops where less than 50 people are employed. I imagine that would be 99 in 100 of all the workshops in the country, because there are not a great many in which more than 50 persons are employed, and as "workplaces" are omitted from this clause no register of outside work will be kept, practically speaking, in any of the workshops in the country. I have no objection whatever, on general principles, to the powers and authorities which the Bill proposes to give to County Councils; but I would point out that the way in which that power is granted by the Bill will cause a great deal of confusion. The County Councils are charged with superintending the inspection of workplaces; that is to say, all workshops where less than 50 people are employed. The effect of that will be, I should imagine, that the Local Authorities would not do their duty in the matter; that is to say, that in order to save themselves from the obloquy of raising the rates they will do nothing, and will throw the responsibility upon the County Councils, preferring that, as far as possible, their local work should be done for them and paid for out of the county rates. That is not a matter which I think will commend itself to your Lordships. Then the County Councils are given by the Bill power to dismiss sanitary officers; but the power of dismissing the sanitary officers is not, at the same time, interfered with in any way as regards the Local Authorities. Therefore, the unfortunate sanitary officers will be under the thumb of two masters, and I am afraid that their difficulties in doing their duty will be somewhat oppressive in that respect. I have made these remarks because, as it appears to me, those provisions in the Bill to which I have referred will destroy the very objects which my noble Friend has in view; and I trust if the Bill is read a second time, as I hope it may be, he will consider those matters carefully before the Bill reaches another stage.

LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, there are at present no fewer than five Bills, which have either been presented to Parliament or shortly will be, dealing with this question. The first is a Government Bill, which I am informed is down for Second Reading in another place next Thursday. I have a proposal to make, which I trust will meet with your Lordships' approval, and with the approval of the noble Lord who has moved the Second Reading of this Bill. As there are so many Bills before Parliament, I hope the noble Lord will wait until the Government measure has been read a second time, and then consent, if your Lordships approve, that this measure should go before a Committee at the same time as the Government Bill. I do not know whether he has seen the Government Bill; but I think I can assure the noble Lord that he will find clauses in that measure which will meet with his approval. Perhaps I may be allowed to quote one instance as showing why I think the noble Lord would do well to consent to that course. This Bill deals almost entirely with sanitation, which is largely the ground of the Government Bill; and were it to be proceeded with now, some confusion would be created owing to the introduction of fresh terms differing from the Factory Act of 1878. This Bill does not, for instance, repeal clauses in the existing Factory Act; and workshops should have, according to this Bill, a different meaning from that employed in that Act. Again, the Bill does not re-enact the qualification requiring the occupier to have a right of access; and the use of the term "workplace" might be likely to lead to an undesirable interference with private home work. That is a very important point, and your Lordships will remember that in our discussion last year on the Sweating Committee's Report that matter of labour in private dwellings engaged your Lordships' attention a good deal. Under the circumstances, therefore, I ask your Lordships to read the Bill a second time, on the understanding that the noble Lord proceeds no further with it until there has been an opportunity of discussing the Government measure.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount CROSS): My Lords, I hope, as I was to some extent instrumental in passing the Bill of 1878, which consolidated the Factory Acts, I may be allowed to ask the noble and learned Lord one question. It has already been pointed out by the noble Lord who has just sat down that the Definition Clause of this Bill and that contained in the Act of 1878 are different in one important particular. Under that Act it will be found that there is no limit of 50 persons being employed on the premises, but that the workshop must be a place under the control of the master, and to which the master had access. The object of that provision, as the noble and learned Lord must know well, because he drew the Bill according to my instructions, was to prevent the law from applying to domestic houses, where members of the same family are at work on their own account, getting their own living; but, as the noble and learned Lord has drawn his Bill, the words applying to those cases are left out in the definition of workshops and work-places, and according to Clause 17, any place where, say, the daughters of a family were at work for a living, having no master at all, but simply doing their own private work in their own house, would come within the provisions of this Bill. Was that the intention of the noble Lord, or not? I would ask him, therefore, whether those words of definition in the Act of 1878 were purposely left out?

*LORD THRING: With regard to the criticism which has been made on the definition of workshops and workplaces, I think "workshops" is accurate. Workplaces are under the present Act, the Public Health Act, and are subject to sanitary inspection without any conditions whatever. What I have done is this: I have really and truly only levelled up workshops with more than 50 workers into the class of factories, in order to put the people employed there in the same position as factory workers. But I have not, as far as I understand (though I will certainly endeavour to alter my Bill if that be so), given the Inspectors a greater right to enter private houses than is contained in the two Acts together at the present time; because, although the Factory Acts to which the noble Lord has referred exempt workshops which are used as private dwelling-houses, and places to which a manager has not access, they are still under the jurisdiction of the Sanitary Inspector; and what I have wished to do is to strengthen the powers of inspection of the Sanitary Inspector, and to put the larger workshops under the Factory Inspectors. But I think the noble Lord will see that I have not authorised any invasion of private houses or mere family workplaces by the Inspector to a greater extent than under the existing law. The difference is that in one case the Factory Inspector has access, but that the Sanitary Inspector has access in every case. I do not know whether I have made myself clear to your Lordships. With respect to the proposal made by the noble Lord, that I should go no further with this Bill until the Government Bill has been read a second time in the other House, of course, if he insists upon it, I must submit; but the only question is whether it would not be better to pass this Bill through your Lordships' House, and then send it down to the other House to be committed with the other measure.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

FACTORY AND WORKSHOP BILL.

[H.L.]—(No. 27.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I hope your Lordships will permit me to say a few words concerning this Bill. It is somewhat more ambitious in its scope than the measure to which your Lordships have just given a Second Reading, although in some respects it may be said also to deal principally with sanitation. This Bill is founded principally, if not entirely, upon the evidence that was brought before your Lordships' Committee of Inquiry into the Sweating System, and was designed to meet, if possible, some of the graver evils and scandals which were proved before that Committee. Into the question of the general state of things that was then revealed I do not propose to go at all. The evidence before that Committee resolved itself principally into three classes. It was shown that men in some of those sweating trades worked the most inhumanly long hours for most inadequate pay. Well, that question of adult male labour I have not attempted to touch in this Bill. Whether it may ever be considered right to restrain men from working these inordinately long hours, and from practically, in consequence, compelling other men to do the same thing, I will not discuss at all. It is, at any rate, a matter that is not within the range of practical politics at present, and I have nothing whatever to do with the question of male labour in this Bill, except in so far as it extends to workshops where adult males only are employed the sanitary provisions which are applicable under the Factory Acts in places where women or young persons or children are employed. Then there was a great deal of evidence given of the most valuable kind as to the terrible insanitary condition of work places, and the horrible want of the ordinary decencies of life. I have endeavoured to deal with that question in this Bill. The other fact that was brought out in evidence was the facility with which the law was broken, I mean the facility with which the law affecting protected persons, the law restricting hours of labour and so on, was broken in the smaller workshops and sweating dens, the inevitable result being that work was attracted out of factories, and large and well conducted workshops into these ill ventilated, badly drained, and insanitary small workshops. My principal object in this Bill is to make the existing law more universally applicable. I have no great fault to find with the law; I believe the law is sufficient as it is. What I complain of is, that the law cannot be applied, that the Act of 1878 contains so many loopholes for escape, so many modes of evasion, that such facilities are given to breaking the law that not only would it be easy to drive a coach and four through it, but there would be no practical difficulty in the whole Coaching Club driving through the provisions of that Act at any time if they thought fit. I also aim at quickening procedure. I have endeavoured to bring it about that the law shall be enforced equally in factories and other places where work is carried on. I have no doubt, myself, that it would be far better if all the work of the country could be carried on in large factories and workshops, properly conducted and inspected, and where the law is properly maintained; but that is impossible. It would be most unwise, most tyrannical, to interfere with home work. The great difficulty in dealing with questions of this kind, the great difficulty in factory legislation, is to reconcile those two principles; not to interfere too much with the liberty of the subject to work as they please in their own homes, not to prevent honest men and women and girls from earning an honest livelihood at home, but at the same time to extend as far as practicable the laws which have been passed for the benefit of labour to labour employed in places where that law is not at present applicable, or at any rate is not applied. Your Lordships must recollect that the mere fact of restricting hours of labour, and of insisting upon proper times for meals, and, in fact, the whole effect of factory legislation is to a certain extent to increase the cost of production; and, therefore, if work can be carried on in small workplaces, which are not known to the Inspector or where the law can be evaded, the cost of production is smaller in those places, the work is more cheaply done in them than in larger factories and workshops. The result is that a fictitious advantage is given to the sweater, work is naturally withdrawn from the larger workshops, and sweating, and the whole system of sub-contracting, about which we heard so much before your Lordships' Committee is encouraged. As regards the provisions of the Bill, I will deal first with the question of sanitation, and I lay down the minimum amount of cubic space per person that is to be provided in all factories and workshops. I take the moderate estimate of 250 cubic feet by daylight, and 400 cubic feet by gas-light. I do not interfere in any way with the existing powers of the Secretary of State, but what I do is this: The cubic space to be allowed per person in factories is at present legally determined by an Order of the Secretary of State. I wish to embody the order and general rule in an Act of Parliament laying down the minimum: it should be at least 250 cubic feet, and 400 cubic feet. But I wish by no means to be understood as saying that that space is sufficient; and if your Lordships read this Bill a second time and it goes into Committee, I shall certainly not oppose any extension of that cubic space. Then I also propose that no work shall be carried on in underground places or cellars which, according to the law, could not be inhabited as dwellings legally. I do not think it fitting or right that human beings should be allowed to work from morning to night, and in many cases from night to morning too, in places which the law says are unfit for human beings to live in. That is not a matter which I think will meet with any opposition in your Lordships' House, and therefore I will pass very lightly over it. Then I come to a more important matter, the providing proper sanitary conveniences. Nothing was more disgusting than the evidence given before the Sweating Committee as to the condition of many workshops in those respects. The accommodation was absolutely insufficient, and in a great many cases—in numberless cases—there was no separate accommodation for the two sexes. Well, that is a state of things which I am perfectly certain ought not to be allowed to continue to exist. It is degrading, it is disgusting, and it cannot but fail to conduce towards immorality. What I propose to do is, in the first place, to compel Local Authorities to do what by the existing law they may now do in that respect, and to extend to the Metropolis the provisions of the Public Health Acts, so far as providing proper sanitary conveniences and separate sanitary conveniences for both sexes are concerned. That is also a matter which I do not think will meet with much opposition. Then as regards cleanliness, lime washing, and so on, I merely apply to workshops the law which at present applies to factories, and embody in an Act of Parliament what is now the law by reason of the orders of the Secretary of State. That is practically, my Lords, with the exception of a few minor matters with which I will not trouble the House now, what I propose to do with sanitation. I extend the existing provisions in regard to sanitation under the Factory Acts to all workplaces except domestic workshops. I prohibit work being carried on in cellars which are unfit for human dwellings, and I provide for a sufficient amount of decency, and for the ordinary requirements and necessities of human nature. But in this matter of sanitation some supervision by authority is necessary; and I also, like my noble Friend (Lord Thring), give some authority to County Councils in this matter. I also provide that the two authorities who have to deal with sanitary questions—that is to say, the Sanitary Officer and the Factory Inspector—should assist each other, and should check each other. I impose upon the Sanitary Officer the duty of reporting to the Factory Inspector, if he finds that sanitation which comes under the Factory Acts, but not under the Public Health Acts, is deficient; and I further provide that if the Factory Inspector takes no action on that Report the Sanitary Inspector shall report direct to the superior officer of the Factory Inspector; that is, to the Home Secretary. Then, on the other hand, the Factory Inspectors are now required by the existing law to notify to the Sanitary Authority if they find any default in matters of sanitation under the jurisdiction of the Sanitary Authority. To that duty I add the duty that they are also to report to the Sanitary Authority in case of any default in fulfilling the requirements of the law as to sanitary conveniences, and cellar workplaces, which are provided for in this Bill, and in that case also I also introduce the County Council as the supreme authority; and I make it the duty of the Factory Inspector, if he finds that the Local Authority take no action on his Reports, to report the matter to the County Council. I differ from my noble Friend opposite as to the powers which I give to the County Council. I do not give them any power of doing the necessary work themselves, which would have the effect of relieving the Local Authorities of responsibility, a unwise thing to do; but I give the County Councils the power which is at present possessed by the Local Government Board and by the Home Secretary—that is to say, they can employ police constables to see that the requirements of the law are carried out, and such officers can recover the money from the Local Authority. That, I venture to think, is a better plan to pursue, because the responsibility, as far as money is concerned, would still rest upon the Local Authorities, and it is essential that upon the Local Authority should rest ultimately the duty of seeing that sanitation is carried out in their own area. It would be a fatal thing if Local Bodies could relieve themselves of taxation, and throw the burden of sanitation upon the County Council and upon rates raised by the county. Then, my Lords, I have endeavoured also to do what I can towards quickening procedure. I allow Factory Inspectors, in the event of their finding a factory or workshop not to be in conformity with the Act, instead of taking legal proceedings, or, in addition to taking legal proceedings to fine the occupier, to serve him with a notice specifying the necessary work that is to be done. Of course, I grant the occupier the ordinary right of appeal, and then, if the requisition is not complied with, I empower the Factory Inspectors to see that the work is done, and to recover the amount expended from the occupier, of course on receiving authority to do so from a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. It will be objected at once to that that the Factory Inspectors have no funds, and could not therefore do such a thing themselves. I am not myself clear how far that is so or not; but if it is so, it would be necessary to provide the Inspector with the necessary means for providing for the execution of the work required to be done, and then to recover the cost of it from the defaulting person. One point was brought out very clearly before your Lordships' Committee, and that was the great difficulty experienced in compelling the occupiers to do anything in these sweating dens and small workshops in the way of improving the condition of their premises. Where the rateable value of the premises is below £40 I provide that proceedings may be taken against either the owner or the occupier. In fact, most of these little workshops and places commonly called "sweating dens" are held at a small rent of about £1 a week, and it has been found useless, practically, to proceed against the occupier. He is a man of straw; he has got no capital; he has no means of any kind. These little places spring up like mushrooms in the night, and they fade away with equal rapidity if the occupier is interfered with. It is impossible to get them to do anything, and it is useless to try; and I think it is not only wise but perfectly just and equitable that in such cases the owner of the premises should be held responsible. That is all I have to say as regards sanitation and the quickening of the proceedings which have to be taken in sanitary matters. But I should like to say a word or two about some provisions of the Bill which deal with the periods of employment of protected persons, which deal with the powers given to Inspectors, with the question of registration, with the definition of domestic workshops, and with exemptions under the Act. My whole object is to apply the existing law as far as practicable to all places where work is carried on. My principal objection to the operation of the Act of 1878 consists in the number and character of the exemptions contained in it. For instance, it draws a distinction, totally unwise in my mind, between women employed in non-textile factories and women employed in workshops. Women employed in workshops can work longer hours than they can if employed in factories. I can see no earthly object in that; on the contrary, if women were to be allowed to work longer hours in one place than in another, I should say they ought to be allowed to work longer hours in the factory; that is to say, in the larger, better regulated, and better ventilated places. What I have done is this: I have placed the women, as far as the limitation of their hours of work is concerned, on precisely similar terms and conditions, whether they work in factories or whether they are employed in workshops. I propose to repeal Section 15 of the principal Act which allows women to be employed for 15 hours in one day. The intention of the law is perfectly clear; the law insists that they are to have 4½ hours for rest and meals, but there are no particular times specified for taking that rest and those meals, and it is, therefore, impossible for the Inspectors to find out whether that condition of employment is observed. Unless you have a whole army of Inspectors, so that an Inspector can be told off to every single workshop where women are employed, and where no young persons or children are employed with the women, it is impossible for the Inspector to ascertain whether the women are afforded those 4½ hours for rest and meals or not. As a matter of fact, the law can be broken with complete impunity, and is so broken. Practically speaking, there is nothing to prevent women in those workshops where no young persons or children are employed from being compelled to work 15 consecutive hours if their employer thinks fit. I can see no object in drawing this distinction between women employed in factories and those employed in workshops. As I have said, in drawing this Bill what I have done is to put women on exactly the same level as regards hours of work, whether their work is done in factories or in workshops. But the sections of the principal Act to which I entertain the strongest objection are Sections 16 and 69. Those are the sections which define a domestic workshop, and which enact that an Inspector, wishing to enter a workshop, which is used also as a dwelling, can only do so with a warrant if the occupier objects. According to the definition of a domestic workshop, any room or place where any number of people work and dwell is, practically speaking, exempted from the operation of the Act, except in so far as it affects young persons and children. But that is open to any amount of abuse. How is it possible for the Inspector, who seems to be expected to do the work of ten men, to tell when he sees a number of people at work in a place whether they are all members of the same family, or are all dwelling in the place in which they work? There is no limitation in numbers. If all the members of one of the various great families of Smiths, Browns, Joneses, and Robinsons in London chose to hire the Crystal Palace as a workshop and dwell there, they might do any amount of work under any conditions they pleased without coming under the operation of the Factory Law. The fact is, the definition is too loose—it can be abused, and is abused, to any extent. What I propose to do is to say that “where not more than three people, members of the same family, work together that shall constitute a domestic workshop.” That would cover all places where a man and his wife, and a son or a daughter work, places where a woman and two children work, and all places where two or three girls work together at sewing in rooms where they live. It would cover all places which may be described as really bona fide, purely family work places, and provides, in my opinion, quite a sufficiently large exception. But in case it should be considered that it is interfering too much with family home-working life, I have provided also that where more than three, but not more than six, persons “members of the same family” work in the place in which they also dwell, on proving before a Magistrate that they are really members of the same family and do dwell there, they can obtain a certificate constituting that place a domestic workshop. I, myself, do not think that advisable. If your Lordships recall the frightful evidence that was given before your Select Committee as to the condition of things obtaining in places, for instance, where clothing is made up, I think you will agree with me that it is necessary to put somewhat strong restrictions on the way in which that kind of work is carried on. We hear over and over again of children lying ill with all kinds of infectious diseases covered with clothing in an unfinished state upon which the family were at work, which was destined to be disseminated not only through the Metropolis, but through the whole country and among all classes in the country. It is not a question merely affecting the working people themselves. This is a question which affects the health and well-being of the whole community. There is nothing that carries contagion more readily than clothing, and certainly steps should be taken to take care that clothing which is sent all over the country should not be made up in the circumstances and under the conditions in which it is now made up, as proved before your Lordships' Committee. If this Bill goes into Committee, and any noble Lord moves the rejection of this last provision which I have mentioned, namely, that where more than three, but not more than six, people work together at home they may get a certificate making the place a “domestic workshop,” I certainly should not object to having it cut out. Then I propose to repeal Section 69. That section makes it necessary for an Inspector to obtain a warrant or an order from the Secretary of State before effecting an entry in any case where the occupier refuses to permit him to enter; that is to say, of course, where the place is a dwelling as well as a workshop. Your Lordships will see in one moment what is the effect of that clause. All that a man has to do who desires to evade the law is to put up anything in the shape of a bed where any number of people are working and he can refuse entry to the Inspector on the ground that the place is a dwelling. What has the Inspector to do then? He has to go off and get a warrant, and, of course, long before he can return with the warrant which empowers him to enter the place is temporarily put within the requirements of the law. The moment he is seen coming, presumably with the warrant in his pocket, the children, young girls or other persons, are hustled out of the room and stowed away somewhere till he is gone. As long as that section stands, to go out of factories, and out of large and well regulated workshops into small work places and sweating dens, which is brought about by reason of the immunity from regulations and legal restrictions enjoyed by the occupiers of those small shops and sweating dens. The facility and impunity with which they break the law gives them an advantage over the better class of masters, and over factories and large workshops, which is most injurious to the workers employed and to the quality of the work produced, and this state of things will continue until the law is made applicable to them. There must be great encouragement for work being carried on in places of that kind, instead of in properly conducted factories and workshops; and my object is, as far as possible, without interfering too much with home work, or with the liberty of the individual is to apply the existing law to work wherever it is carried on. I do not imagine for a moment that this Bill is going to produce any miraculous results. In the first place, the evils complained of before your Lordships' Committee on the Sweating System require the amendment of other Acts—as, for instance, the Truck Act, the payment of wages in public houses and the liability of employers Acts. But I do not think that legislation of any kind is going to cure All the evils which were then brought to light. In my opinion the action which Her Majesty's Government have taken with regard to Government contracts will do more perhaps than legislation could do; and I am very sure that if the Municipal Bodies throughout the country and other corporate employers of labour will follow the action of Her Majesty's Government in respect of stopping unnecessary and injurious subcontracting, and ensuring that the current rate of wages in the trade is paid by the contractors, immense good will result. There is also the great question of foreign immigration, which has more to do with what is commonly called "sweated" labour than any other factor in the case. I am perfectly convinced in my own mind that as long as British labour is subject to the competition of the cheapest and poorest class of foreign labour that can be imported into the country it is practically impossible for English workers to help themselves either by combination or in any other way. Therefore, I do not intend to prophecy for this Bill if it becomes law that it will have any miraculous or extraordinary effect, but I believe that it will have a good effect, and I ask your Lordships to give it a Second Reading.

The Earl of Dunraven

The Earl of Dunraven

The Earl of Dunraven

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Dunraven.)

LORD NORTON: My Lords, I would ask to be allowed to say a few words upon a portion of this Bill upon which the noble Lord laid a little stress at the end of his speech. The Bill chiefly relates to the sanitary condition of workshops; and the noble Earl has, I think, done great service in bringing forward the subject. He is deserving of the fullest recognition of his labours on the Commission, which produced very important information. But it is not upon the sanitary portion of the Bill that I want to speak. It is upon what he says himself is a very important principle, involved in one clause of the Bill, and that is with regard to the hours of labour of young children. He says very truly that he has avoided the question of adult labour except in reference to women; but in regard to children he introduces in one clause a very important change in the law. That is, he proposes to raise the age of all children who may be employed in factories and workshops from 10 years, which it is at present under the Act of 1878, to 12. Now I will not commit myself as to any arguments in support of this proposition, which may be brought forward, but on the face of it it seems to me there is a very prevalent mistake being acted upon at this moment in reference to education. The noble Earl himself seemed to say that he makes this proposal in the interest of education. That observation seems to shew that he has not much appreciation of the education of work, which to the working classes, is, I think, the most important part of their education. It seems to me not in the interest of education to keep children of the working class at school as long as possible, after general elements and to keep them away from work. Now I believe that the earliest time at which they can safely leave the elementary school and begin apprenticeship to industry is the most important point in the education of the working classes, and I think a very great mistake has been made in failing to see that for the working classes practice, intelligence, and honesty in work is education. The noble Earl may possibly be able to make out, when he defends his Bill, that factories and workshops are exceptionally injurious to children on account of their unhealthiness. That, I think, is the only kind of argument by which he will be able to fortify his proposition for raising in factories the working age from 10 to 12. He proposes to make factories much more healthy; and let me point out to your Lordships that when once exceptions begin to be made on the ground of unhealthiness others will be proposed. Depend upon it, if that is done all other employments will follow. There is now a general claim for immunity from labour, and we shall find if we go on in that direction that education will be considered as leading to something separate from labour, as being a much higher thing, while labour will be regarded as being rather a degrading occupation for an English citizen. The Education Department is now trying to carry technical instruction into schools; whereas the reverse is to my mind the right thing to do, that is to pass on schooling into practical technical instruction. All the great manufacturers who have promoted technical instruction have said that the best training for working children is in the workshops themselves, and that it is a total mistake to suppose that schools are the only place of education for the working classes. For myself I think it is absurd that we should, for instance, hold a sailor-boy back from getting early accustomed to the sea and detaining him at school until he can read a historical play of Shakespeare's. That seems to illustrate an absurdity of treatment generally for the working classes and not in their interest at all. The noble Earl says that foreign countries are in advance of us in these matters. I think when he comes to discussion in Committee he will find the comparison is not exactly as he has placed it. The question is whether the law has been found deficient in this country under the Act of 1878, and whether he can show any reason why it should be altered. He has not told us that now, and of course he is perfectly right in reserving all matters of detail for Committee, but I thought that as a question of principle, although involved in only one clause of the Bill, it should be mentioned at this stage, and that it would not be advisable to let it slip through in a Bill of this sort as if it was a matter of no importance.

*LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, we have here another valuable Bill, the result of the Sweating Committee, and I propose, if your Lordships approve, that we should take the same course with it as we did with the Bill of the noble and learned Lord opposite. The noble Earl behind me has brought forward a Bill which is most useful and most important in its provisions. I do not know whether he has yet had time to read the Bill which has been brought in by the Secretary of State; but if he will look over it and compare it with his own Bill he will see that there are nine clauses in it which I think attain the objects he has aimed at in this measure. That will show your Lordships, besides the consideration of the mass of detail which has been put before us to-day, how necessary it is that these Bills should be well thought over and well worked out before a Committee. I hope, and I believe every Member of your Lordships' House hopes, that the Government measure will have good progress in another place, and that it will come up to us speedily, so that we may deal with it and with the two noble Lords' measures of to-day, and from them produce something which will, I hope, give satisfaction to the wishes of many who were concerned with the Sweating Committee of last year. The two Bills of to-day show, as I have already said, what different lines proposals may be made to amend the existing laws on the subject; and I am sure it is best in all respects that the measure which the Secretary of State has brought in should be well discussed in another place and well threshed out, so that when it comes here we shall be able to form our conclusion on the whole mass of labour Bills that are now before Parliament. I may remind my noble Friend that a right hon. Gentleman in another place brought forward a Bill a very few nights ago, which also passed the Second Reading, dealing with the same subject. Therefore, my Lords, if the noble Earl behind me will consent to the course that has been pursued with the previous Bill, I hope your Lordships will give this also a Second Reading.

Question agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and Committed to a Committee of the whole House.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 20th February, 1891.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (GENERAL POWERS) BILL—(by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Second Reading be deferred until Friday the 27th February."

* (3.10.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I think it is very desirable that in regard to Bills of such importance as this an arrangement should be made to take them when they are put down on the Paper, or at any rate, that a longer notice of postponement should be given than the day on which they stand for Second Reading. Very often hon. Members are brought down here in consequence of seeing Bills in which they are interested on the Paper, and so far as Ministers are concerned it is most inconvenient to require them to be in attendance when it is intended to postpone a Bill.

* (3.12.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (University of London): I am very sorry if the right hon. Gentleman has been put to any inconvenience. I may explain that the reason of the postponement is simply a desire to consult the convenience of the House. It is thought that if a few days more time are allowed arrangements may be made which will prevent a protracted discussion. I regret the inconvenience to which the right hon. Gentleman has been subjected, and I will undertake to inform him of the day on which the Second Reading will be taken.

Lord de Ramsey

*MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I think the President of the Local Government Board should not complain of being brought here early, as it is the duty of Her Majesty's Ministers to set an example to the rest of the House by attending prayers.

Motion agreed to.

LONDON WATER COMMISSION BILL (by Order.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(3.15.) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I opposed the Second Reading of this Bill last week not with a view of preventing it from being sent to a Select Committee, but in order to give to those gentlemen interested in this important question—and there are many hon. Members interested in it besides those who represent Metropolitan Constituencies—the only opportunity which the forms of this House afford for discussing it. Three other Bills dealing with the water supply have been introduced this Session, but neither of them have obtained a favourable place upon the Order Book; and, therefore, as they cannot be discussed, it will only be by the generosity and forbearance of the House that they can be referred to a Select Committee. This is absolutely the only opportunity the Members for London have of discussing this most important question. And I think it will be generally conceded that it is a subject which requires full discussion on the floor of this House. After 25 years of discussion, investigation, and discovery, before Select Committees and Royal Commissions, we seem to be at last within measurable distance of placing the control of the water supply of London in the hands of the people of the Metropolis themselves. I do not mean to say that the eight Water Companies of London have done their work badly. The enemies of the Water Companies simply say that the supply of water is dear and bad. I am not one of the enemies of the Water Companies, and I do not subscribe to that assertion. On the contrary, I say that, considering the rapid increase of the consumption and of the population within the area supplied, London, on the whole, has been wonderfully well supplied with water. Indeed, some of the Water Companies—for instance, the West Middlesex and the New River, are models of good management and business-like ability. Of course the system by which the price of water is raised on the valuation of houses cannot be long maintained, although it is a system of which the poor at any rate have no reason to complain. But the case for the transference of the powers of the Water Companies to a public representative authority cannot be said to depend mainly upon the dearness and badness of the supply. If the water reformers were to base their case for the creation of a public authority on the dearness and badness of the supply, they would not be in the strong position I think they are in at this moment. The demand for the creation of a water authority is based rather on the idea that if a profit is to be made it should be made, not in the interests of a private undertaking, but in the interests of the public themselves. That is a view which has been recommended over and over again, both by Select Committees and Royal Commissions. We are all agreed that the undertakings of the existing companies ought to be acquired by some public authority, but we are very far from being agreed as to what the authority should be, or how the Commission or Water Trust should be constituted. This Bill proposes to create a Water Commission in London, which is to have the power of promoting Bills in Parliament for the acquisition of the undertakings of the existing Water Companies, and to do everything that may be necessary to enable the Commission to step into the Water Company's shoes. It will, therefore, be seen that the terms on which the Water Companies are to be acquired form the most important point in the whole controversy, and it is a point which is left by this Bill for future settlement by Parliament. So far I heartily approve of the Bill, but it is when I come to the Schedule which proposes the constitution of the Water Commission in a particular manner that I find myself obliged to part company with the promoters and to express my fear that the schedule itself will be knocked into a cocked hat by a Committee upstairs. The measure proposes, that a Commission shall be created, composed of 51 members, namely—

“The Lord Mayor of the City of London, the Chairman of the London County Council (ex officio); the remaining 49 original members shall be nominated as follows, namely: The President of the Local Government Board shall nominate 1, the President of the Board of Agriculture, 1, the Corporation of the City of London, 5, the London County Council, 20, the County Council of Middlesex, 4, the County Council of Surrey, 4, the County Council of Essex, 3, the County Council of Hertfordshire, 1, the County Council of Buckinghamshire, 1, the County Council of Berkshire, 1, the County Council of Oxfordshire, 1, the Corporation of the Borough of West-Ham, 1, the Corporation of the Borough of Richmond, 1, the Corporation of the Borough of Kingston-upon-Thames, 1, the Corporation of the Borough of Windsor, 1, the Corporation of the Borough of Reading, 1, the Corporation of the Borough of Abingdon, 1, the Corporation of the City of Oxford, 1. If and whenever Parliament shall so direct, additional members may be from time to time nominated by the County Council of each of the counties next hereinafter mentioned, namely: Gloucestershire, Wiltshire, Hampshire, Kent, and by the respective Boards of Conservancy of the Rivers Thames and Lee.”

There are four methods by which the water supply of London may be undertaken. First, by a system of delegation to a body nominated by existing authorities elective or official; next by creating a new authority, to be chosen by popular election; thirdly by taking one of the existing local authorities; and, lastly, by appointing a small Commission of experts. Now, we have had some experience in London of the principle of delegation, and it has not been found to work favourably. The Metropolitan Board of Works was a delegated body, and it expired in anything but an odour of sanctity. It is impossible, therefore, to speculate upon the fate of a double dose of delegation composed of the London County Council and the City Corporation. So far as the second method is concerned, I, for one, am very loth to add to the number of existing Local Authorities in London. I am unwilling to subject the wretched Londoner to the nuisance and worry of another election, and to compel him to spend his life in voting for somebody or another. No sooner has he voted for Codlin than he is required to vote for Short, and frequent elections have become the greatest bore and nuisances of the 19th century. The third alternative is to take one of the existing Local Authorities and clothe it with the powers of a Water Commission, and the London

County Council have volunteered for the job; they have expressed their willingness to be the new Water Commission, and I am perfectly convinced that if the question was to find a Government for Mashonaland, the London County Council would readily volunteer. We who do not belong to that august body are of opinion that the London County Council is already overworked, and that it cannot satisfactorily discharge the work it already has to do. It would be the height of midsummer madness to add to the labours of that already overworked body. The last alternative is one which I throw out for the favourable consideration of the House, namely, the appointment of a small body of professional experts, who should be paid such a salary as would secure the services of competent men such as now manage the affairs of the Water Companies. If you want to have extravagance, delay, and I might almost add jobbery, have a popularly elected body. [Ironical Cheers.] I am speaking of purely administrative functions. If you really desire despatch, efficiency, and economy, you will have a well paid body of professional experts—and that is the suggestion which I humbly make.

(3.25.) Mr. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): A good many hon. Members on this side of the House recognise the dissatisfaction that has been aroused at the authority proposed to be created by the Bill; but I do not share the views of the last speaker as to the inefficiency and unsuitability of the London County Council for the purpose required. We oppose the constitution of a new public authority. The hon. Member appears to hold very cheaply public representative bodies as administrative bodies. If his objections are of a general character they must apply to the whole of the recent legislation of Parliament and the action of the President of the Local Government Board, who has done so much to place the administration of local affairs in the hands of local representative bodies. Has the principle failed in regard to other large towns? It appears to me that the hon. Member has failed to show that there is any ground why the London County Council should not be the authority in this matter, except that it is not the existing authority at present, and the hon. Gentleman and his friends take every opportunity of giving it a kick whenever they can. As a Municipal Authority exists in London the most sensible plan would be to hand the control of the water supply over to it. What is the reasonable ground for making such a difference in the case of London, and electing such an authority as that proposed, except ill-will to the County Council? It is said that the water supply of London is in some way different in arrangement from that of other great towns; but I beg entirely to dissent from that position, as I do not believe that there is any particular point in connection with the water supply of London which has not had its counterpart in many other great towns in this country, and arrangements can be easily made, as they have been made in other towns. Manchester supplies Salford by meter, and Bradford is bound to supply the Local Authorities of outlying districts, if they desire it, although the Local Authorities are not bound to take the water unless they want it. Now that Manchester draws its supply from Thirlmere, it is bound to supply it to any township on the way as long as a certain minimum is left for the supply of Manchester. In other cases there are different arrangements to meet the difficulty, and these have been found to work well. There is another point on which it is said that the London water supply differentiates from that of other towns—namely, that it is gathered from districts which come under the jurisdiction of other County Councils, and that we ought therefore to put on the governing body representatives from those County Councils as well as that of London itself. This question has not been solved in that way in any other instance. Manchester, before getting its supply from Thirlmere, drew it from neighbouring districts, but those districts were not represented on the governing body. At Bradford the difficulty was met by having large stores of water placed under a separate Commission, which sees that the Bradford Corporation keeps to what it is obliged to do by Act of Parliament. With regard to the question of whether the plan proposed in this Bill will work, I think that it would not. Already, by the very petitions against the Bill, the interests of the other communities are shown to be in contradiction to the interests of the Metropolis, and therefore we should be placing on the governing body in about equal proportions two sets of people whose interests would be permanently antagonistic, the result of which would be that the body would be an unworkable one. Again, the money must be raised in some way or other for the purchase of the Companies or for the creation of new water supplies which the Companies themselves, if left, would soon have to face; the money must be raised on terms fair to the people of London, because the rates of London would be the security. How would they manage to raise money chiefly on the guarantee of a body such as that proposed? If this Bill is to be referred to a hybrid Committee upstairs, I hope that it will be a strong Committee, and that some endeavour will be made or an Instruction moved in order to enable it to investigate the whole of the question, and to consider in a wide manner the powers to be given to the governing body, and its future action. These are interests vital to the Metropolis, not only on account of their intrinsic importance, but also in relation to the sanitary condition of London. The subject is vast in its hygienic relations, and in its relations to the poor of the Metropolis and to the purses of the ratepayers, and one question which will have to be considered by the Committee is the price to be paid for this article.

Mr. Baumann

(3.40.) SIR A. BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.): I quite agree that upon this important question it is of urgent necessity and urgent importance that a prompt decision should be arrived at. I, therefore, hope that this Bill and other Bills on the same subject will be referred to a strong Committee in order that the question may be settled upon some absolutely definite basis. I am afraid that the present measure is somewhat too ambitious in its objects. It wanders away to the City of Oxford, and it proposes merely to raise the sum of £5,000 within 12 months for the payment of a Chairman and 51 members. It is doubtful whether such a body ought to be paid at all; but certainly if it is to be paid it ought not to be paid by the Corporation of the City of London. At the same time I doubt whether the ratepayers of the Metropolis would regard with favour the prospect of being saddled with the payment of money to this body. The Bill, as it stands, is altogether unsatisfactory. What is good in it will probably be taken into consideration by the Committee upstairs, and will find its way in proposals to be submitted to the House. I hope to have the honour shortly to move the Second Reading of a measure that deals exhaustively with the whole of the water supply of London, and which contains provisions to take exclusive powers for supplying water and for securing an equalisation of rates. The latter is an important object, because the rates at present are most unequal. For instance, a house of £30 pays in one case £1 4s. per annum; in another £1 8s., and in others £2. I hope that this Bill with other kindred measures will go to the Committee, and that the Report of such Committee may be received this Session, so that prompt legislation may follow.

(3.45.) MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): The hon. Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann) has indulged in one of his chronic and splenetic attacks upon the London County Council, and yet I find that he, in common with the hon. Baronet the Member for Kensington (Sir A. Borthwick), proposes a Bill which would create a new body directly elected by the people of the Metropolis to take over the water supply, or, if the County Council are agreeable, to hand it over to them. If I do not move the rejection of the Bill, it is not because I do not think it an unworkable piece of legislation, but because it raises a question of vital importance after a lapse of 11 years, and recognises the principle that the water supply of the Metropolis should be controlled by a responsible public body. The central point is so far good, but the composition of the new body is ludicrous. The Bill is to secure and manage the water supply of London, but it is proposed to give a majority of Members outside the county, who would be able to out-vote London. It is a manifest absurdity to propose that the London County Council should send 20 members, the Corporation of London six or seven more, and that the total numbers of members should be 57. There would be perpetual collisions between the "insiders" and the "outsiders"—between the representatives of the area supplied and the representatives of the area from which the supply was drawn, and the rates of London would be pledged by the action of a body of 57 members, of whom the County of London would only furnish 20. The County Council should lay down the policy and exercise control, and a small body of experts, adequately paid, should manage the details. I believe this scheme to be inadequate and unsatisfactory. The question is whether the present supply is worth the purchase. The Chemical Commission (1851) was against the present system, and the Water Commission (1869) underrated the increase of population. Before the introduction of a measure of this character, there should have been the fullest preliminary inquiry, to bring our information up to date, into cost, quantity, and quality. What is true of the Thames is true of the Lea. The chalk would not, according to expert opinion, be more than auxiliary. Almost certainly we should require a new and independent supply, like Glasgow, Manchester, and Liverpool. This shows the necessity for investigation as a preliminary to any legislation by the House empowering any public body to control the supply. This is a very serious question, affecting the health and comfort of more than 5,000,000 of people, and I appeal to the House not to make their last state worse than their first.

*(4.5.) MR. RITCHIE: I do not think it is necessary that I should discuss this Bill at any length. The Debate has shown conclusively one thing, which is a matter for congratulation, namely, that all parties in the House have come to the conclusion that the water supply, apart from the question whether the present supply is good or bad, ought to be in the hands of some public authority who should furnish the supply in the interests of the community and not for individual profit. That is a principle I have always supported. The hon. Member for Peckham states that he has very little confidence in the London County Council or the London Corporation, but with these views of the hon. Member in respect to the County Council I must disclaim any sympathy. The London County Council have had imposed upon them a very difficult task, and no doubt they have made some mistakes; but, nevertheless, I have perfect confidence that the London County Council, if intrusted with the water supply of the Metropolis, will discharge the duties connected therewith ably and well, and without a particle of anything approaching jobbery. I have never disguised my own opinion, which is that having established such a body for the whole of London, it is the proper body to be entrusted with the administration of the water supply, though, no doubt, it may be reasonable and desirable to give some representation to the outlying districts on the administrative Committee. But this and other points are not under consideration now. If we were discussing the details of the measure, I should certainly feel disposed to criticise some of the provisions of the Bill adversely. It must be agreed that there ought to be a full and complete inquiry into the whole question of the water supply, and that it would be well that that inquiry should take place before a Committee of this House, who should consider all the proposals brought forward on the subject, whether by the Corporation, the County Council, or the Vestries. I agree with the hon. Member for Hoxton (Mr. Stuart) that the Committee should be a very strong one. I think it is for the interest of everybody that the Report presented should be the Report of a Committee in whom the House has full and complete confidence. If any point is omitted by the Committee its attention can be directed to it by means of an Instruction. I would, therefore, suggest that, instead of hon. Members moving an Instruction now, they should wait until the other Bills on the subject have received their Second Reading, when all the Bills may be referred to the Committee, with, if necessary, such an Instruction as would enable the Committee to fully inquire into every branch of this subject. I hope that when the Bill of the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir A. Borthwick) comes before the House it will be read a second time.

Mr. Lawson

MR. LAWSON: How can you secure that?

*MR. RITCHIE: It can be done in one or two ways—either with the general concurrence of the House or by some arrangement with the Government.

One thing is certain, that if we inquire into the question at all, the Bill ought to go before the Committee. I hope that body will be able to avail themselves of the very best professional skill available, in order to arrive at a solution of this most difficult and complex question.

(4.15). SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I entirely concur in almost every word that has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. I was especially glad to hear him bear testimony to the efficiency of the London County Council, and express his opinion that that body is the proper body to have the administration of the water supply, without, however, excluding the representation of the London Corporation. The fact is that this question of the water supply has been hung up until such a body as the London County Council should come into existence. The Committee of 1882 recommended that the subject should be dealt with by the Government, and certainly it is too large to be effectively dealt with by any private Bill. It is impossible to conceive anything more preposterous than that the Corporation of London should be able to introduce a Bill on this subject and that the County Council should not have the same power. I hope that this point will be taken into consideration by the right hon. Gentleman. The proposal for an alternative water supply is satisfactory. In the absence of power to establish an alternative supply, it would be always impossible to buy up the Water Companies on fair terms. Then, in case of contemplated purchase, care should be taken to ascertain the views of the buyers as well as of the vendors. On a former occasion negotiations for sale fell through because it was found that certain agreements had already been made with the Water Companies, with which agreements the people who were to buy would have nothing to do. The moment those agreements were published the capital of the Companies went up nine millions; but when it was found that there was to be no purchase the capital fell by the same amount. The Companies will never be made to take a reasonable view until an alternative scheme is rendered possible. I think myself that the time has come when London should have a new supply of water. When we remember how the great cities of ancient times were supplied with water, and when we see the great aqueducts in Italy and France we can come to no other conclusion but that it is absurd that London should not have a far better water supply than it has. Seeing that cities which are mere villages compared with London have been supplied adequately and cheaply, it is monstrous to think that London cannot be supplied for less than £33,000,000. As the question is now in a fair way for settlement I hope the Government will bring in a Bill to determine who the authority should be and what extent of authority it should be entrusted with. I do not favour the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject, for a body of that kind seldom reports before the expiration of five years. Let the County Council be empowered to take steps, and I believe that a satisfactory result will be achieved.

(4.26.) MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I must ask for the indulgence of the House while I say a few words on behalf of those who live outside the Metropolitan area. At present one-half of the supply for London is taken from the River Thames, and my contention is that if it is intended to take a still further quantity from the Thames the people resident along the banks of the river, who are deeply interested in the matter, ought to be represented on the Commission. The real question is whether an independent supply should not be obtained, and I believe that no good will be done by way of settlement of the question until this is ensured. In that case the inhabitants of the outside area adjacent to the Thames would not need representation.

*(4.29.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: Before the House proceeds to read the Bill a second time perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words on the important subject. I do not think the promoters of this Bill would base their grounds for it on the allegation that the water supplied in London is either dear or bad. My own individual opinion would rather be to change the present system of charge rather than to take the matter entirely out of the hands of the companies. Much dissatisfaction is certainly felt with the system of charging on the rate of assessment, and there is a strong belief that the supply of water in the basins of the Thames and Lea will not long suffice for the growing needs of the Metropolis. It is, therefore, necessary to make further provision within a comparatively short time. I am afraid we shall never get a system of Government entirely satisfactory to the hon. Member for Peckham. He proposes that the management of the Water Companies should be entrusted to a small body of professional experts, but then the question arises, by whom is that small body to be appointed? I desire to thank the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board for the testimony he has borne to the work of the London County Council. I hope the hon. Member for St. Pancras will accept the suggestion thrown out by the right hon. Gentleman, and withdraw his Instruction, in order that a wider one may be framed by the Government. The London County Council do not wish to oppose the Bill, but they do not wish it to go forth they are entirely satisfied with its provisions. There are two proposals in the Bill especially which seem open to serious objection. One is the mode of raising the funds. I agree with the hon. Member for Hoxton that the money should be raised on London County Council Stock and upon the security of the Metropolitan rates. If a new Stock is created a higher rate will have to be paid, and even if the difference is only one-quarter or one-eighth, still on such large amounts the loss will be considerable. Secondly, the constitution of the Commission is not satisfactory. At the same time the London County Council have confidence that these and all other questions will be thoroughly and carefully discussed upstairs. They hope that the strongest possible Committee will be selected to deal with this very important question, and believing that that will be the case they do not desire to offer any opposition to the Second Reading of the Bill.

(4.33.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury East): This is one of the most important questions affecting London that has ever come before the House, and I therefore think hon. Members opposite should not be so anxious to end the Debate, for we ought to be careful that no mistake is made in providing that proper terms and an adequate water supply are secured. I rise, after the generous speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, to ask my hon. Friend the Member for West St. Pancras to fall in with his suggestion, so that we may have one comprehensive Instruction given to the Committee. This afternoon's Debate has been one which must have given satisfaction to all hon. Members who desire to see the water supply of London placed under the control of a representative body. Should it be decided to purchase the undertakings of the existing Companies, one point ought to be borne in mind. It ought to be ascertained whether the Companies, while they have been paying large dividends, have created adequate sinking funds which would enable them to secure fresh sources of supply if necessary. If they have not done that, the capitalised value of their property is not so great as has been suggested, and I think the figures of 33,000,000, which have been quoted, are at least 100 per cent. too high. For this, if for no other reason, we must have a strong Committee.

Sir J. Lubbock

(4.36.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I want to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to the Metropolitan Water Companies Charges Bill which I have in charge, and the Second Reading of which is fixed for the 4th March, and which, I hope, will have the support of the Government. It will prevent the companies raising their charges upon the forthcoming revaluation of property, and I maintain that any such increase ought certainly to be prevented at a time when it is probable that the undertakings of the companies may be acquired by a Public Authority.

*(4.37.) MR. LAWSON: I am willing to accept the general view of the House and withdraw my Instruction, providing we have a distinct understanding. There are three Bills before the House, and I should like to know if, when the right hon. Gentleman speaks of their being read a second time, he intends to give facilities for that, because we know the Water Companies have friends in this House who object to anybody interfering with them in their long feast upon our increasing rateable value. Under these circumstances, there might be some difficulty in getting the Bills read a second time. Is the right hon. Gentleman willing to move an Instruction covering the questions of the quantity, quality, and cost of the water supply.

*(4.39.) Mr. RITCHIE: I can hardly think the House would be satisfied with referring only this Bill to the Committee. No doubt it would wish to refer the Bills which are much more comprehensive in their character, and which raise the issue much better than this particular measure. The Government will take care that the Instruction to the Committee will secure inquiry into the whole matter.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee of Nine Members, Five to be nominated by the House and Four by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That all Petitions against the Bill presented Five clear days before the meeting of the Committee be referred to the Committee that the Petitioners praying to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard against the Bill, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. Ritchie.)

METROPOLITAN DISTRICT RAILWAY BILL (by Order).

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

*(4.41.) Mr. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I rise to move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months. I think the House hardly knows what this Bill proposes. Under cover of a Railway Bill this Bill will empower the Railway Company to establish places of what they call "instruction, recreation, and amusement;" in other words, "Barnum" shows or Cremorne Gardens; and that I think is not the proper business of a Railway Company. The company have rights over two pieces of land, one of which has been used for the "Wild West" Exhibition, and the other is a triangular piece of ground west of Gloucester Road. The company, under cover of this Bill, propose to take power to convert this triangular piece of road into, as they term it, "a place of instruction, recreation, and amusement," and they will injuriously affect surrounding property in the same way as the Kensington Exhibitions proved a serious detriment to the property in their neighbourhood. I repeat it is no part of the work of a Railway Company to establish such places. Another and equally important point is that in Clause 7, the company actually propose that they shall have power to get rid of and rescind all the agreements they have made with respect to this land. That is a course the House of Commons will hardly sanction. These two acres of ground have been planted by the residents on the understanding that the land shall not be used, or the trees cut down, except for purposes of the railway. If the land is wanted for railway purposes, no one can possibly object; but it is reasonable to expect, inasmuch as Parliament has given compulsory powers to the company to acquire the land, that it shall be used simply for the purposes of the railway itself. I think we cannot pass the Bill or allow it to proceed to another stage unless we have a distinct understanding that all the clauses relating to the Metropolitan District Railway Company, starting or causing to be started a place of amusement of an evening fête or Cremorne nature, shall be cut out of the Bill. It is quite certain, if this proposal had been made in the early days of the company, it would not have got power to acquire the land. For these reasons, I move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Bartley.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

(4.46.) Mr. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to second the Motion for the rejection of the Bill. As one living in the neighbourhood of this triangular piece of ground, I may say that it can be of no good except for the purposes of the railway or an open space. There is practically no access to it. There was a period when those who lived in the houses abutting on it hoped that the supply of water in the basins of the Thames and Lea will not long suffice for the growing needs of the Metropolis. It is, therefore, necessary to make further provision within a comparatively short time. I am afraid we shall never get a system of Government entirely satisfactory to the hon. Member for Peckham. He proposes that the management of the Water Companies should be entrusted to a small body of professional experts, but then the question arises, by whom is that small body to be appointed? I desire to thank the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board for the testimony he has borne to the work of the London County Council. I hope the hon. Member for St. Pancras will accept the suggestion thrown out by the right hon. Gentleman, and withdraw his Instruction, in order that a wider one may be framed by the Government. The London County Council do not wish to oppose the Bill, but they do not wish it to go forth they are entirely satisfied with its provisions. There are two proposals in the Bill especially which seem open to serious objection. One is the mode of raising the funds. I agree with the hon. Member for Hoxton that the money should be raised on London County Council Stock and upon the security of the Metropolitan rates. If a new Stock is created a higher rate will have to be paid, and even if the difference is only one-quarter or one-eighth, still on such large amounts the loss will be considerable. Secondly, the constitution of the Commission is not satisfactory. At the same time the London County Council have confidence that these and all other questions will be thoroughly and carefully discussed upstairs. They hope that the strongest possible Committee will be selected to deal with this very important question, and believing that that will be the case they do not desire to offer any opposition to the Second Reading of the Bill.

(4.33.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury East): This is one of the most important questions affecting London that has ever come before the House, and I therefore think hon. Members opposite should not be so anxious to end the Debate, for we ought to be careful that no mistake is made in providing that proper terms and an adequate water supply are secured. I rise, after the generous speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, to ask my hon. Friend the Member for West St. Pancras to fall in with his suggestion, so that we may have one comprehensive Instruction given to the Committee. This afternoon's Debate has been one which must have given satisfaction to all hon. Members who desire to see the water supply of London placed under the control of a representative body. Should it be decided to purchase the undertakings of the existing Companies, one point ought to be borne in mind. It ought to be ascertained whether the Companies, while they have been paying large dividends, have created adequate sinking funds which would enable them to secure fresh sources of supply if necessary. If they have not done that, the capitalised value of their property is not so great as has been suggested, and I think the figures of 33,000,000, which have been quoted, are at least 100 per cent. too high. For this, if for no other reason, we must have a strong Committee.

Sir J. Lubbock

(4.36.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I want to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to the Metropolitan Water Companies Charges Bill which I have in charge, and the Second Reading of which is fixed for the 4th March, and which, I hope, will have the support of the Government. It will prevent the companies raising their charges upon the forthcoming revaluation of property, and I maintain that any such increase ought certainly to be prevented at a time when it is probable that the undertakings of the companies may be acquired by a Public Authority.

*(4.37.) MR. LAWSON: I am willing to accept the general view of the House and withdraw my Instruction, providing we have a distinct understanding. There are three Bills before the House, and I should like to know if, when the right hon. Gentleman speaks of their being read a second time, he intends to give facilities for that, because we know the Water Companies have friends in this House who object to anybody interfering with them in their long feast upon our increasing rateable value. Under these circumstances, there might be some difficulty in getting the Bills read a second time. Is the right hon. Gentleman willing to move an Instruction covering the questions of the quantity, quality, and cost of the water supply.

*(4.39.) MR. RITCHIE: I can hardly think the House would be satisfied with referring only this Bill to the Committee. No doubt it would wish to refer the Bills which are much more comprehensive in their character, and which raise the issue much better than this particular measure. The Government will take care that the Instruction to the Committee will secure inquiry into the whole matter.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee of Nine Members, Five to be nominated by the House and Four by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That all Petitions against the Bill presented Five clear days before the meeting of the Committee be referred to the Committee that the Petitioners praying to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard against the Bill, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. Ritchie.)

METROPOLITAN DISTRICT RAILWAY BILL (by Order).

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

*(4.41.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I rise to move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months. I think the House hardly knows what this Bill proposes. Under cover of a Railway Bill this Bill will empower the Railway Company to establish places of what they call "instruction, recreation, and amusement;" in other words, "Barnum" shows or Cremorne Gardens; and that I think is not the proper business of a Railway Company. The company have rights over two pieces of land, one of which has been used for the "Wild West" Exhibition, and the other is a triangular piece of ground west of Gloucester Road. The company, under cover of this Bill, propose to take power to convert this triangular piece of road into, as they term it, "a place of instruction, recreation, and amusement," and they will injuriously affect surrounding property in the same way as the Kensington Exhibitions proved a serious detriment to the property in their neighbourhood. I repeat it is no part of the work of a Railway Company to establish such places. Another and equally important point is that in Clause 7, the company actually propose that they shall have power to get rid of and rescind all the agreements they have made with respect to this land. That is a course the House of Commons will hardly sanction. These two acres of ground have been planted by the residents on the understanding that the land shall not be used, or the trees cut down, except for purposes of the railway. If the land is wanted for railway purposes, no one can possibly object; but it is reasonable to expect, inasmuch as Parliament has given compulsory powers to the company to acquire the land, that it shall be used simply for the purposes of the railway itself. I think we cannot pass the Bill or allow it to proceed to another stage unless we have a distinct understanding that all the clauses relating to the Metropolitan District Railway Company, starting or causing to be started a place of amusement of an evening fête or Cremorne nature, shall be cut out of the Bill. It is quite certain, if this proposal had been made in the early days of the company, it would not have got power to acquire the land. For these reasons, I move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Bartley.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

(4.46.) Mrs. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to second the Motion for the rejection of the Bill. As one living in the neighbourhood of this triangular piece of ground, I may say that it can be of no good except for the purposes of the railway or an open space. There is practically no access to it. There was a period when those who lived in the houses abutting on it hoped it would be devoted to the purposes of a recreation ground in connection with a large educational establishment, but unfortunately that hope passed away with Mons. Capel, and since then there has been much anxiety on the subject. I do not wish to say anything against the Exhibitions which were held upon the land, more than that the residents have been exceedingly annoyed by the scenes that have gone on there, and they look with the greatest possible anxiety upon what they believe would be nothing less than another Cremorne in that part of London. I think the residents have a great right to complain, for the land was acquired by the company compulsorily for railway purposes, and there ought to be no deviation from the arrangement. I trust the House will not allow a precedent to be created which will allow a Railway Company to be the means of half ruining a neighbourhood by establishing a centre of immorality at a point where it would be worse than in almost any other part of the Metropolis. I may add that that neighbourhood is not over well supplied with open spaces. We had hoped this piece of land would have been set apart as an open space; and I think that if this House refuses to allow the company to do as they propose, the time may yet come when the land will be utilised as an open space for the benefit of the very large population in that neighbourhood.

(4.50.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I hope the House will not occupy much time in the discussion of this question. This is an omnibus Bill, and the hon. Member for Islington opposes only one clause, the question involved in which has been raised by the Petition lodged against the Bill, and which can be argued before the Select Committee to which the Bill will go. It is not the ordinary practice of the House to object to the Second Reading of a Bill of this kind upon objection to one clause. But any persons who may have rights in this land will have them protected, because the company, in answer to the objections of the residents in the neighbourhood, have agreed to insert words in the clause, which will leave their present rights and powers in the land absolutely unaffected. I hope the House, therefore, will at once reject the Amendment.

Mr. J. R. Kelly

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

QUESTIONS.

SUDBROOKE PARK.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether arrangements can be made for giving to the public access to Sudbrooke Park (which adjoins Richmond Park, and is separated from it only by a light iron railing), and also for allowing clubs and other bodies willing to bear the expense of laying down cricket pitches to play cricket there, that game being at present forbidden in Richmond Park?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Sudbrooke Park was purchased by the Crown in 1841, at a total cost of £34,856, in order to prevent Richmond Park from being spoilt by the erection of unsuitable buildings in its neighbourhood. Of the 130 acres, 20 were added to Richmond Park. I do not think it is necessary to add any more to the 2,000 acres already available to the public in Richmond Park. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests will be prepared to consider any application that may be made for the use of a portion of the ground for cricket and other games.

ST. AUGUSTINE'S SCHOOL.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that in the accounts of the St. Augustine's Boys' School, as published in the "Annual Statement of Work and Funds of the Parish, for the year ending December 31st, 1890," there are charged to the debit of the school the following amounts:—£26 12s. 9d. Sunday school expenses, and deficit on treats £16 8s. 8d., half expenses of parish house; whether these charges appear in the Statement of Accounts furnished to the Department; and whether they are a legal charge on the school fund; and, if not, what steps he proposes to take in the matter?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): If the hon. Member will kindly put his question in a form which will enable me to identify the school to which he refers, I shall be happy to furnish him with all the information in my power.

STREET LIGHTING IN EAST LONDON.

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been directed to the very inadequate lighting of the by-streets in the Eastern districts of London; and whether he could address representations to the Local Authorities, urging them to attend to this important matter?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): My attention has not been directed to the inadequate lighting of the by-streets in the Eastern districts of London, and I have received no complaints on the subject. My right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department has communicated with the Chief Commissioner of Police, with the view of ascertaining whether there are any by-streets in the districts referred to where additional lighting is required, and if it should appear to be necessary I will communicate with the Vestries of the parishes on the subject.

RAILWAY RATES.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the general public interest involved in the settlement of Railway Rates, and with the object of avoiding the possibility of technical objections being raised to any "Appearances" before the Joint Committee to which the Railway Provisional Order Bills are to be referred, he will be good enough to consider the advisability of endeavouring to procure the passing of a Resolution in each House of Parliament, to the effect—

"That all the Petitions against the Provisional Order Bills and Schedules, and Maximum Rates and Charges and Classifications of Merchandise Traffic comprised therein, be referred to the Committee on the Bills, and that such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, Agents, and Witnesses, be heard on their Petitions, if they think fit, and that Counsel be heard in favour of the Bills against such Petitions;"

and if he will, either by the same Resolution, or in some other manner, provide for the enlargement of the time during which Petitions may be presented in respect of the Provisional Order Bills, so as to enable ample opportunity for farmers, traders, and others to prepare and present Petitions in regard thereto?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Yes, Sir; I think the suggestion made in the question of the hon. Baronet is a reasonable one, and I shall be prepared to give effect to it at the proper time. As at present informed, I am inclined to think that the best means of doing so, so far as this House is concerned, will be to pass a Resolution in terms similar to those which are in use when Bills are referred to what are known as Hybrid Committees. The procedure in the other House of Parliament is somewhat different, but the matter shall have my attention, and I shall be prepared to communicate with the officers of that House on the subject.

PLANK BEDS FOR CASUAL PAUPERS.

MR. ALFRED THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether it is true that no casual paupers in the Metropolis are any longer required to lie upon plank beds; whether casual paupers in any union ward in England or Wales are still required to lie on plank beds; and, if so, what is the name of the union or unions; and whether the Local Government Board will take immediate steps for abolishing them?

MR. LONG: In the casual wards in the Metropolis there is no union in which wooden beds are used for the casual paupers. The question of the use of these wooden beds in casual wards has been receiving the attention of the Local Government Board, and they have obtained information from their Inspectors on the subject. These beds are in very general use in some of the districts in England, and especially in the North, and their use is defended on the ground that they are more cleanly than mattresses. It would appear that the question whether or not there is any hardship attending the sleeping on these beds must mainly depend on the number and thickness of the rugs which are supplied to the inmate and on which he can lie; and I am assured by the Inspectors that, although vagrants show no indisposition to complain to them if they consider that they have cause, no complaints are made as to these beds. In cases where these wooden beds are used, and it appears to the Inspector that there is any ground for complaint as to the insufficiency of the rugs, the attention of the Guardians shall be drawn to the matter.

TELEGRAPH REVISION SCHEME.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state at what date the revision scheme in telegraph offices throughout the United Kingdom will be completed?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The revision scheme to which the noble Lord apparently alludes was carried into effect in July last. The corollary measure, which is independent of that revision, and only deals with a comparatively small number of superior officers, is now engaging the attention of the Treasury.

LIVERPOOL CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

EARL COMPTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the Central Telegraph Office buildings at Liverpool are unhealthy and unsatisfactory; and, if so, what steps he intends to take in the matter?

*MR. RAIKES: Assuming that the noble Lord is referring to the head post office at Liverpool, I have to state that the special inquiry mentioned in my reply of December 8 last to the hon. Member for the Kirkdale Division has been made, and that the whole subject is now under the consideration of the Treasury.

CONDITION OF CASUAL WARDS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been drawn to the statements made by Mr. William Booth as to the condition of casual wards, and confirmed by a letter published in the Standard of the 18th instant, signed "A Private Inquiry Officer," who, professing to write from "personal experiences last summer" of 36 casual wards in various parts of the country, states that—

Mr. Long

"The blankets, bedding (when there is any), and the boards are swarming with vermin, and are a disgrace to the Inspectors or supervisors of the parishes to which they belong;"

and whether he is in a position to contradict these statements; and, if not, whether he will direct the Inspectors of the Local Government Board to give special attention to the condition of the casual wards?

MR. LONG: The attention of the Local Government Board has been drawn to the statements referred to, including those in the letter signed "A Private Inquiry Officer" which appeared in the Standard newspaper. It will be realised, when the class of persons who usually frequent the casual wards is borne in mind, that it is not always easy to keep the wards entirely free from vermin, but I have no reason to doubt that proper efforts are made to secure this. The casual wards of the workhouse should, of course, receive the attention of the Inspector as much as any other wards of the workhouse, and the Inspectors are fully aware of this. If the Board receive from the hon. Member, or from the writer of the letter referred to, any definite statements with regard to any particular casual ward, they will be quite prepared to cause special inquiry to be made as to the allegations.

SMOKE ABATEMENT IN LONDON.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in the Bill to be introduced "to amend and consolidate the laws relating to the public health in the Metropolis," it is proposed to deal with the question of smoke and fogs, from which the Metropolis has recently suffered so much; and whether he will consider the desirability of instituting an inquiry on this important subject by a Committee of the House, or otherwise?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, (Birmingham, E.): My right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board will very soon circulate a Bill to amend and consolidate the law as to public health in the Metropolis, and my hon. Friend will, I hope, be content to await the publication of this Bill for an answer to his first question. A Committee of the House of Lords sat in 1887 to investigate the subject of smoke in the Metropolis, and I do not think any new light will be thrown on the subject by another inquiry of this nature.

LORD E. HAMILTON (Tyrone, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has seen the letter of Messrs. Elliot and Co., in the Times of yesterday, giving the simple explanation of the presence of the black smoke which he stated on Tuesday last was frequently seen issuing from their engine on the Thames Embankment; and whether, in the face of that explanation, and in face of the atmospheric conditions by which we have been surrounded for the past few days, the Government have still no intention of investigating the merits of an invention which promises to render perfectly simple the process of entirely freeing London from all smoke?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The investigation of the merits of this invention seems to be a matter for a specialist; but, so far as the Metropolitan Police are competent to do so, the scheme will be inquired into and a Report made to the Secretary of State.

BACCARAT.

Mr. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the Solicitor to the Treasury, when prosecuting clubs for allowing baccarat to be played, has always described the game as an illegal game, and that Magistrates have invariably convicted; and whether the advisers to the Solicitor of the Treasury are also the advisers to the Home Secretary?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Solicitor to the Treasury that he has no recollection of ever having prosecuted a club for allowing baccarat or any other game to be played, and he has had no occasion to describe it as stated, nor is he aware that Magistrates have invariably convicted. When the Secretary of State has occasion to seek legal advice he consults the Law Officers of the Crown. Their advice is also at the disposal of the Solicitor of the Treasury.

SOUTH HETTON COAL MINE.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to a statement that a certain portion of the South Hetton Coal Mine, namely, the furnace drifts and flues, being considered by the workmen to be in a dangerous condition, owing to the intense heat when men are compelled to go in and clean them, the Inspector of Mines for the district has been requested in writing by the workmen to inspect this portion of the mine, or to cause it to be inspected, and has refused to do so; whether it is competent to the Inspector of Mines, on his own authority, to refuse to inspect a portion of a mine under such circumstances, when requested to do so by the workmen; and assuming the facts to be as stated in this question, what action he proposes to take in the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Inspector, who is now in London on duty, informs me that he has not the actual correspondence before him, but that he received a letter complaining of the heat during the cleaning out of the furnace drift. He at once saw the manager on the subject, who stated that in future the fire should be put out during such cleaning, and, as a matter of fact, the fire was put out on the following day. I do not understand that the Inspector refused to inspect that portion of the mine. It is the duty of Inspectors to visit and inspect a mine either on invitation or complaint, even if it be an anonymous complaint.

IRELAND—RELIEF OF DISTRESS.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.), for Mr. FOLEY (Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his special attention has been drawn to the immediate necessity of opening relief works in the Islands of Turbot and Innisturk and the townlands of Coolacky and Ballyconnell, with the view of preventing the poor people in these localities from dying for want of food; and whether he has taken any steps to relieve the destitute condition of the people?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Relief works have been ordered to be opened in the Islands mentioned.

With regard to the townlands named, which happen to be in the Union of Clifden, railway works are in operation in their neighbourhood.

ARRESTS AT CASTLEREA.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will give a list of the persons arrested under warrants issued from the Court constituted under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, and presided over by Mr. Brady, R.M., at Castlereagh, County Roscommon, showing the hours at which the arrests were made, and distinguishing the cases in which summonses were served before the warrants to arrest were made?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have little doubt the particulars can be given, but if the hon. Member will put down the question for some day next week I shall endeavour to answer it.

THE OFFICE OF HIGH SHERIFF IN IRELAND.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the frequent complaints made in the public Press by gentlemen of limited means who are compelled to serve the office of High Sheriff in Irish counties, with its accompanying considerable expense; and whether he will take some step, either by legislative enactment or otherwise, to relieve gentlemen whose net incomes are within a certain margin from being compelled to accept a position which entails on them an expense which their incomes are unable to bear?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government have had for some time under their careful consideration the great hardship which exists in compelling persons to serve in the office of High Sheriff, which, though now practically an honorary one, entails considerable personal expense. The matter can, however, only be dealt with by legislation, and I fear that there is no chance of any Bill on the subject passing in the present state of business.

THE CASE OF JOHN SAWEY.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord
Mr. A. J. Balfour

Lieutenant of Ireland whether the man, named John Sawey, who was convicted of stabbing Sergeant Greer, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, at Castlewellsan, on the 18th of April last, and sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment on the 3rd of June, and, at the expiration of that term, to find sureties to be of good behaviour for 12 months, or, in default, to be imprisoned for a further term of 12 months, is now at large, though a period of over 10 months of his sentence is unexpired; whether this man had been previously convicted of serious offences against property in the town of Castlewellsan; whether it is true, as is rumoured, that he has been released from a lunatic asylum, to which he had been transferred on doctor's certificate; and whether he has entered into any recognisances to keep the peace in accordance with the sentence passed on him on the 3rd of June; and, if not, whether any, and what, precautions have been taken to protect the inhabitants of Castlewellsan from the probable effects of a recurrence of his homicidal and destructive monomania?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts are substantially as stated in the question. The man was transferred from Belfast Prison to Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum, from which he was subsequently discharged on the grounds of health, with a view to transfer to a local asylum, where he became an ordinary patient, whence he was afterwards discharged by statute, the resident medical superintendent reporting that the man was in an advanced stage of diabetes, and showing no mental symptoms. As regards the inquiry in the last part, the man has not entered into recognisances, but the Governor of Dundrum Asylum reported of the man that he was a quiet, inoffensive, and a very rational patient.

UNIVERSITY JURISDICTION.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the Vice Chancellor of the University of Cambridge having sentenced Kate Elsdon to 21 days' imprisonment for the alleged offence of street walking, and that the trial of the girl took place in private, without evidence on oath and without the presence of a clerk; whether he will consider the expediency of bringing in a Bill to put an end to the jurisdiction of the Vice Chancellor over the inhabitants of Cambridge who are not members of the University; whether he has observed that Mr. Baron Pollock sentenced this girl to 21 days' imprisonment for escaping from the prison of the University; and whether he will consider of granting her a free pardon?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have seen a newspaper report of the case in question. The Vice Chancellor's Court at Cambridge is a Court of Record, which has existed for several centuries under the authority of Royal Charters confirmed by Act of Parliament; and recent decisions of the Supreme Court have recognised that its peculiar restraining jurisdiction over certain classes of the female inhabitants of Cambridge who are not members of the University,

"Was necessary for the preservation of discipline and morals and the prevention of the disorder which the age and disposition of the younger students would tend to produce."

I do not think it expedient to introduce a Bill to destroy their jurisdiction. As to the particular case of Kate Elsdon I will communicate with the learned Judge.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Will the right hon. Gentleman introduce a Bill to secure to these unfortunate persons a public trial, and evidence given on oath?

MR. MATTHEWS: The jurisdiction of the Vice Chancellor's Court has been reviewed elaborately by the Supreme Court on more than one occasion.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I am not asking about the Supreme Court; I do not care a sixpence about the Supreme Court; what I ask is whether the right hon. Gentleman, as a Member of this House, considers it right and proper that the trial of any person should be conducted in private, and that person sent to prison without having counsel, and with nobody present but the Vice Chancellor and a couple of bulldogs, and without evidence given on oath?

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not consider it to be any part of my duty to inquire into the manner in which any lawfully-constituted Court exercises its jurisdiction where no abuses have been brought to my notice.

PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT OF INDIA.

MR. GROTRIAN (Hull, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Secretary of State has repeatedly enjoined on the Government of India that, in the Public Works Department of India, fair treatment should be meted out, as between the Civil and Military Officers, in the matter of promotion and in other matters; and that, by notification 89 G. in the Gazette of India, of 13th January, 1890, a resolution was published, in which it was stated that the number of appointments sanctioned for the Military Works and Public Works Departments were distributed as follows:—one chief engineer and six superintending engineers for the Military Works Department, to 13 chief engineers and 32 superintending engineers in the Civil Department; and it was announced that "The Governor General in Council had been pleased to rule that in future there shall be a separate scale for the promotion of chief and superintending engineers of the Military and Public Works Departments respectively:"

whether he is aware that in the following month a Circular 390 G. of 26th February, 1890, was issued by the Government of India in the Public Works Department to the Military Works Department, stating that superintending engineers in that branch (i.e. Royal Engineer Officers on Military duty) would be eligible for appointments as chief engineers in the Provincial Works Branch of the Public Works Department; and whether these contradictory orders have been issued with the assent of the Secretary of State; and, if not, whether he will direct a withdrawal of notification No. 390 G. of 26th February, 1890?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (SIR JOHN GORST, Chatham): The subject of the distribution of promotion and appointments between the Civil and Military Offices in the Public Works Department of India has already engaged the attention of the Secretary of State, who is in communication with the Government of India on the question.

REFORM OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Ministers propose to bring in in the present Session the Bill for the reform of the House of Lords which they introduced in 1888, or in any other manner to give effect to the Resolution, to which they then declared that they attached much importance, to introduce some change in the composition of that House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian was of opinion that any measure, great or small, dealing with the constitution of the House of Lords could only be undertaken by the virgin energies of a Session, and I see no prospect in the present state of business of carrying any such measure except by general consent, of which I have no hope.

MR. BRYCE: Was not the answer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian made on the 10th of July, and does not the right hon. Gentleman feel any difference between the 20th of February and the 10th of July?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes, Sir; there is, for instance, a difference in temperature. But we have embarked on serious and difficult legislative proposals already, and there is not a hope of that general consent which is necessary, seeing that we have other duties to discharge.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to give notice that I shall oppose any Bill brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman for the reform of the House of Lords.

PETER CALLAGHAN.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state what was the nature of the last Medical Report with reference to the eyesight of Peter Callaghan, of Crossmaglen, County Armagh, now an inmate of Chatham Convict Prison; whether he has lost entirely the sight of one of his eyes since his imprisonment, and the sight of the other has been affected by sympathy and likely to be lost; if he will enlarge the prisoner before his eyesight is altogether lost, or at least give him a ticket of leave as is usually done in cases where the prisoner might have suffered from many years of penal servitude; if he can say by whom the last visit to this prisoner was paid, and if he is now entitled to a visit according to the Prison Rules; and how long the prisoner has been in hospital during his imprisonment in Chatham Convict Prison?

Mr. Bryce

MR. MATTHEWS: A special Report was made in September last by Dr. Hartridge, ophthalmic surgeon to St. Bartholomew's Hospital. In his opinion the right eye was quite normal and healthy, and he saw no reason why it should not remain so. The sight of the left eye was lost from an accident some years ago before Callaghan's imprisonment. Sir J. Ridson Bennett also reported to the visitors in April last that the sight of the eye was destroyed by the original injury six months before entering prison, and that there was absolutely nothing to be done for it when the convict came to the prison. These Reports from eminent authorities afford no justification for the suggestion that imprisonment has endangered or injured his eyesight. The prisoner was last visited by the hon. Member himself in August last, and he is now due for another visit. He has been in hospital four times—105 days in all—since he was admitted to Chatham Prison in 1884.

MR. BLANE: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me another visit to the prisoner?

MR. MATTHEWS: If the hon. Member will apply in the usual way I have no doubt his application will be considered.

MR. DILLON AND MR. O'BRIEN.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I wish to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland of which I have given him private notice. I desire to know whether it is the fact, as stated in one of this morning's papers, that the Member for East Mayo, at present confined in Galway Prison, is unwell; and, if so, whether he has been examined by the visiting surgeon, and whether any order as to his treatment has been made in consequence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have received no information at all bearing upon the point to which the hon. Member refers. There is a most excellent prison physician at Galway, and I am sure every attention will be paid to the hon. Member for East Mayo.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I would draw the right hon. Gentleman's further attention to the report that at one of the stopping places between London and Galway, Clonmel, the hon. Member for East Mayo was placed in an infirmary cell; that on the railway journey to Galway the hon. Member did not seem to be well, but on reaching Galway was placed in an ordinary cell, whilst the hon. Member for East Cork was put in an infirmary cell; and whether both these hon. Members were examined by a surgeon at Clonmel and Galway?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no doubt the hon. Members were examined, but if the hon. Member will give notice of the question inquiries will be made.

MOTION.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION ACT (1879)

AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Cross, Bill to amend "The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Cross, Mr. Coghill, Mr. Gully, Mr. John Kelly, and Mr. Talbot.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 227.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

CHURCH IN WALES.

*(5.15.) MR. W. PRITCHARD-MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I rise to call the attention of the House to the injustice of the continued existence of the Established Church in Wales, and to move:—

"That, as the Church of England in Wales has failed to fulfil its professed object as a means of promoting the religious interests of the Welsh people, and ministers only to a small minority of the population, its continuance as an Established Church in the Principality is an anomaly and an injustice which ought no longer to exist."

Hitherto this Motion has been submitted to the House by hon. Gentlemen who have grown grey in the service of the nation—gentlemen whose experience in this House has gained for them the respect of their Parliamentary Colleagues of every political shade, and whose Parliamentary services have earned for them the admiration, esteem, and affection of their fellow-countrymen. My experience here, compared with theirs, has been brief, and I ask the indulgence of the House in regard to the observations I have to make. Though I lack experience, I trust I shall not lack earnestness in advocating the claims of the Principality to Disestablishment, and in calling attention to the anomaly of maintaining an Established Church in Nonconformist Wales. Some hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House may not have any great respect for the Welsh nation, nor for the national instincts of Wales, and perhaps the people of Wales have instinctively but little respect for them; but if gentlemen opposite would only listen to the arguments which can be adduced in favour of Disestablishment in Wales, and, instead of looking at this matter through the spectacles of Party, would endeavour to regard it with eyes undimmed by bigotry and with minds unbiassed by prejudice, they would speedily respect the cause we are advocating. I do not expect to receive a great deal of consideration from hon. Gentlemen opposite. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) in referring to Wales, has shown as little consideration for the feelings of the Welsh people as he has for the heads of Irishmen; and his contemptuous and contemptible phrase, de minimis non, applied to Wales, aroused as much indignation in the Principality as did his batons and battering-rams across the water. Now, Sir, why should one particular section, numerically small, enjoy privileges which the others, numerically great, do not share with them? Why should the Church of England be the recipient of the patronage of the State when the great majority of the people worship elsewhere than in that Church? If the people constitute the State, the Church of England in Wales is not entitled to be considered the State Church. It is not, and never has been, the Church of the people, and in all probability it never will be. If the people's Church is entitled to be considered the State Church, or if a State Church should exist at all—a question on which I hold very definite opinions—then Nonconformity ought to be established as the State religion of Wales. But no Nonconformist, no Welshman asks for State patronage, State endowment, or State establishment for Nonconformity. The Nonconformist Church of Wales, the great Church of the nation, has established itself in the hearts of the people, and no Act of Parliament can ever remove it from the throne of its authority. If the tests of custom and usage are to be applied in this matter, then Dissent is entitled to equality with the Church, for the Principality has almost universally adopted Nonconformity as its religion. What the Welsh Dissenter asks for and claims as his inalienable right is that those who differ from him in externals, though not in faith, shall have no privileges which he does not equally enjoy. From the time of its establishment by force until to-day the Church of England in Wales has ever been out of harmony with the national spirit. The Church it supplanted, Roman Catholic though it was, was the Church of the people, for when Christianity first gained a foothold in Britain it found a soil congenial to its growth in Wales. There religion and learning grew side by side. Churches arose and great schools were established which supplied scholars to the neighbouring nations and monasteries and abbeys multiplied all over the land. One Welsh county, if it were inclined to boast, could claim to be the birthplace of more saints than the whole of England. Who ever heard of the Church of England in Wales producing a single saint? Wales has saints without number, but they lived at a period anterior to that during which the Church of England was forced down the throats of the people. From the suppression of the ancient Church of Wales in 607 until recent years continual attempts have been made to keep Wales under the heel of English tyranny. There was a foreign garrison in the land. The clergyman, who could not speak the language of the people, was supposed to be in legal possession, although, like the Irish landlord, he preferred to live a long way from the village in which it was his duty to be interested. Attempts were made to suppress the Welsh tongue in the same way as attempts were made to suppress Welsh Nonconformity, but in both cases the attempts were failures.

Mr. W. Pritchard-Morgan

Leaving for the moment remote history we will now deal with more recent events. At the Swansea Church Congress, the late Dean of Bangor formulated a terrible indictment against the Church of which he was one of the brightest ornaments. Speaking of the 150 years which succeeded 1700, he said—

“For 150 years every teacher whose name lives in the hearts of the Welsh people has been, without exception, a Nonconformist. While the Bishops were laying hands upon unfit men, the natural, heaven-born teachers of Wales were influencing thousands in the chapel and cymmanfa. Of the clergy those who were educated knew no Welsh, and those who knew Welsh were not educated. Those who had something to say could not say it to the people, and those who could say it had nothing to say.”

To-day, Sir, perhaps things are somewhat different. The Church has to some extent awakened from its sleep of centuries, and is putting forth endeavours by every means at its disposal—advertising and otherwise—to attract the attention of the people of the Principality. Within the last few days I have been favoured with an exceedingly clever circular letter from a rev. gentleman who lives at Brymbo, near Wrexham. He says—

“No sooner had I built one church in this parish at the cost of £2,300 than I am pressed to build another one. This church is to be a Welsh church. Ever since their church fell down, 20 years ago, the Welsh congregation have had no better building than the day-schoolroom to worship in. Last year that congregation, in addition to paying their own current expenses, handed over £20 towards the Curates' Fund. They alone have collected this £200.”

and he gives a fac simile of the cheque, which is somewhat similar to the notes on the “bank of elegance.”

MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): Will the hon. Gentleman pardon me? He has omitted the next line of the letter.

*MR. W. P. MORGAN: The next line reads as follows:—

“They alone have collected these £200, many of the colliers giving one or two guineas, and as much as £5 coming from some colliers' houses.”

More shame say I that a rich Church like the Church of England should try and wring from the homes of these colliers a sum of £5 which the poor men could ill afford to pay. Now let me read the letter which accompanied this cheque:—

"Dear Vicar,—

We have much pleasure in handing you enclosed cheque for £200, the sum raised by our house-to-house collection. The women hope to clear £100 by their sale of work, and between the laying of the foundation stone and the opening service we hope a further £100 will be raised, making £400 in all. Had the parish not so recently given £700 towards the building of the new English Church there would have been sufficient money forthcoming from us. May God bless our humble efforts, and create much sympathy for us, a Welsh congregation in a Welsh parish, without a church to worship in!"

That means that a number of English people have migrated to this part of Wales, where industries are increasing to some extent, and shows that the alleged growth of the Church of England in Wales is not due to the Welsh people, but to the English people who migrate there. This letter, to my mind, shows that conclusively, otherwise the vicar of this essentially Welsh parish would have first endeavoured to collect the money for the building of the Welsh church, and afterwards, if there had been any balance left, would have set about the building of an English church. But nothing of the sort—he spent £2,300 upon an English church, and then gave the Welsh people something from the fragments after the English church had had the solid loaves and fishes. So much for the Rev. Hugh Roberts of Brymbo. Now I wish to refer very shortly to some statistics, which will show—and I do not think that the figures can be questioned by any hon. Member—that the Church of England in Wales has, in the words of the Motion, "failed to fulfil its professed object." In 1676 the Church of England in Wales boasted of 391,297 adherents, while the Nonconformists in that year only had 10,960, so that we find that in 1676 the Church of England in Wales held 96 per cent. of the worshipping people of the Principality, the Nonconformists claiming only 4 per cent. of them. It may be, and doubtless will be, urged that at that time the Church of England was nominally, if not spiritually, the Church of the people. Whatever it might have been then, I think I can show the House that beyond all question the Church of to-day has ceased to be even the nominal Church of the people. The Church boasted in 1676 of more than 390,000 people; but when we get to the year 1801 we find the Church had so far lost its grip upon the people—if, indeed, it ever had a grip—that the Church only provided sittings for 233,730 people, and it will be safe to assert 200,000 of these seats were never filled. In the same year Nonconformist churches provided sittings for 115,107. It will, therefore, be seen that in 1801 they had increased from 4 per cent. to something near 50 per cent. And then what about the open air meetings, the cymmawfias, where the people used to assemble in thousands for public worship, and to hear the Gospel preached under the canopy of Heaven, in the manner in which our great Master first gave His Gospel to the world? Nonconformity was too poor to build churches at that time, but, fortunately for the Principality, the spiritual growth of the people was accompanied by the increase of temporal prosperity, and in 1851 the state of things was very different to that existing at the commencement of the century. According to the Public Worship Census Report, while the Church of England in Wales provided accommodation for 268,953 people, other churches outside the pale of the Church of England provided for 599,520. Right hon. Gentlemen who profess to belong to this Church and sit on the Treasury Bench smile and sneer at these figures; but they are figures which they cannot dispute, and if they had the true principles of Christianity at heart they would give the people of Wales what they want—equality in religious matters. That is all they ask. Although numerically much stronger, they do not wish to be in a better position than the Church of England; they only claim equality of position in religion. According to the Report from which I have quoted, the Roman Catholic Church provided sittings for 2,823 persons in North Wales, and now I will give the percentages and the precise figures, so that there may be no question hereafter, and that advocates of the Church, like the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Reed) may have the opportunity of meeting facts and figures in detail. In North Wales the percentage of sitting accommodation in churches to population was, in the year I speak of, as follows: Church of England, 28·3 per cent.; Nonconformists, 62·5 per cent. In South Wales the figures were: Church of England, 25·5 per cent.; Nonconformists (not including Roman Catholics), 57 per cent. In 1851, therefore, the Church of England provided for only a quarter of the population of Wales. On March 30 in that year, the attendances at Church of England places of worship were 109,533, while on the same day Nonconformist attendances were 432,274. The churches were not half filled; the chapels were filled to overflowing, independently of many open air meetings held throughout the Principality. In 1879 the Church of England Congress was held at Swansea, the Church people, I suppose, hoping that by coming into direct contact with the Welsh people they might inspire them with the fire and zeal existing among the Church Party! At that Congress the late Archbishop of Canterbury asked "why they saw so many dissenting chapels in every valley and on every hillside." The power of Welsh dissent appeared to be unknown to the heads of the English Church. The hon. Member for the Swansea District (Sir H. H. Vivian) promptly supplied the answer to the query—

"There was more vitality in a religion voluntarily supported than in a largely endowed religion."

Lord Aberdare, another staunch Churchman who once sat for the constituency I have now the honour to represent, said at that Congress—

"Religion would have disappeared from the country but for the exertions of the Nonconformists."

At this same Congress the Dean of Bangor, from whom I have already quoted, further declared that the Church in Wales "had lost five-sixths of the Welsh people." Indeed, the wonder is that the Congress did not proceed to terminate its proceedings by passing such a resolution for disestablishment as that which I am now submitting to the House. Subsequently to the Congress, controversy arose, and questions were raised, as to the number of persons attending the different places of worship on Sundays, and in 1881 or 1882, I am not clear which, a census was taken of the public worship attendance in four representative towns, Carnarvon, Llanelly, Conway, and Wrexham. The attendances on a given Sunday were as follows: Church of England, 3,902; other places of worship, 14,801.

Mr. W. P. Morgan

MR. BYRON REED: May I ask the hon. Member was this an official or a private census?

*MR. W. P. MORGAN: I have many statistics from which I shall be delighted to give the hon. Member all the information I can. This is information supplied by a private census.

MR. BYRON REED: Hear, hear.

*MR. W. P. MORGAN: They are facts, let me tell the hon. Member for Bradford, which have never been disputed, never been contradicted by any of the heads of the Church. I do not think the hon. Member, the great champion of Church government in North Wales, if he will visit the Principality, can doubt that Nonconformity is the form of worship adopted almost universally by the people, and that the Church of England is nowhere in comparison. The figures I have given are beyond dispute in the four towns mentioned—Church, 3,902; Nonconformity, 14,801. In 1884 a Sunday Church Attendance Census was taken at Swansea—a representative Welsh town—and I do not think there can be any question as to the accuracy of the figures: Church of England attendances on a given Sunday, 8,834; other places of worship on the same day, 40,702. In Cardigan—the county in which the Church of England in Wales has its Training College, and where one would think the Church would be somewhat stronger than in other parts of Wales, because it is clear the Church would scarcely set up its Training College in a spot where the Establishment has the least sympathy among the inhabitants—in Cardigan we find attendances: Established Church, 666; Free Churches, 5,693. Look at the diversity of the figures; see how they have altered since the end of the 17th century and the beginning of the 18th; altered to such a remarkable extent that I do not see how it can be claimed that the Church, as established, is the Church of the people of Wales. In largely populated districts like the Rhondda Valley, a district so well represented by my hon. Friend on my left (Mr. Abraham)—in a district such as that, composed almost entirely of a working-class population, the figures give a comparison which ought to bring a blush to the cheek of any man on that side of the House who gets up to support the Church of England Establishment in Wales. The incomes of the people in the Rhondda Valley are small; they work hard for their daily bread, but they build their chapels, and supply the ministers who provide for the spiritual wants of the people. In the Rhondda Valley the attendances were: Established Church, 3,949; Free Churches, 51,712. Who, in the face of these figures, will dare contend that the Church of England is the Church of the Welsh people? Lest some of the opponents of Disestablishment may be inclined to imagine that the figures I have so far touched upon have a local rather than a national significance, I will call attention to figures which I know may be received with a certain degree of irony by hon. Gentlemen on the other side. They are vouched for by Mr. Thomas Gee, of Denbigh, the able editor of the leading vernacular newspaper in Wales, the Banner. I quote my statistics from Mr. Gee's letters to the Dean of St. Asaph's, published in the Welsh language, and, before quoting them, I may say that their accuracy has never been challenged by the Dean. The census was taken on January 9, 1887. In North Wales the attendances for the day, including morning and evening services, were: Nonconformist chapels, 317,078; Church, 87,438. In South Wales: Nonconformist chapels, 468,731; Churches, 89,047. So it appears that in 1887 the attendances at Church were in the North about one in every five, and in the South one in every six of the Nonconformists. But, to further strengthen my case, and so that our opponents may not be able to say that the House has only had ancient statistics submitted to it, I will give the result of a Sunday census taken within the last two months. The editor of the Genedl, another enterprising vernacular newspaper, has recently sent round a special commission to gauge the actual attendance in the Churches of England in North Wales, and through the courtesy of the editor I am able to give the House the information obtained. In one church, Llithvaen, eight persons attended service; in another, Pystyll, seven persons; in Llanddwrn two persons; in Penllwch two persons attended service, and the congregation in this instance consisted of the parson's wife and the churchwarden; and in another church visited by the commission, Ciedio, near Nevin, the commissioner himself formed the entire congregation. So that if he had not attended from motives of curiosity, the parson would have had the church to himself. This reminds one of the anecdote of Dean Swift, who, finding only the clerk in attendance at service, proceeded in this form: "Dearly beloved Roger, the Scripture moveth you and me in sundry places, &c." In a periodical which has lately come before the public, the Religious Review of Reviews, a magazine which gives a considerable amount of information respecting various denominations, and which, from the comprehensiveness of its scope, is likely to have a broadening influence upon the religious world of to-day, I notice an able article by Mr. Bompas, Q.C. That gentleman argues for disestablishment without disendowment, and suggests that, the initiative should come from the Church. But if we wait until that suggestion is carried out I am afraid we shall wait a long time. I do not believe the Church will inaugurate any movement of the kind unless it is driven into a corner; and I object to the Church appropriating to herself property which is undeniably national. The Church take the initiative? Why has the Church in Wales aroused from its sleep? Because the desire exists to give spiritual instruction to the people? Certainly not; it is the cry of disestablishment and the fear of losing its loaves and fishes that has awakened the Church. Were it not for endowments and tithes we should have a very sorry battle, and, on behalf of the Nonconformists of Wales, a very easy victory. Now let me glance at the Church of England from an economic standpoint. The annual income of the Church of England in Wales is estimated at £256,000, and the nominal members of that Church are about 250,000. This is a liberal computation, and I doubt if there is that number of actual members. But allowing 250,000, the cost of religious ministrations to this section of the community is £1 per head. That may not seem, nor do I think it is, at all unreasonable, until we come to compare it with the Nonconformist figures. What are the figures on the Nonconformist side? The annual income derived from voluntary subscriptions, given for the most part by working men—men whose wages do not admit of their giving large amounts, and therefore the sum must be made up by an enormous number of contributors—is no less than £400,000, and for this Nonconformity administers to the spiritual wants of at least a million people. Nonconformist ministers may be and doubtless are, in many cases underpaid, but they know perfectly well that if they have any talent at all that their talent will not remain long unrecognised; they know that advancement in the Nonconformist Church is by merit, not by favour, not by money, nor by influence—friendly or political—or otherwise. Those who are interested in the subject of “sweating” may with advantage turn their attention to what goes on in the Church of England. Whilst poor, hard-worked curates in large towns receive a paltry pittance of £120 a year, the Bishops live in Palaces, and for doing very little receive stipends equalling, in some instances, the emoluments of right hon. Gentlemen who occupy seats on the Treasury Bench. In the diocese of St. Asaph—the diocese which perhaps attracts more attention in this Debate from the interest the Bishop takes in this matter—in the diocese of St. Asaph there is a parish—Llandyrnog—with a population, including Dissenters, of only 475, where the clergyman enjoys a living worth £700 per annum, and there are many other similar cases, while in large towns the paltry pay of curates is a scandal of which Churchmen ought to be ashamed. I should like to call attention to a computation made by a clergyman of the Church of England, and I suppose his figures will be accepted even by the hon. Member for Bradford. In Clarke's Prebendaries the income of the Church is put down as £325,226, and this may be taken as the minimum amount, for it excludes annual payments from the Augmentation Fund and for pew rents, and adding these and local contributions we may call the amount £380,000 for the four Welsh dioceses. With this ministration is given to 350,000, including children, out of a population of 1,750,000. These figures differ from mine, but the result is practically the same. Doubtless we shall hear that many Nonconformist ministers are leaving their chapels and joining the Church of England. Certainly there are a few weak-kneed mediocrities who have gone over to the Church of England, but they are men of no intellectual capacity, otherwise their talents would be appreciated in the ranks of Nonconformity, and Dissenting congregations do give their ministers sometimes very handsome salaries indeed. On the other hand, we know that the ranks of Nonconformity have been reinforced by some of the noblest sons of the Church of England in Wales. We shall be told there is an awakening in the Church and signs of an earnest desire for reforms; but the cry of “disestablishment” has caused this—the fear of the loss of worldly wealth. The political influence of Nonconformity in Wales was asserted in 1868, when the Nonconformists returned as their special representative here my revered predecessor, the late Mr. Henry Richard. From that time until to-day it has been growing politically, socially, and religiously, and it now claims the equality which is due to it. Wales has not forgotten the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, in his desire to give religious equality to the people of Ireland, was instrumental in disestablishing the Church in Ireland, and the Welsh Members are glad to see him in his place to-night, and hope that his voice will be lifted up for Wales as it was for Ireland. Wales has not forgotten the statesmanlike references made by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) in respect to the disestablishment of the Church of Scotland, and she hopes that if he does not by his voice support the Motion for the Disestablishment of the Church in Wales, he will do so by his vote. Wales has not forgotten the services to religious freedom which have been rendered to the people of this country by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), and I have every reason to hope the House will hear the right hon. Gentleman's voice in support of the Motion. Irish Members in the House will not fail to support us, because they received for their disestablishment valuable support from Welsh Members. I also hope we shall receive support for the Motion from the rank and file of those who call themselves Unionists. Whatever their opinions may be with respect to what they call the integrity of the Empire, I trust they will not abandon the professions they made to their constituents, and the principles they have promised to adopt, by failing to support the claim of the Welsh people on this occasion. But there is another class to whom I appeal—namely, those who profess no particular creed, who worship at no particular Church—men who are practical Christians, although they are not considered orthodox Christians—men who by their lives and their conduct towards their fellow-men show they are following out the teachings of the Great Master. I implore those men to assist the Welsh people in attaining their desire for religious equality. It may be asked whether the Church will suffer by disestablishment. I do not think it will. The members of the Church of England will take a far deeper and keener interest in their Church if it is less a Church of the priests and more of the people. It is true, if the Church is disendowed, Church people may have a little more to pay for their religion; but they can afford it. What I now ask for is a declaration that the time has arrived for the disestablishment of the Church. Take as an object lesson the Australian Colonies. In their infancy many of those colonies aided all religious denominations. Now, however, no Church receives State aid. What is the consequence? The Church of England in the Australian Colonies is as vigorous as Nonconformity in Wales. The people freely contribute to keep the Churches going, and they are far more popular than they otherwise would be. It will probably be argued that the Church in England and Wales is one and the same institution. That, I admit, is an argument which, upon the face of it, appears to commend itself to the House; but the Licensing Laws of England and Wales were the same, yet a Sunday Closing Act for Wales was passed at the direct wish of the people. An Intermediate Education Act—a measure of great and vital importance to the Principality—was passed at the request of the Welsh people, and Well's charity was dealt with in a manner which almost converted me to the belief that there is no necessity for Welsh Home Rule. I and my colleagues ask that effect should be given to the wishes of the people in respect to the Church; and the people of Wales have, by an overwhelming majority, expressed the opinion that the time has arrived for the disestablishment of the Church. There will be opposition to the Motion from hon. Gentlemen opposite, who blindly follow the Government. But I see sitting in his place the hon. Member for Devonport (Sir J. Puleston). I am sure the hon. Gentleman, as an ardent and proclaimed Nationalist, will hesitate before he goes into the lobby in opposition to the Motion. The hon. Gentleman will have to decide whether he will serve his country or his party, and in view of possible contingencies at Carnarvon he may possibly come to the conclusion that he will better serve his party by voting in favour of the Motion rather than against it. There is opposition even in Wales itself, but who are those in Wales who are opposed to disestablishment? Are they the representatives of the bulk of their countrymen? Are they the elect of the Welsh nation, the exponents of the will and desire of the people? No, they are nothing of the sort. They are the Bishops, and Deacons, and Archdeacons, and Canons, whose only claim to be the successors of the great Apostles seems to lie in inditing uncanonised epistles to the newspapers. The anti-disestablishment party in the House is led on this occasion by the hon. Member for Oswestry (Mr. S. Leighton), and the hon. Member for East Bradford (Mr. B. Reed). It is a peculiar circumstance that the Government have been unable to find any representative of the people of Wales to propose any Amendment to the Motion. Although he comes from a neighbouring county, the hon. Member for Oswestry is of all men in the House the least capable of expressing an opinion with reference to the Welsh people. I join issue with the hon. Gentleman when he says in his Amendment that the Church claims no portion of its revenues from taxation. Tithes may not legally be designated as taxation, but still they are looked upon by the people of Wales as a most iniquitous system of taxation. It is well-known that the hon. Member for East Bradford, another spokesman of the Anti-Disestablishment Party, is the exponent of the opinions of the Church Defence Organisation. The hon. Gentleman receives his retainers and refreshers from the Church, and comes to the House periodically for the purpose of preventing the Welsh people, of whom he is absolutely ignorant, getting that which they so justly demand. If the Government and Parliament are desirous of having peace, harmony, and contentment in the Principality, they will agree to this Motion; they will not further irritate the people by bolstering up in their midst a Church in which they do not worship, a Church with which they have no sympathy, but will give them that equality in religious matters without which the people of Wales ought not to be, and never will be, satisfied.

Mr. W. P. Morgan

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "as the Church of England in Wales has failed to fulfil its professed object as a means of promoting the religious interests of the Welsh people, and ministers only to a small minority of the population, its continuance as an Established Church in the Principality is an injustice which ought no longer to exist."—(Mr. Pritchard Morgan.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

* (6.18.) MR. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town): I cordially approve of the Motion of my hon. Friend whose speech has been so exhaustive and conclusive. It happened a day or two ago to come across the Record, and I have noticed in that newspaper that the Bishop of St. Asaph had declared that in about five years time the Church, so great is its progress in Wales, will be able to meet the Nonconformists on their own ground. I think the right rev. Prelate is greatly mistaken. I know Wales pretty well, for I have lived there all my life, and I consider that Welsh Nonconformists are more active and more decided than they ever were in my memory. My hon. Friend had alluded to the national instinct of the Welsh. I have no hesitation in saying there is no part of the United Kingdom where there is more distinct nationality on the part of the people than there is in Wales. The people have a literature of their own, a language of their own, and laws of their own. I believe that Welsh is more spoken now than it was when I was young. It is, perhaps, well to explain the reason why this question, which has been discussed in the House before, has been brought up again. The Welsh people are constantly urging their representatives to bring the question forward. Every day the people become more alive to the necessity of Disestablishment, and day by day it becomes more difficult for the Welsh members to resist the appeals made to them. But there is another reason which induced us to bring up the question. I and my hon. colleagues know we shall not carry our Motion to-night, but the divisions which have taken place in past years have shown that the feeling in favour of Welsh nationality is increasing year by year, and it is our desire to again test that feeling. I do not expect justice so far as the Welsh Church is concerned at the hands of the gentlemen who at present occupy the ministerial benches, but we do expect justice at the hands of the English people. It is to the English people we appeal. We know that before very long there must be a General Election, and it is well, before that election takes place, that the masses in England should be reminded that the Welsh people are as much as ever opposed to the establishment of the Church. I am satisfied that if the Church in England occupied a similar position to the Church in Wales things would not remain unaltered for a single Session. I believe that at the next election the English people will do the Welsh justice, and that Welsh disestablishment will be amongst the foremost questions which will engage their attention. It is said that the disestablishment of the Church will be an act of spoliation and robbery. I do not know what spoliation and robbery means if disestablishment will be spoliation and robbery. What I understand spoliation to mean is the despoiling somebody of property which belongs to them. Does the Established Church belong to any particular body? Is there any particular body who holds it in fee simple, or as a bit of freehold? Not that I know of. It is national property held from the State. The Queen is at the head of it, and it is an arrangement organised by the State and aided by the State for the purpose of providing for religious ministration. The Established Church in Wales is the Church of a small minority of the population, and we ask the House to declare that its continuance is an anomaly and an injustice which ought no longer to exist.

Mr. W. P. Morgan

(6.30.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I feel myself, Sir, indebted to the courtesy of the hon. Member opposite, who is to move the Amendment to this Motion, for having waived his claim to press that Amendment immediately after the speech of the Seconder of the Motion. I am bound to say that I am glad to have an early opportunity of intervening in the Debate, because I do not think that I am able to adopt wholesale all the statements made by the hon. Member who brought forward this Motion in his comprehensive speech. I shall exercise a just right in stating to the House, in my own tone and manner, my views on the question, and in dealing with the subject in a way less likely to sharpen the opposition than my hon. Friend found it necessary for himself to adopt, with the views he takes of the present action of the Established Church in Wales. If I go back for a period of 50 years—and my own knowledge of Wales has extended over the full range of that term—I could not speak of the Established Church in Wales at that period as I am able to speak of it now. At that period its administration was undoubtedly open in many ways to very heavy censure, and feebleness was everywhere—or almost everywhere—manifest in its discharge of its duties. At present, however, the case is different. I do not look at this Motion of my hon. Friend with a disposition to apply the microscope to its wording, because I might be obliged to say that it does not give full effect to my own views in one or two particulars. In the first place, I do not think that there is great historical precision in the words which the Motion adopts, though I understand the motives leading to their adoption. There is, for instance, a phrase which describes the Established Church in Wales as the Church of England in Wales. As far as I know the history of the case—and I have done my best to acquaint myself with it, though I believe that there is no standard work on the history of the Established Church in Wales during the whole of the long period over which it has existed—but as far as I know that history, we might really speak with as much justice of the Church of Wales in England as of the Church of England in Wales. We know that towards the close of the sixth century of the Christian era—and I hope that the House will not be dismayed at my going back so far, for I will certainly pass over the intermediate period—when England was still barbarous to a great extent, and almost wholly dechristianised in the south, and east, and centre, Christianity existed and even flourished in the northern extremity—which was in partnership with Scotch Christianity—and also in portions of the west, which were connected with Wales. For St. Augustine or his representatives—the missionaries sent by Pope Gregory VIII.—were met by bodies of Welsh Christians, who represented the Christian Church existing in the country from a very early time, and reinforced by refugee British, who were driven by the Anglo-Saxon pressure into these western districts. These were the true representatives of the Church in Wales, which Church has, as far as I am aware, continued from that day to this—that is, looking at it from without and in its corporate capacity. This is a very curious history—the history of the Church in Wales. It would be difficult to find in any portion of Christendom a more signal example of noble, magnanimous and self-denying conduct on the part of the body of the people than the effort which has been made—especially during the present century—by the Nonconformists of Wales to make a provision for their own religion. It is not to be asserted that at all periods the Welsh people had felt the deficiency of that provision. It is a very curious fact that what is termed the Anglican administration, as it operated in Wales, conferred upon the people of Wales one very great and signal blessing, which was highly appreciated by them, and that was the introduction of their mother-tongue into the services of the Church. It was a thing which could be dispensed with, perhaps, in England, where the language was strong and where its roots ran through every fibre of the community. But in Wales the language was weak, drooping, and losing ground; and it was owing to the introduction of the mother-tongue into the services of the Church that the Welsh people were, for a long time after the Reformation, Established Churchmen. My hon. Friend will find testimony to that fact in the history of Mr. Hallam and in other historical authorities. In point of fact, no person could have more conclusively established the point than has the hon. Member himself to-night; because he went back—and I am very much obliged for the interesting information which he gave us—to the year 1676; and he showed us that at that time, while the strength of the Church was represented by 391,000 persons, the strength of Nonconformity at that period—that is to say, the strength of Puritanism—was represented by only 10,000. It would have been impossible at that period—if my hon. Friend had been a Member of the House of Commons in 1676 instead of in 1891—it would have been impossible for him at that time to have made a Motion to the effect that the Church in Wales had failed to fulfil its professed object and ministered only to a small minority of the population. After that came a period most unhappy and most deplorable for Wales, when the Welsh language was proclaimed and put aside, and when, in neglect of native claims, Englishmen came in to occupy every bishopric, every deanery, and every benefice throughout the Principality, quite irrespective of the voices of the people. Then the Welsh people were driven, as I may say, into the wilderness, and then the Welsh people, who are now and who have always been a most devout and most religious people, felt the grievous necessity under which they were placed, and they set about, what was for them, the gigantic effort of providing themselves with the means, the ordinances, and the material appliances of religion. That is the case; and it is a circumstance of great satisfaction to me that, in approaching the question as it now stands, I have nothing to do but to confess my sincere and hearty congratulations to both sides of this question in Wales. I believe that there is great activity in the Welsh Church. I have seen it grow under my own eye. I am not now speaking of my own parish. That is a large, populous parish, where the Welsh tongue has never been native, and which is, like many other parishes in Wales, much more English than Welsh in its circumstances. But speaking of the Church itself in Wales, I do not hesitate to say that though I believe the precepts of Nonconformity are not narrowing, that the energy of Nonconformity is not diminished; that it retains its place in the hearts of the mass of the people; yet the efforts and exertions of the Church now and for a good many years, and the growing and increasing efforts, are such as do, in my opinion, great credit to the energy both of the clergy and of the laity of that Church. I render them ungrudging recognition; and I do not think it my duty on this occasion to withhold any portion of the praise which is their due. A representation was made to me to-day by a dignitary of the Established Church, and it is this. He founded himself on a book which is an Anglican authority—the Official Year Book of the Church of England, and which may be termed, in a certain sense, authoritative, and which is friendly to the Established Church in Wales. What he told me was this. That the rental of Wales, as compared with the total rental of England and Wales, was 4 per cent.; that the population of Wales, as compared with the total population of England and Wales, was 6 per cent. But that the contributions of Churchmen towards religious objects and the support of the Church in Wales, as compared with the total contributions of England and Wales to the same objects, was not 4 per cent. or 6 per cent., but no less than 14 per cent. That is a statement which I think stands in strong, and I may say extraordinary, contrast with the extremely painful, nay the very disgraceful records of the past which is now becoming remote; and in endeavouring to do justice to Wales I find myself not in the slightest degree able, any more than I am disposed, to found this Motion upon the idea that there is on the part of the clergy of the Established Church in Wales the slightest tendency or disposition to neglect their duty, or that there is not abundant evidence of the inspiring efforts—and in many cases the very self-denying efforts—which they make to extend the administration of the Church and the means of meeting its local wants. I quite agree with my hon. Friend in one point which is not immaterial. He says, with perfect truth, that there is a very considerable English immigration into Wales. There is a mining immigration which leads to an English demand in the matter of religion; although I believe it is also a remarkable circumstance that the families of these English miners ultimately become Welsh, adopt the Welsh language, and tend to swell the number of persons speaking Welsh. But, at the same time, there is an English immigration. There is also a very considerable immigration of English to the watering-places of Wales. That may account for some portion of the remarkable figures which the defenders of the Established Church are able to allege on their own behalf; but I do not think that it at all abates what has been said in regard to the increasing devotion of the people, as well as of the ministers and the governors of the Church, in the prosecution of their duties. But then the question is asked why interfere with that state of things? If the Church is active and progressive and the Nonconformists are contented, why interfere? But, Sir, the Nonconformists are not contented—and the question is, whether they are entitled to be contented? Sir, the Nonconformists are making, in the most distinct terms, in a voice very audible indeed, and governed by all the forms of the Constitution, a demand which I, for one, think it my duty to listen to, and which I feel convinced before any great length of time has elapsed, even quite irrespective of the present divisions of Party, will have to listen to, and will be disposed to listen to. I agree with almost everything that was said by my hon. Friend the Seconder of this Motion, who spoke with a weight that belongs to his high character and his long devotion to this cause. I think he is perfectly right in what he said with respect to the vivid sentiment of nationality in Wales. I do not think that the Welsh people are disposed to make inconvenient claims upon that subject. I believe that whatever they ask will be confined within the bounds of reason and moderation. But I do think that my hon. Friend is entirely justified in stating that that sentiment exists, and exists with great force and activity in Wales, and that the people of Wales will ask and will expect, and, so far as they constitutionally can, even will insist, that in the proceedings of the British Parliament due regard shall be paid to those several and distinct claims which the Welsh people within their own bounds and limits are warranted in making. Well, Sir, I am bound to say that in this matter I regard myself as having no title whatever to praise on the part of the Welsh Nonconformists. I have done nothing to press their cause forward. I have waited for their deliberate and sufficient expression of judgment upon it. If there is anyone entitled to praise in this matter, of those with whom in other times I was officially connected, undoubtedly it is my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale. Such is the modesty of my noble Friend that he shakes his head and repels the compliment. I must insist upon placing on his head the crown which he is entitled to wear, because it is a matter of record that when he was leader of the Liberal Party, and spoke in that capacity on an important occasion in Scotland — of course, I admit that the parallelism in the case of Scotland and Wales has yet to be confirmed; but still what I am now saying is simply to assert that my noble Friend did take a bold step as a leader, and entitled himself to great honour and credit on account of that bold step, when he declared in Scotland that the question of Disestablishment was a question which must be decided according to the sense of the people of Scotland, and that if the wish of the people of Scotland were in a direction contrary to the wish of the people of England, as declared by their Representatives, then the wish of the people of Scotland ought to prevail with respect to the continuance or discontinuance of their own ecclesiastical establishment. Well, Sir, I do not know whether my hon. Friend is inclined to insist strongly upon the want of parallelism between the case of Scotland and the case of Wales. But even in the case of Scotland, following the banner of my noble Friend and waiting till I thought there had been sufficient Parliamentary and electoral manifestation to place the matter of fact beyond all doubt, I gave a very deliberate adhesion and support to the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow last year. Following, as I said, the banner of my noble Friend, but unhappily following it, not in conjunction with the person of my noble Friend, I could not fully and absolutely comprehend in my innocence why he should be found in the opposite lobby after his authentic, authoritative declaration that disestablishment must be decided by the voice of the people of Scotland. I do not know whether I am right that my noble Friend did not deem the declaration of the decision and the sense of Scotland to be sufficient to make it imperative upon him to give his vote in support of the Motion. Well, I do not know how that is, but I think that when you look at the state of opinion in Wales and the form in which that opinion may be expressed, has been and will be expressed, there can be no doubt whatever about it. Now, I have no question all that I shall be referred, and very fairly and properly saluted with citations from a speech of my own on a former occasion—I do not remember exactly in what year—[Mr. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: In 1870. Twenty-one years ago.] Since then I have had time to be born again, and come of age. The passage to which reference is made was that it is impossible to separate the Church of Wales from the Church of England. I may have used that expression. I think it very possible that when disestablishment in Wales was proposed more upon the judgment of an individual, or of a group of individuals, than as the distinct expression of a strong, distinct, deliberate, and pervading national sentiment, it is quite possible that I may have used that expression, which may, when strictly regarded, be found to involve an element of exaggeration. Well, I might have said that, in my judgment, it was impossible to re-construct and re-adjust the Income Tax; but, at the same time, if the people of England, in their deliberate mind and by an overwhelming majority, arrived at the conclusion that that must be done, it would be the duty of Members of Parliament to set about it and do it as quickly as possible. And I say now what I believed then, and what I believe now, that the operation of disestablishing the Church of Wales from the Church of England will not be found very easy. I suspect that it will be found that it is tied and knotted and tangled, I might almost say, in such a multitude of legal bonds and meshes with the general body of the Church of England, that it would be a very formidable matter indeed to accomplish this purpose. I think the Mover of this Motion was very wise in not making any such attempt, which, if it is to be done, is to be done by the Government, and I have no doubt it will require all the skill, all the knowledge, and all the care, and let me say more, all the sense of equity and moderation that can possibly be brought to bear upon it in order to carry through the work in a satisfactory manner. Well, so much then for the question of the impossibility of which I have endeavoured to dispose, so far as the words are susceptible of verbal explanation. Well, then I must look at the whole case—and I think I observe one or two gentlemen opposite smiling, or a little more than smiling, but permit me to say that there are a great many things which the Tory Party have believed and have declared to be impossible, and which afterwards—I do not wish to make any invidious reference—under adequate pressure they have been perfectly willing and perfectly competent to achieve. Now, Sir, the question is, what does justice demand of us in this case? Well, undoubtedly, I am aware that the Established Church in Wales is an advancing church, an active church, a living church, and I hope very distinctly a rising church, rising from elevation to elevation. I do not say that the case of the Church of Wales is a repetition of the Church of Ireland; but I do say this: that it is a repetition of the Church of Ireland in two vital points, two vital and determining points, apart from the general abstract principle of establishment, which it is not necessary for me to enter into at this time. In two vital and determining points I cannot deny that the case of the Welsh Church corresponds with that of the Church of Ireland. In the first place, it is the church of the few against the church of the many; and, in the second place, it is the church of the rich as against the church of the comparatively poor. These broad features are so stamped upon the case that, in my opinion, it is impossible to deny them. Very well, Sir. In that state of facts, have the people of Wales given their judgment upon this question? I cannot deny that upon the whole, and not in a very rigid sense, but still in a somewhat substantial sense, it still remains a proportion coming not very far from the truth to say that the Non-conformists are the people of Wales—undoubtedly the bulk of the people of Wales. The enormous majority of those classes that can in any way be distinguished from the people, or from the mass of the nation, is outside the pale of Nonconformity. Looking at their numerical preponderance, even upon the entire population, and looking at the distribution of various classes of society, it was not very far from the truth to say, though I admit there is some element of exaggeration, but only a very limited one, that the Nonconformists of Wales are the people of Wales. The Motion of 1870 was probably the first serious Motion that was made in this House for Welsh disestablishment. Since then unquestionably the subject has taken a far wider scope. It has been under notice in the minds and in the hearts of the Welsh people. If a judgment has been given it has been given, and the conviction on which it was formed was formed, upon such knowledge as it was possible for the person forming the judgment to attain. That being so, after the full knowledge that a very large numerical preponderance had spoken—for although the Established Church may be a considerable body in Wales, yet it is comparatively small when compared with the entire population—that preponderance of the population has spoken again and again on every occasion which was given to it; and if the occasion is given to it again no one will deny that it will speak in terms as intelligible and unmistakable and decisive as those to which it gave utterance at the General Election in 1886, and at former General Elections. They have returned some 30 Members, so distributed that the Party which we term the Liberal Party claims 25 as against five to whom we think the description of Liberal not altogether applicable. That is not quite an accurate account of the matter; for, as I am told, I must still make a further addition to the majority, and a further subtraction from the minority, which makes the majority one of 27 to 3—a majority constitutionally, lawfully, peacefully, regularly, and I may say repeatedly returned to Parliament. Wales having thus spoken, is it right, is it desirable, can it long continue, that by English opinion such a declaration proceeding from Wales should be disregarded, contravened, and overruled? It may happen once or twice. I will not say how long it may continue. I will not undertake to define the length of time in months or years. In politics it is dangerous to predict. But this I will say—it will be a very little time. It cannot sound well in the ears of the people of Wales, it cannot seem well in their eyes, it cannot savour well in their nostrils, if, when this House divides on this question, the opposition to the overwhelming proportion of Welsh opinion will hardly have a solitary Representative from Wales, for I am told we are not quite certain even of the three. The remainder of the majority will be composed of hardly any Members from Ireland, in a very small degree from Scotland, and in an overwhelming, gigantic, absorbing proportion from the vast number of seats which are filled by English Representatives. I do not see the expediency or advantage of prolonging the controversy. Undoubtedly, I am sorry to say, though I hope I have argued this question in a manner which cannot at any rate give offence to those who differ from me—undoubtedly these religious, or rather semi-religious, or mixed controversies, upon the question of establishment and disestablishment, when they become serious, are not good for the temper and social condition of the country and people, who have never quarrelled about anything else. A people kindly, genial, and loyal as the Welsh people are, might perhaps have their tempers sharpened and exasperated on these ecclesiastical questions. I have said that my hon. Friend was, in my opinion, quite right in saying that the sentiment of nationality was strong and inextinguishable in Wales; and I think he was also right in the deliberate persuasion and conviction which he then expressed, that this feeling of the people of Wales could not long continue without having its due and just effect within these walls; and the people of England, who are eminently a just people, will give, and will insist on giving, to Wales in respect of her reasonable demands the same just, considerate, equitable, and conclusive settlement which, in the like circumstances, I believe they would claim for themselves.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

*(7.8.) THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I cannot deny that the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman replied to his own former utterances has entirely disarmed controversy and anticipated criticism. I observed that the earlier part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech was delivered in a very chilling silence on his own side of the House, and those hon. Members who cheered the latter part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech should be reminded that, just as there was a loophole in that very positive statement of 1870, which announced the practical impossibility of separating the Church in Wales from the Church in England, so there is to-day a loophole in what the right hon. Gentleman has just stated. The right hon. Gentleman was careful to observe, in speaking of the numerical preponderance and social distribution of the Nonconformists and Churchmen of Wales, that there again was that element of exaggeration which may thereafter be used against those who support the right hon. Gentleman in this Debate, and who have seemed so delighted to hear his concluding statement. The first part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech commends itself very much to those who sit on the Ministerial side of the House. I do not wonder at the something like dismay which fell upon hon. Gentlemen opposite when the great prophet whom they brought to bless turned and cursed them, and demolished their ancient history so completely. The right hon. Gentleman has made the task of the opponents of the Motion easier and much more simple; and I am very glad, so far as the earlier part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech is concerned, to range myself under the right hon. Gentleman's banner, although I shall not find myself accompanying the person of the right hon. Gentleman into the lobby. But, after all, the right hon. Gentleman's only countervailing argument appeared to be based on one premiss—the national feeling of Wales. The right hon. Gentleman laid enormous stress upon that national feeling, and called upon the House to follow the lead of that national feeling, although I think it has at least taken that period of nonage to which the right hon. Gentleman referred—20 or 21 years—for the right hon. Gentleman himself to arrive at that state of mind. But what is this so-called national feeling in Wales? The hon. Member for the Rhondda Valley is an exponent of the national feeling of Wales—I might almost say that, as far as the House is concerned, it is comprised within the limits of his person. I venture to say there is nothing in the history of the Welsh people which entitles them to attribute the word “national” to those feelings, which are racial perhaps and characteristic, but are not national. The people may swear by the soil, their language may be couched in the vernacular, but that is not a national feeling, because there is no such thing as a Welsh nation. [Opposition laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen who dispute that should apply to their Leader for information on the secular history of their country. Anciently there were three Principalities within the limits of what is now called the Principality of Wales—the Principality which owes its origin and establishment to the fact that Wales passed under the English sceptre. Therefore, I contend that to call the Welsh people a nation is grossly to exaggerate and wholly to misrepresent the facts of the case. I am not going to question the claim of the Welsh to call themselves a people or a race. They are a very interesting race [Mr. W. ABRAHAM: Nation], and they are a very peculiar people. They have their own traditions and their own prejudices, and there is much in both their traditions and their prejudices which specifically claim the interest of those who like to follow the folk-lore of small and obscure populations. I admit that, as a matter of archaeological interest, these peculiarities of the Welsh people are deserving of the attention, and entitled, at least, to the consideration of antiquaries and historians, while to those who live among them they are a never-failing subject of sympathy and interest, and they also bring to Wales a great number of

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

Englishmen who take an interest in the country on account of these peculiarities. But when dealing with a political question, is this House to be governed by vague sentiment of this description? Wales is part of England, and the question of the Church in Wales is the question of the Church of England. The right hon. Gentleman forgets, when he talks of the familiar material of the opposition which will be arrayed against this proposal, that this question is not exclusively a Welsh one. Primarily it may be a Welsh question, but it is one which concerns the whole of this realm of England, and in which every Englishman is entitled to have his voice. When we go into the lobby we shall be dealing with a matter which most nearly and closely affects the existence of our own Church; we know that this attack, which at the present moment is limited to the Welsh outwork, is one which is intended to be followed by one on the whole citadel. Therefore, we are not going to be beguiled by the voice of any Welsh siren to surrender a post, by the surrender of which we shall be abandoning the main principle upon which we rest our case. We are not prepared on this occasion, or I hope for many years to come, to accept the proposition, that because a small population in one corner of the country takes—or thinks that it takes—a dislike to any institution common to the realm at large, we are to go on with a series of fragmentary and sporadic acts of legislation until we have frittered away all the oneness of this realm of England. The right hon. Gentleman, however, did not entirely rest his case on the question of national feeling, but he drew a parallel with the case of Scotland. But, for my own part, I failed to see the value of that comparison. We know that the history of Wales and of Scotland is entirely different. We know that while Scotland once had an independent existence, Wales had not. Scotland is an ancient kingdom, which came into partnership with us through the person of one of our Sovereigns; it has its ancient laws and customs, and it had its Parliament. There is, therefore, no analogy between the two. But I think that a fairer parallel to draw would be between the Church in the Highlands and in the Lowlands of Scotland. In the one region you have the aboriginal inhabitants who have retired with their ancient language into the remoter mountains; in the other the Saxon invader, who settled down with civilisation on the more accessible country. That would be a much fairer analogy to draw, and I do not think that even the centrifugal instincts of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle had made out a scheme which would enable the Church of Scotland to be dealt with by separate legislation for the Highlands and for the Lowlands. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian also referred briefly to the question of numerical preponderance and distribution. He has done such full justice to the position of the Church in Wales that, for my own part, I would rather amplify the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman than deal with them in a hostile spirit. When we are told that the Church in Wales is ceasing to be a living body, and has been merely galvanised into existence by the cry of disestablishment, I think that it is well to bear in mind that Church revival in Wales has not at all commenced with the recent agitation against it. A late Bishop of St. Asaph (Dr. Short), when he came into the diocese in 1850, was able to point to the period of 40 years before that as one of continued activity, and that activity has since gone on in an increasing ratio. In the period of 40 years before 1850 19 new churches had been built, 10 rebuilt, and 71 schools and 60 parsonages erected. I believe these figures compared favourably with those relating to any other diocese throughout the length and breadth of England. In the 40 years which ended in 1890 the figures were—new churches 57, rebuilt and restored 127, schools 150, and parsonages 138; £108,755 having been expended on the building of schools, and £132,857 on parsonages, by Churchmen in the diocese. I wish the House to see that the Nonconformists of Wales—to whose religious zeal I always pay the utmost respect—have not a monopoly of voluntary contribution, but that the Church is as capable of making sacrifices. The diocese of St. Asaph contains 208 parishes, with a population of 268,901. The Church expenditure upon all Church objects in the dioceses during the last 40 years has been £899,298, the annual expenditure at the present time upon Church expenses, school maintenance, and societies is £27,889 ; and on Church buildings £20,000 ; that is to say, that the Church is spending on purely diocesan objects about £50,000 a year out of the pockets of the laity. In 1870, when Mr. Forster's Education Act was passed, the daily attendance in national schools was 11,663 ; in Sunday schools 15,008 ; while in 1890 the figures were—in national schools 19,445, and in Sunday schools 20,604. And this increase in the attendance at the Church schools has arisen in spite of the innumerable Board schools put up all over the country. In the ten years from 1860 to 1870 the number of persons confirmed was 12,000 ; between 1880 and 1890, 15,000 ; and between 1880 and 1890 nearly 20,000 ; while between 1870 and 1890 the number of communicants had just doubled. With regard to the Church services, in 1890 the number of English services was 394, and of Welsh 264 ; the numbers in 1870 being 240 and 219 respectively. A very interesting test on Nonconformist feeling in Wales is supplied by the celebrated Burials Act, in connection with which my right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. G. O. Morgan) expects to attain immortality. In 1885 the burials under the Act were 247 ; in 1886, 216 ; in 1887, 271 ; in 1888, 245 ; and in 1889, 251, while the Church burials for the year 1889 numbered 3,618. I find that during the last five years out of 208 parishes in this diocese there were 94 where there was not a single burial under the right hon. Gentleman's Act, 30 where there was only one, and 18 in which there were only two. There is another very important point to be considered, and that is how far Nonconformity supplies sufficient ministration for the wants of the people, if that supplied by the Church is to be withdrawn. I find that in 1886 there were 280 Nonconformist ministers resident in the diocese, while in 1890 their number had declined to 256. At the same time, it must be borne in mind that the number of Church services has increased from 450 to 600.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid.): The right hon. Gentleman does not give us the authority for the figures.

Mr. Raikes

*MR. RAIKES: I got them from a source which is accessible to all hon. Members, namely, the Charge delivered last year by the Bishop of St. Asaph. There is another point connected with Nonconformist ministration which is extremely important, and that is that in 1886 there were 83 of these 208 parishes without a resident Nonconformist minister, and in 1890 there were 90 in the same condition. If Nonconformity is to take up all the ground and supersede the Church, why, here are nearly half the parishes in a diocese which have not got any Nonconformist shepherd to lead the flock, yet in every one of them the Church has provided ministration for the poor. Does not the hon. Member see that he is paying a compliment to the provision made by the Church when he complains of the number of churches with small congregations? If the hon. Member had endeavoured to make out a case by showing that there were large parishes where no ministration was provided by the Church, then he would have had something to go upon; but when he complains that the Church supplied a superfluity of ministration then he showed no case at all. This question has come to be treated as if it were a purely Welsh question. I venture to point out that there are English people in Wales as well as Welsh, and they have some claim to the provision of religious ministration in the way in which they can appreciate it. I think the House will be surprised when I say that in the same diocese there are 52 parishes in which the Welsh language is not spoken, and the number of monoglot Welshmen only amount to 35 per cent. of the population of the diocese. These are facts which also have to be taken into consideration when this matter is dealt with. As to the assertion that the English Church in Wales is an alien Church, I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has finally disposed of that preposterous proposition. The right hon. Gentleman has justly called attention to the fact that in the later part of the 17th century there was probably no part of Her Majesty's dominions in which the population was more universally attached to the Church than in Wales. Then when did the Church become an alien Church? That re-condite historian, the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil, told us the ancient Church was superseded sometime in the 7th century. He does not seem to realise an unbroken continuance of the ministrations of the Church, that Church which brought out the Welsh Bible, and introduced the Welsh language into the services of the Church. There never was, among all the baseless inventions by which it is sought to bolster up this fictitious agitation, one more entirely without justification or foundation than that which alleges that the Church in Wales is an alien Church. I have to thank the House for having listened so considerably to a speech which in its main features has been controversial; but I am quite sure that, whatever may be the present attitude of hon. Gentleman opposite with regard to this question, if they think they are going to improve the position of this country or of their own Party by pandering to this pseudo-national chimera, which is constantly being put forward as a stalking-horse for electioneering purposes, they will find they have created for themselves a new difficulty nearer home than Ireland, which will again perplex and hamper their legislative efforts if they ever again have a majority in this House. As we are told that the first result of their return is to be a Parliament in which Ireland stops the way, so probably their next Parliament will be one in which Wales stops the way; and when we have come to the separation of Wales on the same lines as the separation of Ireland is now proposed, the country will again have legislation proposed, not on grounds of principle, not with any regard to constitutional principle or national unity, but based upon the narrower and baser foundation of sectional hatred and local jealousy—a policy which will well deserve the ruin it will bring upon those who make themselves responsible for it.

*(7.40.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): If the right hon. Gentleman has ever a reasonable case to present to the House, he never fails to present it in a vigorous and effective manner. I do not think, however, I ever listened to a weaker or a more ineffective speech from him, than the one he has just made, a fact which I cannot believe is attributable not to him, but to the weakness of his case. The right hon. Gentleman commenced by denying the principle of nationality in regard to Wales. He said Wales is not a nation, and the way in which he attempted to make out that proposition was certainly very novel. He said that before Wales was conquered by England instead of being one Principality it was three. If the right hon. Gentleman's reasoning is correct I do not suppose there is a single nation on the face of the globe. England, France, or Germany are not nations, for they were all subdivided in ancient times. It is not necessary for me to go into any finely-drawn argument on the point, for no two persons can ever agree as to what constitutes a nation. The common sense of people, however, enables them to understand pretty clearly the meaning of many things that cannot be scientifically defined. The right hon. Gentleman went very considerably, and, I think, very properly, into statistics. It is the matter of numbers which differentiates the case of Wales from that of England. I admit that a large number of the strongest arguments in favour of disestablishment in Wales is also applicable to the maintenance of any State Church in any country; but I say, we are entitled to claim, as supporters of this Motion, persons who are supporters of the principle of Church Establishment. I do not suppose that any supporter of that principle will maintain that it ought to be applied where the Church Establishment ministers only to a small minority of the people. It will surely be conceded that, in order to make the Establishment in any degree defensible, it should be national in reality as well as in name—that it should secure the support of the bulk of the nation. The supporters of the Welsh Establishment are very far from claiming that the Church in Wales commands anything like a majority of the people. In fact they all admit that it is in a minority. As the late Dean of Bangor said, the Church have "lost five-sixths of the Welsh people." The Church defenders have of late attempted to make out that they are entitled to a larger proportion; but no person who, having intimate knowledge of Wales, would venture to assert that there are more than a-sixth or probably more than a-tenth of the people of Wales who are staunch adherents of the Church Establishment. The statistics quoted by the right hon. Gentleman opposite were chiefly statistics of money spent and buildings erected. I am quite willing to admit that the Church in Wales, as measured from that standpoint, has made immense progress in the last 15 years. But that is no proof whatever of the progress of the Church in the affections of the people at large. We admit that nearly all the rich people in Wales and nearly all the landowners are Churchmen. The right hon. Gentleman's statistics prove merely that the rich people have freely spent their treasures in the last 20 years in building churches. The Nonconformists have also built, and I venture to say they have spent a great deal more than the Church of England people have during the last 40 years. In the previous Debates on this subject it was made a taunt against us that we had over-built chapels, and we were told we had built three or four where only one was necessary. Hon. Gentlemen who oppose us on this question ought to have some sort of consistency in the arguments they use. They say we are unable without the assistance of the Church to supply the religious wants of the people, and then they contend that we over-supply the requirements. It is necessary for them to agree among themselves, and say on which of these contentions they are going to rely. It is certain that if we have erred at all it has not been in under-supplying the religious wants of the Welsh people. There is not a district in which we have not fully and adequately supplied those wants. The right hon. Gentleman opposite made a great point of the fact that there were numbers of parishes in which there were no Nonconformist ministers. The right hon. Gentleman's arguments on that point serve to show his ignorance of Wales. He evidently is not aware of the fact that one of the largest Nonconformist bodies of Wales has no settled pastorate, and that a large number of chapels are served by itinerant ministers. It is true that in a few large towns the system of the settled pastorate is now obtaining among the Calvinistic Methodist body, but to argue that, because that system does not obtain everywhere,

Mr. J. Bryn Roberts

Nonconformity is declining is absurd, because it is under the system of itinerant ministry that the whole of Wales has become Nonconformist. The success of the Calvinistic Methodists in Wales is entirely to be attributed to the itinerant ministry. The right hon. Gentleman also referred to the number of burials in churchyards as a proof that Nonconformist feeling is not increasing in Wales. That was a very unfortunate test to apply, because we know that in consequence of the way in which clerical rights are abused in Wales the Bill of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Osborne Morgan) has almost become a dead letter, or, at all events, that it is only very partially resorted to. Throughout central Wales a great dispute is now raging in relation to a scandal that has recently taken place at Barmouth on this very question. We all know that the right of selecting the burial ground, according to the law, rests with the clergyman of the parish. In England, and also in Wales provided the fees are freely paid, the clergyman always considers the feelings of the family when he makes the selection. In the Barmouth case a widow prepared a grave in which she buried her deceased husband. She expressed her desire to be buried in the same grave, and when her son died had him buried in an adjoining grave in order that she might reserve her husband's grave for herself. The lady died a few weeks ago. She had expressed to her executors her desire to take advantage of the Burials Act to have the Nonconformist burial service read to her, and the executors informed the rector of their intention to carry out her wish. He immediately asked: "Are you going to pay my fees?" The House knows that there is no such thing as a legal burial fee in Wales. No burial fee can be claimed anywhere unless it has been customarily paid from the time of Richard I. In Wales the practice until 20 years ago has invariably been to pay no fee, but the persons attending the funeral contribute something in the form of a voluntary collection. An illegal attempt is now made by the clergymen to exact a fixed fee from everybody who takes advantage of the Burials Act. Because the executors of this deceased lady refused to pay this illegal fee, and insisted on having a Nonconformist service, the clergyman abused his right of selecting the site of the grave. He said: "Very well, then, I will not let you bury this widow in the grave of her husband." The executors were forced to submit to this. There is another reason why the Burials Act is not resorted to. We know that the parishioners have the right of burial. If a person has lived outside the parish and wishes to be buried in ground where, perhaps, his fathers have been buried before him, and his executors express a desire that the Nonconformist burial service should be used, they are instantly met by the clergyman with a declaration that the body shall not be buried there. So much annoyance is caused by the hostility of the Church of England clergy to the Burials Act that the people have almost generally, to avoid scandal, abandoned the right of having the Burial Service read by their own ministers. When a member of a family has just died his relatives are in no mood for squabbling, and say: "Let us have no bother; let the clergyman read the service." Reference has also been made to the question of Confirmation. To get a large number of persons confirmed is a very important thing in the eyes of every clergyman. As a rule he canvasses as thoroughly as he can, with the object of getting as many as possible presented to the Bishop for Confirmation, and a large number are presented who have not been in the habit of attending the church, and who never go afterwards. I was told by a Nonconformist minister that children who were members of the Nonconformist congregation in his own parish were induced by the express desire of the clergyman to go to the church and be confirmed by the Bishop, although they never afterwards frequented the Church, but remained members of the denomination to which their parents belonged. The fact is that the hold of the Church in Wales, as far as it has any hold whatever, is almost entirely confined to the English-speaking people. I ought to mention that there is one class of the Welsh working men among whom you may expect to find some support of the Church, and that is the publican class. Outside the publicans and their customers there are scarcely any of the working men of Wales who belong to the Church. Within the last few years a very strenuous attempt has been made to increase the number of the working class adherents of the Church, but the amount of the increase has been very slight and gives no occasion for boasting on the part of the Church. All the territorial magnates and a large number of the employers of labour are Churchmen. Ever since the disestablishment of the Irish Church in 1868 a great panic has fallen on the clergy of the Church of Wales. They seemed to feel that unless they reformed and increased their numbers the fate which had befallen the Irish Church would befall them, and the most strenuous attempt has been made to get people to come into the Church. When you consider that all the influence of the territorial magnates has to a great extent been placed at the service of the clergy, you will fully understand that it is of immense advantage to a working man to leave the chapel and become a Churchman, as far as his material interests are concerned. It is not surprising, therefore, that some few have been found who have abandoned their own religion and gone over to the Church. Some English people are thoughtlessly disposed to assume that all Welsh people are religious. That, of course, is an absurdity. Such a thing cannot be said of any people in the world. There are a large number of people in Wales who attend no place of worship, and there are others who care more for their own advancement than anything else. It is not surprising, therefore, when the influences of which I have spoken are at work, that some slight increase should have taken place in the number of churchmen. Supposing all the landowners and all the large employers of labour in England were Roman Catholics, and it would be of great advantage to a man who wanted to obtain an allotment, or a farm, or a tenement, or obtain employment in a quarry, to be a Roman Catholic, what would you expect to find? Surely you would expect that a large number of unprincipled people who care not a straw about any religion in the world would become Roman Catholics. They would become Mahomedans or Buddhists or anything else under similar circumstances. Those who have turned away from Nonconformity in Wales are a miserable minority, but most of them have been induced to do so by these influences. This is one of our strongest complaints about the present efforts of the Church in Wales. So far as those who profess Church principles devote their efforts to the spread of Christianity, we say, God bless their work, but when they attempt to demoralise the people by bribery of this kind, we are compelled to enter our protest against it. I will repeat a fact which was told to me not long ago by a minister of the denomination to which I belong, who laboured in a district strongly subject to the influences to which I refer. He said very few had gone over from his chapel, and those who had done so belonged almost exclusively to the class I have referred to. There was, however, he said, one man whom he had been very sorry to lose. He was a man who had a good reputation among his fellows. He was a member in full communion, a teacher in the Sunday school, and was regarded as a person of good and solid character. That man went over to the Church, but did not receive any reward for his apostacy, and the consequence was that he ceased to attend any place of worship. The clergyman of the parish called on the man's wife, who had stuck to the chapel, and asked her why she did not go to church, saying: "Your husband comes sometimes, but I never see you." She replied: "I know he goes sometimes, and it was an evil day for us when he left the chapel. When he was a member at the chapel he always spent his evenings at home, but now he spends them in the public-house, and I bid my boys to be warned by their father's example against leaving the religion they were brought up in." Now, I do not say that because a man goes to church he takes to drinking, but I say that this man by his conduct lost the respect of his neighbours and that he lost his own self-respect also, and then, becoming reckless, took to drink. This attempt to win over the Welsh people to the Church by bribery and by appeals to sordid motives is an evil that is much felt. We do not so much mind the loss of individuals because, after all, it is a mere handful that goes over, but we do protest against the demoralising effect it produces. I would ask the House to bear with me

Mr. J. Bryn Roberts

while I give some statistics on another point. Hon. Members are aware that Welsh people have very largely migrated from Wales to the large towns of England. Liverpool has often been called "the metropolis of North Wales," from the large number of Welshmen who are congregated there. If the Church in Wales were so strong as to number among its adherents two-thirds or three-fifths of the Welsh people you would find the same proportions among the Liverpool Welsh. But you find, as a matter of fact, that whilst there are 45 Nonconformist Welsh chapels in that city, there are only 4 Welsh churches. The total number of communicants in Nonconformist Welsh chapels of Liverpool and district is 10,331, and the total number of communicants in the Welsh Episcopalian churches is only 455, or only $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the whole. What is the reason for this? The reason is that in Liverpool the Welsh people are totally free from territorial and squirearchical influences. The Welshman in Liverpool is not likely to get a bargain or a place because he is an Episcopalian, and, therefore, he goes to the place of worship he really prefers. If you take the other large towns in England the same state of things is found to exist, although not to the same extent. In London, Manchester, and Chester similar circumstances are found. There are no less than 34 English towns and industrial villages outside these places in which there are Welsh Nonconformist chapels. They include Birmingham, Bristol, Wolverhampton, Ashton-under-Lyne, Rochdale, Stockport, Barrow-in-Furness, Dalton, Wigan, Spennymoor, and Warrington. These chapels have been built by Welsh immigrants out of their own pockets. In not one of these towns is there a single Welsh Episcopalian Church. The reason is that there are no Episcopalians among the Welsh people who go there, and there are no landed gentry to build churches. A further illustration of the same state of things is to be found in America. Everybody who knows anything of Wales knows that there has been a vast emigration from Wales to America. In the United States the Welsh Congregational Body, which is one of the four large Nonconformist Bodies of Wales, has 215 chapels, whilst the Baptists have 64 chapels, and the Calvinistic Methodists 190. There are spread over the United States 469 Welsh Nonconformist chapels. How many Welsh churches are there? There is not one throughout the length and breadth of the United States. There are altogether 26,000 adherents of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Body alone in the United States and they subscribe from £15,000 to £16,000 a year. In Australia there are four Welsh Nonconformist chapels and not a single church. I do not say that the proportion of Churchmen to Nonconformists in Wales is analogous to the proportion I have referred to as existing outside Wales, and for this reason: that when the English-speaking people of Wales emigrate to England, they, of course, go to the English churches. But this is a further proof of the point I am endeavouring to make, namely, that the Church community in Wales is confined to the English-speaking portion of the community, and that if you go away from the English-speaking people in Wales you find the Church non est. We are often told that we are trying to make political capital out of this question. If anyone has to gain by disestablishment in Wales, however, it is not the Liberals or the Nonconformists. If anyone will gain it will be the Conservatives. Formerly the Parliamentary representation of Wales was confined to the Welsh territorial magnates, who are all Conservatives. Now the Welsh Members consist of anybody but the large land-owning class—London barristers, English merchants, solicitors, traders, and, in fact, anybody and everybody but the landowners. The reason is that the old landed aristocracy of Wales have allied themselves with the Church Establishment, and have tried to cram it down the throats of the people. Anybody who is acquainted with Wales knows that the Welsh are an eminently Conservative people. What is it that makes a man a Conservative rather than a Liberal? As a rule, you find that men of a timid and cautious temperament become Conservatives, and men of a bold and sanguine temperament Liberals. But among the Welsh Nonconformists you find the timid and cautious men are as great radicals as the bold and sanguine, simply because of the Church Establishment. You will never find a Welsh Nonconformist who is a Conservative unless he is the tenant of some big landlord, nor will you find a Churchman who is a Liberal. The movement in favour of Church Disestablishment has in no class in Wales made greater progress than among the landowners. Silently and secretly a very great change of feeling has been coming over the landlords of Wales. They have seen that Disestablishment is inevitable, and they are coming to believe that it is desirable. They have seen that they will never have the least chance of recovering their hold upon the people of Wales until the Church is disestablished. This has been brought very vividly to their minds by the County Council elections which took place in Wales a little over two years ago. At those elections the ancient gentry were almost universally defeated. A few of them were returned for the wards and districts in which they live, but the immense majority found that they had no chance against the Nonconformists. This is all due to the same cause, and, though the aristocracy of Wales are as strong and zealous Churchmen as ever they were, their belief in the desirability of maintaining the Church as a State Establishment is fast diminishing. No doubt hon. Members will say I am proving too much, and will ask why I go in for disestablishment if it will be of advantage to the Conservative Party. I go in for it because the people of Wales wish for peace. At present there is nothing but discord, and there will be nothing but discord so long as this Church Establishment exists. I have shewn the bitterness that is caused by the way in which the territorial influence of the aristocracy has been unsparingly used in favour of the Church, and I will now conclude by saying that this religious question should be set at rest, so that all religious denominations in Wales may have liberty and freedom to devote themselves to the work of spiritual regeneration, instead of quarrelling and bickering amongst themselves. (8.31.)

(9.0.) SIR J. BAILEY (Hereford): When, at the commencement of this Debate, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian communicated with me and expressed a desire to follow

his two supporters who had moved and seconded this Resolution, I felt certain that I was only doing what the House of Commons would have desired me to do in giving way to the right hon. Gentleman, although it is extremely unusual for the leader of a Party to follow the Proposer and Seconder of a Resolution hostile to the other side of the House without any intervening argument having been heard from those who say they object to that Resolution. Nevertheless, when I listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman I felt that I could not regret the course I had taken, because, in the first place, it afforded me the greatest pleasure to hear the manner in which he corrected the numerous mistakes in Welsh history that had been made by the Proposer of the Motion, and because, also, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman seemed to me to raise the tone of this Debate from one of strong vituperation and personal attack upon Members on this side of the House, which, to say the least of it, is a tone most undesirable in the conduct of Parliamentary proceedings. Moreover, I could not but recollect that I had heard a magnificent speech from the right hon. Gentleman on the same subject 20 years ago—at a time when he was not an irresponsible Member of the House of Commons, but was leader of the House and Prime Minister to Her Majesty the Queen. That speech was on exactly the same lines as the one he has delivered to-night, with one exception, which the right hon. Gentleman designates as “sufficient electoral support.” When he came to the conclusion of his speech we had one more instance of the marvellous facility with which the right hon. Gentleman adapts his opinions to the altered circumstances of the day. I cannot refrain from reading to the House the concluding words of the speech delivered on that occasion. He was alluding to the Church of Wales, having touched on his connection with the Church of England, and he said—

“I know the difficulties, and I am not prepared in any shape or form to encourage, by dealing with my hon. and learned Friend’s Motion in any way except the simple mode of negative, the creation of expectations which it would be most guilty, most unworthy, most dishonourable on our part to entertain lest he should convey a virtual pledge. We cannot go in that direction. We do not intend to do so.

Sir J. Bailey

We deprecate it, and we should regard it as a national mischief.”

That, Sir, is the conclusion to which the same set of facts as those with which we now have to deal brought the right hon. Gentleman 20 years ago. Now, Sir, one fact which seemed to influence the right hon. Gentleman’s mind was that which he called “sufficient electoral support.” He alluded to the small number of Welsh Members who sat on this side of the House and to the much greater number which sits on the other side. Now, I have two remarks to make on this: the first is, that the question of disestablishment was not before the Welsh people at that time. If you were to take the numbers of the Welsh people and the numbers of their Representatives in this House, and use the figures as conclusive argument that the Welsh people desire disestablishment, you must first be clear that they knew at the time of the election that the effect of their votes would be to bring about the disestablishment of the Church in Wales; and if that has not been the case you ought, at all events, not to judge the feelings of the people by the number of Representatives they return to this House, but rather by the number of voters who have voted for those Representatives. Now, what is the fact as to the number of Welsh Representatives? I give hon. Members opposite the full benefit of the fact that at the last General Election there were four constituencies uncontested; but as to the others, the number of electors who voted were 60,000 or thereabouts on the one side and 90,000 or thereabouts on the other side, or in the proportion of 3 to 2. The fact that there are only three Conservatives under such circumstances is one of the curious proofs which are sometimes given that the electoral system of this country may be very unfair to large minorities of the people. If the question of Welsh disestablishment had been clearly and distinctly before the people of Wales at the last election, I believe that two-fifths to three-fifths would have changed from one side to the other, for the Church has yet some hold on the affections of a large portion of the people. Now, Sir, I would remind the House of one other point which the right hon. Gentleman dealt with. He scattered

to the winds the argument raised by the Mover of this Resolution—an argument which has so often been put before the House—that the Welsh Church is an alien Church and not the Church of the nation. What are the facts? The Welsh Bishoprics were founded before the English Bishoprics. Those who have any real knowledge of the Principality are aware that the names of the parishes follow the names of Welsh saints whom no Englishman, unless he has lived in Wales, knows anything about. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Resolution dealt with the question of the Reformation, when, in his judgment, the old Welsh Church died, and something else was put in its place. I must say I do not think it lies with hon. Gentlemen opposite, who are nothing if they are not Protestants, not to give their entire approval to the doctrines of the Church as established at the Reformation. But I may put the point in a different form. My hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) spoke of the Welsh endowments being taken to supply the wants of the English Church. Doubtless, at the time of the Reformation Wales was dealt with differently from England, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners take credit to themselves for using the funds of the disestablished Welsh religious houses for ecclesiastical purposes; but the Commissioners did not use those funds for ecclesiastical purposes connected with Wales, but in order to enrich the English ecclesiastics who had nothing to do with Wales. I am well aware that at the present time the action of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in supplying the religious wants of large populations, especially in Wales, has given the Principality a larger sum than was formerly administered; but, at the same time, the loss incurred by the Welsh Church in the time of the Reformation accounts for the poverty of that Church during the last century. Then I come to the Act for the Better Propagation of the Gospel in Wales. In 1650 the idea of the better propagation of the Gospel in Wales was demonstrated by the ejection of “200 malignant clergymen from the Principality,” their places being supplied by “Godly and faithful men.” These men may have been Godly, and they were probably faithful, but their literate capacity was very doubtful. The Church of Wales was unfortunately compelled to undergo for a few years the infliction of these faithful men, and this, coupled with the state of poverty to which the Church had been reduced, was doubtless the main cause of the trouble that came upon it. I do not know whether hon. Members fully realise the poverty of the Church during this period. In the Diocese of St. David's, in the year 1720, there were 37 livings under £50, 42 under £40, 60 under £30, 29 under £20, 39 under £15, 57 under £10, and 29 under £5 a year.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): Will the hon. Member give the other extremes?

SIR J. BAILEY: I am afraid I have not the figures showing the other extremes; but I have heard it said by an hon. Member, in a former speech, that he attributed much of the evils in Wales to the anti-national policy of that time. I do not want to deny that anti-national policy, but I do say that a great many of the evils which have arisen are referable to the poverty of the Church as well as to any anti-national policy that may have been pursued by the English statesmen of that day. The hon. Member has asked me to state what are the other extremes. I have told him I cannot do that, but I repeat that the Welsh Bishoprics at that time were so impoverished that a great deal of what has happened is attributable to that circumstance. It is this poverty which has been used as a justification for the pluralities existing in Wales, owing to the extreme poverty of the Church it was absolutely impossible for a clergyman to accept a Welsh Bishopric, unless in this way he had the means of maintaining the position. If, then, the Church was as poor as I have described it, how can you expect it to be able to meet a sudden emergency, such as has arisen from the enormous increase which has taken place in the Welsh population? It has also had to meet the bi-lingual difficulty, which is evidenced by the fact that, while 20 per cent. of the population speak Welsh only, 34 per cent. speak English only, and 46 per cent. speak both English and Welsh. It is when the Church is surrounded by all these difficulties that there suddenly comes upon the Church the vast increase of population I have alluded to. The population, partly from natural increase, but largely from immigration, has increased from 500,000 to 1,500,000. Railways have sprung up, the iron trade of the Principality has risen to great prosperity, and a Church has had to meet an increased growth among its people of from 50,000 to 150,000. Now, Sir, in comparison the present position of the Church in Wales with the ancient character of that institution, it must be borne in mind that for 14 centuries the Church was absolutely the Church of the people. It has been described by the Mover of the Resolution as having at the end of the 17th century comprised 96 per cent. of the people. They were then most ardent Churchmen, and until this century was somewhat far advanced. I do not believe Nonconformity had obtained anything like a strong hold upon the Principality. The father of dissent in Wales was a Magistrate of the district, and on his tombstone, which is in the parish church in which I live, his epitaph says: "He remained a faithful member of the Church of England until his death." I think that if that gentleman had known what his action was going to bring the Established Church to in his neighbourhood he would have re-considered it; at any rate, he must have thought he was taking upon himself a great responsibility, but he cannot be described, as the hon. Member opposite has described some Nonconformist ministers who have joined the Church in the present day, as a weak-kneed mediocrity. His death took place in 1811, and since that time the Nonconformists have had ministers of their own preaching the Gospel to the people. It was my privilege to know one who was considered to be the leader of the Nonconformist and Liberal Party in the county in which I live as well as the neighbouring Counties of Carmarthen and Radnor. He was the strongest speaker in that part of the Principality on the side represented by hon. Members opposite at the time of his death. He was buried according to the rites of the Church of England, and I was given to understand, and I believe it to be an undoubted fact, that it was by his special desire that his funeral was conducted in that way. That man, whose name I believe is well known to some hon. Members, though I will not mention it now, was a straight and honest man and a most sincere Nonconformist. While the Welsh people like the simplicity of the services in their various chapels, while they have an honest love for their chapels, yet I believe that in their inmost heart, and I speak not merely of the ministers but of the congregation, there is a strong—stronger than is thought—regard for the Established Church in Wales. Now, Sir, reference is often made to the number of Nonconformist chapels in Wales, but, if the House will permit me to say so, I regard that as a sign not of strength, but of weakness. Up to the middle of the 18th century every one knows that the Church was predominant in Wales. As a matter of fact, in 1742 there were 105 chapels and 769 churches; in 1851, 2,826 chapels and 1,180 churches; and in 1884, 4,200 chapels. In 1851 Nonconformity seated 58 per cent. of the population. What is the cause of this increase, then? The large number of Nonconformist chapels is caused by the splits among the congregations. Troubles occur, and part of the congregation build a new chapel—a circumstance which indicates, as I put it, weakness rather than strength. I have here a letter from one who is connected with a Nonconformist place of worship, and he writes: "There is a debt on the chapel of £760; we are only a few poor work people." This chapel is in a large and thriving centre, and no doubt there are well attended chapels all around it, and, while I sympathise with the people, still I think it an exceedingly imprudent thing on their part to burden themselves with another chapel when they had already plenty, thus creating that great source of trouble to Nonconformists—the chapel debt. My hon. Friend alluded to the number of Church burials—something like 20,000 Church burials and 1,400 under the Act of my right hon. Friend (Mr. G. Osborne Morgan). The hon. Member who spoke last said on one notable occasion a clergyman had been found to do an injustice to his parishioners by refusing to bury in a grave which had been bought by a man for himself and wife. If these facts can be proved that clergyman would get no more sympathy from me than from the hon. Member. Still, such a circumstance is a reason, possibly, for re-considering the Act of the right hon. Gentleman, and, going further, but not for disestablishing the Church. I propose now to give some figures respecting the diocese of St. David's. The number of confirmations in 1886 was 2,533; in 1887, 3,004; in 1889, 3,206—in ten years, 26,041; a number greater than is recorded in most English dioceses. An hon. Member opposite says that the number is due to pressure brought to bear upon the people by the clergy, and that afterwards the communicants go back to Nonconformity. Such a statement is a libel on Welsh Nonconformity, and public opinion would not allow Welsh Nonconformists to at once desecrate their own form of religion and that of the Established Church. In St. David's, between 1879 and 1888, 25 churches have been built or restored—a number not reached by 25 other dioceses, while only seven have exceeded it. In Llandaff, in the same period, 42 churches have been built or restored—a number not reached by 27 other dioceses. The exact number of Church attendants cannot be got at with the facility which exists in the case of Nonconformists who erect their chapels in centres where they think there is need for them, whereas the Church goes to the thinly as well as the thickly-populated districts, and establishes its church for the ministration of the few as well as of the many. In the parish of Merthyr, in 1810, the population was 7,705, and in 1888 it was 58,000. There are 17 clergyman at work there, and since 1877 £41,200 has been spent on Church extension and £12,750 added to the endowment. And now I come to the parish of Rhondda. The hon. Member, when on a former occasion he spoke on this subject, referred to the fact that at one time there were only two churches in the parish. He said that there was an obligation to hand one of these over to the Roman Catholic Body, and that the other had been erected by a wealthy person, who had obtained the money by the sweat of the brow of the colliers of the district. Well, as to the former of the two churches I think it very difficult for the building to have been used for a better purpose than that to which the owner devoted it, pending the time he hoped it would be occupied by his co-religionists, while how could a colliery proprietor better expend his profits than by building a church for his workmen?

Sir J. Bailey

Mr. ABRAMHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): What I complained of was that the church was not built for the workmen, nine-tenths of whom were Nonconformists.

SIR J. BAILEY: Well, it is not necessary to enter into that question now. We have been told that the increased Church activity is a fight for tithe. Whereas there were only two churches in Rhondda 20 or 30 years ago there are now 22. In one Church district, where the clergyman's income is £289 a year, he keeps no fewer than seven curates; in other church districts the clergymen get nothing at all for tithe. It has been said that the building of these churches has been a foolish expenditure of rich men's money, but can you imagine anyone being liberal or foolish enough, not merely to build 22 churches, but to enlarge the parish church as well? In nine of these churches Welsh services are given. To say that these churches are filled with the rich and wealthy landlord class, no one knows better than the hon. Member for Rhondda opposite that this is not the case, for the Valley of the Rhondda is certainly not filled with rich people. But this affords a striking instance of what is being done by the Church in large centres of population in Wales. There is one argument further I should like to put before the House. If Wales were separated from England by the sea, as is Ireland, or by an impassable range of mountains, I would leave the argument where it is. But such is not the case. As my right hon. Friend told us, Wales never has been a nation. There were only three occasions on which all Wales was united, and by no possibility can you name a town which could have been the capital of the whole country; and the reason is clear. In the South you have the great Valley of the Severn, connecting the mineral district with Bristol, Gloucester, and other English counties; and the railways, too, which are laid out to suit the requirements of the commercial classes, do not connect the South with the rest of Wales; they connect it with London and Liverpool. On one occasion lately we went so far towards considering

London our capital that we held our national Eisteddfod there. Then we have the Valley of the Usk, connecting Wales with the Great Plain of Monmouthshire; and then the Wye, going into Herefordshire, through the Counties of Brecon and Radnor, the beautiful Valley of Llangollen, and if you disestablished the Welsh Church you would have farmers living next to each other under an entirely different religious policy. This is no mere chimera, and I do not think that any hon. Member opposite has thoroughly considered the vast interference with the Church, apart from the Established Church in Wales, which this Motion contemplates. The County of Monmouth is generally considered to be a county of England. It is part and parcel of a Welsh diocese. Are hon. Members going to break that diocese up? That would be the result of the adoption of this Resolution. You are not going to disestablish the Church merely in the 12 counties of Wales, but in the County of Monmouth as well. If you go a little further, you will find a part of Shropshire is in the diocese of St. Asaph. Are you going to break up that diocese? A part of Radnor and most of Montgomeryshire are in the diocese of Hereford, and a part of Flint is in the diocese of Chester. The Resolution means the disestablishment not only of the Church in Wales, but, to the extent I have mentioned, in England also. Mr. Watkin Williams (afterwards Mr. Justice Watkin Williams), when he brought forward this Motion, said—

"If you disestablish the Church in Wales, you must on the same ground disestablish it also in Cornwall and Yorkshire. Whenever those places wish to disestablish their Church they shall have my hearty support."

I hope that hon. Members who desire to disestablish the Church will bear that argument in mind. The time may come when Church disestablishment will be the battle cry at some General Election, and it will then be seen how deeply the Church has embedded itself in the hearts of the people. Let us beware of having our fortresses taken in detail. In this question, as in so many others, union is strength. No doubt this Resolution will be brought forward year after year until the majorities may possibly fall off from very weariness. I hope the House will resist the temptation to weariness, and that they will stand shoulder to shoulder to resist a Resolution which is intended to injure, and perhaps destroy, an institution which in England, as in Wales, is the ancient Church of the people.

Sir J. Bailey

*(9.50.) Mr. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): We could have desired no one to meet us on this question better than the hon. Baronet the Member for Hereford who has just spoken, for we were well aware we should meet in him a courteous opponent, and that his arguments would be the arguments of a straightforward man. But I hope the hon. Baronet will forgive me if I say I failed to find any new argument in the speech he has just delivered. He has undoubtedly fallen into an error in which the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General led the way. I must say I think that after the tribute paid by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian to the work of the Church of England in Wales it was needless for the Postmaster General to spend so much time in adding his meed of praise. We might have been spared that, and also the praise showered upon it by the hon. Baronet, who is the Lord Lieutenant of a Welsh county, for time is far too precious thus to be expended. The Welsh people have constantly declared that they are not the enemies of the Church; they have no quarrel with the Church, and it is unreasonable year after year, in reply to their case, to bring out that sophistry and that contention. One quarrel is with the establishment in Wales, and I say that that ought to be the quarrel of the Church Party itself, for they have suffered from it more than the Welsh people have. To that position we desire to confine ourselves. The hon. Baronet said he doubted if the disestablishment of the Church had ever been really a test question at any General Election in Wales. He need hardly entertain that doubt, for, with his knowledge of the Principality, he must be aware that it is the special test raised at every election, and if he will stake the issue on that point alone, any single Member for Wales on this side of the House will gladly resign his seat if the hon. Baronet will agree to abide by the result. It must be patent to the whole House that we stand on Disestablishment because we have done so for the last three General Elections. We know it is the only ground on which we can present ourselves to a Welsh constituency, and to pretend that we are agitators and foment the feeling is unworthy of reasonable discussion in this House. But we are suffering from a severe disappointment this evening. Great as the evening has been on account of the important deliverance of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, which will resound from one end of the Principality to the other, and which has at last lifted the question into the highest of all places, has placed it among the foremost to be dealt with, we regret that the Amendment on the Paper was not, as we understood it would be, moved by the hon. Baronet.

SIR J. BAILEY: It was impossible to move it.

*MR. STUART RENDEL: At any rate, it stands here upon the Paper, and in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, who is the official champion of the Church in Wales. It is impossible not to see how far that Amendment departs from the lofty assumption and from the position of superiority hitherto taken up by our opponents in dealing with this question. What are the terms used?—

“That, inasmuch as the Church derives no portion of its revenues from taxation, and provides, in Wales as well as in England, spiritual ministrations for a larger proportion of the population than any other denomination of Christians, it is unjust, as well as inexpedient, to deprive the Church people of the Principality of the means to support the form of religious worship which they prefer.”

The Church by this Amendment drops into the position of a mere denomination. The Amendment practically concedes the point for which Welsh Members have always contended. We protest against its claiming a monopoly—against its claiming the sole right to administer to the spiritual wants of Wales. We say that in Wales the State ought not any longer to sanction and make valid this unjust and unreal pretension. And this Amendment practically abandons it, and treats the Church as one among other denominations. Well, let the State concur and then we shall be satisfied. But the Amendment goes on to plead ad misericordiam against any deprivation by the State of its present means of support. No more pitiful appeal was ever put forward on behalf of a great historical body than this one from the wealthy classes in Wales. If the Church cannot live in Wales without State support it ought not to live at all. If there is one thing certain it is that the Welsh people can and will support their own religion. A body which cannot live in Wales without extraneous support stands condemned. This pitiful appeal comes from the wealthy classes in Wales, the classes which own the land and most of the funded property, and it is addressed to this House against a proposition made by those who speak for the people of Wales, for those who are already adequately supplying the religious requirements of Wales out of their own pockets, and who deem this maintenance of their religion, not a burden, but an honour. We do not desire to say one word of disrespect to the Church. We desire rather to congratulate it upon its labours. We do not grudge it its success, if success there be; we only ask why should it be supported by the State, and why should it derive its support from endowments which ought to belong to the whole people of Wales? Now, the foundation of this singular plea is that this denomination, the Church, is superior any to other denomination in Wales in numbers. I will not go into figures more or less ambiguous. I will not follow the course taken by the Postmaster General, but I wish to mention, and am bound to mention, certain broad figures as to which there shall be as little doubt as possible. I do not think the broad facts of the case are always fully appreciated. The Church in Wales has 1,500 beneficed clergy and curates. The Calvinistic Methodists in Wales have 1,258 chapels and 284,000 adherents, and in 1890 collected £182,000 for the maintenance of their chapels.

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): How many ministers?

*MR. STUART RENDEL: I have not the figures just now in hand. The Congregationalists have 1,138 chapels and 283,000 adherents, and collected £124,000, while the Welsh Baptists have 753 chapels, with 100,000 communicants. It has been suggested that Nonconformity in Wales is standing still or decaying, but to refute this I will point to the amount of money collected for the maintenance of one of these denominations. Perhaps the amount of contributions is a more convincing test than the number of adherents. The average amount collected annually by the Calvinistic Methodists for the 10 years from 1871 to 1880 was £144,903, and for the years from 1881 to 1890 it amounted to £170,700, and in the last year, at a steady increase, it amounted to £182,000. I have not the figures for the Congregationalists, but I can give the number of chapels and of actual communicants as to whose genuine membership there can be no doubt. In 1861 the Congregationalists had 761 chapels; in 1882, 1,083 chapels, and by 1890 they had 1,138 chapels. In the same years the number of communicants were 97,647, 120,652, and 127,360. The growth in numbers of the Welsh Baptists has been still more significant. In 1872 they had 576 chapels and 62,887 communicants, and last year they had 753 chapels and 939,622 communicants. In short, if I may take the total number of chapels or congregations as a fair test, these have grown from 2,927 in 1861 to over 4,500 last year. These figures show a steady and uniform growth, and therefore any argument founded upon the decay of Nonconformity in Wales is erroneous and unfair. It must be remembered in considering these figures that the Welsh population is not increasing as the English population increases; in fact, in five counties the population has dwindled for the last five years at the average rate of 600 a year. My hon. Friend the Member for the Eifion Division of Carnarvonshire has dealt with an interesting point, showing how the Welsh Nonconformists carry their Nonconformity with them out of Wales. It should carry conviction of the manner in which Nonconformity is ingrained in the character of the Welsh people to see the touching manner in which they take their religion with them wherever they go. And in regard to the hundreds of Welsh congregations in the United States—all of whom look upon this question as one not only of justice to their religion, but of recognition of their nationality—I would urge the unwisdom of those who now hold a majority in Parliament solely upon the cause of Imperial unity, lending their numbers to defeat a Resolution which tends to bring together and reconcile to a great English Institution every Welshman throughout the Empire. Of course, it is alleged by those who see a decline in Welsh Nonconformity that there has been a great revival of the Church in Wales. We are not here to contest that, or to quarrel about it, though we may have our own ideas as to the manner in which it is stated, and our own view as to the value to be attached to some of the figures with which the statement is supported. But one thing we will not do, we will not follow the example set by those high in authority in the Church—we will not endeavour to improve our own position by blackening the position of others. It is for us to state our case to the best of our power in accordance with the facts, but it does not fall within our methods of controversy to attack those who are honestly working in the same vineyard. We have not the slightest desire to depreciate good work that is done, whether by the Church in Wales or by any other denomination. It may, however, be fairly pointed out that as compared with England the ministry in Wales is doubly manned. You find in proportion to Church population, twice as many Bishops and Chapters and beneficed clergy in Wales as in England, and we are not quarrelling with the fact, but it does appear to us to render it all the more significant and arbitrarily aggressive that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in the exercise of the extraordinary powers given to them by Parliament over what some are nevertheless pleased to call Church property should annually transfer large sums of £30,000 or £40,000 as subventions from the undermanned Church in England to the already overmanned Church in Wales. Now, after all, what is the result of what the Church has been doing in Wales? There has been an anti-tithe agitation. Is that a satisfactory result? I hardly think there is any one will say it is. What is the constitutional test? The wish of the people as expressed in a General Election. Is there any doubt as to what the result of a General Election in Wales would be now, or a year hence, or at any time? Nobody can have any doubt. There are not many Conservative Welsh Members, and there are not many Conservative candidates, but I was interested in reading the other day of the attitude of one Conservative candidate who, having once represented a Welsh constituency, has a laudable ambition to do so again. He was "heckled" on the question of disestablishment, and what he said in substance, in reply, was—

Mr. Stuart Rendel

"I am a Churchman. I think disestablishment would be ruinous to the religious interests of the country and the Church, but if the majority desire it I will vote for it."

That is a striking indication of what the state of feeling in Wales is, and of what the prospects of the next General Election in Wales are upon this question. I do not think the Postmaster General has assisted the Welsh Conservative candidates by his speech of to-night. It is a great event for us that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has spoken as he has, but if there is any speech second in value to us it is that delivered by the Postmaster General. The present authorised Church argument is represented, I take it, in the Amendment, but there is another bolder argument expressed by the Dean of Llandaff, who has urged—

"How can you disestablish the Welsh Church? There is no Welsh Church. The Church in Wales is nothing more nor less than four dioceses of the Province of Canterbury."

I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether in his view there is a Welsh Church or not? The Dean of Llandaff says there is no Welsh Church. If there is no Welsh Church, then it is not a National Church in Wales, and Wales has a fair claim to say that the English Church shall not have the national position the State assigns to it in Wales. If it is, as is thus admitted, an alien Church, why all this heat and show of indignation over the term alien? On the other hand, if it is a Welsh Church then it is the National Church in Wales, and Wales, as the inherent right of its nationality, may claim to deal with it constitutionally. Whether it be called a Welsh Church or not a Welsh Church, our position is unanswerable. We have a right to reject its claims to monopoly if it is not ours. We have a right to deal with them as we please if it is ours. The real truth is this is a question of the separation of four dioceses from the Church of England, and though the difficulty of the separation has been done full justice to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, is it such a serious matter?

All the dioceses of the Church of England in the Colonies of Australia, New Zealand, and the Cape were, down to 1861, regarded and treated by the Church and the Government as part of the Establishment. In 1861, Lord Kingsdown's judgment decided that they were not, never had been, part of the Establishment. Since colonial dioceses were thus declared by the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council not part of the Establishment, has the Church suffered any hurt? Has the discipline or the doctrine of the Church been affected? Has there been any conflict between the Established and the non-Established portions of the Church? On the contrary, no one seems to have been a whit the wiser or a penny the worse, and I venture to doubt whether the all important fact I now mention is within the knowledge of more than a very small minority of this House. It is no necessary part of Church unity that these four Welsh dioceses should be maintained as part of the Church of England. It is too late in the day to say that the separation of four more dioceses out of the hundred that belong to the Church of England can seriously affect her position, when already for the larger portion of those 100 dioceses are outside the Establishment. It is not essential to the life of a Church that she should be the creature of the State, and to make casuistical and sophistical difficulties over disestablishment in Wales is to exasperate a question which has already tried the Welsh people enough. Can any hon. Member, after hearing the arguments adduced on behalf of the Church, justify in his own mind the maintenance of the Establishment in Wales? I know that there is a sort of impatient idea that the Welsh people are Dissenters out of perversity, and why do they not, it is said, become members of the Church of England? I venture to say that, proud as the English people are of the Reformation, the Welsh people have as much reason to be proud of the redemption of Wales for Christianity by Nonconformity as Englishmen have to be proud of their Protestantism. It is not consistent with the self-respect of our peculiar people, our interesting race—call them what the Postmaster General will—to continue to tolerate the existence of the Establishment. Harmless as the Establishment may seem here, the people in Wales feel that they are unjustly kept under the Church yoke, and that their religion has cast upon it a certain stain of illegitimacy by the State giving exclusive and exhaustive spiritual authority to one denomination which is not that of the people. Consider what Establishment means. It means that the whole of the country of Wales is mapped out for the clergy, that the Bishops in Wales are the Bishops of every soul in their respective dioceses, and that every incumbent is by law the pastor of every soul in his parish. A smaller anomaly is that the Church of England recognises the Orders of the Roman Catholic priests, but will not recognise the Orders of Nonconformist ministers. Can it be supposed that a people like the Welsh, deeply attached as they are to their Nonconformist ministers, will willingly tolerate a state of things under which their ministers are in law discountenanced, their religion placed under a stigma as though of base birth, when it is in truth their highest glory, and when as a nation they are as justly proud to be Nonconformist as any Englishman can be to be Protestant. And who are the people you thus gratuitously insult and are willing to alienate? The people of Wales are religious, orderly, temperate, thrifty, and loyal beyond, I might say, other people; they are not intolerant of the Church of England doctrines; their objection is simply to its Establishment. As I well remember the late Mr. John Bright saying to me 10 years ago, when this question was first set burning in the minds of Welsh Members, the Church has ceased to be the Church of the people, not by its own wrong-doing as a Church, but by the action of Establishment. Establishment killed the Church, said Mr. Bright. And now I venture to say that it is Establishment which is rendering the Church odious to the people of Wales, and to contest the position of the Establishment, to try to save the Establishment, is to aggravate the position, and will make the inevitable change one of more severity to the Church. The real policy of those who care for the Church should be to reconcile the Church to the people, and that will best be done by disestablishment. I ask the House what harm the people of Wales have done to England that they should be so used? In what respect can it be said, that they are in the wrong, or have ever acted wrongfully? Why are the English battalions here, and not the Scotch or the Irish, to vote against this Resolution? It is not our fault that Nonconformity has grown to be the form of our national religion; I do not say it is the fault of the Church even. It is the fault of the State, and the State must admit it, and withdraw its unhappy intervention as well for the sake of the Church as in justice to the Welsh people. Our demands are moderate, we do not wish to give effect to any revengeful feelings, we are not covetous of the goods of the Church. This is no claim for concurrent endowment, this is no proposal for a Maynooth grant. All we ask for is an honourable equality before the law for all denominations in Wales, and the people of Wales cannot do less than make this demand again and again until it is satisfied. Whatever the vote to-night may be, however English numbers may overthrow us, there is not one of the Englishmen who will go into the Lobby against us who will not feel that were we to do otherwise than fight this question as the one question for Wales we should be wanting not only in national self-respect, but in actual manhood, and in their hearts they would despise us.

Mr. Stuart Rendel

*(10.30.) MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I was glad to hear from the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down the magnanimous declaration that he was not going to blacken the Church to which he belongs, but I think most hon. Members will agree that before he sat down he had succeeded in giving the Church what is commonly called a "back-hander." The hon. Gentleman seemed rather satisfied with the Amendment I have put down upon the paper and thinks it is a step towards reconciliation—that it is making an advance towards those who belong to other denominations. I am glad he thinks so. For my part I have no quarrel with Nonconformists, I represent Nonconformity as well as Church feeling. I am certain that I represent a great many Nonconformists who disagree with the words of the Churchman who has just spoken. The hon. Member who moved this Resolution seemed to think that I am hardly capable in my position of speaking for Wales or Welshmen, but I may say I am a good deal more connected with Wales than the hon. Member who has spent twenty years of his life in Australia, and I think I know more about Wales than the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, whose connection with the Principality is merely a political one, who has no home in Wales, and does not speak the Welsh language. I have something more than a political connection with Wales. I am acquainted with Welsh sentiment, and I do not hesitate to say that Churchmen and Nonconformists and all religious men in Wales will be extremely shocked at the tone and language of the hon. Member who brought forward this Resolution. I am perfectly certain that I speak the opinion of Nonconformists, and that they will not approve of the virulent attack the hon. Member has made upon those whose religious views differ from his own. The hon. Member who sits for Merthyr was returned to Parliament, not upon what may be called the Nonconformist interest, for all of those connected with the chapels in Merthyr voted against him and used the strongest language in condemnation of his claims. They said—though I hardly like to repeat what they did say—"that he was brother to Judas Iscariot," and that he and all his friends were going to a very bad place. I do not know whether he has yet made friends with these electors, or if, by his speech, he hopes to do so. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian has given us an interesting account of his own attitude towards this subject, and how for the last twenty years he has been patiently watching which way the cat would jump. There was to the last an uncertainty as to which way he would vote, and it was extremely interesting to note the anxiety depicted on the faces of Members opposite as the right hon. Gentleman described the zeal and activity of the Church. However he seems to have come to the conclusion at last that the cat is out of the bag and has jumped. The right hon. Gentleman's conscience is influenced by electoral figures, his political conduct is governed by arithmetical rules, and upon the result of the elections of 1886 he has made up his mind that the number of Welsh Members supporting this Motion is sufficiently large to make it safe for him to support the Resolution. But I am not quite sure that he is right for in the election of 1886 the electors voting for the present Members numbered 60,000, and against them were 48,000, a proportion of five to four. Why, hon. Members who profess to represent Wales, represent only the "odd man." As an indication of the current of opinion at the present time, I may point to the recent School Board elections at Swansea, where the Church candidates, three clergymen, completely defeated the Nonconformists by more than 2,000 votes. [An hon. MEMBER: "The cumulative vote."] I think the idea that the feeling is all one way is based on a mistaken view of the facts. We shall this evening apply the microscope to Wales, but it must be remembered that this Motion affects five or six dioceses in the Southern Province and one in the Northern; it affects the Church of England in England as well as in Wales. The conditions of the Church in Wales are the same as in England, with this difference perhaps—that Churchmen in Wales show greater zeal and contribute more generously than in purely English dioceses, and that there are in Wales a larger proportion of communicants to the population than in England. But I specially wish to ask the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Stuart Rendel) what he means by the maintenance of the Establishment? Can he give us a definition; can the hon. Member who moved this Motion? Does he not know that the term "by law established" is a mere translation of "legibus stabilita," and simply means the recognition and protection which is by law accorded to every lawful religion? That the term is equally applicable to all denominations. The hon. Member does not understand, and greatly disparages the position of the denominations whose case he is endeavouring to put forward when he does not recognise this fact. For the last 200 years there has been what may be called concurrent establishment. If he doubts that allowance by law is of necessity a sufficient establishment, let me remind him of old statutes and judicial declarations. In 1767, in the House of Lords, Lord Mansfield in the cause between the City of London and the Dissenters on the nomination of sheriffs used these words—

"The Toleration Act renders that which was illegal before now legal. The Dissenter's way of worship is permitted and allowed by the Act."

It is not only exempted from punishment, but rendered innocent and lawful. It is established."

Hon. Members are perhaps ignorant of the law: they have not perhaps read Blackstone. It may be they have never heard of Lord Mansfield, who said the worship of Dissenters is established. Speaker Onslow supported that view, and in Dr. Furneaux's letters to Blackstone hon. Members will find the privileges to Dissenters described as legal establishment. For 200 years—from 1720 to 1850—the Dissenter denominations received State pay, sums of money being granted every year in the Appropriation Acts for their support, because they were considered to represent a legalised and established form of public religious worship. But Nonconformists are always asking for more establishment. Only the other day they asked for special rights to obtain sites for places of public worship. We have recognised the rights of Nonconformists: their ministers are relieved from serving civil offices: they are recognised by law.

*MR. STUART RENDEL: I am sure the hon. Member does not wish to misrepresent me. What I said was that the Established Church does not recognise the orders of Nonconformist ministers.

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Still I do not quite know what the hon. Member means. The Church does not recognise the orders of Nonconformists or Nonconformists our orders. Of course, no Church recognises the orders of another, in the sense of allowing services to be performed by those who do not believe in the doctrines of the Church.

*MR. STUART RENDEL: I am unwilling to interrupt the hon. Gentleman; but I must repeat and emphasise my statement that the Established Church does recognise the orders of the Roman Catholic Church, but not of Nonconformists.

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I beg pardon; we do not recognise the orders of the Roman Catholic Church, nor do Roman Catholics recognise our orders in the sense I have referred to.

MR. DE LISLE rose, but

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON proceeded: I say we do recognise the position of Nonconformist ministers by law, by the State, by Acts of Parliament relieving them from service in offices where otherwise they would be compelled to serve, and so I say Nonconformity is established by law.

Mr. Stanley Leighton

But it is the endowments hon. Members want to confiscate, what do they care about the relations between Church and State? Why not be honest and say you want the money? For my part I can more tolerate though I cannot admire the narrow bigotry which would suppress every form of faith but its own than I can endure the canting hypocrisy which covers its predatory instincts under the cloak of religion. Here are the uses as set out in their draft Bill to which hon. Members would apply the money they get from the Church.

*MR. STUART RENDEL: I am sure the hon. Member does not wish to directly mislead the House. His language is sometimes strong and his statements occasionally erroneous, he speaks of a draft Bill of ours; I can assure him there is no such thing in existence.

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Oh, but I have the draft Bill here. ["Whose"?] Here are some of the purposes to which the funds of the Church are proposed to be devoted: music rooms, museums, observatories, eistedfodds. Will hon. Gentleman put all religious bodies upon the same footing? Dissenting bodies are richly endowed; let hon. Members regard the Church endowments as they do the endowments of their own denominations. The property administered by the Church is private not national property. If anybody doubts that I recommend him to learn law and history from the Nonconformist Selden, the Radical Chancellor Brougham, the Tory Eldon, the Unionist Selborne, the Radical historian Freeman. It is private not national property, and those who deny it assert what is morally, legally, and historically untrue. The Church has never been subsidised by the State, and is no burden upon the State. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has said on a notable occasion that the clergy are not State paid. I do not know whether that declaration of fact will now be said to contain "an element of exaggeration." The statement of the hon. Member for Swansea that tithes were supplied to the Church, by Parliament, is historically and absolutely untrue. Now it is declared in this Motion, that the—interests of the Welsh people and ministers only to a small minority of the population ;”

"Church has failed to fulfil its professed object as a means of promoting the religious

but, as a matter of fact, there is in Wales no religious body which has so large a number of members. If all minorities are to be robbed of their endowments merely because they are minorities, then disendowment will have to begin with the Roman Catholics first, then the Wesleyans, the Independents, the Congregationalists, the Baptists, the Calvinists, and, last of all, the Church. It is not the Church of the few, but of the many. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian said the Church in Wales is in precisely the same position as the Church in Ireland ; but he forgets that in Ireland Roman Catholicism has a far larger number of adherents than the Church of England. But there is no religious denomination in Wales that can compare in numbers with the Church of England. Hon. Members base their case upon numbers, but how is it they so bitterly oppose an authoritative return of their numbers—a religious census ? Why do they object to a man stating the religion he belongs to ? I do not know how it may be in the company hon. Members keep, but I have never heard of a Nonconformist being ashamed to acknowledge the religion to which he belongs. Hon. Members claim to have many friends, why are they unwilling to have them counted ? An amateur census has indeed been taken by an important gentleman whose name has been mentioned in the Debate, though probably it is not familiar to many hon. Members—a gentleman of the name of Gee. Mr. Gee is an Irishman, and, therefore, would be counted an alien in Wales. We do not call such persons aliens, but they have been called so during the Debate by hon. Members who claim to represent Wales ; but, alien or not, Mr. Gee is a very important person ; he is practically father-confessor to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Denbigh (Mr. Osborne Morgan), and generally an autocrat among the Radical Members for North Wales. He is, indeed, a sort of Welsh Schnadborst. This gentleman set up a census in 78 parishes, and published the returns as they came in. From these returns it appears that the Church in these parishes stands in proportion of 5 to 1 to the Baptists, 5 to 3 to the Calvinists, 3 to 1 to the Independents, and as 3 to 1 to the Wesleyans. This then, I say, is not the Church of the few, but of the many. This census further tells us that in Bangor the numbers are : the Church 5,306, Calvinists 3,549, Independants 1,026, Wesleyans 1,386, Roman Catholics 260. In Denbigh the Church 2051, Calvinists 938, Independents 609, Wesleyans 388. In Brecon, the Church 2832, Calvinists 148, Independents 189, Wesleyans 335, Roman Catholics 556. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who has lived long enough at Harwarden to know something of the poor, made the audacious statement that the Church is the Church of the rich. We all know that Nonconformity is strongest among the middle classes, and has but few adherents among the poor. It is not always easy to test this. But the Nonconformist Board of Guardians at St. Asaph determined to find out the strength of Nonconformity among the poor by counting the adherents of different denominations who were in the workhouse. It turned out that there were 96 Churchmen, 13 Calvinists, 9 Baptists, 6 Independents, 5 Wesleyans, and 5 Roman Catholics.

MR. ILLINGWORTH : Can the hon. Member give us the statistics of the prisons ?

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON : Here we have the result of the investigation by a Nonconformist Board of Guardians establishing the fact that among the extreme poor the immense majority belong to the Church. This does not look like the failure of the Church among the poor, while Mr. Gee's census proves their strength in large towns. But Nonconformists, if not hon. Members, are willing to admit the activity of the clergy. The Rev. John Thomas, D.D., at Carnarvon on Nov. 20, 1883, said :—

“ During the last 50 years, but especially during the last 25 years things have greatly improved. A large number of Welsh Clergy take a deep interest in their work and there is no end of their visitation among their parishioners. I admire their zeal.”

I have a good many other statistics which I put away because they have already been touched upon, and now I will say something upon what I may call the other side. I should like to know what means Dissenters have of supplying ministration to the poor, if a Motion like this under consideration is put into effect. There are 90 parishes in St. Asaph which have no resident Nonconformist minister. Something has been said about an alien Church. Do not hon. Members know that Nonconformity was first forced on Wales by Cromwell and Major-General Harrison? Do they not know that the clergy were thrust out, that a State religion was set up, and ministers paid by Parliamentary Commissioners, who established the Calvinistic doctrine of religious inequality. The plan failed, and in 1676, or 20 or 30 years afterwards, the Nonconformists in Wales numbered only 4 per cent of the inhabitants. Methodism in the last century was the offspring of the Church. It was a brotherhood within the Church. In 1801, and again in 1834, the chiefs of the Methodist body said they did not want to separate themselves from the Church of England. It was only when politics overshadowed the chapels that the attack upon the Church was made in Wales. I would like to have one or two inquiries made as to Nonconformity in Wales. I would like a Royal Commission to inquire into the established Nonconformist denominations in Wales. The official statistics of the Calvinistic Methodists show that in 1884 in that body there were 10,000 communicants, while in 1886 there were only 6000. We have other official statistics printed by the Nonconformists to the effect that in 1883 there were 422 Baptist pastors, and in 1886, 360. I would like to have an inquiry as to how many chapels have been abandoned and used for secular purposes since 1860, and how many unnecessary chapels had been erected, because I find that at a meeting held last spring, at Shrewsbury, one of the speakers said it was nothing less than a scandal to their common faith to see, in a street 30 yards long, four chapels, any one of which would accommodate all the congregations. I would like to know how many chapels are used for political meetings. There is the scandal of that hon. Member who got up in the pulpit, and, having delivered a very racy address one Saturday evening to the political Nonconformists, put a pipe in his mouth and smoked. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN rose, and was received with loud cries of "Order!"

Mr. STANLEY LEIGHTON refused to give way.

Mr. Stanley Leighton

Mr. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN still essayed to speak, but his voice was drowned in cries of "Order!"

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I was not alluding to the hon. Member. Why should he put the fools cap on?

*MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Mr. Speaker—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order!

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Really, the reason —

Mr. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN still remained standing.

*MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Leighton) does not give way he is in possession of the House.

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I do not see why I should give way to the hon. Member when I referred to a scandal in which he was not the actor. The real reason for the present agitation is the decline of Nonconformity and the increasing strength of the Church. If we crippled the Church who would be the gainers? Will spirituality be renewed amongst Nonconformists by giving this blow to the Church? Methodism, which is 100 years old, is already on the wane. The Welsh Church is older than the See of Canterbury, and has given to the Welsh the translation of the Bible, which has been the means of preserving the language, and is to this day practically the dictionary of the Welsh people; the bishops, clergy, and laity of the Church in Wales were never more active in Church work, in educational work, in philanthropic work, and I maintain that it would be unjust and inexpedient to paralyse the labours of such a Church; it would be to encourage class hatred and bitter sectarianism; it would take away from the poor the means of religious worship and retard the progress of the nation.

*(11.9.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgton): I do not propose to follow the hon. Member (Mr. S. Leighton) in his historical argument, but I must say that though I listened to his speech with great care and attention it was not easy to get hold of any tangible argument in favour of the Welsh Establishment. If the Church is to be saved it will be by speeches of a different kind. There have been speeches delivered by hon. Gentlemen opposite to which a much closer examination must be given. The hon. Member for Oswestry appealed to the age of the Welsh Church, but for our present purposes we need not go back very far in history—not beyond the lifetime of many living men. Two generations ago there were in Wales 300 or 400 chapels, and now there are 3,000 or 4,000. That shows the tendency of the current: that shows what the people want, and will continue to want, until the Resolution before us has been carried out by law. Speeches in defence of the Church have been made, not by Welsh Members, but by Members for neighbouring English counties. The Members for Hereford and Shropshire are as near an approach to Welsh Members as can be got to plead against the wish of Wales. The hon. Member for Oswestry told us that the cause of this movement was the decline of Nonconformity and the increasing strength of the Church, and the hon. Member for Hereford (Sir J. Bailey), my old schoolfellow, who I hope will allow me to call him my hon. Friend, who spoke in the tone which men should adopt towards their neighbours, made the very best case out for the Church—a case in which he evidently thoroughly believed. He said that the Church of England and Wales, or the Church of England in Wales, as the hon. Member for Merthyr called it—it does not greatly matter by which name it is called for the short time it will last as an establishment—has increased greatly of late years, and he gave instances of that increase. Other instances have been given on the other side of the question. Now, I beg hon. Members to look very closely into both cases. The hon. Member for Hereford took the case of Merthyr Tydvil, the constituency of the hon. Member who moved the Motion. He showed how Merthyr Tydvil has increased. He showed that it is a great community of some 60,000 people, and he showed, if I recollect right, that about £122 a year is paid in tithes.

SIR J. BAILEY: The right hon. Gentleman is mixing up two cases. I think the sum in Merthyr Tydvil is £800.

*SIR G. TREVELYAN: The sum, at any rate, was small. He showed how there was a small sum in tithes, and how, by the public spirit and devotion of Churchmen, a very large body of religious teaching has been set up, many churches built, and many curates endowed. In fact, the whole speech of the hon. Gentleman was a speech on the advantage of voluntarism. Other cases taken by another hon. Member, who well knows the case of Wales, were Cardiff, Swansea, and Llanelly. In Cardiff the tithes are £109, in Swansea £140, in Llanelly I can find no tithes recorded at all, but the populations are enormous; they are counted by scores and hundreds and thousands, and they afford a fine field for the exertions of rival religious bodies. Where the population is dense and the endowments are small there the Church of Wales was increasing as the Church of England is increasing in our great cities. That is an argument, not for Establishment, but for voluntarism. We must not think that in these great centres Nonconformity is behind hand. The same causes which have given an impetus to the Church have given an impetus to Nonconformity. In Merthyr Tydvil for every seat which the Church has provided, four are provided by other bodies, and in the great centres of Monmouthshire for every seat provided by the Church at least three have been provided by other bodies. It must be remembered by those who, like myself, listen for the opinions of the people through the mouths of their constitutional representatives, that all these crowded districts, of whom my hon. Friend spoke, send by enormous majorities men charged to effect in Parliament disestablishment of the Welsh Church. But these places do not afford the strongest test; that is to be found in the rural districts, those Welsh speaking districts where, by the confession of a dignitary of the Established Church, the Nonconformists are in an enormous majority. And what are the statistics of the hon. Member who has just sat down when tried by the light of the confession of a Dean of his own Church, when he says—

“Out of 1,006,100 souls who, according to Mr. Ravenstein, speak Welsh, 800,000 are attached more or less closely to the 3,000 chapels of the three different Nonconformist sects. Statistical apologists will hint that these Nonconformists exist only on paper. Paper adherents do not give money. The Welsh Nonconformists give far more than £300,000 a year.”

The truth is that it is these rural districts that are the real test rather than the great towns. These are the cases in which the excluded are the most anything else if the endowments are to draw their flocks away from them? Politics has been to them a matter of conscience. They are bound to the politicians. The only way to send them back to their duties, and to give them the same interest which all good citizens have in politics, is to do justice to pass this Resolution and found a basis upon it, at the earliest opportunity to give them the fair play that all citizens ought to have. If you do that, you may be very sure that they will retire to the ranks of private citizens. There remains only one argument that I know of of a serious sort, and that is that the Church of England and Wales is an organic and indivisible body, and that you cannot separate the parts any more than you can separate a limb from the body. Now there is an interior and invisible, as well as a mystic meaning in this. The visible meaning was given by the hon. Gentleman opposite. He said there were such very great practical difficulties on this question. He said—

“Monmouthshire is part of the diocese of Llandaff, and how would you separate Monmouthshire from Llandaff and leave it, as an English county, under the influence of the Established Church.”

My answer is that we should not separate Monmouthshire from the rest of the diocese of Llandaff. What would have been said if we had been told two years ago that we would not have a Local Government Bill because the unions overlapped the boundary of this or that county? And as regards the mystical side of the question—“This is a single indivisible body which cannot be divided”—that I allow is too deep for me. It is not a practical objection at all, and Members of this House are not likely to have much sympathy with it. The Resolution is a practical suggestion. We know the thing can be done. We have done it in the case of Scotland 200 years ago. It was quite idle to give the Scottish people then the arguments which are now thought good enough for the Welsh Nonconformists. The Scottish people told English Churchmen in a very sharp manner that they will not have them. This has been done in the case of Scotland, and it has been done in the case of Ireland. We know, therefore, that it is practical. I will advance only one more argument, which I think has not been given already, but which I consider a very serious argument indeed on one side of the question—that is, the demoralizing effect in every department of social and municipal life of Church privilege. Just as in Ireland when you began to favour a particular Church in things religious, that favour was spread to civil matters, so the same thing has taken place in Wales. There are Welsh counties where religious opinion is made a test for taking part in civil duties. There is one county which returns six Members to Parliament pledged to disestablishment, and yet in that county a short time ago there were but two County Justices who were Nonconformists. In the County of Carmarthen four-fifths of the population are Nonconformists. In the Island of Anglesey not long since there was but a single Nonconformist on the Bench, while in Flintshire there is not one. Up to a very recent period the same state of things prevailed in regard to other public positions in Wales. But it is very different in all cases in which the Welsh people have the power to express their own wishes, as in the County Councils, for instance. The conscientious objections which many Welshmen have to the payment of tithe has produced great differences, and has been one of the great causes which have led during the last three years to the greatly increased desire for disestablishment. We know by recent and ancient history that a Church which is in a precarious and an invidious position may be safe so long as it remains quiet, but that directly it becomes aggressive towards its opponents it will be placed in great danger. The Church in Scotland will furnish an example of this in the case of the Patronage Bill, and it is now the case with the Church in Wales in connection with the tithe war. If the Welsh Nonconformists had been left alone they might have remained tranquil, but the Tithe Bill which is about to pass through Parliament has set their backs to the wall, and they are determined to fight the whole question. The feeling against the Established Church is stronger in Wales at the present time than it ever was. It has been growing rapidly, and numerous and the included are few, while the endowments are enormously great in proportion to any work done for the benefit of the population. The Postmaster General referred to these districts. He said that the great glory of the Church was that it kept up public worship and service for small congregations of two, three, and four people. If that were a valid argument, the Irish Church would be alive this very moment. It is quite idle to argue that these districts would be left without any sort of public worship if this money were withdrawn. If any good work is being done in these districts, even if the money were withdrawn, why should not the Church as a voluntary institution with its rich adherents go on doing the work which is done by the Nonconformist bodies with their poor clients? It is not the case that the field would be left empty, for the field is a religious field. The Welsh are a religious people, and if in any places there are only one, two, or three going to church, that is because the majority go to chapel. The real defence of an Established Church is that it is the Church of the poor. I have never heard any hon. Member deny that the Nonconformist bodies in Wales are the churches of the poor, or argue that the Church in Wales, whatever it is, is, at any rate, anything but the Church of the rich. And yet the Nonconformist colliers, the small famers, and small shopkeepers keep their own ministers, silently and without complaint, in decent competence. I have very small sympathy with men who draw large rents from the land and get the profits from the large works, who endeavour in the English newspapers to secure sympathy for their ministers, and yet who let their clergy starve if the tithes are not regularly paid. That is the state of things in Wales. The rich have their religious worship kept up for them at the expense of national property of £260,000 a year at the least. The poor took out of their slender earnings at least £300,000 a year; and then the Postmaster General comes to us and says that Wales is to submit to this state of things for the sake of England. He says that to rebel against this state of things would be to "fritter away the oneness of this realm of England." The speech of the Postmaster General was worth a great deal to us. It is strange, indeed, that so ingenious a Gentleman, who is arguing on behalf of an institution which he loves in so disinterested a manner as he does love the Church to which he belongs, should be so unfortunate in his language as to give weapons of the most trenchant sort to those who are endeavouring to overthrow its bulwarks. The references of the Postmaster General to the Welsh people I prefer to be read by the people in the Postmaster General's speech. The very mildest of them all was when he compared them to the more civilised districts of the Island. He used very much stronger remarks than these, but none of his epithets will go so home to the Welsh people as his absolute denial of a Welsh nationality. And on what ground does he deny this nationality? On the ground, so far as I can make out, that according to his reading of history until Wales fell under the power of England it never was united, but was split into three Principalities. Are we to make that the test of nationality? England, indeed, may be a nation on those conditions, and so may France. But what do you say to the nation, the struggle for whose nationality has made the history of our lifetime—the Kingdom of Italy? Was Italy a united Italy without anything else attached to it before the time that it was united under Victor Emanuel? Indeed, if I were to scrutinise too closely the claims of Ireland on the principle laid down by the Postmaster General, Ireland would have no claim to nationality. No, Sir; the arguments that have been used against this measure have not been of a very persuasive nature. The most formidable argument, and the one on which our adversaries rely, is that the Church, though not a very successful authority, is still a Propagandist Church. A sanguine man in the Debates on the Irish Church Bill said it would take 4,000 years to convert Ireland to Protestantism; and I think it would take at least four centuries to make any impression on the Nonconformity of Wales. And what a prospect it is for Wales that all the endowments of the Principality should be placed during all that period in the hands of the adversaries of the creed of the majority. It is said that the Welsh clergy are politicians. How can they be anything else if the endowments are used to draw their flocks away from them? Politics has been to them a matter of conscience. They are bound to be politicians. The only way to send them back to their duties, and to give them the same interest which all good citizens have in politics, is to do justice—to pass this Resolution and found a Bill upon it, at the earliest opportunity—to give them the fair play that all citizens ought to have. If you do that, you may be very sure that they will retire into the ranks of private citizens. There remains only one argument that I know of of a serious sort, and that is that the Church of England and Wales is an organic and indivisible body, and that you cannot separate the parts any more than you can separate a limb from the body. Now there is an interior and visible, as well as a mystic meaning in this. The visible meaning was given by the hon. Gentleman opposite. He said there were such very great practical difficulties on this question. He said—

Sir G. Trevelyan

“Monmouthshire is part of the diocese of Llandaff, and how would you separate Monmouthshire from Llandaff and leave it, as an English county, under the influence of the Established Church.”

My answer is that we should not separate Monmouthshire from the rest of the diocese of Llandaff. What would have been said if we had been told two years ago that we would not have a Local Government Bill because the unions overlapped the boundary of this or that county? And as regards the mystical side of the question—“This is a single indivisible body which cannot be divided”—that I allow is too deep for me. It is not a practical objection at all, and Members of this House are not likely to have much sympathy with it. The Resolution is a practical suggestion. We know the thing can be done. We have done it in the case of Scotland 200 years ago. It was quite idle to give the Scottish people then the arguments which are now thought good enough for the Welsh Nonconformists. The Scottish people told English Churchmen in a very sharp manner that they will not have them. This has been done in the case of Scotland, and it has been done in the case of Ireland. We know, therefore, that it is practical. I will advance only one more argument, which I think has not been given already, but which I consider a very serious argument indeed on one side of the question—that is, the demoralizing effect in every department of social and municipal life of Church privilege. Just as in Ireland when you began to favour a particular Church in things religious, that favour was spread to civil matters, so the same thing has taken place in Wales. There are Welsh counties where religious opinion is made a test for taking part in civil duties. There is one county which returns six Members to Parliament pledged to disestablishment, and yet in that county a short time ago there were but two County Justices who were Nonconformists. In the County of Carmarthen four-fifths of the population are Nonconformists. In the Island of Anglesey not long since there was but a single Nonconformist on the Bench, while in Flintshire there is not one. Up to a very recent period the same state of things prevailed in regard to other public positions in Wales. But it is very different in all cases in which the Welsh people have the power to express their own wishes, as in the County Councils, for instance. The conscientious objections which many Welshmen have to the payment of tithe has produced great differences, and has been one of the great causes which have led during the last three years to the greatly increased desire for disestablishment. We know by recent and ancient history that a Church which is in a precarious and an invidious position may be safe so long as it remains quiet, but that directly it becomes aggressive towards its opponents it will be placed in great danger. The Church in Scotland will furnish an example of this in the case of the Patronage Bill, and it is now the case with the Church in Wales in connection with the tithe war. If the Welsh Nonconformists had been left alone they might have remained tranquil, but the Tithe Bill which is about to pass through Parliament has set their backs to the wall, and they are determined to fight the whole question. The feeling against the Established Church is stronger in Wales at the present time than it ever was. It has been growing rapidly, and in proof of that I will give the House one or two figures. The old Parliamentary representation of Wales was not in favour of religious equality. In 1856 only two Welsh Members voted in favour of Mr. Miall's Motion for Welsh Disestablishment. Later on in the same year, when a Motion was brought forward in the House to enable Dissenters to take part in the proceedings of the Cambridge University Senate, only one Welsh Member voted in its favour. In 1870 it would be found only seven Welsh Members voted in favour of disestablishment, while now the numbers were 27 to 3, with the difference that the three cannot be relied on to vote at all. The reason is that since then two things have happened—we have got the ballot, and household suffrage has been extended to the counties. That is to say, the great body of the common people in Wales have the franchise, and they use it without supervision or dictation. It is proved beyond all manner of doubt that the great body of the Welsh commonalty are attached to the Nonconformist faith, and are opposed to the Established Church. The feeling against the Established Church grew up in the last century under a very severe system of persecution, such as is impossible now in these days of publicity and humanity, and it is kept alive, and will continue to be kept alive, by the only persecution now possible—the favour and partiality shown by the law to creed as against creed—a favour and partiality which I earnestly trust will receive their deathblow to-night.

(11.35.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): The House may well feel surprised that no attempt has been made by those who support the Motion to grapple with the propositions it contains. That Resolution made two statements of fact, and upon those statements based a recommendation. The statements are—first, that and, secondly, that

“The Church of England in Wales had failed to fulfil its professed object as a means of promoting the religious interests of the Welsh people;”

“It ministers only to a small minority of the population.”

The first of those propositions has been refuted as much by the speech of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian as by any other speech that has been delivered to-night. The very person who has moved this Resolution acknowledged that there has been an awakening to life on the part of the Church in Wales. If the Church in Wales needed any vindication at all it has received it in the speech for which this Debate will be memorable—the speech of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, who spoke of the Church in terms of deep and sincere admiration, and showed that in support of their creed and their Church the supporters of the Church of England in Wales have outdone even the generosity of the people in English dioceses. This directly negatives the first proposition put upon the Paper. The right hon. Member who spoke last seemed to think that he had answered the argument based upon the recent increase of churches in places like Merthyr by saying that the Nonconformist chapels had increased in like proportion. Surely that does not disprove the good influence of the Church in Wales. Is it not a good thing that the energy of the Church should inspire corresponding energy in other bodies? An honest rivalry amongst those who are teaching religion and endeavouring to do good ought to be a cause for jubilation. The second proposition in the Resolution is that the Church in Wales ministers only to a small minority of the people. Has that been proved? The expression “a small minority” has not been explained, and we know that the last Church census, in 1889, which was begun was not carried to a completion by those who, being opponents of the Church, had thought to make capital out of it. It is not uncharitable to suppose that if the results of that census could have borne out the views expressed by the opponents of the Church they would have been put before the country in their entirety. Does this Resolution mean disestablishment and disendowment? [“Hear, hear!”] Then why does it not say so? Why should an attempt be made to induce the House to accept a vague Resolution of this kind? If the Church is using the funds it possesses for the benefit of the people there is no ground for taking them away. The right hon. Member opposite delivered a speech 20 years ago which he had not recanted, although to-night, with a miraculous subtlety of interpretation, he has tried to minimise its effect. Speaking of the proposal then made with regard to the Church of Wales, the right hon. Gentleman said—

Sir G. Trevelyan

"We do not intend to go in that direction; we deprecate it, and we should regard it as a national misfortune."

That was 20 years ago, and what has been the history of those 20 years? There is not a Welsh Member who does not know that to-day the Church in Wales is stronger and better and purer and more energetic than it was then. Can Parliament reasonably be asked to cripple this organisation, which is generally admitted to be doing good work to-day—to cripple it, not because any one suggests that there is any object under the sun to which the Church funds can be devoted with greater usefulness to the people, but simply because a section of the community wish to gratify a political antagonism? It is said that the Nonconformity of Wales is opposed to the Church; but it is not to the old and traditional Nonconformity of Wales that this movement can be referred. Welsh Methodism was begun by Churchmen who had no thought of making their movement an assault upon the Church. Welsh Methodism was taught by Churchmen, most of whom remained faithful members of the Church. In 1834 there was an assembly of the Welsh Methodists at Bala, at which it was unanimously agreed that those present deeply lamented the nature of the agitation now so persistent in the kingdom, and which avowedly had for its object the severing of the National Church from the State, and recommended every member of the Connection not to interfere, and pray that "They might lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty." If those men who founded Welsh Dissent and restored to the Church by their bright example much of the efficiency that it had greatly lost, had been alive now, I believe that they would have raised the strongest voice against the Motion of their successors, who now ask to have the National Church disestablished and disendowed. The history of the Welsh Church has been a long one. For 1,300 years its tradition has been continuous, and because 200 years ago, through the action of a Monarch to whom England has not much reason to be grateful—I mean William III.—an unpatriotic, hard, and not a national administration of the Welsh Church occurred, by which it was for a time divorced from the people and weakened in its hold, that is no reason why, when we find the Church regaining its authority and strength, sounding the note of purity, of energy, and of a true faith, we should not let the Welsh people enjoy in its increasing strength and fullness the administrations of a Church which for 11 centuries has been dear to them. It is too late to deal with any matters of statistics; but I would observe, in conclusion, that for neither statement made in the Resolution has sound reason been given in the speeches of hon. Members opposite.

(11.55.) MR. BYRON REED: I beg to move that the Debate be now adjourned.

Mr. DILLWYN 'rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 235; Noes 203.—(Div. List, No. 60.)

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY,—Committee upon Monday next.

SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON (SUPERANNUATION) BILL. (No 49.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on nomination of the Select Committee [10th February.]

*(12.12.) THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I crave the indulgence of the House for one moment in reference to the nomination of this Committee, and I ask the attention of the House to the proposal which I have to make, as it may relieve it from the dilemma in which it is placed. A few weeks ago it was agreed to appoint a Committee on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member move one restraint upon a young man in responding to the seductions of the betting circulars, and I do not think there can be any sound objection to an extension of the measure, because although there may be circumstances under which a borrowing transaction on the part of an infant would be perfectly legitimate, I do not think that any legitimate desire to borrow on the part of an infant would be likely to receive any valuable assistance from the receipt of any of these money-lending circulars; whilst, on the other hand, in many cases, it is certain they lead to the commencement of transactions by which a man is encumbered and burdened often during many of the subsequent years, perhaps during the whole, of his life. Therefore, if I receive any encouragement from your Lordships to do so, I would certainly be disposed to extend the scope of the Bill. It would not be a large addition to extend its operation to money-lending as well as to betting circulars.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Herschell.)

LORD DE ROS: I am sure both parents and guardians must be grateful to the noble and learned Lord for introducing a measure to put a stop to the pernicious system of betting by youths through these circulars, and if he had not forestalled me I was going to ask him whether he would include in the Bill, not only betting, but money-lending circulars, and make it penal for them to be sent to boys and youths at public schools and colleges, as they now are to an enormous extent. I hope your Lordships will accede to his suggestion, as he is, I am glad to hear, ready to include money-lending circulars within the scope of the Bill.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, I desire to say that there will be no objection to the Bill on the part of the Government. The only question will be as to the extension of its scope. To myself it seems to be the most unreasonable thing in the world that, while people are brought before Magistrates and dealt with summarily for fortune-telling, persons should be allowed to carry on a trade which is worse a great deal than fortune-telling, and far more injurious in its consequences. A great deal is heard at the present time of legislation for the benefit of the poor, and I am therefore glad that something is at last going to be done for those who are supposed to be rich, and who have been left very much to take care of themselves, whilst rigorous measures are adopted to protect the poor against being entrapped by persons who call themselves fortune-tellers. I cannot see why the Bill should not be extended to those persons who offer facilities for borrowing money under what are practically or absolutely false pretences. What is done by the senders of such circulars may not come technically under the legal definition of false pretence, but persons are deceived in being led to suppose that the repayment of the money would be made on easy terms, while the actual terms turn out to be quite different, so that the unfortunate borrowers are hampered for years by the obligations they find they have incurred. Young men are frequently drawn into this system of borrowing before they are of age, on the security of expectations, which, when they are ultimately realised, are encumbered to an extent which embarrasses them for a long time, perhaps as long as they live. Unfortunately, young men who receive these circulars do in that way borrow largely before they come of age, and their liability for money, which perhaps really they have never received, hangs round their necks for the rest of their lives. I am glad the noble and learned Lord has taken the matter in hand, as I believe that legislation may be attended with results beneficial to all who are exposed to these temptations.

Lord Herschell

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I entirely approve of the object of the Bill, but I would call the noble and learned Lord's attention to the fact that he has simply made this offence a misdemeanour. If he will consider for a moment, I think he will see the clumsiness of the remedy which is proposed, instead of these offences being made triable before the Magistrates at Petty Sessions. He will see that the attainment of the object of the Bill is more likely to be secured by the remedy being made short and easy, without the necessity of bringing such cases before a Grand Jury to find a presentment. I believe it would be more effective if, instead of making the offence a misdemeanour for which an indictment may be preferred before a Grand Jury, it were made an offence for which any person charged with it might be brought before the Magistrates in the ordinary way to be summarily dealt with.

LORD ESHER : My Lords, I do often almost envy my noble and learned Friend opposite his good fortune in bringing forward all the beneficial measures in his power, such as the Bill which he now proposes. I have often in that view wished I could be an ex-Chancellor myself if it were not for the horrible necessity of being a Chancellor first. For the Bill itself, I really think it would be futile unless the addition were made which has been suggested, because if these people were not prevented from sending circulars to youths offering to lend them money, they would simply leave off sending circulars with regard to betting and would substitute others of a money-lending character but taking care that the offer to lend money should include a stipulation or a proposition that it should be employed in betting transactions. I entirely agree also, if I may be allowed to say so, with the suggestion made by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, that it would be better to put in words which would give to the Magistrates summary power of dealing with the alleged offence. Further, I think, as I mentioned to my noble and learned Friend as I came to the House, there will be a difficulty with regard to the evidence against the persons charged with sending these letters. That will be a very difficult matter indeed, unless you put something into the Bill to make a prima facie case against any of those persons requiring it to be disproved that he is the person who has sent the letters. I would therefore suggest that if a letter of any of the kinds described in the Bill is sent with the firm name or the known name of any person, that should be prima facie evidence that it came from him, with liberty, of course, to that person to show that he knew nothing of it, had nothing to do with it, and that his name was appended to it without his authority.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN : My Lords, I do not think that a Bill to restrain gambling, as proposed by my noble and learned Friend, can fail to be received with gratitude in this House. Perhaps, no body of individuals in this country is more exposed to the evils aimed at by the Bill, arising from this pest of money-lending circulars, than the Members of your Lordships' House, whether as sons or fathers. Those persons who send out these circulars do not draw the line at colleges and public schools, for I have a boy of 12, and therefore not old enough yet to be in a public school, who has received a good many of these circulars, at the private school where he is, in which he is told that if he borrows any money his father need not know anything about it, but that if in due time it became necessary he should know it he would no doubt be delighted to pay the money. It is fortunate that in many cases boys make a confidant of a headmaster, and in that way further evil was prevented. He showed the letters to his schoolmaster, and got, of course, some judicious advice, but that perhaps does not always happen ; and I hope, therefore, your Lordships will approve this Bill, and rid the country of this terrible pest.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY : I am sure this Bill will be received with great gratitude over the whole country. There has been no Church Conference, decanal or diocesan, for some time past at which the subject has not been discussed with ardour, and at which attention has not been directed to the miseries which betting and gambling are bringing upon young persons and their families. It may be difficult to determine where the balance is to be struck or the line drawn between such betting as it may be thought ridiculous to do more than discountenance, and such betting as is bringing ruin upon a large number of young fellows at the present time. The noble and learned Lord in supporting the Bill has spoken with his accustomed moderation of the evil which attends the sending of circulars to schools and colleges, but he says very truly that it exists upon a scale which renders it worthy of interference by the Legislature. There is no clergyman, I am sure, but knows that the system is being carried on upon a vast scale indeed, and whatever else may be criminal and wrongful, there can be no baser trade than that of instigating ignorant young men to enter into betting and gambling transactions in order to make an enormous profit out of their inexperience and misery. It does indeed exist upon a great scale and in all directions. In a single square I know of two most unfortunate cases that have occurred within the last few months not far from where their Lordships are sitting. In the first, a very promising young footman had disappeared under terrible circumstances, leaving behind him proof that he had been extensively engaged in betting. In the second instance, at the other corner of the square, a young secretary committed suicide under most painful circumstances, after having been found to be fraudulent with regard to cheques to the amount of nearly £2,000. This young man's room was full of papers, of one of which I have here a copy. The accounts weekly furnished to him by the commission agent, whom I suppose, poor fellow, he thought he was employing, but who was really employing him, which were found after his death, are made out in a systematic manner, giving the dates of the meetings, the names of the horses, and the balance upon the amounts lost or won. Letters from this agent were also found, showing that occasionally small sums were sent to the unfortunate young man as winnings, but that he was more frequently asked for large cheques to make good the losses. He had been lured on by those means until a life which had begun well ended in terror and degradation. But that is not the end of the sad story. A friend who had been abroad for two years, on returning inquired for the young man, after his death, and on learning his fate remarked that he was the second friend of his who in the meantime had committed suicide through the unbearable wretchedness produced by the betting temptations of the men aimed at by the Bill. I would not have mentioned those cases did I not know that they are typical instances. I am assured by business men that there are at this moment many luncheon bars in the City where young men are tempted to bet and to borrow money for gambling purposes. Young men in those places are continually solicited to bet on horses, and are offered money to begin with, the men who make those offers being well assured that once they get the young men in their power they will be able in some way to produce the money even if they are driven to help themselves to it. Scarcely less evil is produced by the vile system of "money-lending," and I hope most heartily that the noble and learned Lord will include in his Bill the money-lending circulars which are being sent in such numbers to almost everybody. Not only youths at college and boys at school but a whole population is being drenched with these circulars. There is a kindred matter which might, I think, be more thoroughly attended to, and that is the large numbers of circulars which are sent to every house from Hamburg and other places on the Continent relating to foreign lotteries. I spoke to a legal authority on the subject the other day and he told me they were illegal, and that it was merely an accident that they had not been stopped by the Post Office. Two more came in a few days to my house, and they go on in profusion. If they are illegal the Postmaster General's attention ought to be called to the fact that these circulars are being constantly delivered, and I hope that an effectual check will be given to the practice.

The Archbishop of Canterbury

VISCOUNT MIDLETON: I am very thankful to the noble and learned Lord for having introduced this Bill. I can give him every encouragement. Between 12 and 13 years ago, with the assistance of my noble Friend (being then in another place) I successfully passed through the House the Infants' Protection Act, which went very much on the same lines as this Bill. Every effort has been made since to overturn that measure by the parties it was intended to reach; and though I was unsuccessful in another place in passing that part of the Bill which made the judge and not the jury the arbiter of what were necessities for infants in law, yet the simple fact that infants were rendered utterly incapable of contracting, and that no advances made to them while under age could be validated by any subsequent advance after they came of age, has operated as a very material check upon the doings of those depredators who prey upon that particular class. The Bill, with the assistance of my noble and learned Friend, was passed into law; and from that time to this it has never been found possible by those persons to get round the clauses, although every effort has been made to do so. I think we need not be in the least afraid of being accused of legislating in a grandmotherly spirit in reference to this Bill, because it is greatly needed in practice. I think that the noble and learned Lord has done a great public service in introducing it; and I sincerely hope it may be passed as soon as possible.

LORD NORTON: My Lords, I merely wish to say a few words in gratitude to the noble and learned Lord for the Bill he has introduced; and I do so, not I am sure because it wants in any way a recommendation to the Members of this House, but because I cannot help thinking that the Bill may not commend itself as easily and as generally elsewhere as it does to Members of this House; and, therefore, anything like a general expression of opinion in favour of the Bill here will do as much good in drawing favourable attention to this most important subject as possibly even the passing of the Bill itself. Now, I cannot help thinking that the noble and learned Lord himself rather depreciated the importance of his Bill. He talked of it as a small measure. In my humble opinion there is not a more important measure before Parliament at this moment to the well-being of society than that we are now discussing, which proposes to check a noxious and lucrative trade, involving the demoralisation of the youth of the country, and bringing misery and disaster into many homes and families throughout the Kingdom. I hope that the suggestions which fell from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, and also from my noble Friend near me, the Master of the Rolls, may be accepted as improvements in the Bill by the noble and learned Lord who has introduced it, for the purpose of facilitating the action of the Bill, and the conduct of proceedings in carrying out its object. I do not think the noble and learned Lord himself realises the enormous extent to which the mischief has gone which his Bill is aimed at suppressing. According to the Report alluded to by the most rev. Primate upon the facts which came before Convocation from various parts of England, carefully gathered together, it appears that there are no less than 10,000 of these professional betting agents in England alone. They are to be found in almost every locality, most of them dealing with young men, and dealing with them chiefly because they make more easily profit out of their inexperience than they would out of men older and with more sense in their heads. Their work is well known to go on, and it cannot be easily checked without the assistance of measures like this. It is going on at our public schools, at Eton, at Sandhurst, at the Universities—Oxford and Cambridge, and elsewhere. That is quite well known. The Bill does not deal with gambling in general, and, therefore, some of the cases cited by the Most Reverend Primate were not illustrations of the operations of this Bill. Gambling in general is the subject of a great deal of our legislation. There is nothing that the legislature has been more assiduous in trying to put down; but, as I have said, this Bill does not deal with gambling in general, but seeks, by protecting youth, to strike at these nurseries of vice and ruin. Gambling, I believe, though I am not a lawyer, is classed amongst public nuisances in our criminal law. It is a misdemeanour, and I cannot conceive a more offensive trade, or more contagious disease, in the country than it is. Certainly it ought to be prohibited in the same way that other public nuisances are. The Legislature has made constant efforts to put down gaming in general, but in all the Acts on the subject there has been a difficulty which we must bear in mind in dealing with even so much-required a Bill as this. The difficulty of legislating in regard to gambling in any shape at all is to steer clear between condemning harmless amusements and neglecting to penalise a most dangerous vice. The Acts which followed the Commission of 1844 have all taken this distinction most carefully; they have distinctly excepted wagering from the Common Law of Contracts, and have condemned it as being against public policy. It is distinctly made an illegal practice, and the Legislature has drawn a line between such games as faro, hazard, roulette, &c., and amusements which often involve money payments on a small scale, but which have nothing whatever to do with the subject of this Bill. The Bill is simply for the protection of youth and profit out of their inexperience and misery. It does indeed exist upon a great scale and in all directions. In a single square I know of two most unfortunate cases that have occurred within the last few months not far from where their Lordships are sitting. In the first, a very promising young footman had disappeared under terrible circumstances, leaving behind him proof that he had been extensively engaged in betting. In the second instance, at the other corner of the square, a young secretary committed suicide under most painful circumstances, after having been found to be fraudulent with regard to cheques to the amount of nearly £2,000. This young man's room was full of papers, of one of which I have here a copy. The accounts weekly furnished to him by the commission agent, whom I suppose, poor fellow, he thought he was employing, but who was really employing him, which were found after his death, are made out in a systematic manner, giving the dates of the meetings, the names of the horses, and the balance upon the amounts lost or won. Letters from this agent were also found, showing that occasionally small sums were sent to the unfortunate young man as winnings, but that he was more frequently asked for large cheques to make good the losses. He had been lured on by those means until a life which had begun well ended in terror and degradation. But that is not the end of the sad story. A friend who had been abroad for two years, on returning inquired for the young man, after his death, and on learning his fate remarked that he was the second friend of his who in the meantime had committed suicide through the unbearable wretchedness produced by the betting temptations of the men aimed at by the Bill. I would not have mentioned those cases did I not know that they are typical instances. I am assured by business men that there are at this moment many luncheon bars in the City where young men are tempted to bet and to borrow money for gambling purposes. Young men in those places are continually solicited to bet on horses, and are offered money to begin with, the men who make those offers being well assured that once they get the young men in their power they will be able in some way to produce the money even if they are driven to help themselves to it. Scarcely less evil is produced by the vile system of "money-lending," and I hope most heartily that the noble and learned Lord will include in his Bill the money-lending circulars which are being sent in such numbers to almost everybody. Not only youths at college and boys at school but a whole population is being drenched with these circulars. There is a kindred matter which might, I think, be more thoroughly attended to, and that is the large numbers of circulars which are sent to every house from Hamburg and other places on the Continent relating to foreign lotteries. I spoke to a legal authority on the subject the other day and he told me they were illegal, and that it was merely an accident that they had not been stopped by the Post Office. Two more came in a few days to my house, and they go on in profusion. If they are illegal the Postmaster General's attention ought to be called to the fact that these circulars are being constantly delivered, and I hope that an effectual check will be given to the practice.

The Archbishop of Canterbury

VISCOUNT MIDLETON: I am very thankful to the noble and learned Lord for having introduced this Bill. I can give him every encouragement. Between 12 and 13 years ago, with the assistance of my noble Friend (being then in another place) I successfully passed through the House the Infants' Protection Act, which went very much on the same lines as this Bill. Every effort has been made since to overturn that measure by the parties it was intended to reach; and though I was unsuccessful in another place in passing that part of the Bill which made the judge and not the jury the arbiter of what were necessities for infants in law, yet the simple fact that infants were rendered utterly incapable of contracting, and that no advances made to them while under age could be validated by any subsequent advance after they came of age, has operated as a very material check upon the doings of those depredators who prey upon that particular class. The Bill, with the assistance of my noble and learned Friend, was passed into law; and from that time to this it has never been found possible by those persons to get round the clauses, although every effort has been made to do so. I think we need not be in the least afraid of being accused of legislating in a grandmotherly spirit in reference to this Bill, because it is greatly needed in practice. I think that the noble and learned Lord has done a great public service in introducing it; and I sincerely hope it may be passed as soon as possible.

LORD NORTON: My Lords, I merely wish to say a few words in gratitude to the noble and learned Lord for the Bill he has introduced; and I do so, not I am sure because it wants in any way a recommendation to the Members of this House, but because I cannot help thinking that the Bill may not commend itself as easily and as generally elsewhere as it does to Members of this House; and, therefore, anything like a general expression of opinion in favour of the Bill here will do as much good in drawing favourable attention to this most important subject as possibly even the passing of the Bill itself. Now, I cannot help thinking that the noble and learned Lord himself rather depreciated the importance of his Bill. He talked of it as a small measure. In my humble opinion there is not a more important measure before Parliament at this moment to the well-being of society than that we are now discussing, which proposes to check a noxious and lucrative trade, involving the demoralisation of the youth of the country, and bringing misery and disaster into many homes and families throughout the Kingdom. I hope that the suggestions which fell from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, and also from my noble Friend near me, the Master of the Rolls, may be accepted as improvements in the Bill by the noble and learned Lord who has introduced it, for the purpose of facilitating the action of the Bill, and the conduct of proceedings in carrying out its object. I do not think the noble and learned Lord himself realises the enormous extent to which the mischief has gone which his Bill is aimed at suppressing. According to the Report alluded to by the most rev. Primate upon the facts which came before Convocation from various parts of England, carefully gathered together, it appears that there are no less than 10,000 of these professional betting agents in England alone. They are to be found in almost every locality, most of them dealing with young men, and dealing with them chiefly because they make more easily profit out of their inexperience than they would out of men older and with more sense in their heads. Their work is well known to go on, and it cannot be easily checked without the assistance of measures like this. It is going on at our public schools, at Eton, at Sandhurst, at the Universities—Oxford and Cambridge, and elsewhere. That is quite well known. The Bill does not deal with gambling in general, and, therefore, some of the cases cited by the Most Reverend Primate were not illustrations of the operations of this Bill. Gambling in general is the subject of a great deal of our legislation. There is nothing that the legislature has been more assiduous in trying to put down; but, as I have said, this Bill does not deal with gambling in general, but seeks, by protecting youth, to strike at these nurseries of vice and ruin. Gambling, I believe, though I am not a lawyer, is classed amongst public nuisances in our criminal law. It is a misdemeanour, and I cannot conceive a more offensive trade, or more contagious disease, in the country than it is. Certainly it ought to be prohibited in the same way that other public nuisances are. The Legislature has made constant efforts to put down gaming in general, but in all the Acts on the subject there has been a difficulty which we must bear in mind in dealing with even so much-required a Bill as this. The difficulty of legislating in regard to gambling in any shape at all is to steer clear between condemning harmless amusements and neglecting to penalise a most dangerous vice. The Acts which followed the Commission of 1844 have all taken this distinction most carefully; they have distinctly excepted wagering from the Common Law of Contracts, and have condemned it as being against public policy. It is distinctly made an illegal practice, and the Legislature has drawn a line between such games as faro, hazard, roulette, &c., and amusements which often involve money payments on a small scale, but which have nothing whatever to do with the subject of this Bill. The Bill is simply for the protection of youth and for the suppression of betting agencies which are making enormous profits at this moment from the inexperience and aptitude for excitement of boys who are thus led from small beginnings to acquire the habit, and a taste for gambling. Some persons appear to think that the cause for alarm is exaggerated, inasmuch as there is no such high play now as there was in the days of Fox and Sheridan; but all are agreed that the evil has spread among all classes and ages. Servants, small tradesmen, work-people, and pot-boys are engaged in betting. The Report of Convocation relates an instance of two boys on their way to school, settling the amount of their bets upon horse races in halfpence. This Bill is for the protection of youths from the first allurements of systematic betting. Some people are so foolish as to assert, and I have heard parents say that after all the stakes in these agents' books are very small, amounting perhaps only to a few shillings. So are the first steps in dram-drinking very small, but they are not the less certain to end in slavery to an unconquerable passion. There is one thing I must ask your Lordships to consider in this training of youth in the first nursery of gambling—for I am sorry to say I know something of this matter. It is very remarkable, but somehow or other these betting agencies manage to keep their young victims at first from the best thing that could happen to them, that is a good loss at starting, and to keep them for a time in a course of small winnings. And how can this be? Why, by blunting and breaking down that fine sense of honour, the destruction of which is after all the most dangerous part of these transactions. It is, however, not only the demoralisation of youth, but the injury done to families throughout this country, which this Bill of the noble and learned Lord will strike at. What a farce is the cant of education, when this vice is allowed to accompany it! My Lords, I fear a good deal of this entrapping of youth in the first steps of gambling is not done through these circulars alone, but in private life there are men and women—ladies—who almost perforce lead young lads to take the first steps in gambling at their houses. We cannot deal with that evil in this Bill, but I hope we can see our way to the infliction of adequate penalties upon these public agents who are sapping the life and happiness of the country, who are making gain for themselves out of the demoralisation of our youth, and introducing ruin in many homes.

Lord Norton

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: My Lords, I should like to say a few words more than have been said already about this Bill, and I will take very little time to say them. I can myself testify to the existence of the evil, and not only so but that it is growing very rapidly. I can testify that whereas it was somewhat prevalent in Public Schools 20 years ago, when I was myself a public school-master, it has largely increased since that time, and is going on increasing. But there is one thing which makes this Bill particularly valuable in my eyes from a totally different point of view, and that is that the moral effect of the Bill will be to put a black mark against the practice of sending out those circulars and upon the agents or persons who send them out. Not long since I was very much startled to see on the list of a Church Committee, who were engaged in raising money for building a church, the name of a man whom I knew as one of those betting agents, and whose circulars I had seen. On my remonstrating against such a person being allowed on a Committee of that kind, I was immediately met with the charge that I was discrediting a well known and very useful occupation. I think the sooner Parliament makes it plain that those persons do not follow a useful occupation the better it will be for the community at large.

*THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I am sure the noble and learned Lord will be well satisfied with the reception his Bill has met with at the hands of your Lordships. I have never before heard such a unanimous expression of opinion on any subject which has been brought before your Lordships' House as has been evoked by this Bill. I trust the expression of opinion may be equally unanimous on the other side of the Central Hall. But, I fear, we may perhaps in the warmth of our sentiments against the practice complained of lose sight of the extreme difficulty in framing provisions that will prevent it. That is the real difficulty we have to deal with. We have no doubt whatever that it is desirable to stop these betting and loan circulars being sent to persons under age, if we can do it. My fear is that the men engaged in this business are men to whom character is of little importance; that they will change their names, use other persons' names, and employ the agency of men of straw to conduct their correspondence, and the proof will be, as my noble and learned Friend behind me has already pointed out, will be exceedingly difficult, and the Bill may miss its mark. I listened with some melancholy to the observations of my noble Friend (Lord Norton) that there is nothing which the Legislature has pursued so sedulously as the prevention of gambling by legislation. If the state of things we see around us at the present time is the result of long and sedulous action on the part of the Legislature, I am afraid it does not give us much hope for the future in respect to sedulous endeavours. I should be very glad if it could be made penal to join in playing with any person who is under age, I believe that the evil is so great. But I do not suggest a remedy that is beyond the possibilities of the moment. There is one remedy I would suggest to the noble and learned Lord, which I want him to take into his consideration. It may be possible that my unlearned mind may not see the difficulties; but it appears to me that the great object of the men who send out money-lending circulars is to get young men into their toils, not for the few shillings or pounds that they can dispose of, but to get them into their toils so that they shall have heavy debts hanging round them when they come of age, and then induce them to renew their acceptances and force them to pay. I should like to make it a plea in answer to an action of that kind that a similar debt had been contracted by the person sued when under age to the same plaintiff. If that idea could be thrown into practical shape, I am sure it would take away the great object that these men have in view, and do more than anything else to put an end to a practice which we unanimously condemned.

LORD HERSCHELL: I have, of course, every reason to be satisfied with the reception this Bill has met with. I quite agree with the noble Marquess that nothing is more difficult than by means of legislation to effectually carry out the end we have in view, and that, however carefully you may frame a measure of this description there are quite certain to be attempts, and quite certain to be almost successful attempts, to get round it and do that which you are seeking to prohibit. But, on the other hand, I think, notwithstanding that, you may gain great advantage by putting obstacles in the way of doing it, and that although you do not altogether succeed in your object, you will diminish and check the evil if you make it more difficult and dangerous to practice. I think, therefore, the noble Marquess will agree with me that though we are fully conscious of the impossibility of altogether preventing evasion we ought not on that account to be deterred from at any rate making some attempt to check the evil. I am much obliged for the suggestions made by noble Lords. I agree with the Lord Chancellor that it would be an advantage to make those offences punishable by summary conviction rather than by indictment. I would rather see a prospect of these offences being punished on summary conviction, even with diminished penalties, than make them subject to indictment for misdemeanour; for if imprisonment is one of the possible penalties that will act as a sufficient deterrent, it would not perhaps be rendered a greater terror if two or three months longer term were added on a conviction for misdemeanour. Then the Master of the Rolls referred to money-lending circulars. I am not quite sure whether it would be possible to insert a clause relating to them. I have consulted about it and it seems doubtful. Therefore, the better course would be to introduce another Bill and then to consolidate them in Committee. If your Lordships will allow me I would ask the House, immediately after this Bill has been put, to authorise another to render penal the sending of money-lending circulars to infants with the view of bringing the two Bills on together.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

EAST INDIA OFFICERS BILL [H.L.]
(No. 35.)

House in Committee (according to Order): Bill reported without Amendment; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (BLIND AND DEAF) BILL [H.L.]—(No. 33.)

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 11.

Amendment moved, in page 4, line 4, after ("regards") insert ("conveyance to and from a school, or.")—(The Lord Norton.)

Amendment agreed to.

*LORD NORTON: I do hope to draw attention to this clause. In line 10, it is provided that the parent of a deaf or blind child shall not pay a larger fee for its instruction in a blind and deaf school than the ordinary school fee. The words are that, as far as regards the education of such a child, "the parent shall pay the ordinary weekly fee payable in a public elementary school for a similar child not blind or deaf." Everybody knows that the education of blind and deaf children is a great deal more expensive than that of ordinary children, and why should a parent, equally capable of payment for his child, be allowed to get a shillingworth of education for 6d.? It is a great affliction, of course, to have a blind or deaf child, but you are not in consequence of that to make the unfortunate ratepayers pay more for its education. It is introducing a pauper principle if you only charge the ordinary fee to cover the much greater expense of education at one of these special schools. Those special schools are not only very expensive for the particular kind of instruction required, but they can only be district schools scattered throughout the country, and there is the conveyance and boarding of the children and other expenses incidental to this kind of education. I can find no reason whatever why the well-to-do parents of a blind or deaf child should pay no larger fee for the education of that child than is payable by a parent in similar circumstances for an ordinary child at an ordinary school.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 10, to leave out from ("parent") to ("deaf") in line 13.—(The Lord Norton.)

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My noble Friend rather surprises me at the way he seems to read this clause. No doubt if I read it as he appears to have read it I should find considerable difficulty; but the clause does not mean what he supposes. He supposes, apparently, that it lays down the principle that not more than the ordinary fee shall be paid for such a child at one of these special schools, that is to say, not more than 9d.; but that is only one of the items to be taken into consideration.

*LORD NORTON: It is for the education.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: One of the items to be taken into consideration is the means of the parent. The circumstances of the parent are to be regarded. That is to say, the two things are to be taken into consideration, the cost and the parents' means, and a sum is to be fixed, which it is thought right the parent ought to pay looking to his means. That is a totally different thing from ordering all parents to pay the same fee. The clause is intended to give power to the Court to fix upon the sum, which is to be settled in each case.

*LORD NORTON: Allow me to say that is not the case at all. I suppose the means of the parent, in the comparison, to be the same in the case of a child sent to an ordinary school and of one sent to a blind school; and yet the more expensive education is to be got by one of the parents for his blind child at the same fee as is charged to the other, similarly circumstanced, for the ordinary child. The other expenses of conveyance, maintenance, and so on, must be otherwise met; but in this line of the clause it particularly says that the payment for the education of a blind child is to be the same as the fee paid for an ordinary child. I really think this is a serious point. It is introducing a sort of eleemosynary socialistic principle into the Bill to say that because a parent has the misfortune to have a blind child, having the same means as the parent of an ordinary child, he is to be provided at public expense with the more expensive education at the same fee as the other parent pays for his child's ordinary education.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: It is provided that if the parent can make an agreement in regard to the sum to be paid he may do so. If not, the question must be taken before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, and then there is power to take into consideration the means of the parent and also what the expense of the education of a child is ordinarily. That is to say, in the case of a parent who is of the working class, who would ordinarily pay the usual school fee at an ordinary school and not more, it would be in the power of the Summary Court to say that he should not pay more on account of his child being deaf. He would obtain conveyance for it from the place where he resides; but it is left entirely open to the Court of Summary Jurisdiction to fix whatever fee it thinks proper for the education of that child, absolutely.

*LORD NORTON: I am afraid my education has been so ordinary that I cannot perceive the reason for the limit laid down, though a Court may relax it. However, I beg leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave of the Committee, withdrawn.

Clause 14.

LORD EGERTON OF TATTON: My Lords, I have an Amendment at the end of the clause, which raises the question whether the compulsory powers in regard to these afflicted children should be exactly the same in reference to age as with regard to ordinary children. The noble Lord at the head of the Education Department contends that the parents of these children ought to have the power to take them away and to employ them in some occupation at the age of 14 years. Now, I venture to think that the case of these children—certainly of the deaf—is very different from that of ordinary children. If the parent of an ordinary child takes it away without having passed certain standards which may be found necessary for him in after life, he may continue his education; but if you take away a deaf child at the age of 14, before he has attained the means of speech—acquiring the power of speech, he never can recover what he has lost in that way—he never can recover his powers of speech which he was in process of acquiring. Therefore, I say, a deaf child is placed at a disadvantage, under which he ought not to suffer, and on that account there should be a distinct difference made between deaf and blind and ordinary children. I have ventured to put the age at 15. I have not gone quite so far as the Royal Commission, and perhaps my noble Friend will be disposed to meet me on that point. I think the age of 15 a very important period, because it gives the necessary eight years after a child who is deaf should have commenced his education. It will enable him to have finished the education which he ought to have for eight years. The limitation to the compulsory powers at the end of eight years was taken out of the Bill. By the first Bill it was not necessary to send a child who was deaf to school before the age of seven years for reasons which were shown to us by inquiries both at home and in foreign countries—France, Germany and Italy; that it was not profitable to the State to begin to educate a deaf child until he attained the age of seven, that he could not possibly before that age take any education. It was shown that those children were at least two years behind others, and therefore the compulsory powers I am asking for these children up to 15 are really no more than those for ordinary children up to the age of 13. That point was very strongly urged before the Commissioners, and that conclusion was arrived at after communication with teachers both in this country and abroad. It is not so likely, perhaps, that parents will withdraw their children in order to put them to work when they are getting a good education in some school maintained for that purpose, because they would not be fitted to obtain their livelihood at 14, but they might take away a child and put him in the streets to beg. I would ask your Lordships, is that a desirable thing to permit to be done? Therefore, I say it is to the interest of the State to see that these children are properly taught, and that they should not be allowed to be withdrawn at the caprice of the parents. The State having gone so far as to provide for their being educated, ought to see that the education is completely and thoroughly carried out. I have, therefore, fixed 15 as the age at which these children can fairly be said to have had an education sufficient to enable them to obtain a livelihood in the future. These children are frequently withdrawn from school by their parents when only 13 or 14 and apprenticed to tailors or put to work at other trades, and they soon forget the little knowledge they have obtained, and though they may be capable of earning their livelihood by their work, they are without that education which they ought to have. The contention before the Commission is, that these children are and ought to be treated educationally as a class apart. The right way to deal with them is to do as is done in the United States, where they are considered the wards of the State, and where it is recognised that it is the duty of the State to look after them more carefully than other children. This is a very important matter if the oral system of teaching is ever to be largely carried out in this country. It is quite clear that this description of education is a thing apart. I am sorry to have to go into these details, but this is a subject of great importance. If the deaf children are to be educated at all it is only by enforcing such a system as they have in France, Germany, and Italy. In those countries they have certainly, by the course of education followed, enabled the deaf to speak, and it is only in consequence of the inferior teaching and of the short time devoted for the purpose of education that children of that class are in this country less fortunate in regard to what is done for them. This country is, I am sorry to say, very much behind the nations of the Continent in that particular. The Commission had before their minds the necessity that the education of these children should be raised to what it is according to the best system among the nations of the Continent, and it is, speaking on their behalf especially, that I venture to propose the addition of words which will raise the compulsory period from the age of 14 to 15.

Amendment moved, in page 5, line 4, at end of clause to add ("beyond the age of fifteen.")—(The Lord Egerton of Tatton.)

Lord Egerton of Tatton.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I should like to say a few words in addition to what has fallen from the Mover of the Amendment, because I also am a Member of the Commission. I paid very particular attention to all the evidence that was presented upon the best method of dealing with deaf children. It was certainly made out to us very clearly that it would be a very great gain to the deaf if they were so taught by the oral instruction method as to be able to speak in ordinary conversation with other people. It was also very clearly proved that it was necessary, if this was to be done at all, that sufficient time should be given to it. I venture to think if you curtail the time you will seriously damage the chances of giving the necessary instruction in that respect, and that you will waste a large proportion of your efforts in what may have been already done, you will have spent a rather shorter time and not have really obtained your object; and you might almost as well cease the attempt altogether as not carry it to its full extent. For myself I regret that the age was not fixed at 16; but, at any rate, I venture to think it would be very unwise to cut it down still lower. We ought not, I think, to fall into that worst of all mistakes, that is, doing a thing in so imperfect a manner that it is a question whether you ought in such a case as we have here to deal with to do it at all. I venture, therefore, to press upon the House to accept the Amendment.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, I think there is some little misapprehension as to what this clause really does. This clause puts deaf and blind children upon a totally different footing from other children who come into the ordinary schools and remain in the ordinary schools up to a certain time. In the ordinary schools at the age of 14, the Government ceases to pay any Parliamentary Grant for them at all. Here we agree to pay a Parliamentary Grant, and we permit their education to be helped out with it up to the age of 16, which is two years more than in the case of other ordinary children; but at the same time we leave them, at 14 years of age, as in the case of the ordinary children when they have passed a certain standard, at liberty to be taken away and put to work. In the ordinary schools they are taken away when they are able to assist their parents. But in this case it is well known that in most of these institutions they stay of their own accord, and if they do they will be able to do so with greater advantage by the help of the Parliamentary grant. With regard to the age of entry, that is provided for in a certain way. My noble Friend, Earl Granville, whom I am sorry not to see in his place, especially as his absence is from being indisposed, takes a great interest in this subject, and he headed the deputation to the Department. He, when the Bill was in this House, thought it would be a great advantage to add in the earlier years. I did not, however, think that a very material point to insist upon, because probably the School Boards would not think it advisable the children should be sent, and that the institutions would not be very anxious to receive them at that age. But with regard to the present Amendment of my noble Friend I really hope he will withdraw it, because it would be, I think, absolutely useless. This Bill does not alter the compulsory age for education at all, and all that my noble Friend would do would be to say that nothing in this Act shall operate beyond the compulsory period of 15 years. This leaves it simply under the Education Acts, and so the Amendment which my noble Friend proposes would be absolutely inoperative. I cannot help thinking that when he considers how far the suggestions of the Commission have been adopted in this Bill that he had better accept it as it is.

LORD EGERTON or TATTON : After what has been said by my noble Friend, I beg to withdraw the Amendment. I merely wished to raise the question so that the Bill should not pass without its being noticed.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee; and to be printed as amended. [No. 43.]

INTERMEDIATE SCHOOLS, &c. SITES BILL [N.L.]—(No. 3.)

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1.

LORD HERSCHELL : This clause proposes to enable a person who has a limited interest in land to give or sell or exchange it for the purpose of erecting upon it an intermediate school, or a covered market or buildings. As regards remaindermen, I think sufficient protection is afforded by saying that the gift or sale is not to be made without their consent. But there is one point that needs consideration. The section provides, that if such a conveyance is made and the party to it is a minor or a lunatic, the conveyance is not to be made unless the guardian or Committee of such a person should concur. So far as it deals with sale or exchange I do not see any objection—I think that is enough; but if it is a gift which may be disposing of very valuable property of the infant or lunatic, inasmuch as it applies to land up to the extent of an acre, I doubt whether it is a sufficient safeguard that the guardian or Committee should concur, because it is really practically enabling the guardian or Committee to make a gift of the infant's or lunatic's land without consideration, no doubt for the public purpose of a school or market buildings. It may be doubted whether the mere consent of the guardian or Committee is a sufficient protection. I would suggest that in that case the intervention of the Court should be invoked, and that the gifts should only take effect (where it is a gift of property of a minor or a lunatic) with the sanction of the Court. Of course there may be cases where it would be for the benefit of the estate of the infant or lunatic to do this if it were advantageously and properly done, but I think the Court would not interfere in such cases; and, on the other hand, it would not be in the power of the guardian or Committee of the infant to make improperly a gift of what might be a valuable portion of his property.

LORD STANLEY or ALDERLEY : If the noble Lord means to include the guardian who is probably the father of the next person in remainder, it seems to me hardly worth while to ask your Lordships to pass such a Bill, because in the case of sale and exchange Lord Cairn's Act is ample; but it is to avoid the difficulties of sale and purchase that I would ask your Lordships to pass this measure doing, in the case of sites for intermediate schools and markets, the same thing as was done in the case of places of public worship and burial ground sites. In the case of the Committee of a lunatic, I have no objection that the sanction of the Court should be taken; but in the case of a minor who, probably, is nearly of age, it would, it appears to me, make the Bill perfectly useless.

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not think my noble Friend sees the point. The minor might be only two years old—of course there is no limitation of age—and this would enable the guardian to make really a gift of what might be a valuable portion of the minor's property.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: You have done it in the Places of Public Worship Sites Act. Why should you not do it in other cases?

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not propose the Amendment now; it will require a little careful framing. For instance, the Court whose sanction is required would, in the case of a minor, be the High Court; and in the case of a lunatic, the authority would be the Lords Justices in Lunacy.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: You can put it in when the Bill is before the Standing Committee.

LORD HERSCHELL: Yes.

Bill reported without amendment; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

BORROWING (INFANTS) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to render penal the sending money circulars to infants—Was presented by the Lord Herschell; read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 44.)

CLERGY DISCIPLINE (IMMORALITY) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for better enforcing church discipline in the case of crimes and other offences against morality—Was presented by the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury; read 1st; to be printed; and to be read 2^d on Thursday the 5th of March next. (No. 45.)

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Four o'clock.

Lord Stanley of Alderley

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 23rd February, 1891.

QUESTIONS.

THE ASSAM-CHITTAGONG RAILWAY.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India why, in the last two years' Indian Railway Reports, no mention has been made of the Assam-Chittagong project which was under negotiation, although other projects are described or spoken of, and the provisional route for the Assam line is duly marked on the map accompanying these Reports; if, as is understood, a concession has now been granted by the Secretary of State for this Assam Railway, can a statement of the terms on which the grant is made be laid upon the Table; and as it is said that a 3 per cent. guarantee is to be given on one and a-half millions of the capital, from what sources is the four and a-half millions, required to make up the estimate of six millions, to be supplied?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The reason why no mention was made of the Assam-Chittagong Railway project in the Reports referred to is that there was nothing fresh to report. Negotiations are now going on for the construction of the line, but nothing has been yet finally settled.

TAX ON DRY GRAIN IN CEYLON.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, having regard to the recent abolition of the tax on dry grain in Ceylon, and the expression of opinion on the part of the Ceylon National Association, and the debate in the Legislative Council of that colony on the 17th of December last, showing a strong desire for the abolition of the Paddy Tax on the part of the representatives of the Sinhalese people, the British and other planting interests, and the burghers, he will give such instructions as shall permit the official members of the Council to vote for its abolition?

SIR J. GORST: In the unavoidable absence of my right hon. Friend, perhaps I may be allowed to reply to the question. All the Papers connected with this subject are now before the Secretary of State, and will require the most careful consideration, as, whatever may be the merits or demerits of the Paddy Tax, it could not be abolished without substituting other taxation. The question, as it stands, is a little misleading. It should be borne in mind that the repeal of the Dry Grain Tax is in no way connected with the various proposals that have been made with respect to the Paddy Tax. It is a matter that stands by itself, and on its own merits. As regards the debate to which the hon. Member refers, I may observe that the speeches of the unofficial members, four of whom had previously signed the Report of the Select Committee against the abolition of the tax, will show the difficulty which is felt in dealing with the subject. The burgher representative, it may be noted, stated distinctly that he was not an advocate for the entire abolition of the tax, but for its reduction. Pending the decision of Her Majesty's Government it would be impossible to permit any individual official to give his vote for the abolition of so important a portion of the Colonial Revenue.

MUSKETRY INSTRUCTION FOR THE VOLUNTEERS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if, having regard to the onerous duties attaching to instructors of musketry in large regiments of the Volunteer Force, and to the great increase in the requirements as regards musketry of the Military Authorities, necessitating unceasing watchfulness to secure their fulfilment, it is possible in Corps of 10 companies or more to sanction the seconding and exemption from company duty of an instructor duly trained at Hythe?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I cannot sanction the seconding of Volunteer musketry instructors as a general rule; but if my hon. and gallant Friend can make out a special case as regards his Corps, I shall be prepared to entertain the proposal in his and in analogous cases.

AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS' UNION.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is cognizant of the resolution of the Executive Committee of the Agricultural Labourers' Union of 6th February, "that no more sick benefit or superannuation benefits be paid;" if he is aware that a large number of poor labourers, who have for many years subscribed to the Sick Fund, will be deprived of the result of their thrift at a time when they most need it, and that the President of the Union has declined all offers of an independent inquiry into the funds of the Union; and having regard to the hardship of the case whether the Government will institute an inquiry into the state of the funds of the Union, and to the allegations made that moneys contributed to the Sick Fund have in the past been appropriated to other purposes connected with the Union?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am not surprised at the question of my hon. and gallant Friend if the facts are as he describes them. There is no subject which excites greater sympathy than the case of agricultural labourers or other wage earners who make contributions towards a fund for providing for their sickness and old age, and then find their hopes disappointed. But whatever the facts are, the Government has no power to order an inquiry into the application of the funds of a Trade Union. It is a question whether a Select Committee of the House could deal with such a case.

DISTRESS IN SOUTH UIST AND BARRA.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernessshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that great poverty and distress prevails in the islands of South Uist and Barra, particularly among the fishermen and cottars; whether he is aware that legal injunction and interference by the proprietrix with the industry of gathering the seaweed called "tangles," for which a demand had sprung up, has stifled the industry; and that, in consequence, and to the great loss of the people, seaweed, worth thousands of pounds sterling, lies rotting on the shores of these islands; and whether he will extend the laws regarding white fishings in Scotland to all products of the sea?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): All the information I have on the first part of the question is to the effect that there is no exceptional poverty and distress in the district referred to, and that the applications for relief are unusually few in number. Presumably the hon. Member, by what he terms a legal injunction and interference by the proprietrix, means the action of interdict brought against certain parties who asserted a right to enter upon and use a farm for drying tangles. After judicial proceedings this interdict was made perpetual, and I understand that the result of this action has had none of the disastrous consequences set forth in the question. The industry is still carried on for the sole benefit of the crofters in the manner stated in the answers given to the hon. Member on March 17th and July 21st of last Session. As was then stated, I am unable to discover any legitimate grievance calling for remedy by legislation.

STREET ACCIDENTS IN THE METROPOLIS.

MR. HULSE (Salisbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to an article in the Daily News of Monday, 16th February, in which it is stated, upon the authority of New Scotland Yard, that no fewer than 5,330 persons were run over in the Metropolis during the year 1889, and that the principal cause is owing to—

"Drivers who sit inside covered vehicles, where they are unable to see anything but what is just in front of them, and the horses are driven with a simple snaffle bridle that affords no command over the horse, and they cannot, therefore, be pulled up quickly;"

and whether he can propose some improvement whereby greater safety in the London streets may be assured, and with a view to reducing the number of accidents from over 5,000 per annum?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): The Home Secretary has not seen the article in question, and does not know on what authority it was written. I must refer my hon. Friend to the answer which was given on this subject on the 10th inst., in which the Home Secretary stated that the whole matter was now engaging the attention of the Chief Commissioner.

Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh

H.M.S. EGERIA.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will state what steps have been taken in connection with the re-opening of the inquiry into the mutiny on board Her Majesty's Ship Egeria, and when that inquiry is likely to conclude?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The general inquiry into the outbreak on board the Egeria has not been re-opened, but the senior officer at Singapore was directed to inquire further into the facts of the cases of the executive petty officers and leading seamen who had been ordered to be punished, and to remit or reduce their punishments at his discretion. His Report, dated November 21, 1890, was received in office on February 9, 1891, and is now under the consideration of the members of the Board. The officers of the Egeria were dealt with by their Lordships on the Report of the original inquiry. The Commander and the Senior Lieutenant were superseded, and an expression of their Lordships' displeasure was conveyed to the other officers, with the exception of the boatswain, for their failure to support the First Lieutenant in his endeavours to restore order.

"COFFIN" TARGETS.

MR. JACOBY (Derby, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, as it is almost impossible to see "coffin" targets at 300 yards' range in wet weather, he will, looking at the great disadvantage that Volunteers are put to on such occasions when firing their class, give orders for the use of Wimbledon targets by the Reserve Forces before next month when class firing commences, and especially as he has stated that these targets are to be used by the Regular Troops?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The change of target referred to, with other changes recommended by the Musketry Committee, would greatly affect the conditions under which a Volunteer can earn the higher rate of capitation; and it is indispensable that such alterations should have the most careful consideration before they can possibly be adopted.

POSTAL SERVICE BETWEEN STROME FERRY AND LOCHMADDY.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH : I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he has received complaints of the inefficiencies and delays in the Postal Service by sea between Strome Ferry and Lochmaddy; whether he will grant a Return as from 1st September last showing how often, and for what periods, the steamer carrying the mails was behind time; and whether he is perfectly satisfied that the steamer now on the line, the Handa, is of a size and model safely fitted for this stormy route in winter?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University) : Yes, Sir; I have received complaints on this head, and it is admitted by the contractor for the service that the usual time has not been observed owing to the temporary necessity of placing the Handa on the station. To replace this vessel the Staffa was ordered last month, but on her way to Skye she unfortunately ran aground and now needs repair. The service provided for under the contract is a service three days a week, but that actually given is on six days a week, and it is being performed to the best of the contractor's ability in circumstances of much difficulty. I sympathise, however, with the inhabitants of the locality as to its present inadequacy, which I am determined shall not be allowed to continue. It would serve no good purpose, I think, to furnish the Return asked for by the hon. Member.

MARKET RIGHTS AND TOLLS.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has considered the Report of the Royal Commission on Market Rights and Tolls; and whether it is the intention of the Government to propose any legislation founded on the recommendations of the Commissioners?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's) : The Report of the Royal Commissioners on Market Rights and Tolls was only delivered in the latter end of last week. There are 13 volumes of evidence, &c., in connection with this Report, and all the volumes have not yet been issued. In addition to the Report of the Commissioners, there are five Supplemental Reports in which members of the Commission express their dissent from certain of the recommendations. At present I can only say that the Report will receive the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. PICTON : Will the right hon. Gentleman be able to give an answer to the question within two or three months, or in the course of the Session?

*MR. RITCHIE : I should not like to promise anything I may not be able to perform.

MR. PICTON : Shall we receive information as to the intentions of the Government during the Session?

*MR. RITCHIE : I have really not had time yet to investigate the Report, and it is quite impossible to answer the question of the hon. Member.

LIEUTENANTS IN THE ROYAL NAVY.

MR. CHARLES ACLAND (Cornwall, Launceston) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the present paucity of Lieutenants in the Royal Navy on the Active List, the Admiralty will give to some of those officers on the Retired List of Lieutenants who, at the invitation of the Admiralty, have consented to serve in case of war or of national emergency, and who have in consequence attended courses of instruction, the further chance of rendering their services in time of war or of national emergency more valuable, by offering them the opportunity of returning to active service in time of peace?

*LORD G. HAMILTON : The margin of unemployed Lieutenants is small, but it has not, up to the present time, been found necessary to call upon retired officers to volunteer for service. Should the requirements of the Service render such a step necessary in the future, the Admiralty would not hesitate to avail itself of the services of such officers.

SCOTCH PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh) : I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the attention of the Scottish Education Department has been called to a Conference of representatives of the School Boards of the large towns in Scotland, held in Edinburgh on February 11th, on the subject of the withdrawal of children from the public schools at too early an age; and whether the Department will take measures in the Code, or otherwise, to cope with the evils resulting from this practice?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The attention of the Scotch Education Department has been called to the Conference held in Edinburgh on 11th February, and the resolution passed by that Conference has been communicated to the Department. On the 27th of January the Department addressed to School Boards and other school managers a letter embodying certain proposals for counteracting the evil referred to. They are now receiving the remarks of the Local Authorities on the subject, and these will receive their careful consideration.

IPSDEN SCHOOL, OXFORDSHIRE.

MR. FRANCIS PARKER (Oxfordshire, Henley): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if his attention has been called to complaints as to the educational status of the school at Ipsden, in Oxfordshire, and to the fact that the School Attendance Committee will neither answer letters or investigate the complaints; and what steps he will be prepared to take in the matter?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The Department are engaged in the investigation of the circumstances to which my hon. Friend calls attention, and are prepared to take any steps that may be necessary to provide an efficient school for the children at Ipsden. The inaction of the School Attendance Committee, to which it is usual in the first instance to refer complaints, requires an explanation, for which the Department are now pressing a second time.

MASHONALAND—LOBENGULA'S CONCESSIONS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Lobengula, having declared that the published terms of the alleged concession made by him to certain persons, who on the plea of this concession obtained a charter from Her Majesty's Government, are not "his words," has persistently refused to recognise the concession by taking over the 1,000 Martini-Henry rifles which were to be given to him by the concessionaires, and whether these rifles are still in the possession of the agent of the Chartered Company in the camp of the company at Bulawayo; whether the money paid monthly by the company to Lobengula remains intact, ready to be repaid to the company; whether, in view of Lobengula's complaint that the concession, in respect to which a charter was granted to certain persons by Her Majesty's Government, does not represent what he was under the impression that he had conceded, any steps are being taken to prevent injustice being done to this African Chief; whether he is aware that promises of a specific amount of land in Mashonaland were held out by the agents of the Chartered Company to induce persons to take service in the expedition of the company to that country, although the concession granted by Lobengula, according to the company itself, gave to the concessionaires no rights over the land in Mashonaland; and whether the officers of Her Majesty in Bechuanaland, who were employed in recruiting for the company, were aware of these promises being held out, although by the concession they could not be performed?

Mr. Buchanan

SIR J. GORST: I have been requested by my right hon. Friend to answer this question. As regards the first paragraph of the question, Lobengula has made no such declaration. He said—"That I have given my whole country to Rhodes, it is not my words." It is not claimed that he has given his whole country. Her Majesty's Government believe, but do not know as a fact, that the rifles have not yet been accepted by Lobengula. He has not, however, thereby refused to recognise the concession. As regards the second paragraph, on July 30 it was stated that Lobengula had not then used any of this money. There was nothing said about repaying it to the company. In answer to the third paragraph, Lobengula does not appear to have made that complaint, but Her Majesty's Government will take all possible steps to prevent injury being done to him or any other South African Chief. With regard to the fourth paragraph, any promises of land by the company have been made expressly contingent upon the company acquiring a title to make laud grants. In answer to the last paragraph, Her Majesty's Government believe that such promises were made to the "pioneers," but not to the police whom Her Majesty's officers assisted to recruit.

MANICALAND.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the alleged Treaty between the agents of the Chartered Company of South Africa and Mutassa in regard to Manicaland; whether he can state what presents were given to Mutassa either before or after his signifying his assent to the alleged Treaty; whether any intoxicating liquor was given to him; and whether, when he agreed to a Treaty, which, according to the Times correspondent, included the right to establish banks in what he considered his territory, there is any evidence to show that he understood to what he agreed?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): It would not be desirable to lay Papers while the negotiations are proceeding. We have no information as to the presents given to Mutassa—they are sure to have been suitable—nor whether any liquor was given to him. The Treaty is said to have been signed in the morning. The right of carrying on banking business was included in the concession, the terms of which were, as we are informed, discussed at great length by the Chief and his Indunas, and were carefully explained to them. The latter repeatedly stated that the Chief was perfectly free, as no Treaty of any sort had previously been signed by him, and no concession had been given by him to any one.

MR. PICTON: What is the word in the vernacular that is equivalent to "banking?" May I also ask if this matter will be settled with Portugal before any Papers are laid on the Table of the House?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not acquainted with the vernacular. In regard to the second question, I am not in a position to make a promise; but if the hon. Gentleman will put the question on the Paper, I will endeavour to answer it.

MASHONALAND—TREATMENT OF NATIVES.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has seen the following statement in a letter published in the St. James's Gazette of February 18th, dated "Fort Sali, Mashonaland, South Africa, January 3," and purporting to be from an Englishman with Colonel Prendergast's Force in Mashonaland—

"Just seen a nigger held across the pole of a waggon, and get twenty-five. He howled, but serve him right, as he was a waggon driver who deserted in the bush at night on the way up, and was eventually caught;"

and if he will take steps to ascertain if the inhabitants of territory within British influence, and administered by persons holding a Royal Charter, are subjected to corporal punishment if they withdraw from the service of the said persons; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will put an end to such a practice, and bring those guilty of it to justice?

SIR J. GORST: On behalf of my right hon. Friend, I have to say the Secretary of State had not seen the statement until his attention was called to it by the notice of this question. It does not appear to be alleged that the act was committed by persons in the employment of the British South Africa Company; but Her Majesty's Government will inquire as to the truth of the statement, and will take all possible measures to prevent and punish any abuses of the kind.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that no one is allowed in Mashonaland who is not in the employment of the South Africa Company?

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; I am not.

THAMES WATERMEN AND THE LIGHTERMEN BILL.

SIR EDWARD GREY (Northumberland, Berwick): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he intends to introduce a Bill this Session to give effect to the Report of the Committee on the Thames Watermen and Lightermen Bill of last year?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Committee of last year threw out a Bill for freeing the river. They have proposed, instead, a scheme which, after careful inquiry, I find appears to satisfy nobody. The Watermen's Company object to it, and complain that they were not heard by the Committee; and the Thames Conservators and the County Councils, apparently, do not want to have anything to do with the matter. Under these circumstances, I do not propose to introduce a Bill on the subject.

THE MAGAZINE RIFLE.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what steps have been taken to prevent stripping in the composite bullets used for the magazine rifle, and to secure their remaining homogeneous during and after firing; whether trials have been made of bullets with the mantle and core soldered together, and with what results; and whether the amount of copper contained in the present nickel mantle or casing of the bullet would cause serious results from poison in wounds resulting from them, and be in contravention of the Geneva Convention?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The required result has, so far as can be at present ascertained, and as I stated the other day, been achieved by the use of a somewhat thicker envelope. Trials were made with bullets in which the mantle and core were soldered together; the process did not appear to diminish the tendency to strip. No poisonous results are anticipated from the metallic coating of the bullets; nor do I find that they are in contravention of the Geneva Convention. In any case, coatings containing copper have been adopted in at least five Continental Armies.

SENTRY DUTY AT PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN LONDON.

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many soldiers of the Guards are every day employed on sentry duty connected with St. James's Palace,
Sir Edward Grey

Kensington Palace, the War Office, the Home Office, and the Foreign Office; whether the medical officers have ever reported sentry duty as a cause of ill-health and invaliding among the soldiers of the Brigade of Guards; and whether he has any reason to suppose that the great amount of sentry duty in London has an unfavourable effect on the recruiting for the Brigade of Guards?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: This matter has recently been before me, and considerable reductions have been effected. At the present time the sentries at the points indicated in the question are 14, furnished by a guard of 42 men. Since 1885 the medical officers of the Guards have not reported against sentry duty. On the contrary, in 1886 and 1888 they reported that the duties were not too severe. Too heavy sentry duty is unpopular, and probably has an unfavourable effect on recruiting, but every effort has been made to reduce it to a reasonable extent in London. I am also inclined to agree in the opinion expressed by one of my predecessors in 1883, when he said—

"Sentry duty is doubtless irksome, and is much disliked, but it is a very necessary part of a soldier's training, indispensable in War, and one for which some practice in peace is requisite."

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeen, W.): Is it true that at certain periods of the year the Guards in London have on an average, owing to sentry duty, only four and a half nights in bed per week?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: This may have been so in the past, but it is not so now.

BRIDPORT SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to an advertisement in the Bridport News of 13th February, in which

"Major C. Sykes, Treasurer of the Bridport Savings Bank, gives notice that, in consequence of the trustees having decided to close the Bridport Savings Bank, his firm" practically touts for the deposits, and announces that the firm

"Have retained the services of the actuary of the Savings Bank;"

and whether any security is offered to these depositors in thus transferring their deposits to a private banking firm?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am advised that the facts are as stated by the hon. Member; but the authorities of the bank have replied to the advertisement by issuing the following notice to their depositors:—

“In view of circulars and advertisements recently issued, the trustees and managers beg to announce that it is their desire that depositors should exercise their own sole discretion as to the disposal of their money after receiving it, the trustees and managers being desirous of not influencing the depositors in any way.”

As regards the last paragraph of the hon. Member's question, no security such as the Post Office Savings Banks afford can be afforded by any private bank.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): Has notice been sent to each depositor?

MR. GOSCHEN: I believe that a notice to the depositors has been prepared, but I am not aware that it has been sent to each.

PROFIT SHARING.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will have the Report on profit sharing reprinted in a handy form, as it is already out of print, and cannot be obtained at Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode's?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The sale of this Report was suspended for a short time to allow of some corrections being made. The amended edition has now been issued. I do not see any sufficient reason for publishing it in a cheaper form; but if anyone chooses to do so, I should raise no objection.

EXPENDITURE UNDER THE IMPERIAL DEFENCE ACT AND BARRACKS ACT.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what is the estimated expenditure, for the year 1891-2, for fortifications under “The Imperial Defence Act, 1888,” for armaments under the same Act, and for barracks and the purchase of land for the same under “The Barracks Act, 1890”?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The estimated expenditure for the year 1891-92 under the Imperial Defence Act of 1888 is for fortifications alone £600,000, and for armaments £210,000. It is quite impossible at present to indicate even approximately the amount which will be spent under the Barracks Loan Act during the coming year. Much will depend on the weather and progress made with plans. But I hope that a considerable amount of work will be carried on.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

SIR CHARLES DALRYMPLE (Ipswich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, looking at the great importance of the questions dealt with in the Industrial Schools Bill of last Session, the great need of legislation, and the long period that has elapsed since the Royal Commission of 1882-3 made their Report to Parliament, he will consent to re-introduce the Bill in the present Session; and whether it has been brought to his knowledge that the Bill, if somewhat lightened, would probably obtain general acceptance?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: It has not been brought to the Home Secretary's knowledge by what modifications the Industrial Schools Bill of last Session could be made practically a non-contentious measure, so as to render it possible to pass it during the present crowded Session. He will be glad to confer with my hon. Friend on this subject, and come to some decision.

TEN SHILLING NOTES.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in the issue of ten shilling notes suggested or foreshadowed in his address at Leeds, he proposes to base these notes on silver or gold (coin or bullion); and if as against silver, will such ten shilling notes be legal tender only for the same sum as that (not exceeding forty shillings), to which silver coin is now limited by law?

*MR. GOSCHEN: My idea was that only so much silver should be held against these notes as, on consultation with men competent to judge, would be necessary, with a view to paying the notes in silver. The remainder will be secured partly on gold and partly on silver. The basis of the ten shilling note will be that it is payable in silver, and be a legal tender only to such amount in silver as the silver coinage itself.

*MR. SINCLAIR: Does the right hon. Gentleman not consider that by offering such ten shilling notes in exchange for light half-sovereigns he will thereby obtain a large supply of gold as a nucleus for the commencement of his second gold reserve, while the holders of such light gold will escape risk of loss by such notes being legally tenderable for their face-value of ten shillings?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The question is not whether I should like the holders of the light half-sovereigns to take these notes, but whether they will take them in exchange. When they brought their half-sovereigns in they would be placed to their credit at the bank, and it would be desirable in many ways that they should be able to take out these silver notes.

*MR. SINCLAIR: Assuming that it was a voluntary action on the part of the holders that notes should be allowed to be exchanged in the way I suggested, would not the effect be that the right hon. Gentleman would thus obtain a large supply of gold for his second gold reserve?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Yes; it would substantially do so.

INSANITARY STATE OF WINDSOR.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R. Barnsley): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether complaints have from time to time been received by the Local Government Board as to the insanitary state of the courts and alleys in Windsor; whether official inquiries were held into the matter; whether he is aware that with regard to South Place it was reported on 17th January, 1887, that

"Of 13 houses on the south side, 10 have no opening whatever at the back, no scullery, no closet, and no water but a tap at the end of the row. For closet purposes, the 65 dwellers in the 10 houses have to go into an open yard at the back of the opposite houses on the north side;"

and that the Inspector also stated that

"As for the houses on the south side, we see no way of rendering them tolerably habitable but by demolishing every third house and converting its site into a yard for its neighbours, with a proper w.c. to each;"

whether it is a fact that these houses in South Place are practically in the same condition as in 1887; and whether, under these circumstances, the Local Government Board will order the Local Authority to proceed under Part II. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, in accordance with the provisions of Sub-section 2, Clause 31?

Mr. Sinclair

*MR. RITCHIE: Inquiries have been held by Inspectors of the Board with regard to the sanitary condition of courts and alleys in Windsor. I am informed that since January, 1887, considerable improvements have been made in South Place. On the north side six houses have been provided with additional sculleries and back doors, and with windows at the back. Ten new water-closets have been erected, and six old ones re-constructed. An additional water supply has been provided, and also new dust-bins; and the paving of the yards and the drainage have been improved. As regards the houses on the south side, nine have been improved by matchboarding and the under ventilation of the floors, and through ventilation has been secured by means of grid ventilators on the staircases where back windows have not been provided. The 11 houses on the south side are now occupied by only 46 persons; and as the Medical Officer of Health is of opinion that the water-closet accommodation cannot now be declared inadequate, he does not advise that some of the houses should be demolished for the purpose of making such provision. As regards the action which it is suggested that the Local Government Board should take, I am not aware that any representation by four or more householders has as yet been made to the Sanitary Authority under Section 31 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890; and assuming that any such representation has been made the Board have not received any such Petition from the householders as would empower them to take any proceedings in the matter.

SHEERNESS DOCKYARD.

MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that the "job and check" system is still pursued in Sheerness Dockyard; that it is viewed with great dislike by the workmen; and whether he will take steps to put an end to it?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The job and check system is only in force in Sheerness Dockyard in smithery, and has been in force for more than two years. It was instituted on account of the very unsatisfactory state of this department, in which the cost of production was much too great; and even now it is not so satisfactory as it should be. I cannot undertake to abolish this system.

BETHNAL GREEN BANK.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the failure in February, 1889, of the "Bethnal Green Bank," in which the deposits amounted to a total of or about £10,000; whether he has been informed that the effects of the bankrupt, Mr. T. F. Braybrook, and the estate of the "Bank" realised the sum of £4 000; whether any portion of these assets have been distributed to the depositors, if so, how much; and, if not, will he explain for what reason; and whether he can inform the House what the total costs of the bankruptcy proceedings have been, and what amount is left for the depositors?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am informed that up to 2nd February, 1891, the estate referred to by the hon. Member realised the sum of £4,991 3s. 7d.; that a dividend of 2s. 6d. in the £1 had been paid to the creditors, £1,674 6s. 7d. being distributed; and that the costs amounted to £2,911 19s. 9d., the principal items being: law costs, £1,741 9s. 10d.; trustees' remuneration, £528 6s. 1d.; auctioneer, £426 14s. 3d. The balance in hand is £235, and the outstanding assets are valued at £250. The receiving order was made on 11th February, 1889. Since 5th March, 1889, the estate has been administered by a non-official trustee and committee of creditors. The functions of the Board of Trade where a non-official trustee is appointed are limited to the audit of his accounts, and they have no control over the expenditure.

ALLOWANCES TO HIGH SHERIFFS OF COUNTIES.

MR. LOCKWOOD (York): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the practice of the Treasury to make allowances to the High Sheriffs of counties for attendances at Assizes, for summoning jurors, for hire of carriages for the use of Her Majesty's Judges, and for issuing proclamations, but to refuse to make such allowances to the Sheriffs of cities and towns in respect of these same items; and whether he is prepared to recommend that Sheriffs of cities and towns shall receive the same allowances as High Sheriffs of counties?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The allowances to High Sheriffs of counties which are mentioned in the question are not made to the Sheriffs of cities and towns, because these latter are appointed by the Town Councils under the Municipal Corporations Act of 1882, and are not, therefore, officers of the Crown. I cannot hold out any hope that the existing rule as to allowances will be extended to the Sheriffs of cities and towns.

THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE, QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will ascertain from the Lord Chancellor if he is aware that great dissatisfaction exists among many members of the Bar, and of other branches of the legal profession, as to the manner in which the business is conducted in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice; and whether any changes are contemplated at an early date in the constitution of the Bench in that Division?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the hon. Member desires it, I will ascertain from the Lord Chancellor whether he is aware of any such dissatisfaction as appears to be pointed at in the question. But I am already in a position to say that no representation from the legal profession has reached the Lord Chancellor making any suggestion for a change in the constitution of the Queen's Bench Division.

FACTORY ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to move the Second Reading of the Bill for the amendment of the Factory Acts before Easter?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: With regard to the Second Reading of the Bill for the amendment of the Factory Acts in charge of the Home Secretary, I should hope that after the Debate of Wednesday last on the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the House may be prepared to give the Bill of the Government a Second Reading without very much discussion, for there was practically a discussion on the subject when the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman opposite was before the House. I believe the House desires that these Bills should be considered by the Standing Committee on Trade; and having regard to that wish, we hope to take the Second Reading of our Bill next Thursday, as we feel that we should be justified in interrupting Supply for a short time looking to the importance of the question. When the Bill is referred to the Standing Committee it may be possible to introduce into the Bill of the Government some of the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury which are accepted on both sides of the House.

SIR H. JAMES: Will the Bill be the first Order on Thursday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope it will be possible to take the Bill the first Order on Thursday, looking to its great importance and considering that the question is one upon which there is no Party feeling, and that it is regarded with interest on both sides.

IRISH LAND HOLDINGS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what was the total number and area of holdings, the purchase of which was sanctioned by the Land Commission up to 14th February, and the total sum agreed to be advanced thereon; and what sum in addition to this had been applied for, respecting which no decision had been arrived at up to the same date?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Land Commission reports that up to January 31, 1891 (the latest date for which Returns have been prepared), the total advances applied for amounted to £9,620,819. Of this, advances have been provisionally sanctioned amounting to £7,822,014, and advances have been refused amounting to £1,026,152, leaving a sum as to which no decision has been as yet arrived at of £772,653. The Commissioners are unable to state the acreage of the holdings.

Mr. W. H. Smith

IRISH FISHERIES LOAN.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is it a fact that a man named Montgomery obtained a loan from the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries for £170 two or three years ago on giving good security for its repayment by instalments extending over some years, the last not falling due till 1895; that he purchased a fishing vessel with the money; that he repaid the instalments of his loan as they fell due up to the present; that neither the Fishery Inspectors nor the Board of Works held any mortgage or lien of any kind on the vessel; that he lately sold it to a fisherman named M'Carthy, from the County Cork, to whom the Inspectors of Fisheries had agreed to make a loan of £100, and for repayment of which M'Carthy had, with two sureties approved by the Inspectors of Fisheries, signed promissory notes for the amount to the Board of Works; that he, Montgomery, had consented to allow this £100, which otherwise would have had to be paid to him for the vessel, to be retained as a set-off or part payment of the balance falling due on foot of the loan made to him, though the last instalment would not fall due till 1895; that all the requirements and conditions imposed on M'Carthy had been complied with by him; and that subsequently, after the loan had been made and he had purchased his vessel from Montgomery, the completion of the transaction was refused unless Montgomery would pay up the balance of his loan, the last instalment of which would not fall due till 1895; and, if these allegations are correct, what authority had the Inspectors of Fisheries, or the Board of Works, for so acting?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries report that the facts are substantially as stated in the question. The security for the loan made to Montgomery consisted of promissory notes executed by him and his sureties jointly. The Inspectors were of opinion that to permit Montgomery to part with the boat would weaken his solvency, and would be a just cause of complaint on the part of the sureties in the event of its being ultimately necessary to take proceedings against them should there be default. Montgomery received from M'Carthy a sum of £35 on account, with which he could have discharged his outstanding debt of £25 11s. 8d. in respect to the loan. It was further considered inadvisable that the Trust Fund should be used for the purpose of making continuous loans on the same vessel. In these circumstances, Montgomery was called upon to discharge his liability before parting with the vessel.

THE TERMON ESTATE.

MR. MATTHEW KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he is aware that the Receiver on the estate of Sir John M. Stewart's Termon Estate, County Tyrone, has taken Civil Bill proceedings against tenants for the recovery of certain rents, notwithstanding that a notice had been served on the tenants by order of the Receiver Judge authorising abatements of rent if paid by a date which will not be reached for a month hence; if the Receiver Judge will take notice of this breach of faith with the tenants; and if, in the event of eviction proceedings being resorted to under the circumstances, he will advise the Lord Lieutenant to withhold the service of the Forces of the Crown?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The management of the estate referred to is in the hands of the Receiver Judge, to whom application should be made, if the tenants think they have reason to complain of the action of the Receiver.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if any money has been paid from the Constabulary Force Fund to either officers or men of the Royal Irish Constabulary who joined that Force since 1883; and, if so, how much; if, during the Crimean War, any money was used from this fund to equip and transport the volunteers from the Royal Irish Constabulary to the different corps for which they volunteered; and, if so, how much; and if the Constabulary Force Fund was drawn upon to build a wing of the present Constabulary Depot in Dublin; and, if so, to what amount?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary authorities report that, inasmuch as officers and men of the Royal Irish Constabulary joining the force since the Act of 1883 are precluded by that Act from contributing to the Constabulary Force Fund, neither they nor their widows or children have received, or will receive, any grant from the insurance branch of the Fund. They are entitled to receive for good police service grants from the reward branch of the Fund. Eight men appointed since the Act of 1883 have received such rewards, amounting in all to a total of £18. No such payments as are mentioned in the second and third paragraphs of the question have been made, or could possibly be made, from the Fund.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what sum did Colonel Hillier receive from the Constabulary Force Fund, when retiring as Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and how long did Colonel Hillier occupy the position of Inspector General; what sum was paid Colonel Bruce on his retirement from the position of Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary from the Constabulary Force Fund; and what was the period of his service in that Force?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary authorities report that Colonel Hillier on retirement received from the Constabulary Force Fund a sum of £279. He had served in the Force for 22 1-3 years, of which 5 7-12 years had been in the position of Inspector General. Colonel Bruce received from the same Fund on his retirement a sum of £232 10s. He had served in the Force for 8 2-3 years.

MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN CAVAN AND CLONES.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will consider the possibility of arranging with the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland for an improved train service between Cavan and Clones, in order to expedite the mail service, and to avoid the necessity for the mail cars which at present convey the mails between Cavan and Clones along the route of the railway?

*MR. RAIKES: This question has several times been under consideration; but it has always been found that the arrangement desired would involve the establishment of special trains, at an expenditure far in excess of the available revenue. As the mails already reach Cavan by road at an early hour in the morning, no large expenditure for a service by railway would be warranted. I am informed that the circumstances have undergone no change.

MARKET RIGHTS AND TOLLS IN IRELAND.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government intend during this Session, or at all, to introduce any Bill designed to carry into effect the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Market Rights and Tolls, in so far as those recommendations affect Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have nothing to add to the answer my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board has given to the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton). No steps will be taken without a consultation between the two Departments.

BELFAST STREET TRAMWAYS.

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the Resident Magistrates for the City of Belfast, the Local Justices of the Peace who are members of the City Corporation, and also the officers and men of the Royal Irish Constabulary have free passes, or in some cases passes at a merely nominal rate, for travelling by the Belfast Street Tramway Company's cars, although the Magistrates thus privileged adjudicate upon cases in which the Tramway Company are concerned, and whether Magistrates are permitted to accept free passes from companies over whom they have judicial jurisdiction; and if he could furnish a statement of the number of prosecutions brought by the police force of Belfast against the Belfast Street Tramways Company for breaches of the city bye-laws before and since the privilege of free travelling has been granted to the police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Member to defer the question.

Mr. Raikes

THE MAIL SERVICE TO LIMERICK.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if his attention has been directed to almost daily irregularities of delivery of letters between Limerick and Fermoy, Kilworth, and other parts of the County of Cork; and, with reference to a reply from the Secretary of the Post Office, Dublin, dated 19th January, 1891, No. 1752, to a Limerick merchant—

"That such complaints were due to late arrivals at Limerick Junction of the night mail trains from Limerick, and that the special attention of the Waterford and Limerick Railway had been called to such matters," will he state the result of such inquiry, and explain the cause of the delays on that railway?

*MR. RAIKES: The irregularities in the mail service on the Waterford and Limerick Railway are attributed by the Railway Company to the difficulty in working their traffic consequent on the recent strike. Although the strike has been over some time, the irregularities, I am sorry to say, have not ceased; and the company, in their explanation, state that the new men whom they had to take on are unable to marshal and shunt the trains so quickly as the men formerly employed. This, however, seems hardly a sufficient excuse, and I have strongly represented to the company the necessity of taking some effectual measures for improving the service.

THE LARNE AND STRANRAER ROUTE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has yet submitted to the Treasury his proposal respecting the Larne and Stranraer route?

*MR. RAIKES: Yes, Sir; the whole subject is now before the Treasury. I submitted full Reports respecting the alternative routes on the 12th February.

MR. SEXTON: Is it proposed to make one route supplementary to the other?

*MR. RAIKES: Certainly, Sir.

BELFAST PRISON.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, what has been the result of the conference between the Irish Government and the Irish Prisons Board, concerning the unanimous protest of the Corporation of Belfast against the projected alterations of Her Majesty's Prison at Belfast, upon the several grounds that they would create an eyesore, destroy the frontage line, and deteriorate the value of property in the district?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The subject is still under consideration. The works have been suspended to await the result of such final decision as may be come to.

SMALL-POX IN BELFAST POLICE STATION.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that there has been an outbreak of small-pox in the Donegal Street Police Station, Belfast; whether it is admitted that this and other police stations in Belfast have long since been condemned as both structurally and sanitarily unsuitable; can he explain why, although more than a year ago the Corporation of Belfast conveyed to the Irish Government a site for a central police station, and the Government promised to begin the erection of the station last November, nothing has yet been done; and, now that the evil effects of the delay are so painfully demonstrated, what steps do the Irish Government mean to take?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary authorities report that it is the case that some of the men in the Donegal Street Police Station have been attacked by small-pox; but that it is not the case that the premises are unsanitary, or were ever considered so. The disease is reported to have been introduced by a member of the force who was on duty in a locality in the city in which it existed. There has been no unnecessary delay in proceeding with the building of the central barracks. The Corporation did not convey a site more than a year ago. They were not in a position to convey it until very recently, and the lease was only completed within the past few days. Every progress is being made with the construction of new police barracks in Belfast.

LOCAL REGISTRATION OF TITLE (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. MATTHEW KENNY: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he intends to re-introduce the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Bill; and if, in view of the necessity of speedily passing Part IV., dealing with the devolution of freeholds sold under the Purchase Acts, he will consider whether it would be advisable to introduce what would be a non-contentious measure separately?

MR. MADDEN: I am glad to find that the hon. and learned Gentleman in whose name this question stands—and other hon. Members—recognises the necessity of speedily passing the fourth part of the Local Registration of Title Bill. In this I agree with him. But I regard it as of equal importance to provide tenant purchasers with a system of registration suitable to the nature of their holdings. From the reception given to the Bill last year I venture to regard it as practically non-contentious. By introducing it early in the present Session I hope that it may be possible to pass it into law with such useful amendments as may be suggested by hon. Members who take an interest in this important matter.

ETHER.

MR. MATTHEW KENNY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can confirm the statement published in newspapers that ether has been scheduled as a poison, and can in future be sold in Ireland only by chemists?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As stated by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply to a question addressed to him on December 1, ether has been scheduled, and it can only now be sold by qualified chemists or druggists as a poison.

CASE OF MRS. MARY M'GEE.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, on the 13th ultimo, after visiting the house of Mrs. Mary M'Gee, of Lough Keel, Gweedore, a widow, over 80 years of age, Sergeant Daly, of the Irish Constabulary, telegraphed to the relieving officer of the district, with the result that the relieving officer visited the woman, and the Dunfanaghy Guardians granted her a weekly allowance of Indian meal for two weeks only; whether he is aware that the Guardians, on Saturday, the 24th ultimo; refused to grant further relief to Mrs. M'Gee; that when the weekly allowance was applied for on Tuesday, the 27th ultimo, it was refused; and that Mrs. M'Gee died on the following day, Wednesday, the 28th, for want of sufficient food; whether he is aware that three days after her death the relieving officer wrote to the shopkeeper who supplied meal for the orders of the Guardians, saying—

"I beg to say that I was instructed by the Board of Guardians last Saturday [the 24th] to go over some day this week, and to make more inquiry about the means of support of Mary M'Gee before they would give her more outdoor relief; but as I did not get going, you better please give her 2 stone more I. meal this week, until I get going over;"

whether the parish priest requested Sergeant Daly to take steps to secure the holding of an inquest; and will he explain why there has been no inquest in the case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that there is no ground for the suggestion that this old woman died from want of sufficient food. She was old; she was delicate; she had meal, a little money, and apparently some poultry, at the time of her death. The Rev. James M'Fadden did inquire whether it was intended to hold an inquest. Sergeant Daly replied that he had been to the house where the woman had died, and made an inquiry from her son and daughter, and that there was no complaint that the woman had died from want of food. The death was neither sudden nor suspicious, and there was nothing to suggest any necessity for an inquest.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to this case.

IRISH NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that, according to the Report of the Auditor General upon the Vote for Public Education in Ireland during the last financial year, there has been a saving in the salaries of national school teachers as compared with the grant made by Parliament of £34,866; whether this is attributed to the existence of epidemics and to unusually bad weather which prevented pupils from qualifying for examination for results, and thus caused a serious falling off in the incomes of teachers without any fault of theirs; and whether, since the system of payment by results in respect of primary schools has been abandoned with regard to England and Scotland, he will consider the advisability of putting an end to it in Ireland?

Mr. Sexton

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The statement that there has been a saving in the salaries of national school teachers of £34,886 on the grant made by Parliament is somewhat misleading. The amount that would be required for that part of the salary of the teachers which arises from "results" fees is always doubtful. In 1885 and 1886 the amount was under-estimated respectively by £20,000 and £15,000, necessitating Supplemental Estimates. In 1888-9 an amount that would, in the opinion of the Commissioners, both amply cover the ordinary increase in the "results" fees, and obviate the possibility of the Supplemental Vote being required, was asked for, but it appears that they over-estimated the amount of the increase, with the result that more money was asked in the Estimates than actually proved to be necessary. It would seem to be inaccurate to say, as is said in the second paragraph of the question, that a serious falling off in the incomes of the teachers has occurred. The actual amount paid in remunerating the teachers has increased, while the ratio of the total number of teachers to the total amount paid to them shows that last year the average diminution arising out of the exceptional circumstances alluded to has been extremely slight. I say nothing of the grant of £78,000 made by Parliament during the current year. As regards the third paragraph, I have to say that the hon. Gentleman appears to have put it on the Paper under a misapprehension. In England and Scotland the whole contribution of the State was, till last year, in the way of payment by results, whereas in Ireland "results" fees are only employed as a supplement to the fixed class salaries which form by far the larger portion of the teachers' income. I do not think that any sufficient reason has been shown for departing from this system.

IRISH REVISION COURTS.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Irish Local Government Board have fixed the remuneration of clerks of Unions for duties performed under the Franchise Acts at £1 for each 100 ratings up to 10,000, and at 10s. for each 100 such ratings over 10,000, together with a sum of 10s. 6d. for each day of their attendance at the Revision Courts, while the remuneration of the poor rate collectors has been fixed at 15s. for each 100 ratings, together with a sum of 7s. 6d. for each day of their attendance at the Revision Courts; whether the duties for which this remuneration is given to clerks of Unions are heavier than those discharged by the poor rate collectors; whether the duties of the latter are at least equally arduous; and whether he can say why this distinction is made between the two classes of officers?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts are as stated in the first paragraph of the question. The collectors of poor rate act as assistants to clerks of Unions in carrying into effect the duties referred to. Having regard to both the nature and extent of the duties discharged by clerks and collectors respectively, the Local Government Board consider that the former are entitled to be remunerated at a higher rate of payment than the latter, and they framed their order accordingly.

VETERINARY INSPECTOR TO THE BANDON UNION.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Lord Lieutenant has refused to sanction the appointment of Mr. Good, V.S., to the post of Veterinary Inspector of the Bandon Union, to which he was elected on the 21st January last; is he aware that Mr. Good is a veterinary practitioner under "The Veterinary Surgeons Act, 1881," and that his name appears on the Register of Veterinary Surgeons; was Mr. Good approved of by the Privy Council as an existing practitioner, and does such approval entitle him to hold the position of Veterinary Inspector to the Board; and on what grounds has the Lord Lieutenant overruled the election of this gentleman by the Board of Guardians?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer the question.

MR. FLYNN: Until to-morrow?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think I shall be able to answer it to-morrow.

IRISH BANK NOTES.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that the authorised circulation of bank notes by the Bank of Ireland is £3,738,000, whereas the actual amount of notes issued is only £2,709,000; that the corresponding figures in regard to the Provincial Bank are, authorised circulation £927,000, actual amount of notes issued £816,000; and of the National Bank, authorised circulation £852,000, actual amount of notes issued £1,572,000; and whether, if the above figures be correct, the Treasury will cause inquiry to be made with a view to equalise the advantages possessed by banks of issue, and of giving to non-issue banks of approved solvency and position the right to issue notes subject to specified Treasury regulations?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have no doubt that the figures cited by the hon. Member are correct; but, as I stated the other day, I am not prepared, certainly as at present advised, to extend the right to issue notes to the Irish banks who have not that right at present. The situation is the same in England—there are many banks who do not issue up to their authorised amount.

IRISH DISTRESS.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the demand for employment made by the people of the Loughrea and Portumna Unions, in order to assist them in meeting the distress which prevails in those districts, he intends to institute public works in those Unions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The matter is receiving the attention of the Government, but I am not aware that there is any ground for the institution of public works.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the plans for the proposed railway from Macroom to Ballyvourney were submitted to and almost unanimously approved of by the Grand Jury of the County of Cork at the Summer Assizes of 1889 without a guarantee; whether application was made to the Privy Council on the subject; whether the Cork and Macroom Railway Company are satisfied to contribute £20,000 to the cost of the line provided the Government give £40,000, or the company will undertake to complete the line and supply the necessary rolling stock if the Government contribute £40,000; is he aware that much distress and dearth of labour exist in the district, attested by Poor Law Guardians, clergy, and constabulary; and whether any steps will be taken to promote the line of railway in question?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A Memorial containing the statement in paragraph 1 of the question, and praying that the proposed line of railway might be declared as one desirable to be made under the Act of 1889, was received in October last. No financial suggestions of the nature referred to in paragraph 3 were made to the Government; nor having regard to the large sums of money already voted by Parliament, do they feel that this is a case in which they could specially appeal to Parliament for a grant. The state of Macroom Union is receiving attention.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what relief works have been started, or proposed to be undertaken, in the Macroom and Millstreet Unions, and in the parish of Donoughmore, County Cork?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No works have been started in either of the Unions mentioned. In regard to the parish of Donoughmore, relief works have been opened within the last few days in the electoral division of Templemalus.

MR. MORROGH (Cork, S.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has yet received the resolutions passed by the large public meeting held in Bandon on the 10th instant, which meeting was attended and addressed by some of the most influential inhabitants of Bandon and surrounding districts, of different creeds and politics, one of which resolutions recommended the construction of a light railway to Kilmacsimon Quay for the relief of the present and impending distress; and whether he is prepared to give the matter his favourable consideration?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A letter purporting to forward the resolutions was received two days ago, but the resolutions did not accompany it.

MR. MORROGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a resolution, relative to the present distress existing in the district, passed by the Board of Guardians of the Schull Union on the 10th instant; and, if so, what attention is he prepared to give to the subject?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member does not seem to be aware that relief works are in actual progress in the electoral divisions of Schull and Crookhaven. The condition of other portions of the Union mentioned is having attention.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received and considered Reports relating to the distress in the Glangevlin and neighbouring districts of the County Cavan; whether he has considered the unanimous resolution of the Enniskillen Board of Guardians declaring the necessity for relief works; whether he is aware that the district pays extra cess for the Cavan, Leitrim, and Roscommon Railway, which is 14 miles off, and is never used by the people, who use the Sligo and Enniskillen line six miles off; whether he is aware that the roads in the district are very few and very bad; and whether, considering the various circumstances of the case, he will take steps to relieve the pressing distress by road-making or otherwise?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The condition of Glangevlin and other neighbouring districts in the Enniskillen Union has received careful attention. There is no reason at present to apprehend the occurrence of severe distress from want of food; but there is a scarcity of fuel in the locality, to meet which the Guardians were authorised a month ago to afford relief in fuel.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Chief

Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called, by resolution of the Newcastle West and Glin Boards of Guardians, to the destitution prevailing among the labourers and small farmers in the west of County Limerick; if he has caused inquiries to be made: and whether any relief works are in contemplation?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The condition of the district in the west of County Limerick referred to is receiving attention. As regards Newcastle Union, the Guardians have been authorised to afford relief in fuel should they deem such a course necessary.

MR. STACK (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government have decided to accede to the influential local Memorial recently forwarded to Dublin Castle in favour of the construction of a light railway from Listowel to Tarbert, in the County of Kerry, connecting Newcastle and Abbeyfeale with the Port of Tarbert; and whether he has been apprised of the necessity of taking immediate steps, by the opening of some such work as this, to meet the widespread distress which prevails in this part of North Kerry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A Memorial on this subject has been received, and is receiving attention.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, although there are on Tory Island a splendid lighthouse, a Lloyd's signal and telegraph station, a post office and a national school, yet there is not on that island an ordinary pier, or even a boat slip; is he aware that the inhabitants of Tory Island are for the most part fishermen; that frequent movements have been made for the construction of a pier, and that Mr. Hicks, the Local Government Board Inspector, who accompanied him in his tour in Donegal, took bearings for the site of a pier, made reports, and promised his best efforts to promote its construction; and whether, having regard for the present distress and the relief work which might be given in the construction of a pier, he will take steps to procure this boon for the island?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no doubt that a pier would be useful on Tory Island. But I cannot give any undertaking on the subject.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a copy of a Report of Dr. Sandiford, dispensary doctor, furnished to the Mallow Board of Guardians on 12th inst., setting forth the acute distress amongst the labourers and small farmers of Glountane and Mounsey Abbey, and stating that a large number of families are in a "starving condition"; whether the attention of the Government has been called to the distress in this district; and if the Government have sanctioned any relief works or reproductive employment in the locality?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The attention of the Government has not been called to the Report in question.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he could state what works under the Relief of Distress Act (Ireland) are now in progress in the Unions of Tuam and Glengamaddy, and what further works are in contemplation?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Relief works are about to be opened.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Local Government Board in Ireland has been called to a Memorial received and adopted by the Bandon Board of Guardians, and signed by nearly 400 of the principal inhabitants of the district between Crookstown and Enniskeane, which Memorial directs urgent attention to the distress existing in the district, and shewing that were the line of light railway constructed between Crookstown and Enniskeane it would prove a great financial success, and provide labour for the starving labourers in the district; whether similar Memorials were received from the Templemartin and the Enniskeane Dispensary Committees, which passed resolutions in favour of the line, which were also adopted by the Bandon Board of Guardians, and duly forwarded to the Local Government Board; and whether any, and, if so, what, steps are being or will be taken to investigate the proposition and carry out the suggested relief work?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Memorials have been received, and they are being attended to.

DR. TANNER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that reports have been made by the Constabulary and by the Poor Law Guardians, many of whom are Conservatives, as to the absolute state of starvation which exists in this district?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As I have already told the hon. Gentleman, I am aware that Memorials have been presented.

THE OCCUPATION OF TOKAR.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs a question of which I have given him private notice. It is with reference to the military operations in the Soudan. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will be good enough to tell us if the military object of those operations is the permanent occupation of Tokar and Handoub? Have Her Majesty's Government raised any objections to this first step towards the re-acquisition of the Soudan, and is this not a departure from the policy which Her Majesty's Government have hitherto recommended to the Government of the Khedive? I should like to know, also, what new circumstances have arisen to justify that departure?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No positive resolution has been arrived at respecting the permanent occupation of Tokar and Handoub, but it is probable that the reasons which have necessitated the occupation will require their retention. The reasons are that the Dervish bands continually harassed and oppressed the inhabitants around Suakin, who are peacefully disposed, raiding even up to the fortifications, trade was constantly interrupted, and the supplies which found their way into the interior were acquired or seized by the Dervishes as the means of hostile proceedings. The Slave Trade was carried on even from Handoub. These places, too, are the only points from which Suakin can be annoyed. It is stated that none of the Dervish troops killed at Tokar belonged to that part of the country. The movement is not at all a departure from the policy heretofore pursued by Her Majesty's Government. They only offered no objection to it on condition that no advance is to be made into the interior, and it is for the reasons I have stated consistent with the principle of maintaining the position of 1886.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): May I ask whether the Egyptian troops employed were Egyptian troops in the strict sense of the word, or black troops?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I believe that two of the battalions engaged were black battalions, but they were regular battalions of the Egyptian Army and part of the permanent garrison of Suakin.

MR. J. MORLEY: Are we to understand that no addition will have to be made to the duties of the British troops in Egypt, although there is a permanent occupation of Tokar and Handoub? Are the British troops to advance to Kassala in any circumstances?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I stated on a former occasion that no addition will be required to the small British force now in Egypt. I also stated that it is not expected that the garrison of Suakin will require to be reinforced. It is clearly understood that no further advance will be made.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): Is it not a fact that Tokar is some 50 or 60 miles distant from Suakin, and that the occupation of Tokar involves the occupation of a considerable district?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The House will not expect me to go into details; but Tokar is in an oasis peculiarly advantageous as a basis of operations against Suakin. Its occupation is considered necessary for the reasons I have stated.

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): May I ask whether the Government intend to proceed with the nomination of the Select Committee on the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill this evening, and, if so, after what hour it will not be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It will not be taken this evening, considering the important business on the Paper.

ARMY EXAMINATIONS.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): The other evening the Secretary of State for War said he would consider whether he could lay before the House the correspondence in regard to making Latin a compulsory subject in Army examinations. Can the right hon. Gentleman give us the result of his consideration?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will first of all look at the last part of the Report of the Civil Service Commission. He will find there some of the correspondence. Perhaps he will then tell me whether he thinks what he finds there is sufficient or not.

EAST INDIA (CAMBAY DISTURBANCES).

Address—

"For Copies of or extracts from Correspondence relating to Disturbances in the Native State of Cambay."—(Mr. Burt.)

PROSECUTION OF OFFENCES ACTS, 1879 AND 1886.

Address—

"For Return showing the working of the Regulations made in 1866 for carrying out the Prosecution of Offences Acts, 1879 and 1886, with Statistics setting forth the Number, Nature, Cost, and Results of the Proceedings instituted by the Director in accordance with those Regulations, from the 1st day of January 1890 to the 31st day of December 1890 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 135, of Session 1890)."—(Mr. Stuart Wortley.)

DEATHS FROM STARVATION (METROPOLIS).

Address—

"For Return of the number of Deaths in the Metropolitan District, in the year 1890, upon which a Coroner's Jury having returned a Verdict of Death from Starvation or Death accelerated by Privation (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 373, of Session 1890)."—(Mr. Talbot.)

IRISH LAND COMMISSION.

Return ordered—

"Showing (1) the names of the Chief Commissioners, Land Purchase Commissioners, and Sub-Commissioners in connection with the Irish Land Commission on the 1st day of January, 1891; (2) date of original appointment; (3) age on appointment; (4) residence at time of appointment; (5) county or counties in which practical experience of land was acquired; (6) where educated; (7) previous profession; (8) acreage of land farmed; (9) whether held as owner or tenant; (10) what other experience in agriculture; (11) what experience in valuing, mapping, and surveying; (12) salary; in the following form:—

	Name.
	Date of original appointment.
	Age on appointment.
	Residence at time of appointment.
	County or counties in which practical experience of land was acquired.
	Where educated.
	Previous profession.
	Acreage of land farmed.
	Whether held as owner or tenant.
	What other experience in agriculture.
	What experience in valuing, mapping, and surveying.
	Salary.

—(Mr. Loe.)

MOTION.

PUBLIC TRUSTEE (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Bill for the appointment of a Public Trustee, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Jackson, and Mr. Attorney General.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 228.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

ARMY ESTIMATES, 1891-92.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 153,696, all ranks, be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland at Home and Abroad, excluding Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892."

(4.37.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I do not wish to continue my criticism of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, in which I was interrupted by the adjournment of the Debate the other night, but I wish to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that there are 7,000 men less in the ranks than are to be voted, and 12,000 men less in the Reserve than are to be voted. I attribute that deficiency chiefly to administration. I think the right hon. Gentleman is holding out false promises to the men who are thinking of enlisting, and the false promise I will particularly draw attention to—that a private soldier will receive 15s. I maintain that a private soldier only gets about 13s. a week. In order that the question of pay might be properly discussed to-night, I addressed a private note to the Secretary of State for War, so that if he thought proper he might be prepared with figures, and might be able to make a statement on the subject. The way I estimate that a private soldier gets only 13s. a week is this: As actual pay he receives 7s. a week. 1s. 2d. a week is put down to his credit for deferred pay, but 1s. 2d. a week deferred for seven years or three years is not worth more than 1s. a week. So that altogether he gets 8s. pay. From a statement once made by a Financial Secretary to the War Office, I know that a private soldier gets 3½d. worth of meat a day. The value of bread supplied him may be estimated at 1d. per day; so that in rations he gets 4½d. a day. I see the Secretary of State shakes his head. The soldier's rations were formerly valued at 4½d., but there is no doubt that the price of meat and bread has declined. In pay and rations a soldier receives 10s. 6d. a week. Lodging I put down at 2d. a day. Barrack accommodation, fuel, lighting, and bedding cannot be put down at more than 2d. a day. Soldiers sleep 14 in a room, and it is evident that under such circumstances there is great economy. The clothing of a soldier I value at £2 12s. a year, or 1s. per week. That is the extreme outside price. The Secretary of State will say a soldier's clothing costs more than £2 12s. a year, but if so the soldier does not get greater value than that. You wish a soldier to look smart, and yet you wish him to sleep in the guard room in his good clothes. When all these items are added together they come to 12s. 8d. I allow 4d. for contingencies, making in all 13s. It is said the soldier receives medical attendance, but I believe that in England for 3d. a week a man cannot only get attended to by a doctor, but can obtain attendance for his family and also get an allowance when he is sick. Therefore, medical attendance I really put down as little or nothing. I want the Secretary for War to point out where I am wrong in my figures. The stoppages from a soldier's pay are very considerable. The fines alone form large deductions. The soldier gets fined not only when he is drunk at his work, but when he is drunk, although not on duty. Of course it is not a proper thing to have drunken men in barracks, but an ordinary workman does not get fined for returning home drunk at night as a soldier does. The Secretary for War says a soldier gets as much as 15s. a week; and I would ask him to enter into such details as will prove that he is right and I am wrong.

*(4.49.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. F. STANHOPE, Horncastle, Lincolnshire): I am afraid I cannot agree with my hon. and gallant Friend that this Committee is the best body to ascertain exactly what are the facts of such a case. The hon. and gallant Gentleman, of course, has large technical knowledge on this subject, but I am bound to tell him that those whom I have consulted also have very large technical knowledge with reference to it. I admit that there must always be a difference of opinion as to the precise amount received by the soldier, but the statement we put in the placards is founded on the best information we could obtain. It was first published before I was responsible for it, but I have seen nothing to lead me to modify it. The 15s. a week is based upon a general estimate. The rations are taken at 3s. 6d.

COLONEL NOLAN: Oh, no!

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Well, it is a matter of opinion, and I am afraid we must agree to differ. The lodgings in which we include fire, lighting, and bedding we place at 2s. 6d., and the clothing we place at 2s. The 15s. does not include the deferred pay, the uncertain amounts which a soldier may receive according to his conduct, or any valuation for the amount of medical attendance or casual earnings. Although I am afraid it is impossible to satisfy the hon. and gallant Member, all I can say is that other people have formed a totally different estimate from his, and I can see no reason whatever for differing from their opinion.

(4.52.) COLONEL NOLAN: I am very glad I have drawn this statement from the right hon. Gentleman. I may point out that, whilst I have expressed my own opinion, the right hon. Gentleman has not said he has gone into the question himself, nor has he named one of the advisers upon whose opinions he relies. I think he should state who those authorities are. I am glad that the matter has not been reduced to such a small compass that I can say positively that the right hon. Gentleman over-estimates the rations by something over 1s. a week. As regards the lodging, it must be a matter of opinion on the part of the soldiers and of ordinary workmen whether a bed in a room which is occupied by 14 men is worth more than 1s. 2d. a week. I certainly say that a bed of such a kind could be easily procured by contract for 2d. per night. As regards the clothing, the greater part of the clothes served out are of no use to the soldier, and an ordinary workman would be able to get as good and warm and very nearly as smart clothes for £2 12s. a year.

*(4.56.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): There are one or two very broad observations I wish to make with regard to this Vote. I am sure we all listened with great pleasure to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War in introducing the discussion. With regard to the point alluded to by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Nolan), the right hon. Gentleman gave the most explicit information the other night from the point of view of the interests of the private soldier. As to the special Vote before us for 153,696 men, I confess I always feel a considerable amount of sympathy with any Secretary for War. I think his difficulties are enormous.

VOL CCCL. [THIRD SERIES.]

He is suddenly put at the head of a great spending Department which has many ramifications; his responsibilities are great, and it is obvious it must be a long time before he can master the details of his work. By the time he has mastered the details of his Department I think it will be found that the officials of his Department have mastered him. I wish to point out once more that the form of the Estimates and the procedure of this House render it quite impossible to discuss, adequately, the question before us. We can only take it in bits. The actual number of soldiers of sorts on the Estimates is 707,242; but as 553,546 are distributed under other Votes, we are forbidden to deal with them now, so that we are only dealing with a very small proportion of the total Military Force on the Estimates. We are asked to vote 153,696 men when the Estimates actually provide for a number of soldiers amounting to nearly three-quarters of a million. They are supposed to be for the defence of the Empire. We are further precluded from taking into account the 150,000 native troops in India, and the regular and auxiliary troops scattered throughout the Colonial Empire. So really we are taking the Vote for a small fragment of the Military Forces of the Empire. Further, let me say that the Army as a purely Military Force is intended to defend British territory against the possibility of purely military attack; and with the exception of the frontiers of India and Canada, there is no part of the Empire open to military attack except by sea, and thus the possibility of attack and amount of force required to resist it, becomes a naval question which we are not allowed to discuss, and, therefore, we have to vote this number of men absolutely in the dark. We are not allowed to refer to those reasons which would fix the military standard of required strength, and so I think this stage of Committee on the Army Estimates should either be enlarged in the scope of its discussion, or it might very well be dispensed with altogether. We have to look on this Vote wearing Parliamentary blinkers; we must not look to the right, where lies the naval question, nor to the left, where are the Indian and other Forces. Some of the statements of the right hon. Gentleman on introducing these Estimates are germane to the observations I have ventured to offer. I find the right hon. Gentleman said—

"We have taken stock of all our available resources, and after making full provision for the garrisons of our ports and coaling stations at home and abroad, we are organising the remainder of our Force into an Army of defence."

Well, so long as I have been able to follow military and naval Debates in this House, it has been the usual statement from the Minister that "we are organising," and so long as we have to approach the discussion of military and naval policy by bits, so long we shall go on organising, so long will it be impossible for a Minister to say, "We are organised." With regard to this, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman to say when he replies later, are we to understand from his statement, that before taking stock of our military resources the question was not asked: What are the existing resources for purely local defence, and are they or are they not in excess of our requirements? I think that so long as our first line of defence, the Navy, is sufficient to protect commerce in the Channel no great attempt at invasion can possibly take place. That is the determining factor as to the nature, number, and amount of our Military Force, and that over 500,000 men in England for nothing else than resisting a military invasion is scarcely necessary. Our method of procedure has been upon these lines. First you take the available military resources and say these have been created, they exist, and then, without inquiring how they came into existence, or whether they are wanted, we provide for real military necessities and then find a remainder of 500,000 men, unappropriated, so they are organised into an Army of defence. There is another passage in the right hon. Gentleman's statement to which I must refer. He said—

"On the occurrence of an emergency, troops mainly drawn from the Regular Army, forming the first line of defence (that is the first line of defence against invasion), will concentrate at the appointed stations all situated at important railway junctions enabling them to be transported with the least possible delay to the threatened districts."

Now, I do wish humbly to protest against a phrase which may come to be generally adopted when applied to the Army in the United Kingdom, that it is the first line of defence against invasion. We have always considered the Navy the first line of defence for this Kingdom.

Sir J. Colomb

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Really, I think I made my meaning perfectly clear; what I meant, of course, was the first line of military defence—of Army defence.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB: That is to say the first line of defence supposing your Navy broken down.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB: I take this explanation that the Regular Army is, according to the passage in the right hon. Gentleman's speech, the first line of defence supposing the Navy broken down. But then I think we are adopting an entirely new principle in our military policy. The Regular Army is for the general service of the Empire. You cannot limit it and tie it down to be the first line of military defence at home, and observing that it is only in India and Canada that there can be a great military attack delivered, so long as your Navy is sufficient, then the Regular Army should be available as hitherto for service abroad. I have felt it incumbent upon me to make this protest. The more I consider the whole matter the more am I satisfied that until the House is placed in a position by the alteration of its forms to discuss the principles upon which the strength of the Army is to be founded, at all events for one night in the Session, so long shall we have waste and inefficiency, and so long will we be without that safety the Empire demands.

(5.10.) THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON (Lancashire, Rossendale): I do not propose to follow the various statements made by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War on Thursday. I will only add the expression of my opinion to that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman as to the extreme clearness and ability which marked those statements, and the important nature of some of the information laid before the Committee. But I think, perhaps, it would be convenient on this occasion, if I were to ask the right hon. Gentleman to take this, or some other opportunity he may consider more desirable, for giving to the Committee some further information as to the steps taken by himself and other Members of the Government, to carry out suggestions made by the Royal Commission appointed to examine the organisation of the Military and Naval Departments, of which I had the honour to be Chairman. The right hon. Gentleman told us last year that upon some of the recommendations contained in that Report the Government would take further time for consideration, and I do not think that any member of the Commission objected to that, considering the extreme importance of the matter; but we should be glad to know whether that further consideration has now been given, and in what conclusion, if any, that consideration has resulted? There were, however, certain of the recommendations of the Commission which the right hon. Gentleman said were to be acted upon at once. The Commission recommended the constitution of a Naval and Military Council of a certain composition. The right hon. Gentleman made some criticisms upon the precise form of their recommendation, and stated that the Government had come to the determination to constitute within the Cabinet itself a Naval and Military Council, the decisions of which were to be kept on record for the information, not only of themselves, but also of their successors. I think it is desirable that we should know whether that Council within the Cabinet has been appointed, whether it has met, and, as far as the right hon. Gentleman is able to tell us, whether any progress has been made in the consideration of the questions which induced the Commission to recommend the appointment of such a Council. Perhaps it is desirable that I should once more recall the nature of the questions in view of which we recommended the appointment of a joint Naval and Military Council. In the seventh paragraph of our Report we say—

“The first point which strikes us in the consideration of the organisation of these two great Departments is, that while in action they must be to a large extent dependent on each other, and while in some of the arrangements necessary, as a preparation for war, they are absolutely dependent on the assistance of each other, little or no attempt has ever been made to establish settled and regular inter-communication or relations between them, or to secure that the establishment of one Service should be determined with any reference to the requirements of the other.”

Further we state—

“It has been stated in evidence before us that no combined plan of operations for the defence of the Empire in any given contingency has ever been worked out or decided upon by the two Departments; that some of the questions connected with the defence of military ports abroad, and even of those at home, are still, after much Departmental correspondence, in an unsettled condition, and that the best mode of garrisoning some of the distant coaling stations is also unsettled.”

My right hon. Friend stated last year that in his opinion the amount of friction to which reference has been made has been very much exaggerated, and that there was no cause for serious misunderstanding in the working of the two Departments. Now I have explained that the result of the investigation we had had to make, was that the friction actually existing in the operation of the existing system of the Departments was not the main defect to be guarded against. I quite agree that the amount of friction which actually occurs may not be serious, but the question which arises is whether that friction is not avoided by leaving some of the most vital questions in abeyance in the unfounded confidence that every difficulty that might become serious will resolve itself when necessity arises. As we say in our Report—

“There does not appear to us to exist sufficient provision for the consideration by either Service of the wants of the other. It seems to be assumed, without adequate ground, that each will be, in time of need, prepared to give the assistance essential to, or highly necessary for, the efficiency of the other; and there is a want of such definite and established relations between the Admiralty and the War Office as would give the opportunity to either Department of calling the attention of the other to the condition of the establishments and preparations in which it is vitally interested.”

If that is a correct statement of the state of affairs, it is quite possible for there to be very little friction in the action of the two Departments, and yet some of the most vital questions essential to the efficiency of both, but which it is nobody's business to raise, might be left in a most uncertain condition, and cause, in time of trial, friction of a very dangerous character. What I think the Committee have a right to know is whether the appointment of this Naval and Military Council has been made, and whether any progress has been made towards a satisfactory solution of what is described in the Report of the Commission—and I know it was the unanimous opinion of the Commissioners—as an “unsatisfactory and dangerous condition of affairs.” If any consideration has been given to these matters, it is not, I am bound to say, apparent on the face of the Army Estimates. The Navy Estimates have not, I believe, yet been presented to the House. Very few changes in the Establishments seem to be made in the present Estimates, either in the whole or in relation to the various branches of the Service. If that is due to the fact that the examination of the questions I have referred to has resulted in the opinion being formed that our Military Establishment is adequate to the wants of the Empire, and that the Army is efficient in itself and capable of giving the Navy support in time of war, and that the same statement can be made with regard to the Navy, that no doubt will be a highly satisfactory statement for the Committee to hear; but in the absence of a positive assurance to that effect, I hardly think we can assume so much, and I think the Committee require further information. I am bound to say that in my opinion this thorough and harmonious communication between the two Departments will never be established by the constitution of any Naval and Military Council, within or without the Cabinet. I believe it can only be practically attained by certain administrative changes which the Commission recommended. I believe it is necessary that in each Department highly-trained professional officers should be appointed, who would be free from all administrative or technical work to a very great extent, whose chief duty would be to give responsible advice to their respective Ministers on questions of policy. I believe that the appointment of the officers recommended by the Commission, the First Naval Lord and the officer whom we designated the Chief of the Staff, would be the means of establishing that thorough and free communication between the two Departments which I think does not at present exist. These officers would, from the nature of their duties, be in constant communication with each other, through them all questions of common interest and importance to each Department would be presented to their respective chiefs, and those questions would be raised and decided in a manner that would prevent the possibility of that misunderstanding which I fear now exists. That, in my opinion, affords the only true solution of the difficulty. But I fully admit that, until the Government are in a position to give further consideration to the carrying out of the recommendations of the Commission in this respect, a good deal might be done by the Naval and Military Council, which we have been informed is to be appointed. I wish also to ask my right hon. Friend whether any progress has been made towards the adoption of the recommendations of the Commission for the re-organisation of the Department over which he himself presides—the War Office. The Secretary of State last year very properly took time to consider what he described as the far-reaching and drastic recommendations of the Commission, and I think the time has arrived when we may ask if any progress has been made in that direction. But one of those recommendations my right hon. Friend said he was prepared to carry out at once, and he undertook to constitute a War Office Council in a more formal manner. He undertook to secure freedom of discussion in that Council, with a formal record of its proceedings. We are, I think, entitled to ask whether that Council has been formally constituted, and whether any practical benefit has resulted from it, whether there has been any result as affecting the Estimates, and whether any responsibility for advice has been placed on that Council; or whether still, as in times past, the Commander-in-Chief is the only official in the War Office to whom the Secretary of State is entitled to look for advice on questions of magnitude and importance. In the 73rd paragraph of our Report it is pointed out that all responsibility for administration is practically, under the present system, concentrated upon the person of the Commander-in-Chief, and we suggest that a definite and direct responsibility to the Secretary of State should be placed upon the heads of Departments. We have pointed out in the Report that the only responsible adviser of the Secretary of State is the Commander-in-Chief, who has a multitude of other duties to perform. I think an instance will show better than anything else the state of things to which we were endeavouring to call attention when we made that recommendation. The Commission considered that there was no real power and responsibility placed upon any of the so-called heads of Departments in the War Office, except upon the Commander-in-Chief. For instance, with regard to the magazine rifle, my right hon. Friend, in the course of the Debate the other night, made two statements which appear to me to be, to a great extent, of a conflicting character. My right hon. Friend's first statement was that up to recent times—

The Marquess of Hartington

“Soldiers have had too little control over the weapons placed in their hands, but now the primary responsibility for the weapons of the Army rests with the Army itself.”

The statement seems to me to require a little examination. What is the exact meaning my right hon. Friend attaches to his words? The Staff and regimental officers have nothing more to do with their weapons now than formerly. The statement must be taken to mean that there is at the War Office some representative of the combatant branches of the Army, presumably the Commander-in-Chief or the Adjutant General, who has a voice in the selection of weapons. In that way it might be said that the Army has a primary responsibility for its weapons. But my right hon. Friend went on to say that the Director of Artillery is the officer primarily responsible for recommending the new rifle. In my opinion, the Director of Artillery is not a representative of the Army at all. He is chosen, I believe, and I think he ought to be chosen, not as the representative of the combatant forces of the Army, but because of his special and scientific knowledge of questions relating to that arm of the Service. It therefore seems to me that the two statements of my right hon. Friend are not easily reconciled. If the choice of the new rifle really rested with the Commander-in-Chief or the Adjutant General, then it might be said, in some sense, that the Army, through its representatives, was responsible for the new weapon; but if, as we were further informed, the primary responsibility rested upon the Director of Artillery, then I am unable to see that the Army has anything more to do with the choice of the new weapon than it ever had in former times. That view seems to me to be somewhat confirmed by the rest of the speech of my right hon. Friend. He said, in the course of his speech, as to the rifle, a great deal about the recommendations of Committees, and the opinion of the weapon given by certain experts, even by certain members of the Volunteer Force, and he quoted the opinion of the Director of the Ordnance Factory. He went very fully into the merits of the rifle and the cost of it. He made the statement which I have read as to the responsibility of the Director of Artillery for recommending the rifle, but in the whole course of his observations I do not find reference to the opinion of the Commander-in-Chief or the Adjutant General, who alone—so far as I can see—of the officials of the War Office can be said to represent the combatant Forces, or the opinion of the combatant Forces in the choice of the weapon. The Director of Artillery is appointed, and no doubt ought to be appointed, for his practical and scientific knowledge on questions of armaments. But what the members of the Commission felt, and what I desire to point out, is, that under the present system no real and direct responsibility rests on the Director of Artillery or any other so-called heads of a Department. The Director of Artillery is, under the present system, merely a subordinate member of the Military Department under the Commander-in-Chief. In estimating the relative positions of the members of the War Office administration some regard must be had to the importance of those positions as measured by the amount of salary attached to them. A slight examination of the Estimates will show that the Director of Artillery is not only not in an independent position as the head of the Department, but that, relatively, he is not a highly placed member of the Department of the Commander-in-Chief. In the Military Department, the head of which is the Commander-in-Chief with £6,000 a year, there are a Military Secretary with £2,100 a year, an Adjutant General with £2,700, four Deputy Adjutants General at from £1,700 to £1,500 a year, an Inspector General of Fortifications with £2,100, a Deputy Inspector General of Fortifications with £1,700, and, finally, the Director of Artillery, with a salary of £1,500; so that the position of the Director of Artillery in the official hierarchy appears to be on a level with that of a Deputy Adjutant General, and below that of the Deputy Inspector General of Fortifications. In my opinion nothing is gained by placing the man who is really responsible for a decision of this kind under a military chief whose scientific knowledge must, presumably, be inferior to his own. I might say the same thing with regard to the Inspector General of Fortifications, the officer in charge of the Commissariat, and others. I say I think it is a false principle that these officers should not be made directly responsible to the Secretary of State for the discharge of the important functions with which they are entrusted, but should be, nominally, placed under the control of a single military head. Referring, again, to the case of the selection of the new magazine rifle, it appears to me that it would be infinitely preferable that the duty of primarily and finally recommending the adoption of a particular arm should rest upon the Director of Artillery without the interposition of the responsibility of any other authority between him and the Secretary of State. Let the Military Authorities by all means examine the arm placed in their hands, let them conduct any series of experiments, let them test their new weapon, let them make any Reports they consider necessary, and let those Reports and any remonstrances they may have to offer be referred to the Director of Artillery; but let him be the person who has the final word with the Secretary of State, and who, having considered the whole matter, shall, on his sole and undivided responsibility, make his recommendation to the Secretary of State, so that the public may know who there is in the Department, under the Secretary of State, who will bear the whole responsibility for the efficiency or inefficiency of a weapon served out to the troops. The present system seems to me to lead to a confusion of duties and devolution of responsibility. If the Director of Artillery has anything to do with the trials and tests to which a new arm is subjected, the responsibility of the Director of Artillery for passing what may be a defective weapon is diminished. And if the combatant officers take any part in recommending mechanical alteration in a new arm, so far, in my opinion, the responsibility of the Director of Artillery for that which ought to be his business is weakened and diminished. In addition to the present system of accumulating a vast amount of duties upon the Commander-in-Chief and the Adjutant General, it is impossible for any man to cope with a distribution of duties which is unsound in itself. Take the case of the administration of a great railway. The engineers and directors of the rolling stock occupy a position analogous in military administration to those who occupy themselves with fortifications and guns in the Army; but I do not think any Railway Board would dream of placing the management of the factories or workshops, nominally in the hands of the traffic manager, though undoubtedly he is the person—like the combatant branches of the Army—who is most interested in the efficiency of the rolling stock. I do not think a Railway Company would be of opinion that it would get the best result by giving to a traffic manager either the real or nominal responsibility for the management of their factories or workshops. I do not wish to detain the House, but I think I must point to another instance of the inconvenience of the present system of apportioning duties. The right hon. Gentleman the other night made an important statement as to the progress made with the scheme for the mobilization of the Army. Now, I should like to ask who does the right hon. Gentleman hold responsible to himself for that scheme, upon which the safety of the Empire may, in a possible contingency, depend? It is, of course, impossible for the Secretary of State or any civilian to make himself personally responsible. But there ought to be some individual at the War Office whom he can hold personally responsible. I doubt very much whether, under the existing system, there is any individual who is directly responsible. If I am not mistaken, the head of the Intelligence Department is, jointly with the Commander-in-Chief, responsible; but it is impossible for the Commander-in-Chief, with his many other duties relating to drill, discipline, recruiting, instruction, and training of the Army, the selection of officers, and other such matters—it is absolutely impossible for the Commander-in-Chief to be held personally responsible for the details of any such scheme as this. It is also extremely improbable that the Adjutant General, with his many other duties, gives any real detailed examination to the mobilization scheme. This is a matter which ought to be confided to some officer who would be rightly described as Chief of the Staff. If such an officer were appointed he would then be absolutely and personally responsible, and his professional prospects and reputation would be at stake. There are several distinct departments of the War Office—such as the men, armaments for fortifications, the weapons placed in the hands of the troops, the commissariat, supplies, transport and finance—all these are administered under the Secretary of State, and have broad divisions. I think there is nothing gained by placing all these matters, between which there are broad and distinct divisions, under the nominal charge and supreme control of a military officer whose position and duties are such as to not unnaturally lead him to devote his time and attention to the more personal branch of the Service. I hope that the Secretary of State will state his views on these important points with regard to military organisation. Possibly a more convenient opportunity than the present may be found on the Vote for the War Office itself, but as it is uncertain when that Vote will be reached, I have thought it desirable to make this statement now and to call attention to certain matters which appear to me to be of very great importance.

The Marquess of Hartington

*(5.50.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I think the noble Lord opposite must have forgotten a good deal of the Report of the Commission over which he himself presided. The noble Lord appears suddenly to attach extreme importance to this Naval and Military Council, but in the Report for which he is responsible the utmost which he could bring himself to say was that there might be some advantage in the formation of a Naval and Military Council. The Report says how the Council should be formed and what it should be summoned for. The recommendations of the Commission on this subject have not been overlooked by the Government. In the first place, the opportunity has been taken in the Cabinet of assembling together in Committee for the consideration of questions affecting the Army and Navy, not only those who are responsible for the two Departments, but those connected with other Departments of the State who may be indirectly interested. The decisions which have been come to are very important. Certain out-standing questions between the Army and Navy have been settled, and much has been done to facilitate the working of both Departments. Something has also been done with regard to matters of detail, which could not well be brought before a Committee like that to which I have referred, composed of very busy heads of Departments. We have felt it necessary to have a better system of inter-communication between the Army and the Navy, especially with reference to questions of defence. Accordingly, the old Defence Committee—which my noble Friend will remember, having himself been at the head of the War Office—has been abolished. That Committee only met on rare occasions, and was a very unsatisfactory body for deciding outstanding questions between the two Departments. Instead of that Committee we have established a much smaller body, consisting of some of the highest military officers under the Commander-in-Chief, and of some of the highest naval officers, who have already met together on several occasions, and who consider from the point of view both of the Army and Navy all questions of defence. Primarily they take, of course, the view of the Navy with regard to the points of defence and the amount of defence required, and then they discuss together the best manner in which that defence can be carried out. In this Committee, therefore, we have a permanent means of communication between the Army and Navy upon questions of defence. If in the course of the Committee's discussions questions arise involving some great principle, they are, of course, referred to the Committee of the Cabinet to be dealt with. Thus the consideration both of questions of principle and of questions of detail is provided for, and we hope that all the larger questions that involve points for argument between the Army and Navy will gradually be settled satisfactorily. The noble Lord has pointed out that the Commission over which he presided, recommended very great changes at the War Office, but he has failed to draw attention to the qualifications to that recommendation. My noble Friend will remember that the Commissioners, while recommending certain changes in the War Office administration, stated that they were not prepared to say when would be the proper time for carrying out those changes. There was no recommendation by the Commission that the office of Commander-in-Chief should be abolished during the tenure of the present occupant of that post. They did recommend, there being one dissident, that upon the occurrence of a vacancy the office should be abolished, and the organisation which they proposed should be substituted for it; but they frankly recognised the unique position of the present Commander-in-Chief, the long services which he has rendered to his country, and his great experience. I have already told the Committee that we are not prepared to state what changes we propose to make upon the occurrence of a vacancy in the office of Commander-in-Chief. We do not think we should be justified in throwing down into the arena of public discussion any proposals on the subject. I have been censured by the noble Lord in somewhat severe terms because I have not intimated that the changes suggested by the Committee can be carried out. I have only to say that when the Report of the Commission was brought before the country the Government were, I think, perfectly justified in waiting for some little time to see the general drift of opinion with reference to the changes proposed. As the noble Lord will admit, the public took no notice whatever of the Report, with the exception of one influential newspaper, to whose opinions no doubt great weight must be attached. With that exception, no notice was taken of the Report by the public, and I think the explanation is to be found in the recommendation of the Commission that the changes should not be introduced until a vacancy occurred in the office of Commander-in-Chief. We certainly have not been encouraged to believe that public opinion would have been with us if we had favoured the retirement of the Commander-in-Chief, and the immediate introduction of the changes recommended. We knew, at any rate, that there would have been enormous opposition to any such proposal from the Army generally, and until they knew that they would be supported by the great mass of public opinion outside the ranks of the Army, I am sure no Government could possibly have moved in the direction indicated. It was not recommended that we should call for the retirement of the Commander-in-Chief, who has, I believe, done great service to the country, and is worthy of retaining the high place he fills. We accept the Report of the Commission with the most perfect good faith, and when the fitting occasion arrives we shall be perfectly prepared to communicate the nature of the changes which we think it will be well to introduce. With regard to the observations made by the noble Lord as to the position of the Adjutant General, I may say we have found it absolutely necessary that the Adjutant General, who is the chief Staff officer of the Commander-in-Chief, shall be as far as possible relieved of some of his routine duties in order that he may be enabled to devote a greater portion of his energy and ability to the larger question of Military administration. My hon. Friend also asked, with reference to the mobilization scheme, the person who is responsible for it. The person mainly responsible is the Adjutant General, who selects officers to work under him. The Adjutant General is responsible to the Commander-in-Chief, and he is the man I look to as primarily responsible for the scheme of mobilization and everything connected with it. And he, of course, calls upon the officers he has selected to accept their share of the responsibility. My hon. Friend has also asked what we have done in other respects. We have established a War Office Council in pursuance of an undertaking which I gave in a former speech. It consists of Civil and Military officers, and meets at the War Office. The fullest freedom of discussion is allowed every member of the Council, who is absolutely entitled to bring forward with notice anything he thinks necessary. There is perfect latitude of discussion, and, as President, I call on every member to express his opinion; and having heard the views of the various members, I am in a position to form an opinion, for which I am responsible to this House. I look to every member of the Council for individual responsibility for the opinion he gives; and it is from these responsible opinions I am able to form the judgment which I present to the House. Then my noble Friend spoke, in connection with the new rifle, as to the position of the Director of Artillery, who, he said, was insufficiently paid, relatively to other officers. That, I dare say, is so. I should be very glad to provide a larger amount of remuneration for an officer who is doing his work so admirably as the present Director of Artillery. But I would remind my noble Friend that no change of that description ought to be made without giving full consideration to the remuneration attaching to all the other officers in the War Office. I am quite confident I would not be justified in simply asking the Treasury to raise the salary of a particular officer without asking that the salaries of other important officers at the War Office should be re-considered as a whole. My noble Friend said a great deal on the subject of the Director of Artillery. That officer in his time was under purely civilian control. What was said by the heads of the Army was that they had no responsibility whatever with regard to the weapons issued to the Army. I said—and I believe now that the country is entirely in agreement with what I said—that this was a most unsatisfactory proceeding. The Director of Artillery, purely subject to civilian control, was the person who chose the weapons issued to the Army. For my part, I think that although you continued to place on the Director of Artillery the primary responsibility for the choice of weapons, the Secretary of State ought to be fortified by obtaining the opinion upon the Director of Artillery's recommendations, of the heads of the Army, of the Adjutant General and of the Commander-in-Chief, so that the Army may know, before the weapon is chosen, that the heads of the Army had been allowed the fullest opportunity of expressing their opinions to the Secretary of State, before he decides to adopt any recommendation of any subordinate officer. I believe that change is satisfactory to the Army, and, so far as I can judge, from what I hear in all directions, it is already appreciated to a very large extent. The noble Lord has asked me with regard to other changes which we have been able to introduce into our administration. The other evening I brought before the House a most important change, though for some reason, perhaps that I had spoken so often that the reporters were tired, an adequate Report was not given of that portion of my speech. I refer to the establishment of a Promotion Board. I explained to the Committee the position in which we are now placed. Officers will not be promoted in future to the rank of colonel except by selection. I also explained that under the New Warrant no colonel, after a certain interval, could be promoted to the rank of general except by selection. Now, the position would be this: take the case of a lieutenant-colonel: Officers who have completed the term of regimental command or Service on the Staff could be placed on half pay, unless they elected retired pay; but as we recognise the injustice of retaining such officers on retired pay unless, in the opinion of the authorities, they had a reasonable prospect of obtaining employment on promotion, we only thought it right that they should be informed, as soon as they reasonably can be informed, that they are not likely again to be offered employment. It was for this purpose in the first instance that the Promotion Board was constituted, and it was decided after full consideration that the Promotion Board should be altogether independent of the War Office or of the officials of the War Office—I mean, of course, the Adjutant General, the Military Secretary and the Commander-in-Chief and his Staff, who will, of course, have to exercise the highest functions in cases of difficulty, and when considering the recommendations of the Promotion Board. In some cases they will have to act as a sort of Court of Appeal against some of the recommendations of the Promotion Board. But we thought it would command confidence if the primary recommendation came from the Promotion Board, and if the promotion could be made by officers who had nothing whatever to do with the War Office itself, and who were in close touch with the officers from among whom selections were to be made. The Board of Promotion, therefore, is constituted of five general officers. Three of them will be the senior officers in command in the United Kingdom, and the other two will be general officers taken from the particular arm of the Service from which the selection is to be made. That is to say, if you are going to select Cavalry officers or Infantry officers you will have general officers of Cavalry or general officers of Infantry, as the case may be. By that means every arm of the Service will have thoroughly fair play, and the Board will consist of officers of the largest experience, and who are in intimate touch with officers in all parts of the country. We have laid down as an absolute condition that the General commanding at Aldershot, who is in touch with so large a portion of the Army, and through whose hands so many officers pass, should have a seat on the Board. With regard to the proposed working of the Board, we desire that it should not decide hastily upon the rejection of any officer; and if among the members of the Board there is inadequate information with regard to any particular officer, they are especially directed to adjourn the meeting and to call for any information they may think necessary—for any confidential Report—in order to enable them to arrive at a fair conclusion with regard to that officer. I may also add that it is our desire, so far as selections are going to be made for the rank of colonel, that seniority shall be considered in order to avoid supersession. Though the special requirements of the Service may occasionally necessitate supersession, I think that the establishment of the Promotion Board amply meets the pledge already given to the House on the subject, and I think it is an arrangement which will have the confidence of the Army. It is one devised with the sole desire of ensuring that the selections shall be fair, and that every officer, whether he has been on foreign Service, or whether he has not, shall be considered fully on his merits, and not be rejected or debarred from future promotion, except after his whole acquirements and merits have been thoroughly investigated by a competent tribunal.

Mr. E. Stanhope

Mr. E. Stanhope

*SIR JOHN COLOMB: Do the right hon. Gentleman's observations apply to officers of Artillery and Engineers as well as to Infantry and Cavalry?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Certainly, Sir. Of course, two extra officers of Artillery or Engineers would be appointed where officers in those branches of the Service were to be considered for selection. I think I have dealt, though inadequately, I feel, with the points raised by my noble Friend. I am perfectly conscious, of course, that the scheme of Army administration sketched out by the Commission has not been carried out, but I have explained the circumstances which have withheld me from making any further recommendation. I certainly for the present am not prepared, and the Government are not prepared, to make further recommendations upon the substantial points to which the noble Lord has referred, and which may hereafter form the main basis of a re-organisation of the War Office. Before sitting down I will reply to some of the criticisms of my hon. and gallant Friend (Sir J. Colomb), who I think has done some injustice to me in reference to the statement I made on Thursday last. I then endeavoured to explain to the House the reasons why we asked for the number of men named in this vote. I told the House in a somewhat unusual, but I hope perfectly frank way, why we asked for so many men for the Artillery, so many for the Infantry, and so forth, and if my hon. and gallant Friend had any criticism to offer on the statement I then made, and the reasons I gave as to why we came to those decisions, I am surprised that he did not take advantage of his opportunity. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has told us that we are always organising, and that it is impossible to say when we shall cease to organise. Well, Sir, I hope we never shall cease to organise; but that we shall go on making improvements from year to year. In fact I cannot imagine when the time is likely to arrive when we in this country, would be wise in saying, with regard to the Army, we think we should go no further. No foreign country stands still. Why, therefore, should we do so? What we have done has been to lay down to the best of our power the functions which the Army ought to perform in time of War, and we have also to the best of our power allotted to their several stations and functions the different arms of the Service, which we deem suitable for those stations and functions. When my hon. Friend says we have not taken sufficient account of the Navy, I would point out to him that the very foundation of what we are doing, is that we have organised our defensive forces on the idea, and under the supposition that our Navy has been defeated, and that the invasion of this country has been rendered possible. If we did not regard invasion as possible what would be the good of keeping up our Volunteer Force? We might in that case get rid of them altogether and undoubtedly we might otherwise largely diminish our military expenditure. But that is not my view at all, and I am sure it is not the view which prevails throughout the country. The people of this country are not at all disposed to get rid of the Volunteers, and for my own part I regard them as constituting a most valuable auxiliary body which it is very desirable to retain in case its services should ever be needed. I cannot, therefore, concede what appears to be the view of my hon. Friend that it is to be assumed as a self-evident proposition that the defeat of the Navy of this country is absolutely and entirely impossible. My hon. and gallant Friend has asked whether we are satisfied that our present military resources for the purposes of purely local defence are not in excess of our requirements. That I may say is a matter to which we have given the most careful consideration. I presume my hon. Friend refers in particular to garrisons of ports, and I think that in this respect it may be that we have provided too large a force in former years. We have, however, carefully gone over every garrison required for defensive purposes in every part of the world, and in doing so we have assigned so many men to every gun; and I am bound to say, that in the statement I have made, instead of making any excessive provision we have, if anything, provided for rather less than would be absolutely needed for the purpose of defending every gun in position, and what is more, for every gun that may be required. I do not think much more need be said as to the criticism of my hon. Friend with regard to my speaking of the first line of defence. Everybody knows that in what I have been talking of I have not been alluding to the Navy. After the Navy is defeated the first line of defence is the Regular Army. With regard to the scheme of mobilisation of which I spoke but briefly the other day—and as to which one of the main criticisms passed on what I then said, was that I spoke too briefly and did not enter sufficiently into detail—I should like to say that during the last two years I have spent a great deal of time in this House in trying to explain fully the principles on which we mobilise our Forces. I have not yet heard one word of criticism as to the principles we have adopted. Indeed, those principles have been generally accepted by the House, and we are encouraged to persevere in them. I am not going to explain those principles to the House at any great length, but rather to tell the House very shortly the extent to which we have advanced in their application. The scheme that has so far been carried out is not absolutely complete, inasmuch as we have not yet completed the scheme for the decentralisation of stores, which we regard as a matter of the most vital importance for mobilisation. There are a good many minor matters that are still in progress, but which are not yet absolutely complete; but the result is that up to the present time we have got into a position in which we are able to mobilise not only our regular Army for the defence of the country, but all our other defensive Forces, in a much shorter space of time than has ever before been possible in the whole history of the country. I think I have now answered the criticisms of my hon. Friend, who seems to think that we should discuss the matter not only as it affects the Army, but also as it affects the Navy. Of course, he is perfectly right in saying you ought not to fix on your system of organisation for the Army without fully considering the relative duties of the Army and Navy, and assigning to each the functions they have to perform. Well, we have considered what both the Army and Navy can do. I know that there are two or three moot points which my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Admiral Mayne) and my hon. Friend Sir J. Colomb entertain strong opinions upon, and that one of them is the question of fortifications, the control and responsibility for which they think ought to be taken away from the Army and transferred to the Navy.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB: Of naval bases. I referred to naval ports, and not to military forts.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: My hon. Friend says he confines his remarks to Naval forts and garrisons, and he thinks they ought to be transferred from the Army to the Navy. Speaking as one who is responsible for Army administration, and for that only, I say without the slightest hesitation that there could be no possible solution of the question that would personally be more agreeable to me, and I think I may also say to those who may be my successors, than the transfer of an enormous part of the duty entrusted to me—a duty which is exceedingly difficult to discharge—from my shoulders to the shoulders of the Minister who is responsible for the Navy. But the Committee will probably recollect that some years ago, when the question was raised in this House by the noble Lord who used to represent the Borough of Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford), it was proposed by the noble Lord that the question of garrisoning some of the distant coaling stations with Marines, instead of the Forces belonging to the Army, should be fully considered. Well, I may state that we have given to that question our very earnest and careful consideration. It is a question which everybody knows is one of enormous practical difficulty, and the result of the examination which my noble Friend and myself have given to it is that to transfer the Forces in the way proposed for the purposes referred to would, under the existing organisation, involve a largely increased charge on the financial resources of the country. And here I may say I do not wish it to be supposed that I am laying down the proposition that we should not take any steps in this direction; but when my hon. Friends talk of striking out of these Votes the whole of the charges for fortifications, and transferring them to the Navy, they must surely have forgotten the detailed difficulties of such a transfer which, even if the House were to say the transfer should be made, could not be carried out except after the lapse of a considerable number of years, which would necessarily go to the very root of the whole question of Army organisation, and be the means of handing over to the Navy a responsibility which a large and enormous number of naval officers do not desire to have thrown upon their shoulders. To undertake at once to carry out such a proposition would be the height of rashness for any Government; but, at the same time, I think it right to say that my noble Friend and myself have the question under our consideration, and if we think we can make such a proposal to the Committee, and that it would add to the strength of the country and simplify its defence without adding unduly to the charges on the public purse of the country, we shall make it without the slightest hesitation, in the full confidence that it will meet with the approval of Parliament. I do not think my hon. and gallant Friend will expect from me any further assurances at the present moment than I have already given; at any rate I am not prepared to say that I can see my way to divesting myself of the responsibility which is at the present moment vested in me. This, however, does not prevent our realising that there is often danger arising from differences of opinion in matters of this kind, and that it is a very great thing to secure, as far as possible, unity of action in all matters regarding our defences, and that the Army and Navy respectively should thoroughly understand their different functions, and be fully prepared in time of need to do all that is necessary for the discharge of those functions without complication and without confusion. We are confident that should we continue to hold office for a short time longer, we shall see our way to a practical solution of all the difficulties that have arisen, and to place on a satisfactory basis both the military and naval organisation of our Forces.

Mr. E. Stanhope

*(6.30.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I do not imagine that the amour propre of my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale is greatly concerned with his position as Chairman of the Royal Commission, but I think that he and the other Members of that Royal Commission have at least some reason to feel surprised and almost hurt at the somewhat slighting terms in which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State has spoken of the Report which was the result of our labours. He said that the country did not care about it, and he showed that the Government did not care either; at all events, he put off the consideration of most of its principal recommendations for an indefinite time; and that was not the way to show a true appreciation of the labours of the Commission, and of the recommendations which after much labour and voluminous inquiry it ventured to make. Although the right hon. Gentleman might not have introduced at once all the changes which have been suggested, yet it was hoped that he would in some way have shown a disposition to move in the direction which the Commission indicated. I will deal briefly with only three of these points. The first point is the responsibility of the military officers who constitute our headquarters Staff and their relations to each other and to the Secretary of State. No doubt it is perfectly true the Commission did not recommend that a fundamental change should be made in the organisation of the Military Department at the War Office as long as the present Commander-in-Chief held office; but the Commission pointed out very strongly the evils of the present system by which one officer is placed above another, and very few officers indeed—and only one in the last resort—come into direct relations of personal responsibility to the Secretary of State. The Director of Artillery has not long occupied the position he now holds in the hierarchy of the War Office. Formerly he had a separate existence under the Surveyor General. I quite admit that that was an arrangement open to great objection; but what the right hon. Gentleman has done whilst he has been Minister of War has been actually to aggravate the evil of which the Commission complained, and to put the officer who really has the control of the enormous business of supplying the matériel of war for the Army and the Navy under the Quartermaster General. Is not that so?

*Mr. E. STANHOPE: No.

*Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Well, under the Adjutant General, who is under the Commander-in-Chief, who is responsible to the Secretary for War. It is essential to good administration that an officer with such enormous responsibilities as General Alderson should be in more direct relations with the Secretary for War, who is responsible to Parliament and to the country. On the recommendation with regard to the Naval and Military Council, I separated myself from my colleagues on the Commission, and only signed the Report owing to the employment of the word "may." I am sceptical of the advantage of any Council of that sort, but I do think there would be advantage in a Council within the Cabinet—a Council of responsible Ministers. One of the ends supposed to be gained by this Naval and Military Council would be the prevention of friction between the two Departments of the Army and Navy, and, above all, the settlement of many outstanding questions between them with regard to which there is an undecided limit of authority. The cases of alleged friction brought before the Royal Commission as calling for the proposed Council were no doubt serious; but the arguments founded upon them have been greatly exaggerated; and with proper feeling between the two Departments there ought not to be much friction. There will necessarily be a certain amount of friction as long as there is any confusion with respect to the duties of the two Departments in providing for the sea defences of fortified places. With regard to such important places as Malta and Gibraltar I believe that until lately there has been great diversity of opinion as to how far the defence should be undertaken by the Navy and how far by the military forces, and the same difficulty has arisen with regard to harbours and other duties which are obviously of an amphibious kind. This overlapping of responsibility leads one to look with a more friendly eye than one otherwise would upon the transference suggested by the right hon. Gentleman to the Naval Authorities of the greater part, if not the whole of this work. No doubt it would involve fundamental changes, but it would unify the coast defence of this country, and the sea defence of the coaling stations and fortified places all over the world. I pronounce no very strong opinion on that point. The right hon. Gentleman will no doubt tell us that a great expenditure of time and money would be caused; but these would not be insuperable objections if there were any real prospect of an increase of efficiency and simplicity in the arrangements for the defence of our Empire. It is by settling these points one way or the other, once for all, rather than by the establishment of a Naval and Military Council, that difficulties hitherto experienced will be got rid of. The third point I have to deal with is the question of the establishment of a Board of Promotion. I entirely agree with a considerable part of this proposal, and especially with the formation of the Board and the appointment to it of the three senior general officers commanding districts, thus making it an impersonal appointment, and avoiding the danger of selecting any particular officer to exercise a somewhat invidious duty. I would urge the right hon. Gentleman to apply that principle to the other two officers. I do not regard with very much satisfaction the prospect of a general officer of Cavalry, Artillery, or Engineers being selected for the purpose of discharging this difficult duty; you might name the officer in command of the School of Military Engineering or the officer commanding at Woolwich, without fixing upon a particular man to exercise this delicate function. The right hon. Gentleman says the first duty of the Board will be to deal with the lieutenant-colonels. Now, when an officer of this rank has served his time he has the option either of retiring or of going on half-pay with a view to further employment in the future. The right hon. Gentleman says the Board might at once tell him there is no chance of further employment, so that he might as well retire at once. I think there is a certain amount of cruelty in at once telling him that there is no chance of his being again employed, and I am afraid the Board would be tender-hearted and hesitate to do it. I have always favoured the principle of making the decision rest upon actual employment. If a man is merely to be told of a prospect of being employed, there will be room for the play of over-indulgence or prejudice as between one officer and another. It may be that to limit promotion in this way would limit the chance of promotion to the whole body of officers in the Army; but if the appointments at the head of the Army are not sufficient to cause an adequate flow of promotion from below, the sounder remedy is to lessen the number in the ranks below rather than to artificially increase the higher posts. Officers should only be promoted to discharge the active duties of the higher ranks. There is another point on which I wish to say a word or two, and it somewhat affects a matter with which I was dealing a few minutes ago, namely, the relations between the Army and Navy. The right hon. Gentleman announced, or rather corroborated the announcement previously made, that the recent transfer of the Stores Vote from the Army Estimates to the Navy Estimates had been followed by a determination to divide the naval from the military stores. The separation of the military from the naval stores is, no doubt, the logical consequence of the transfer of the votes from one estimate to another; but the Treasury Rule of May 1887 will still be infringed; for whatever arrangement is made, the Admiralty will still get its stores by or through the War Office. I should like to know whether the Treasury and the Admiralty have both fully concurred in the change, and whether they are satisfied that it will lead to no large increase of expense. The question of an increase of the Staff to look after the stores is a comparatively small matter, but at foreign stations there may be danger arising through the duplication and confusion of the patterns, and there may be a necessity to keep a larger reserve of stores than under the old system. I do not mean to say that these are evils which must not be faced, but I should like to know if the authorities are completely satisfied that they will not exist to an unreasonable and pernicious extent. So long as there are two distinct stores and two competing authorities in the matter, I fear the country will be liable to the evil which has been experienced in foreign countries—namely, that for the Army to adopt any particular arm or weapon is sufficient to insure that the Navy will not adopt that arm or weapon, with the result that, owing to rivalry and jealousy, the country is deprived of the advantage we have hitherto enjoyed of having one reserve of stores at all our foreign stations as well as at home, equally applicable to the Army and the Navy.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

*(6.51.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I will at once reply to the special question put by the right hon. Gentleman, relative to the division of stores. The right hon. Gentleman said quite truly that it is the logical result of the division of responsibility and I am glad to say that the course which we have now decided upon has been absolutely approved by the Admiralty, Treasury, and War Office. That I think will satisfy the right hon. Gentleman. The purchase of warlike stores, however, has not been removed from the War Office, but the moment the stores pass into the custody of the Army or the Navy then that particular Department becomes solely responsible for their care. The Treasury is satisfied that no great increase of expense will be entailed by the new arrangement; though in some matters of detail there may be a slight increase. The absolute condition has been laid down that divergent patterns for arms used in common by the Army and Navy are not to be adopted unless it has been shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary for War and of the First Lord of the Admiralty that such divergence is absolutely unavoidable. The right hon. Gentleman has alluded to the undesirability of adding to the aggregate quantity of stores, but I may say that the principle of the separation of naval from military stores has not been applied outside the United Kingdom; and no such principle will be adopted on foreign stations, and particularly on coaling stations, until after full examination of any difficulties which present themselves. The right hon. Gentleman, in dealing with the question of the Promotion Board, said the danger was that such a Board would be too tender-hearted. I agree it may be so, but even though the Promotion Board is inclined to be tender-hearted, it may simplify the work that has to be done if the Board goes carefully through the whole list of officers who may be selected for promotion. I trust that before long we shall be able to put before the House in a definite and accurate form rules for the working of the Promotion Board, which will show we have carefully guarded against the dangers which have been pointed out.

*(6.57.) GENERAL FRASER (Lambeth, N.): As there is a great and paramount question coming before the House with regard to the position of purchase officers—

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I rise to order. I have to call attention to the fact that my hon. and gallant Friend has put a Motion on the Paper dealing with the case of these officers and that it would therefore be out of order now to discuss it.

*GENERAL FRASER: I will not trespass on the time of the Committee on this occasion, as a momentous subject of paramount importance will shortly be brought prominently before the House of Lords and House of Commons, namely, the position of the purchase officers of the Army. The interests of these officers, recognised by Royal Warrants and honourable pledges given on the abolition of the purchase system, cannot be set aside. I say that the proposal with regard to the Board of Promotion made by the Secretary of State for War will be looked upon as a flagrant breach of faith.

(6.58.) MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I desire to call attention to the question of the employment of Reserve and discharged soldiers, and I should not do so had the Secretary for War alluded to the subject in his speech the other night. Since the introduction of the short-service system about 450,000 men have been discharged from the Army, or about 32,000 a year. No effort has been made in behalf of these men, except by the Association for the Employment of Discharged and Reserve Soldiers, which, when it was started, was promised the warmest support and assistance of the Government. The only assistance given has been a pittance of £200 a year, and therefore the platonic sympathy of the right hon. Gentleman, though gratifying, is absolutely valueless. As the right hon. Gentleman will not advise an increase of the grant, or grant an office to the Association at the War Office, will he include in the scope of the Committee to which he referred the other day the question of the employment of discharged and Reserve soldiers?

(7.0.) THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I am sure every Member of the Committee will be equally anxious with the hon. and gallant Gentleman that the War Office should give every assistance in their power towards an institution that has been established for the purpose of providing employment for old soldiers, but the difficulty we have had about this Society is one which, I think, the hon. and gallant Gentleman will appreciate. It is not possible for the Government to undertake the responsibility of finding employment for discharged soldiers, and if the War Office were to set up a bureau the Government would be responsible. We have met the question by subscribing for the last five years £200 a year towards the expenses of the Society. The total expenses of the Society last year were £532. I have not the figures before me at this moment, but speaking from recollection I may say that, whereas at the time the Government commenced to subscribe the whole expenses of the Society were defrayed by private subscriptions, the funds have now suffered to more than the extent to which the Government have subscribed. I think, therefore, it is not an unfair deduction that if we were to subscribe a larger sum, there would be a larger reduction in the private subscriptions. Our object in subscribing at all is to increase the sum available for the work. My right hon. Friend is not at all unwilling to see whether some further negotiation cannot be carried on with a view to meeting the private subscriptions, and we are at this moment in consultation with the Treasury about it.

MAJOR RASCH: Will the Government include the question in the scope of the Committee.

MR. BRODRICK: I think it would be beyond the scope of the Committee, which has already got very important subjects before it.

*(7.4.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berkshire): I desire in a few words to accentuate one portion of the speech of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) which was passed over lightly by the

Major Rasch

Secretary of State for War—that portion in which the noble Marquess referred to the adoption of the new rifle, and to the place in which the responsibility might properly be allocated. The other night it was urged from more than one quarter that owing to the censure that had been passed on the War Office by the Report of the Commission it was impossible to accept the doings of the War Office with simple and pure confidence. The right hon. Gentleman took great exception to this line of argument, and said he could not see what sort of connection the Report of the Commission, presided over by the noble Marquess, had with the adoption of the new rifle. I was very glad to see the noble Lord thought it had a very close connection indeed. The noble Lord was as much puzzled as other Members of the House, and people outside, as to the real place in the War Office where the responsibility for the selection of the rifle is properly to be allocated. The Secretary of State for War himself has given very contradictory accounts. The other night he said that the primary responsibility for the adoption of the weapon rested, in the first instance, with the Army itself, and then he said that the Director of Artillery was responsible. He now appears to think that the Commander-in-Chief and the Adjutant General are responsible. I have not in any speech seen the expressed public opinion of the Commander-in-Chief on the subject, but I have read a speech which the Adjutant General delivered at Devonport in December last, in which he stated that he knew very little indeed about rifles, but that he still thought that we had a good rifle, in view of the fact that the new rifle has been adopted by the Government of Roumania.

MR. BRODRICK: I am sorry to be obliged to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but I wish to point out to him that the speech of the Adjutant General was very briefly, and, indeed, most imperfectly reported.

*MR. MARJORIBANKS: The fact remains he was reported, and he has not contradicted the report.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: He contradicts it now.

MR. BRODRICK: The Adjutant General made a much more distinct and definite statement in reply to the Secretary of State's letter.

*MR. MARJORIBANKS: I accept the contradiction of the Adjutant General, and I am sorry I imputed to him a want of knowledge that he really possesses. However, the Adjutant General has evidently arrived at the incorrect conclusion that the weapon has been adopted by the Roumanian Government. Even had it been so adopted, it would not be any great recommendation of the rifle. It is an extraordinary fact that, if the Army itself is primarily responsible for the adoption of the rifle, so little attention should have been paid to the Report of the body of instructors at Hythe, which Sir R. Buller has said amounts to a general condemnation of the weapon. I only rise on this occasion in order not to pass by any opportunity of bringing this subject before the House, because there are a great number of people, both inside and outside of Parliament, who believe that in adopting this rifle we have adopted a thoroughly bad weapon, and one that it is a shame to the country the War Office should have forced on the Army.

(7.11.) GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): I and others do not entirely agree with the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) in respect to the Committee appointed to inquire into the administration of the civil and professional depôts. There was only one military gentleman on the Committee, and I do not believe the Committee represented the sentiments of the officers of the Army. I am in hopes that in the end the War Office will be a thoroughly business-like Department. Personally, I believe that it would be a very good thing if we had a Minister for Defence. The Secretary of State has done wisely in appointing a Board of Selection, because there are several officers whose claims have been ignored. With reference to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs, I would like to point out that very often officers, on vacating one appointment, apply for another. I think that when there is no intention of appointing them it is well to tell them so at once. I trust that the time will soon come when the coaling stations will be handed over to the Navy. As to the Society for the Employment of Discharged Soldiers, I should like to see the Government finding the whole of the necessary funds, so that officers would not have to provide for their old soldiers.

*(7.15.) SIR H. HAVELOCK ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): Before this Vote is taken I should like to draw the attention of the Secretary of State to what appears to me to be a most important subject. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Birkenhead (Sir E. Hamley) did not at all exaggerate the case when he said we had touched bottom in the matter of the unsatisfactory nature of the bulk of the men who we are obliged now to take into the Army. If I criticised at all the remark of the hon. and gallant gentleman, I should say it did not go far enough. I venture, with all deference, to suggest to the Secretary of State two modes by which he may, at all events, stay the enormous waste going on. The one is by enabling all men who desire to prolong their service to seven or nine years to do so. Such a power would, I believe, even in the next 12 months, have a most appreciable effect in retaining a large and valuable body of men under the colours. The other point has reference to the useless and totally unnecessary waste so strongly pointed out by the Inspector General of Recruiting, namely, that under the present conditions only about 20 per cent. of those who complete their original 12 years' engagement enter the Supplemental Reserve, and that, by the discharge of the remaining 80 per cent. the State has, during the last five years, lost the services of upwards of 38,000 men. If these men were allowed to extend their time from 12 to 16 years the result would be most beneficial by retaining for the Army a large number of trained soldiers who would form the most valuable of all the different classes of men in the Service. The cost of this would be extremely small, and I hope the Secretary of State for War will devise some means of placing an arrest upon the great and wanton waste now going on.

(7.20.) SIR F. FITZ-WYGRAM (Hants, Fareham): I, with others, feel most grateful to the Secretary of State for the many advantages, in the future, he has held out to the soldiers. Almost every class in the Army will derive some advantages through his proposals except one, and that is the non-commissioned officers, the most valuable part of the Army, the strength and the backbone of our regiments. I have never asked for an increase in the pay of the private soldier. I think his pay and the advantages he derives are fully equal to the wages paid unskilled labour in the country; but the case of non-commissioned officers stands on a different footing altogether. We want, as non-commissioned officers, men of good character and connection, and fitted for the responsibilities of the position. The Secretary of State for War has said that the regiments can get as many non-commissioned officers as they want. I know the roll is full, and always will be full, because you will always find in the Army a certain number of men glad to accept 8d. or 1s. a day more for performing the duties of non-commissioned officers. But such a class do not furnish the men we want, nor do they give the service we want. I live in a district which furnishes a very large number of recruits, both to the Army and to the Navy, but the complaint that is made in the district is that there are not a sufficient number of good and well-paid places for good men. Commissions are given away occasionally, but they are of no use in regard to recruiting. If you had good places for good men, fathers and mothers would be glad to see their sons go into the Army, especially in these days of short service, when there was some chance of returning home at no distant date. My belief is that if you were to pay your corporal 2s. 6d. a day, your sergeant 3s. 6d., your troop sergeant-major and colour-sergeant 4s. 6d., the good news would very soon spread throughout our villages, and an impetus would thus be given to recruiting. Such a step would be much more effective than the increase in the pay of the private soldier advocated by the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) and others. I hope the Secretary of State for War will lend a kindly ear to this proposal, which would not result in a large expenditure, but which, I believe, would be most effectual in increasing recruiting. There is another subject on which I wish to say a few words. In all Infantry regiments there is great complaint as to the guards which have to be kept. I believe that complaint is thoroughly well founded. Take the case of an ordinary Line regiment. In many Infantry barracks I find a number of sentries which are perfectly unnecessary. I find a sentry at the officers' quarters, at the quartermaster's store, at the hospital, at the magazine, and, in some barracks, at the officers' latrine. In many cases there are sentries at the front and rear of the barracks. It may be necessary to have a guard at the magazine, where it is distant or where the circumstances of the place renders it necessary, but as a general rule the amount of ammunition stored in the regimental magazine is very small, and not likely to create a very dangerous explosion if anyone got in and fired it. I assume that the reason for posting a sentry at the hospital is to prevent the introduction of spirits; but in view of the responsible Staff engaged in the hospital I cannot believe there is any fear of spirits being introduced. I fancy that in the case of regiments the conduct of whose men is not very satisfactory, sentries are placed at the rear and front of the barracks to prevent men breaking out after hours; but the idea that a sentry checks breaking out after hours has no foundation. If men want to break out they can always evade a sentry. Everybody who knows the Army knows that there are only two hours in which men ever break out of barracks, and they are the two hours between watch-setting and the closing of the public houses. I think the best way of preventing breaking out is to occasionally call the check rolls. If you put sentries on, men break out without being found out, and they break in without being found out; and, of course, where there is a great chance of getting off scot free you find the practice of breaking out prevails much more largely than would otherwise be the case. I come from a Cavalry regiment, and we have a good deal for our men to do during the day, and we do not want to keep them up all night. For years past we have found that a corporal's guard of three men and a sentry is quite sufficient to maintain the security of the barracks. I think that if the Secretary of State for War would call the attention of the Commander-in-Chief to the unnecessary number of sentries, and obtain their abolition, he would do good service to the soldier, and remove a great source of grievance. The soldiers know that all this sentry duty is unnecessary, and anything which is unnecessary is always felt very much more than that which is necessary. I should have been glad to have heard from the right hon. Gentleman a proposal to set up workshops at the barracks. I have always advocated this, and it may be said it is rather a hobby of mine, and I used to carry it out in India. I think the Secretary of State could, if he chose, undertake the whole of the barrack repairs by this means, and road-making, draining, paving, plastering, and almost everything else. In every regiment there are a considerable number of men more or less artizans by trade, and though, no doubt a good many are little more than apprentices to the trade they left early, yet with a little training and teaching they could do the work. My object in this suggestion is to assist men to find employment when they enter the Reserve or leave the Army. Of all the Reserve men who go loafing about, 99 per cent. come from Infantry regiments; rarely do we find among them men from the Cavalry, Artillery, or Engineers. In the latter branches of Service the men have an opportunity of fitting themselves for civil employment—they learn the management of horses and the routine of stable-work, and they pretty readily find employment in civil life. I often see them engaged as drivers, and though I hope men from my regiment do come to me when they find themselves in distress, I have not once in the year an application that I will assist a man to find employment. In Cavalry, Artillery and Engineer regiments we keep the men employed during the day, and the consequence is that when they do go into civil life they do not find the hours of labour irksome. I see the noble Lord the Member for Petersfield (Lord Wolmer) looking at me, and I know he takes an opposite view. In my establishment it is the rule to find, as far as possible, employment for Reserve men; but what I should like to see done would be the training of a certain number of men, say 10 per cent. in every Infantry regiment, in those trades which are useful both in peace and war. There are trades particularly useful in war in which the British soldier is certainly not instructed. Now I live at Portsmouth, and there is about the fortifications a good deal of work in connection with the raising and turfing of earthworks, and upon such work I often see civilian labourers employed when it would be very much better if the men of the garrison were employed upon it. As regards barrack repairs, there would be great saving of expense. The soldier is paid his daily pay as a soldier and, therefore, would, I imagine, do the work at half the rate of payment to the civilian labourer. You may say, this would only afford employment for a very small number of the Reserve men, and I am aware of that, but still it would be better than nothing, and I think it might be carried out to some extent.

Sir F. Fitz-Wygram

*(7.35.) VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield): I put a question to-day to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War as to sentry duty, and if he will give me his attention I should like to put one or two further questions on the subject which it may not be necessary for him to answer now, but he may think the matter deserving attention. I understood him to say that his information was that the excessive amount of sentry duty did not prejudicially affect recruiting for the brigade of Guards.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I said if it was excessive it would affect recruiting. The question is whether it is excessive.

*VISCOUNT WOLMER: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he has consulted the officers engaged in recruiting as to whether the amount of sentry duty has an effect on recruiting? I would further ask him whether the opinion of the commanding officers of the battalions of Guards, which have to find the men for this duty, is that it is good training for the men? I have the greatest respect for the right hon. Gentleman's opinions, and do not like to speak slightly of his remarks, but there was one sentence in his answer to my question which I cannot, if he will permit me to say so, reconcile with common sense. He said the training in sentry-go around St. James's Palace might be useful in time of war. Now, I cannot consider any two occupations more dissimilar than walking round the walls of the Palace and the actual military occupation; and, indeed, on active service there might be some danger of a man not remembering that he was not engaged in the duty he had hitherto been practising. On that point I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman to take the opinions of the colonels responsible for finding the men for this duty. I could not help being a little disappointed with the answer of the Financial Secretary to the question whether the employment of Army Reserve men would be submitted to the Committee which is going to be appointed. I was under the impression that it was going to be analogous to the Committee presided over by Lord Airey. Now, this question of the employment of Reserve men is most important in relation to the question of recruiting, and I cannot understand why it should be withdrawn from the consideration of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman has made a great many speeches, and we have trespassed much upon his time and attention, but the right hon. Gentleman did not deal with the question raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Birkenhead (General Hamley) as to whether it was worth while for the sake of 2d. a day to restrict the Supplementary Reserve to 20 per cent. of the men who leave the ordinary Army Reserve. At a moment when recruiting is actually short, when a great percentage of the recruits are specially enlisted and are admittedly unfit for immediate duty as soldiers, is it wise to lose from 5,000 to 9,000 men a year, the very pick in point of physique of the men in the country, the best men that can possibly be had for soldiers? No doubt many of them would not re-enlist under any terms, but it seems to be the opinion of Members well qualified like the hon. and gallant Member for Birkenhead to give an opinion, that the great majority of them could be secured on slightly improved terms. Surely this and all other questions connected with recruiting and the state of the Reserves deserves attention.

(7.43.) COLONEL NOLAN: I hope the Financial Secretary will be able to give me an answer in respect to the value of rations.

*(7.43.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): With reference to what has been said by the noble Lord (Viscount Wolmer) may I ask the right hon. Gentleman to be kind enough to inquire of the Military Authorities whether I am not right in the assumption upon which I put my supplementary question this afternoon, that while musketry practice is going on at Aldershot the men engaged on sentry-go in London during that period have only four or five nights in bed. I quite admit that during the rest of the year they have plenty of rest. I would also ask him to inquire whether it is not the fact that last year 50 men of the Coldstream Guards were invalided in one year, and whether this was due to excessive exposure to severe weather while on sentry duty. If there is any idea that such duty is useful as hardening the men, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consult the medical officers of the Guards as to whether it is not prejudicial to the health of the men that they should be exposed to long hours on night duty during the inclement periods of the year.

Viscount Wolmer

(7.45.) MR. BRODRICK: With regard to the point raised by the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Nolan) it is possible to give the average cost of rations over three or four years, and I believe it is about 5d. or 5.25d. We must, in considering the cost, bear in mind that it does not represent the cost to the man himself if he found his rations, because we have the advantage of buying in large quantities.

COLONEL NOLAN: Is it not under 5d.?

MR. BRODRICK: Practically, we may call it 5d. The smallest rise may bring it to 5½d., and within a short time we have had it as high as 7d., and a bad harvest might send it up again.

COLONEL NOLAN: But the average?

MR. BRODRICK: I can give the hon. and gallant Gentleman the average over a series of years, if he likes to have it. For the last three or four years it has been 5d., and before that it averaged considerably higher. With regard to the Reservists my right hon. Friend will consider whether it is possible in any way to bring that subject within the scope of the Committee, but if the noble Lord looks at it he will see that it is part of a very large question, and that it is concerned with the large question of the labour of the country. The suggestions of my hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Fitz-Wygram) are no doubt of value, and my right hon. Friend will carefully consider them.

(7.47.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): In common with other Members I have listened with the deepest interest to this Debate on military matters, and I gather from it that in all probability, if this country is attacked by the smallest force, we shall sustain a disastrous defeat. As far as I can make out from what has been said in the Debate by military gentlemen who, of course, know more about these matters than I do, our soldiers are stunted in size, they live in barracks which are unfit for pigs, they have very much too little to eat and hardly any pay, and they are put to sentry and other duties which destroy the little health that is left to them for their miserable existence. But then I am somewhat comforted by the fact that I have heard all this before, in fact, I think I have never heard a Debate on going into the Army Estimates or on the first Vote in which all the military gentlemen did not come forward with these complaints. It is surprising to me that nothing is done to remedy them. I am sure I have for some dozen consecutive years heard one military gentleman after another prove conclusively that he would make an infinitely better Secretary for War than the right hon. Gentleman who at the time happened to hold that office, and yet the Secretary for War, for the time being, has invariably treated this military wisdom with the greatest contempt, and in default of remedy the same thing goes on year after year. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War will give us an Army that will please the military critics in this House, without spending one farthing more than we spend now. Generally these Gentlemen add to their strictures the suggestion that more money should be spent on the Army. I am one of those who consider that we have much too large an Army at the present time, and the number of men is always going up under every Government. I am not surprised, for, unfortunately, there is still a great deal of "Jingoism" in existence, and every Government—but especially the present Government—undertakes new obligations, annexes new territories, and then comes to us saying the Army is not sufficient to defend the perpetually expanding British Empire. I have put down a proposal to reduce the number by 3,320 men, that being the number at present in Egypt, according to the Estimates that have been submitted to us. We are told that the Egyptian Government pay £87,000 a year, and I suppose our establishment in that country costs us about £300,000, at the rate of about £100 a man. Putting it at the lowest estimate, the cost to this country is about £200,000. But this is not the only ground of my objection to our Army there. I consider that the very worst use to which a man can be given up is to put him in uniform and give him a gun and make him a soldier. It takes him away from the labouring class and encourages in him a military spirit. I consider that our Army ought to be reduced to the lowest number that does not involve danger to the Empire. I am not going to bring forward the whole of this question. I will only allude to one or two points. I have spoken and perhaps divided the House a couple of hundred times on this question of the occupation of Egypt when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was in power, so it cannot be said that I am bringing it up as a Party question. What has been the origin of this occupation? Certain persons in the City, known as the Egyptian bondholders, had lent money to Egypt, and as Egypt did not seem likely to pay, therefore we established what was called a "dual control" with France. When we did that Egypt was under a sort of general tutelage of Europe, though it forms part of the dominions of the Sultan. We obtained the consent of the Sultan and a species of mandate from Europe, and with France went to Egypt and established there the dual control. The Egyptians objected to the incursion of English and French officials to squeeze out the money for the bondholders. They protested; they had some sort of Representative Assembly and ventured to suggest that the salaries of these officials should be submitted to them. At once we declared this was contrary to all justice, a riot developed into a rebellion, and, in consequence, we bombarded Alexandria. The French were more sensible, more honourable, more honest, I am sorry to say, than my own countrymen. They refused to take part in that nefarious transaction—the bombardment of Alexandria. We, however, did so. Then followed the battle of Tel-el-Kebir. A number of Egyptian fellaheen were killed. We called it a victory, and marched to Cairo, and since 1882 we have occupied Egypt. We obtained the assent of Europe to all this by the fact that we were always giving pledges that our occupation was only temporary. Why, the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale in 1883 said that we should evacuate Egypt in six months. I believe that the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had really every intention of making it temporary, but something always occurred to make it impossible to withdraw the troops, as they said. I remember at one time they were very nearly withdrawing them. They had the troops in Alexandria when sickness broke out; and then, again, there was the war in the Soudan, and the intention of withdrawing was not carried out. I confess that I began to doubt whether they would ever withdraw, these circumstances always recurred so frequently, and I divided against every Vote for expenses connected with the occupation. The present Government inherited that position of affairs. The troops were in Egypt, and I have not seen the present Government evince the slightest vestige of an intention to make the occupation a temporary one. On the contrary, it appears to me that they intend that the troops shall remain there as long as the Government remain in office; and I presume they hope that their tenure of office is a long one. Indeed, judging from what is said in their organs and in their speeches, it seems to be almost assumed that Egypt practically belongs to this country—the idea of temporary occupation gradually fading. During the Ministry of my right hon. Friend a plea for remaining was that Egypt had no efficient Army of her own, but now it seems that the fellahs are making pretty good soldiers, while there are also the black troops under British officers, who, judging from the laudations of their recent action at Tokar, give Egypt as good an Army as she is ever likely to have. Now, the question is whether our conduct under these circumstances is legitimate or expedient, putting the question of legality aside. I consider that, in view of the pledges we have given to Europe and the suzerain of Egypt that our occupation would be but temporary, it is a base betrayal of our pledges that we should practically make this occupation permanent. It may be said that it is necessary, and that salus populi suprema lex est, but I contend that by remaining in Egypt we are putting ourselves in an entirely false position with the rest of Europe. It is true that Germany has been induced to give a sort of tacit consent to our occupation, but that has been to put us in a wrong position with France. I believe that there has been some tacit agreement with regard to this between Lord Salisbury and Germany in connection with the Triple Alliance, that Lord Salisbury should do his best, as he did, to induce Italy to join the Triple Alliance. But look at the consequences, see the position we are in in other parts of the world. A little while ago there was a difficulty in Samoa, and Germany behaved improperly in regard to our interest and the interest of the United States. But we dared not do anything, we were under the influence of Germany, and Prince Bismarck has, indeed, said that it is worth while to secure Lord Salisbury's assistance by yielding in Africa. It is surprising that Lord Salisbury should be content to occupy such a position, but this is an example of the consequences of our action in Egypt; in the Samoan difficulty we had to leave everything to the United States Government. Then again, in Newfoundland the French have certain rights; they are not particularly anxious to exercise these, but they say, "We are there by Treaty, and we take advantage of our position, while you, in violation of engagements, remain in occupation of Egypt." It may be said that there are military reasons, and that it is absolutely necessary for the safety of the Suez Canal that we should maintain our occupation. I entirely deny that; I think that the Suez Canal ought to be neutralised, and that such water-ways should be under international guardianship and control. But, as a matter of fact, by happy hazard we have a position in regard to the Suez Canal possessed by no other country. No ships could come through the Canal and get into the Red Sea, because you would hold the gates. If you happened to be at war with a Foreign Power the probability is—though I do not suggest that you would pay him to do it, or that you would propose that he should do it—that some neutral would sink a ship in the Canal. Knowing the possibility of a neutral sinking a ship, and of keeping both ends of the Canal so as to prevent an enemy from passing through, and knowing the impossibility of an enemy going down the Red Sea, you would send everything round the Cape of Good Hope; if we were at war with a European power, we should not use the Suez Canal, so that Egypt would be as useless to us as the Crimea. Then India is exceedingly distant, and that is a great advantage in retaining our hold upon that Empire. I cannot conceive any policy more absurd than reducing the distance between England and India by bringing troops to Egypt. By that policy, if we are at war, and any nation wants to attack us in the East, we do not wait for them in India, going round by the Cape of Good Hope, but leave an Army in Egypt for them to snap up. We have there 3,320 men. They are nothing—a mere compromising guard. If we were at war we should have to increase the number enormously, and even if we did increase the number enormously, we should be in an extremely false position. If we were at war with France, for instance, France could much more easily throw troops into Egypt than we could—provided she could pass the sea; and if she could not pass the sea the possession of troops in Egypt would be immaterial to us. Looking at it from all points of view, I maintain that we gain nothing and really lose a great deal by this occupation of Egypt. But that is not all. Egypt has no troops on her southern frontier. She there meets the barbarism of Africa, and you will probably continue to have troops pressing on that frontier, and you will, probably, be continually getting into difficulties with those tribes, and, so long as you are there, you will be forced into military operations at a very great cost to the British Treasury and of British blood, and that, too, in regard to matters as to which we have no real concern. And is our action to the advantage of Egypt? It is immaterial to me whether it is or not. I can conceive that some province of China might be better governed if we sent out Commissioners and an Army and highly-paid officials to occupy it and govern it; but that would not be our business. Our business is to see that the people are protected and properly governed in our own Empire, and I have no belief in this universal philanthropy, which usually means a scheme to take money out of the pockets of the British taxpayer, and put it into the pockets of somebody else who lives on the British taxpayer. That is what took place in Egypt. I admit that the administration there is better than it was in the time of Ismail Pacha, but you are destroying the patriotism of the country. [Laughter]. An hon. Member opposite sneers at what he thinks the poor Egyptian's want of patriotism. I admit that the Egyptian has not much now, owing to your efforts to destroy it, but you are aware as well as I that in the time of Arabi Pacha there was some little patriotism in the Egyptian. Well, what have you done with him? Have you given him Constitutional Government? Have you trained him in representative institutions? No! You have placed him more and more under tutelage and made him more of a child than he was before, and if you went away to-morrow there would be less chance of his having sound Constitutional Government now than before your arrival. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was at the head of the Government, Minister after Minister used to rise up and speak about training the Egyptian and making him a free and independent and constitutional being. But did they so train him? Not they! The first thing a person so trained would do, would be to turn out an alien race attempting to rule over him. Why do we remain in Egypt? We are acting in the basest manner in doing so. We are violating all our pledges; we are putting ourselves in a false position. I take it there are two reasons why we remain there. One is that the old Jingo feeling still lives. The Secretary for War, I have no doubt, agrees with what I am saying, but he has not the moral courage to say we are going to evacuate Egypt. The other reason is that, if the occupation ceases, Egyptian bonds will come down, and every one knows perfectly well that there is a very powerful representative of the bond holders, who once was not a Conservative, but has gone over to the Conservatives, and has, no doubt, made his terms with them—every labourer is worthy of his hire. The Government have taken over this gentleman, and they insist on his bond holding policy being pursued. The bonds might go down, and that is the only reason, except this general love of Jingoism, which leads us to remain in Egypt. These troops are not only employed in Egypt proper. When we went to Egypt we entered into an engagement—I do not know with whom, but I suppose with ourselves—to defend certain ports of the Red Sea; and there have been during the last five years three or four most outrageous and wicked massacres in the neighbourhood of Suakin. I never understood myself why we should defend Suakin. It is not really a part of Egypt. It is part of the Soudan, and when we gave up the Soudan—and it will be remembered that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian spoke about the Soudanese being men who were “rightly struggling to be free”—I do not know why we should remain at the port of Suakin. The slave trade has been trotted out as an excuse, but there is nothing to be gained in that direction by maintaining the Egyptians in the Red Sea ports. The fact is, it is a case of J’y suis, J’y reste. Two years ago a deputation waited on Lord Salisbury, and they were assured that no attempt would be made to get beyond Suakin. When the noble Lord the Member for Paddington moved the adjournment of the House on the occasion of the last battle, or whatever it is called, the House was assured that the operations were only undertaken in order to prevent an attack on Suakin; but from the newspapers this morning we find that

Mr. Labouchere

Mr. Labouchere

Tokar has been attacked—a place 40 miles from Suakin. The position was this: The tribes in the neighbourhood of Suakin were at one time fed through the merchants in that place. These people were mainly porters, their principle business being to carry goods between Suakin and Kassala and interior places. When you interfered with their trade, and tried to starve out the whole of the Soudanese, you deprived these people of their occupation. The Protection of Aborigines Society sent £1,500 to feed these people, but they were told that they could not feed the people. That I understand was done by the desire of General Kitchener, when both Sir E. Barry and Sir F. Grenfell were absent from Egypt. At any rate the thing was done. Dr. Harper, the Missionary, has told us how the distressed people were put outside the forts on the plea that cholera had broken out, and General Haig has described the suffering these people have had to endure through being driven outside the Egyptian military cordon. You turned the people out and insisted that no goods were to be allowed to enter the Soudan, and then because they turned to the dervishes for protection—as they could do nothing else—you slaughter them. The recent fight at Tokar is spoken of as “a glorious victory,” but to my mind it was a cruel massacre. On the side of the Egyptians there were 12 men killed, whereas on the other side 700 corpses were left behind, and as the dead were in many cases carried away, the killed may be put down at 1,000. And what was all this slaughter for? Because Osman Digna is in occupation of Tokar, and Tokar is 40 miles from Suakin. But no doubt Osman Digna will collect his forces and occupy some place 40 miles or less from Tokar. Will that be considered a reason for attacking him there? There is no doubt it will, and I point to this as showing what must be the inevitable consequences of our maintaining this garrison in Egypt. We encourage the Egyptians—in fact, I think the Egyptian Government is a dummy, and that when we talk of the Egyptians we are talking of Her Majesty’s Government. But, be that as it may, we are no doubt responsible for what I can only call most scandalous atrocities. We seem to think that English morality and justice can be quite different in different parts of the world. What would be said of the Russian, or any other European, Government if it were to cause a massacre of this sort with the loss of only a dozen men? There would be an outcry in every newspaper of the country. Now, I want a clear understanding on this matter. If the right hon. Gentleman will give us a definite assurance that within six months the last English soldier will leave Egypt, or that he will at once enter into negotiations with Europe in order to promote that neutrality of Egypt which ought to exist when we withdraw from it, I shall not ask the House to divide. But if we are to be simply told that this permanent occupation of Egypt is a temporary occupation, and that we are to go on year after year encouraging these raids in the Soudan, it will be my duty to divide against the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 150,376, all ranks, be maintained for the said Service."—(Mr. Lubouchere.)

*(8.21.) SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): I am sure the Committee must have listened with great attention to the speech of my hon. Friend. I was one of those who from the first took great objection to the manner in which we proceeded in Egypt. Although I was a supporter of the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone), I felt that it committed a great and fundamental error in the bombardment of Alexandria, and during the war in the Soudan I was one of those who constantly objected to the proceedings of the Government. I quite feel with my hon. Friend that the time has come when we ought to know what our liabilities are in Egypt. There is one point to which my hon. Friend did not allude. I should like to ask what would have been the result if the Egyptian troops had been defeated at Tokar, instead of having gained a victory? Would the English troops have had to be sent down from Egypt to reinforce them? Are the English troops to do all the dirty work of the slaughtering of the poor people of the Soudan when the Egyptians are defeated, as they did before? We had to give up the idea of conquering the Soudan for Egypt, and we made Egypt adopt a policy which seemed to be a sound national policy, namely, that of treating Wady Halfa as the southern boundary of the country she desired to defend. We departed from that policy, however, when we sent a small garrison to Suakin.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): We have no English soldiers at Suakin.

*SIR J. PEASE: Well, I think that makes the matter worse; because whilst we are doing all we can for Egypt proper we allow her troops to run wild in the Soudan, and to run the risk of involving us again in all the loss of money and credit which we have experienced in past times. I hope Her Majesty's Government are not so absurd as to wish, like the Government which preceded them, to go from Suakin to Berber. If we can now leave Egypt to its own resources, we shall have done a great deal for it, without getting any other benefit than we obtain from other civilised countries; but if we are going to remain in Egypt in order to allow Egyptian soldiers to fight in the Soudan, I must enter my protest against such a course. I should like to say one word on another point. During the last few years, under both Administrations, the Army Estimates have gone on steadily increasing. We seem to have had lately a very quiet and peaceable foreign policy. No one can accuse Lord Salisbury, during the present Administration, of having rushed blindly into war, but the Army Estimates continue to increase. The Reserves have mounted up; the Militia has been strengthened; and the Volunteers have become a larger and a better Force than was the case when I first began to study these Estimates, and the cost of the Army has grown larger and larger. Of course, I shall be told by the right hon. Gentleman opposite that Europe is filled with armed men. It is perfectly true that Russia, Germany, and France are filled with enormous Armies; but I want to know which of these Powers we are afraid of. Do you expect that Germany, or France, or Russia are going to invade us? We are surely not going to take part in quarrels between Germany and France or Germany and Russia. We adopted a policy of peace when Germany and France were at war, and the country profited morally as well as pecuniarily during that period. The policy of Lord Salisbury has been one of non-interference with other countries; and surely a policy of peace and good neighbourhood with our neighbours in Europe is one which does not require large standing armies in addition to large fleets. During a time of peace the present Administration has had its hands full of the question of pestilential barracks, and of the difficulties of raising and dealing with large numbers of soldiers. At the present moment our Army, irrespective of our Indian troops, with the Militia and Volunteers, numbers between 500,000 and 600,000 men. The use of so large an Army I am quite unable to conceive. (8.30.)

* (9.3.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: It may appear somewhat surprising that I should be called upon to intervene in a Debate on the Army Estimates, and especially in the case of so small a reduction as has been moved by the hon. Member for Northampton; but I freely admit that it is not unreasonable to connect with it the question of our occupation in Egypt, of our influence there, and of the duration and object of that occupation. The hon. Member has not brought forward his criticisms on the policy which underlay our occupation of Egypt for the first time. The House has been favoured before with many of the arguments which have been used to-night. The hon. Member, no doubt, has been a consistent opponent of the policy which Her Majesty's Government inherited—they certainly did not initiate it—and from which they have not swerved. The hon. Member referred to our position in Egypt as a false position. I do not wish to enter into more detail than the subject requires; but some few remarks I must make in defence of our position in answer to the attacks which have been made upon it. The hon. Member says that we do not act independently in any part of the world, and that questions in which other nations are involved enter everywhere into our relations. But that is the penalty we pay for having a worldwide Empire. Undoubtedly, owing to the enterprise of our people, we have possessions in every part of the world; but we do not aspire to exclusive possession; we must have neighbours, and we desire to live in harmony with them. Nevertheless, there must be rivalry, and it is our duty as politicians to deal with such rivalries, to avoid friction, and occasions of collision, and to come to honourable agreements and understandings with them. With regard to Newfoundland, I hope we shall be able to arrive at a solution of the difficulties which have arisen, without reference to the duties which our position impose upon us in other parts of the world. The hon. Member asks why the Suez Canal has not been neutralised. The Powers of Europe have entered into a Conference on the freedom of passage of the Canal, and arrangements were made by which not only mercantile ships, but the ships of war of all nations were secured a right of passage. And as to concentrating our attention upon our own Empire, I take it that we never interfere elsewhere unless British interests require it. Were so narrow a policy followed as that which the hon. Member advocates I am afraid our interests would greatly suffer, as we should have no friends. The hon. Gentleman asks what we have done for Egypt. We have done a great deal. Papers were laid before the House in the beginning of last Session which showed what we have done, and which gave a graphic picture of the improvements which have been effected in Egypt during the last seven years. The year 1889 was stated to have been the most satisfactory year in the history of Egypt, and Sir Evelyn Baring, commenting on that statement in the Memorandum, pointed out that an equilibrium had been attained, that the struggle for years past between solvency and insolvency had resulted in a condition of affairs which we never could have hoped for a few years before and that there was a surplus of £200,000, and he expressed great hopes for the future. In the interval since then these hopes have been fully realised, for the surplus which in the beginning of 1890 was £200,000 has been succeeded by one of more than £600,000 when the transactions of last year were closed. I venture to think that that is a proof, not only of the extraordinary elasticity of Egypt's resources, but also of the results of British influence upon the government of that country. When we remember that only six years ago Egypt was unable to meet her engagements, and that now she has not only resumed full payments, but has paid the interest which had been suspended, and is beyond the reach of financial embarrassment without increasing, but, on the contrary, having largely diminished, the burdens of the people, I think the results must be considered highly satisfactory. There has been a vast increase in the extent of land brought under irrigation, and peasantry pay their land assessments with greater ease, and the prosperity of the people has been advanced in very many material respects. The hon. Member has touched upon the subject of the recent advance upon Tokar, with respect to which I answered a question early in the evening. Indeed, it also formed the chief subject of the speech of the hon. Member for the Barnard Castle Division, who objects to the whole of our policy in Egypt, and particularly to the military operations, which far too often have been rendered imperative. The hon. Member asked what would have happened if the Egyptian troops had been defeated at Tokar. That is a question which might be asked in regard to any military operations. When it is necessary to undertake operations with a moderate force which is deemed to be sufficient by the military advisers, and when the expedition results in a conspicuous success and in the complete fulfilment of its object, it is rather too late to ask what would have happened if the troops had been unsuccessful. The fact is success was ensured by the prudence of the arrangements and gallantry of the troops. When we remember what has occurred in our own times, and how stubborn a foe our own troops have met in those regions, it must be admitted that the expedition could not have been brought to such a successful conclusion without good tactics and valour on the part of those employed. The hon. Member expressed regret for the loss of life that occurred in the action. General regret will be felt for the sufferings of a gallant enemy, as well as for the valuable lives which have been lost on our side; but if the necessities of the situation require warlike operations such losses cannot be avoided. I cannot allow the operations which have been carried on to be spoken of as if they were gratuitous. This movement on Tokar has been advocated by all Egyptian authorities. While there has been a difference of opinion as to the policy to be pursued on the Red Sea littoral, as to opening or closing of trade, there has been no difference of opinion as to the occupation of Handoub and Tokar. It has been pointed out by those most anxious to open up the trade of the country that it is necessary to take possession of those places, which furnish the supplies that enable the enemy to make a fresh descent, when they are disposed to do so, on the outposts of Suakin. All agreed that this expedition to Tokar and the occupation of Tokar and Handoub were absolutely necessary, and for a long time past it has been pointed out. [Mr. J. MORLEY: How long?] For more than a year past. It has been pointed out for a long time past that this oasis of Tokar furnished a most convenient base for the operating Dervish forces, not only against Suakin, but for keeping up a constant system of persecution and raiding the inhabitants, while Handoub was also a source of annoyance, and was used as a base of operations for the Slave Trade. Within the last month a large cargo of slaves at Handoub was only prevented from being embarked by the active proceedings taken by one of Her Majesty's commanders, who, having notice of the intention, slipped across the Red Sea and prevented the embarkation, and the occupation of Handoub caused the attempt to be abandoned altogether. The hon. Member for Durham asked whether, having now occupied Tokar, the troops will not go on and occupy some further point. I am very glad he has given me an opportunity of answering him on that point. Tokar is so situated that it forms a very convenient place for an attack on Suakin, as well as a more convenient outpost for Suakin, because it is situated 200 miles from any other place of the same character—Kassala on the one hand, and Berber on the other. It is an extremely good outpost, and does not tempt the force that occupies it to attempt to go further. More than that, Tokar is a district which is peculiarly calculated to revive trade and industry in the Eastern Soudan. In fact, it has been described by those advocating its occupation as being the key to the Eastern Soudan. Only eight years ago the region of Tokar furnished about 175,000 cwt. annually of cotton of the finest staple, and superior to that of Egypt proper. It is also rich in the production of the food grains of the country; so that at the time when the population of Suakin was 12,000, not only did it easily provide for the sustenance of that population, but it also supplied a great deal for export. The region in the neighbourhood of Suakin will now be capable of being cultivated instead of being constantly exposed to the ravages of the Dervishes, which rendered it unsafe even for the poor man to cut wood in the bush. Those are the chief reasons why Her Majesty's Government did not object to the occupation of Tokar. No doubt the publicity which is so often given to military operations in this country, and where British influence extends, gave the Dervishes time to collect in greater numbers than those which had occupied Tokar for some time past; but there is no doubt that the military commanders rightly estimated the force required for the purpose, and if they gained the action by the timely and active occupation of certain cover, all military actions are gained by the skilful use of the ground. The larger part of the question upon which the hon. Member for Northampton has based his Amendment has been the occupation of Egypt by British troops, and the continuation of British influence there. He has spoken as if that occupation is to be permanent, and he has expressed incredulity of the professions made from time to time by Her Majesty's Government on that head. If that be seriously said, it may be necessary once more to assert the converse proposition, and to state what the policy of the Government has been, and what it is to be. I say they have given ample proofs of their intention that their occupation and their direct influence in Egypt shall not be permanent. When in the Wolff Convention they reluctantly agreed to set a term to this occupation, it was not without misgiving that their present mission would be thereby endangered; but with a sincere desire to remove the natural objections of the Sultan, and probably the susceptibilities of other Powers, they fixed a date to that occupation, but attaching to the undertaking a distinct condition that in case Egypt was exposed to internal disorders or external dangers they should be free to resume their occupation. I do not think it requires much to show that that was a most necessary condition. The Government have always been opposed to the policy of fixing a final date to the influence exercised by them in Egypt, and to their power of watching over the development and restoration of Egypt's prosperity. We have never maintained that it is necessary for the stability and strength of Egypt that the occupation shall be permanent, nor that it is necessary that, if British troops and agents are withdrawn from it, they shall return there. We hope that the measures which have so far been successful in strengthening the improvement in Egypt will be so increased that Egypt will be in the truest sense independent, that good government will prevail there, and the country be no longer in danger of foreign occupation. We have consistently expressed ourselves as desirous of withdrawing from Egypt whenever the condition of things, administrative, financial, and military, is such that a withdrawal can be safely performed. But there is a great difference between intimating an intention to withdraw and withdrawing before all the world when the state of things justifies it, and giving an undertaking to withdraw—an undertaking which would probably defeat its own object in checking the restoration of Egypt, and in drying up the springs of improvement that have so freely begun to flow. I ask the Committee to consider whether the undertaking to abandon Egypt at a fixed date, in whatever form it might be couched, would not have checked every investment, every measure of improvement, and would have encouraged those who were interested in the anarchy of the country to lay their plans for the future, to wait their opportunity to undo the good that has been done, and possibly necessitate further interference.

Sir J. Pease

Sir J. Fergusson

What chance would Egypt have had of converting her debt and reducing her interest had the financiers of Europe not had confidence that the occupation by this country would be prolonged?

MR. LABOUCHERE: They would not have paid at all.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It might also be said that "base is the slave who pays." This country has taught Egypt better things; it has enabled her to bear her onerous responsibilities, and to place herself in a sound financial position. The burden of her debt has been reduced owing to the confidence entertained in the continued guardianship of Her Majesty's Government. These considerations, I think, will probably not be seriously disputed. Her Majesty's Government remain, as they have been hitherto, looking forward to their ultimate withdrawal from the country. But a mission has fallen to them, not of their own seeking, but by the accident of their position. It was not undertaken by Her Majesty's present advisers; it fell to their predecessors partly from the force of circumstances and partly from the inaction of others, from whom co-operation might have been expected. That mission has been pursued eminently to the advantage of the people of Egypt, with full consideration for the rights of other nations. That mission will be pursued until its objects have been accomplished, and then we may withdraw in the hope that we have conferred permanent good on the country, have given liberty to its people, stability to its Government, prosperity to its finances, and security against occupation in the future.

*(9.30.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I think those who remember the speech the right hon. Gentleman made in December last must feel some amount of commiseration for him to-night, because he has practically, so far as Suakin is concerned, unsaid all he and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War said at that time. I should like to contrast the position of Her Majesty's Government to-day with the position they held at the time the last expedition was undertaken to Suakin. On December 17, 1888, the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken in favour of advancing to Tokar, which is 40 miles or more from Suakin, assured the Committee there was no intention of doing more than to defend Suakin. It is quite clear that the House was led into approving those operations on the emphatic assurances given by the right hon. Gentleman, and also by the First Lord of the Treasury, that nothing more was meant than a defensive operation. Lord Salisbury about the same time gave public assurances that nothing was intended beyond the gates of Suakin. What has become of that policy? Then as to our objects in Suakin. The House, the country, and foreign observers were assured that the retention and defence of Suakin were intended to prevent the Slave Trade. Now, the right hon. Gentleman has completely transformed the situation. To-night, instead of talking about preventing the Slave Trade, the right hon. Gentleman talks about opening up avenues to inland trade, and of protecting the population. Formerly we were asked only to look seaward. To-night we are told only to look inland. This is a completely new view, and it confirms me and others in the suspicion that we are slipping—not deliberately driving—into the old position of making an inward move into the Soudan. We are allowing the Egyptian troops to push into the Soudan, and we shall have to send our own troops, as we have sent them before, to rescue the Egyptian troops. The right hon. Gentleman has used two inconsistent terms. He has spoken of Tokar as a suitable "outpost" for Suakin, and also as the "key of the Eastern Soudan." Now, which is it to be? Have you taken Tokar in order to protect Suakin, or have you taken it, and are you going to advise the Egyptian Government permanently to retain Tokar, in order to open up new avenues for trade? What the right hon. Gentleman has said is truly alarming. We know very well that at Cairo there is a military party which proclaims that it is indispensable for the safety of Egypt that the frontier of Egypt should not be, as Her Majesty's Government promised in 1888 it should be, namely, at Wady Halfa, but at Khartoum. Al- though the issue is not raised to-night in the most advantageous form, or in one corresponding with its importance, we are raising a protest now because we believe the present course is inevitably destined to land us in disasters as great as those from which we escaped, not very triumphantly, in 1885. As to the considerably larger question raised by the hon. Member for Northampton, I think it will be agreed by hon. Gentlemen opposite that since 1896 the Opposition have never cavilled at any step in the foreign policy of Lord Salisbury. We did not make the Anglo-German Agreement an occasion for attack, and did not offer obstacles to the carrying out of the policy of the Prime Minister in Africa or elsewhere. Therefore, we shall not be suspected of Party motives to-night in calling attention to the position with reference to Egypt which is taken up by the right hon. Gentleman and by Her Majesty's Government. This is a very serious question, and no words ought to be spoken by any of us without the fullest sense of responsibility. But I confess I am by no means satisfied. I ventured to oppose in this House the Egyptian, and especially the Soudanese, policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and I am not disposed to press Her Majesty's Government any more hardly now. I am well aware of all the difficulties by which they are surrounded. Still, I do not find the language of the right hon. Gentleman very satisfactory. Although I am afraid the language used has been heard in the time of the preceding Administration, yet it has been used more frequently by the present Administration. The right hon. Gentleman now tells us we must remain in Egypt until our work is done. When will our work be done? In this part of his speech the right hon. Gentleman took two different lines. He first of all said that financially, militarily, and administratively, and in every other respect, everything in Egypt has gone on admirably. And having made that declaration the right hon. Gentleman went on to argue as if our work was hardly begun. That is a most serious inconsistency. If we are to remain in Egypt until our work is done, in the opinion of every English official and of every English officer at the head of an

Mr. J. Morley

Egyptian regiment, we should have to stay there till the crack of doom. The arguments which are used in favour of an occupation of Egypt have been entirely undermined by the course of events. It used to be argued that we could not leave Egypt because she had a weak, undisciplined, and dangerous military force, such as, under Arabi, had caused the disorder in 1881-2. Now, the Committee are given to understand—and even those painful and detestable evolutions which we have just been discussing shows—that at the present time the Egyptian Army is in good order under British officers, and, therefore, that old argument is, by the admission, and almost boast, of Her Majesty's Government, at an end. Another argument used to turn on the Suez Canal. But the right hon. Gentleman has told the Committee that the state of affairs with regard to the Canal is completely satisfactory. We have the right of transit through it not only for merchant vessels, but also for vessels of war. What more do you want? If there has been an internationalization of the Canal, how are you going to improve the position in that respect? Everybody now believes that if we had trouble in India we should send our material and men round by the Cape, and not through the Canal at all. But be that as it may, we have done all we can in the direction of the neutralisation and internationalisation of the Canal. The right hon. Gentleman talks of the narrow policy of the Opposition, and says we have no friends. It is the Government policy of undefined occupation I call narrow. When you speak of the good we are doing in Egypt, I am not concerned to deny that English administration in Egypt has undoubtedly procured certain advantages for the population of Egypt. The Government have pledged themselves that they will one day come out of Egypt. I am proud to think that Englishmen, wherever they go, do procure certain advantages of good order and honest administration. But do not suppose that your position in Egypt costs nothing. Let those who desire a permanent occupation of Egypt ask themselves whether we, as a nation, would be playing a right part before Europe if we deliberately broke the pledges we have given. I advise the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir R. N. Fowler), who naturally looks at commercial interests, to count up how much it has cost us.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: It costs us nothing.

*MR. J. MORLEY: If so, I can, with a still clearer conscience than before, vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend. Either these 3,200 men are wanted or not; if they are not wanted, I shall vote all the more readily for the Amendment. But that is not what I mean. I think we are playing a bad part before Europe in evading our solemn obligations. We are hampered at every turn by our position in Egypt. Does not everyone know that difficulties in Newfoundland may be created by our position in Egypt, and does not everyone believe it is that position also which gave Germany a hold over us with regard to Zanzibar? Do not let us forget that England with Egypt is a very different Power from England without Egypt, and a far weaker Power. I want to take advantage of this occasion, as I shall of every other that offers, to beg Her Majesty's Government to consider carefully, and with a desire to fulfil the pledges they and their predecessors have given, whether it is not possible to resort to the expedient which was referred to by the right hon. Gentleman himself as being part of an arrangement suggested some time ago, and fix some date at which British troops may be withdrawn from Egypt, and so lessen those very grave responsibilities in Europe to which the presence of the troops conduce. I would ask them to consider whether their present responsibilities are not felt by them to hamper them in most important transactions; and whether the moment when we prudently, wisely, and in conformity with our own pledges leave Egypt, is not a moment which, instead of weakening us and lowering our prestige before Europe, will greatly strengthen our material power and enlarge our diplomatic influence in Europe.

*(9.55.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I am bound to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that we are discussing Army Estimates, and that there is not a single penny in the Army Estimates which affects the main subject of the discussion—the expedition to Tokar. As regards the cost of the troops maintained in Egypt, we are paying the actual cost of the troops if maintained in this country, where they would have to be maintained in any case, and any extra cost incurred is paid by the Government of Egypt. I am, therefore, not going to waste the time of the Committee in following hon. Members through a great many of the topics on which they have spoken. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) said he had made 200 speeches on the question before. There must have been 200 replies to those speeches, and those replies seem to have pretty well exhausted the subject. His complaint was that since Her Majesty's Government came into office in 1886 they have taken no steps towards withdrawing from Egypt. Well, at the beginning of 1886 there were 18,000 British soldiers in Egypt; when we came into office there were 10,000; when I myself came into office at the beginning of the next year there were 8,000, and they have since been reduced to 3,000. That, I think, is an earnest of our desire at the earliest moment, consistently with our pledges and obligations, to withdraw our forces. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle has said the speech of my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs constituted a remarkable departure from the pledges we have given on this subject. I altogether fail to see any such departure. He has said, in the most explicit terms, that when our work was done we should withdraw from Egypt. My right hon. Friend gave instances of the manner in which we have improved the finances of Egypt. When my right hon. Friend gave instances of how the administration and condition of Egypt are improved he was showing the progress our work was making, and that we were so much nearer the time when that work would be done and our troops could be withdrawn. The right hon. Gentleman has declared that the operations in the neighbourhood of Tokar are inconsistent with the statements I made in December, 1888, when we defined the limits of our operations and said that it was not intended to advance beyond Suakin but the fact is, that it became necessary to drive away the Dervishes from the immediate vicinity of Suakin, and that could only be accomplished by attacking their strongholds in the neighbourhood. I fail to see that there is the smallest difference between my declarations of 1888 and the policy that has just been so successfully carried out for the purpose of freeing Suakin from the presence of the hostile Dervishes, and to enable us to assist most effectually in putting down the Slave Trade, which the right hon. Gentleman himself some years ago explained was one of the main objects of our occupying Suakin.

*MR. J. MORLEY: Just the contrary. I denied it altogether.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have not the quotation before me. However, I say in addition to the suppression of the Slave Trade this advance was rendered necessary in order to prevent the friendly tribes in the neighbourhood of Suakin suffering from starvation, and to enable the trade in the district to be thrown open through that port. The Committee are perfectly aware that Her Majesty's Government have done their best to open up the trade of the interior through Suakin. I remember that in the discussion that took place on this subject in 1888 the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian said, "What I want you to do is to bring the local tribes within the circle of your movement." That is exactly what Her Majesty's Government have been endeavouring to do. For instance, two of these tribes who had formerly been most hostile to us—the Hadendawas and the Amaras—are now in the most friendly relations with the British Government, and actually assisted us against the Dervishes who came from a distance to attack the town, whilst none of the local tribes took any part against us. The steps that have been recently taken are therefore for the interest of both Egypt and Great Britain. The right hon. Gentleman said that the forward movement had been undertaken to satisfy the ambition of the military party at Cairo, but I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that that is not the case. It is true that the military advisers of the Egyptian Government were in favour of these operations being undertaken, but so were the civil advisers. There was no difference of opinion among the advisers of the Khedive, because they recognised that it was absolutely impossible to leave Suakin in the position it occupied with hostile tribes swarming up to its gates and scoffing at the defenders without making an effort to clear the neighbourhood from marauders in the interest of permanent peace. If it should be necessary that the occupation of any of these advanced posts should become permanent, that occupation can be carried out without any strain being thrown upon the British troops, seeing that the Egyptian Army is capable of doing all the work that would be required. I do not think that Her Majesty's Government would have been at all disposed to sanction any operations in the Soudan unless they believed that the Egyptian Army is equal to the strain. After the lessons of 1885, which Her Majesty's present Government remember well, they would be guilty of the most culpable folly if they were to repeat the errors of their predecessors. We hope that we are avoiding that policy, but the steps which have been recently taken have been suggested by a desire to protect Suakin and to put a stop to the constant attacks upon peaceable traders, and it is intended that they shall be strictly limited to accomplishing those two objects. I believe that the operations that have been carried out will be for the advantage of Egypt and will tend to secure the peace of the district.

Mr. E. Stanhope

(10.20.) SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I mean to vote for the Motion of my hon. Friend, to reduce the number of men in Egypt. I am not one of those who think that the British Army is too large; on the contrary, I think it is probably not large enough to defend the Empire. Therefore, I very much object to the employment of our troops where they are not necessary. I will not go into the original question of the occupation. Successive Governments resisted the desire of the Egyptian Government to occupy the Soudan, but at last the Government yielded to the desire with disastrous consequences. It seems to me that if the Egyptian

Army is now so efficient that it can indulge in the luxury, if I may call it so, of re-occupying districts in the Soudan, then the time has come when the British troops are no longer necessary for the protection of Egypt, and they might safely be withdrawn. On the other hand, while I am glad to believe there is a considerable and efficient Egyptian Army, if the Egyptian troops are pushed forward into the Soudan the result will be that we shall retain the British troops in Egypt at the expense of the British taxpayer for an indefinite period. I know the Financial Secretary has declared across the Table that the troops in Egypt do not cost the taxpayers anything; but though the Egyptian Government do pay some £25 a head for additional expenses, yet still a heavy expense falls upon the British taxpayer in connection with this Force. The gross amount of the expenditure on these troops falling upon the Exchequer reaches, I should think, £500,000 at least. It is said that if the troops were not in Egypt they would be elsewhere, but I deny this. Being so many this number of troops have to be added to the numbers of the British Army; and should there be defeat of Egyptian troops in the Soudan, or an invasion of the country, these troops would have to be reinforced. The British Army is the reserve of these troops, and I protest against the British Army being turned at the cost of the taxpayers of this country into a reserve for the British troops that are employed in Egypt. I know there has been a continued hankering on the part of British officers engaged in Egypt after a reconquest of the Soudan, and there has also been that hankering on the part of Egyptian Ministers. But up to the present successive Governments have resisted that policy. In the last Debate Her Majesty's Government expressly declared that their policy in regard to the Soudan was to confine operations to Suakin. I extracted a promise that the troops should not be permitted to go to Handoub, seven miles from Suakin, and yet now they have gone to Tokar, 60 miles, I believe, from Suakin, for this advance, and the consequence is this country is practically responsible. It is said that this policy was forced upon us because Suakin was the subject of continual attack, but I deny that altogether. I have followed this policy throughout, and it has invariably happened, when raids were made in the neighbourhood of Suakin, that those raids had been provoked and egged on by English officers in Suakin. I assert it is so, and that is probably equally the history of the present expedition. I refuse to believe that the tribes formerly hostile are now friendly, and I ask for the evidence of the allegation. I cannot help connecting this policy with another very different part of Egyptian policy, for I suspect that the advance on Tokar has been thrown out as a sop to overcome the resistance offered by the Egyptian Minister to the scheme for the improved administration of justice. The Committee are told that we are gradually retiring from Egypt, but I do not think that is really so. The whole British Army is still at the back of the British troops there, ready in case they should be wanted. Not one step is being taken in the way of withdrawing from Egypt; on the contrary, there is a great deal of truth in the assertion of the French that every step taken is towards Anglicising the Administration. I maintain that the Egyptian Army, having now reached such a point of efficiency, is quite equal to the protection of Egypt proper. By taking the aggressive they are postponing sine die the period when the British troops can be withdrawn. With this view I shall vote for the Motion of my hon. Friend.

*(10.24.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I think we have had a full discussion, and I now make an appeal to the Committee to allow the Vote to be taken now. There has been a very full discussion of a very important question, and there will be many other opportunities during the course of the present Session, when we shall hear the same speeches from right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite. I trust the Committee will allow a Division to be taken now upon the Amendment, believing that the discussion on the present occasion has been sufficient to justify that request.

(10.25.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman has not heard much of the Debate, and is not aware of its importance.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I have heard a great part of the Debate, and I am quite aware of the importance of the subject.

*DR. CLARK: I have given notice of an Amendment, which has been drawn by the Under Secretary into this discussion. My Amendment raises the question who should pay for the troops, while the Amendment of my hon. Friend asserts that the troops are not necessary. For my own part, I did not think that two Debates would be necessary, but I consulted my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, who thought the wisest step was to put down both Amendments, the one affirming that the men were not required, and the other, in the event of the former being negatived, raising the question as to who should pay for them. From a European standpoint our honour is engaged to leave Egypt. Nine years ago Lord Dufferin gave the solemn pledge that we were only going to Egypt to restore order, and seven years ago the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale in this House indicated six months as the period for our withdrawal. But to-night we have had a statement from the Under Secretary which, truly interpreted, comes to this: that British troops will remain in Egypt till the millennium. Their prolonged stay there is in flagrant contradiction of former declarations of Her Majesty's Government. I expected to hear from the leaders of the Opposition some statement of policy in reference to Egypt, because they were responsible for our going to that country in the first instance, which I believed to be the greatest crime against liberty during the last quarter of a century. What might have been done was to neutralise Egypt precisely as Belgium has been neutralised by the Great Powers of Europe; and though I do not approve of the policy as applied to Belgium, still it is better than this we are pursuing in Egypt, remaining in occupation because we choose to think that if we withdraw some other Power will enter into occupation. We have been told of the benefit our presence in Egypt has caused, but we have not been told of the harm we have done. We have intervened on behalf of the bondholders, the Egyptian people having no more responsibility for the loan than the people of Great Britain would be responsible for a loan raised by the Prince of Wales. There was a portion of the loan which the Egyptians were responsible for, and to get sanction for borrowing that money this man Ismail had to call together the Egyptian Parliament. The Egyptian Chamber never proposed to interfere with the money under the Controllers; all they asked for was the right of voting that portion of the Budget relating to their own country. Nevertheless, this country intervened, saying that if this attempt at controlling the money so raised were persisted in we should be compelled to resort to armed interference. Have we done anything to bring about self-government in Egypt? We know what Lord Dufferin did. He went there and wanted to re-constitute the Chamber, but even that reform has not been carried out by the Khedive and his advisers. Then, again, you are to-night attempting to defend the policy of going outside Egypt; I refer to the action now being taken in the Eastern Soudan. I do not know what you are doing there at all. I suppose it is the old story which we have always heard in these cases—you are putting down the Slave Trade. I never knew any proposal to grind anybody's axe, or to grab anybody's territory, without hearing the same pretext put forward. You want to put a stop to slavery and prevent slaves from entering the Egyptian and Turkish harems. You can easily do this by preventing the slaves from entering Egyptian territory; but it would seem that the main supporters of the Slave Trade are those who are now voting in the Councils of the Khedive. We have just succeeded in murdering a thousand or so of the unfortunate Soudanese on this pretext. We have always been told how easily Suakin was defended; but now we are urged to remain there for the purpose of crippling the Slave Trade, because Suakin is so defenceless. Then we are advised to take Tokar, Handoub, Trinkitat, and the whole of that section of the Eastern Soudan. But there is another pretext besides that of the Slave Trade, and it will, perhaps, be more popular with some Members on this side of the House, because it relates to the development of a trade in which their constituents are engaged. Tokar is the key of the Eastern Soudan, and we are occupying Tokar to strengthen Suakin and open the door of the Soudan to our trade. We are told also that the frontier tribes, who used to be our most bitter enemies, are now assisting us against the Dervishes. Whither does this argument lead? The result will be that you will have to go on, step by step, into the interior of the country, ever advancing to put down the resisting Dervishes until, in the end, you will be again obliged to occupy equatorial Africa. This is what those in Cairo want. They say that without Khartoum Cairo cannot be controlled, nor Egypt rendered safe, and the result will be that you will end by replacing on the people of the Soudan the horrible Turkish and Egyptian yoke. The best policy you can pursue would be to direct the Egyptians to retire from Suakin altogether, and come to terms with the de facto rulers of the district. Hand over Suakin to Osman Digna, and withdraw the Egyptian troops altogether. What are you occupying the district for? It is said that Italy wants Kassala and Berber, and is afraid it may lose its hold on that district. It is, therefore, preferring a claim against that of Egypt; but as to ourselves, I say that our policy is to retire altogether. We have no business there. The Suakin district is no portion of Egypt; and if we want to develop our trade there, we ought to do it in the only practical way—by coming to terms with the de facto rulers. We have no right to attempt to prosecute our trade by bringing back the Soudanese under Egyptian and Turkish rule. There is one question which the right hon. Gentleman has omitted. I will put that question, and will answer it myself. What, I ask, would have occurred if the Egyptians had been defeated? Why, you would have sent troops from Cairo to Suakin, from Malta to Cairo, from Great Britain to Malta and Gibraltar. The right hon. Gentleman who has charge of the Estimates takes credit for reducing the amount from 10,000 to 3,300 men; but while you have a corporal's guard at Suakin you will send men from your nearest ports if the life of one of that guard should be endangered. ["Hear, hear" from the Ministerial Benches.]

Dr. Clark

Hon. Members cheer that statement; that is honest; but why do you take credit on the other side? You tell us you are going away, and yet if one man is imperilled you are ready to send any number of men to assist him. We gave this pledge nine years ago: We said that when we had accomplished the work we went there to do we should leave the country. We have done that work; why, then, do we remain? You have put down anarchy in Egypt, and you have re-constructed Egyptian credit on what you regard as satisfactory lines; your Administration is now perfect, if we are to believe the statements of the Under Secretary for India, who so strongly eulogises our Egyptian Administration. Anarchy has ceased, the Army is thoroughly under control, being well developed and thoroughly capable of coping with the Soudanese, and yet we remain. I have been amused with the claims made as to the good we have done in Egypt. A great deal is said about the neutralisation of the Suez Canal. The only real way of neutralising the Canal would be to prevent ships of war from passing through it at all. The only Power which has broken the neutrality of the Canal is England. At the time of the so-called Arabi insurrection we sent troops through the Canal, and yet Turkey and Egypt, who recognise the neutrality of the Canal, allowed those ships to pass through. I am not at all satisfied with the explanation the right hon. Gentleman has given the Committee to-night. If you think France or any other country would come there, then probably you would remain.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Member has misunderstood me. What I said was that we should claim to return if there were any attempt to annex the territory.

MR. LABOUCHERE: No, no.

DR. CLARK: You would claim the right to return if there were any intention on the part of any other Power to invade Egypt. But once you leave that country you will not find it easy to get back. The only things that made it possible for us to go there at all were the name and fame of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, though it was said at the time that such action was a sin against God and man.

You have placed a burden on Britain and a burden on Egypt, though by irrigation works you have done something to make the burden easier, and you have now a revenue of £650,000. Having got the sanction of Europe to go into Egypt, and having now done your work, you can leave, obtaining a guarantee from Europe that no one will undo that work, and that the independence and neutrality of Egypt will be observed just as in the case of Belgium.

(10.48.) MR. LABOUCHERE: Mr. Courtney, I have always been anxious to pursue a conciliatory policy towards Her Majesty's Government. The Committee will, therefore, remember that in moving this reduction I said that if I received satisfactory assurances from Her Majesty's Government I should not press it to a Division. One assurance I asked for was, that Her Majesty's Government would evacuate Egypt within six months, or, if they could not evacuate it in that time, that they would inaugurate negotiations with Foreign Governments in order to make a Treaty placing Egypt under an European neutrality, and thus enable them to leave Egypt. I cannot say that the assurances which have been given to me are satisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs went further than any Government has gone before in telling us that this temporary occupation would be a permanent one. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that the Government of Egypt was a permanent one; that the British Army was permanent; and that Egypt was able, without extra taxation, to pay the expenses of her Administration, besides the huge interest upon the bonds. But he went further, and gave as his reason for staying in Egypt that we should remain there until she was no longer in danger of foreign occupation. [Sir J. FERGUSSON indicated assent.] Well, the right hon. Gentleman admits that. He says that we are to remain in Egypt until, in the estimation of the Government, Egypt is in no danger of foreign occupation. Why, I never heard such reckless words in my life from a Minister of the Crown. By whom is Egypt in danger of foreign occupation beyond us? Neither the Germans nor Russians are going there. No; this is a distinct insult to France.

Dr. Clark

I have observed that the right hon. Gentleman, following in the steps of his respected Chief, never loses in this House an opportunity of indirectly insulting France. Will the right hon. Gentleman withdraw from Egypt if France assures Her Majesty's Government that she has no intention of going to Egypt? No; the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues will not believe France. They say, "We shall remain in Egypt so long as it is likely that some other Power will occupy Egypt, in order to prevent that contingency." Can you interpret the right hon. Gentleman's words in any other way? With regard to the occupation of Tokar, the Government would have no locus standi for the occupation of Egypt unless they started this new idea of further occupation. There are plenty of persons in Cairo and in London who are exceedingly anxious that we should remain in Egypt, and, perceiving the difficulty of Her Majesty's Government, who undertook to leave when our work was done, they pushed on this project of the occupation of Tokar, and, as that place cannot be protected by the guns of the Fleet, a considerable force will be required. They will say, "There are not sufficient Egyptian troops; you must remain here to maintain order." And it would not in the least surprise me if we had troubles in Cairo and Alexandria promoted by these speculators, in order to prevent our coming away. It is gratifying to me to think who will have to vote with me to-night. You, Mr. Courtney, will remember that I brought forward a Resolution in 1880, on the occasion of one of these abominable massacres near Suakin. Who voted with me? All the Conservative Party. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby called it "a dirty trick." I protested at the time; I protest now. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Morley) was one of those dirty tricksters. We here are true to our opinions. Who are going to vote with us to-night? Are hon. Gentlemen opposite going to free themselves from this allegation that they are dirty tricksters? Is my hon. Friend (Mr. Jesse Collings), who voted with me in 1880, going with me to-night? Oh, he is not here; he has already gone to the Lobby. The hon. Member for Bordesley Division voted again and again against Her Majesty's Government. Will he stand to his guns to-night? You know he is a man who never changes his side; he is a man of principle. I hope I shall see hon. Gentlemen opposite go into the Lobby with me. In any case, instead of having received the assurance for which I asked, I have elicited from Her Majesty's Government that they intend, so far as I can see, to remain until Doomsday in Egypt; and, having found that their sly hints that they might some day come away under certain impossible conditions were ill received by their supporters in different parts of the House, I shall certainly press my Amendment to a Division.

(11.0.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 124.—(Div. List, No. 61.)

Original Question again proposed.

*(11.12.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I desire to move the reduction of the Vote by 30,000 men, and I have three reasons why I wish to urge this on the Committee, one of them being what I consider a very special reason: In the first place, I object to the cost of the Army, and think that the money might be more usefully spent in other directions. I do not desire to reduce the pay of the men; on the contrary, I would vote for their receiving more money. My next reason is that this country is doing practically nothing to abolish war and to promote arbitration. [Ironical cheers.] Hon. Members may laugh, but that is one of the points I want to go into. We have a class of men in this country called a West End class, who live by this sort of thing. They live an idle life, and I think we should be doing away with them by promoting arbitration. [Cries of "Divide!"] I hope I may not be interrupted—it should not be forgotten that this Debate has been mainly taken up by hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. I do not mean to say I desire to altogether destroy this West End class, but I want to see them doing useful work instead of spending their time in betting and bacarat playing, which seems to be peculiar to them. The late John Bright, who knew a great deal about this sort of thing—[Loud laughter].—I do not mean to say he knew a great deal about fighting—the late John Bright told us that war was brought about by Imperial and Royal Families. Royal Families learn nothing but the art of fighting. That seems to me to be the most detestable work we as a nation can have to do, and I would like to see them better employed. The American people have set us a good example in this matter. They have said to their Ministers, "We will not have an Army," their ground for that being that experience has taught that if a Government has a large Army they themselves or the officers will find work for it to do. Therefore, though some people hold a contrary opinion, my belief is that if you want to put an end to war you should put an end to the Army. Let those gentlemen from the West End of London go out and fight themselves, and then perhaps they will not be so ready to go to war. My second point, as I have said, is that this country has done nothing towards promoting arbitration. I know we accepted arbitration with the American Government, but that was because we were afraid to go to war with a big Power. We bully little Powers, and do not talk about arbitration with them, but we are prepared to arbitrate in the case of a big Power like the United States. I desire to see this country declare itself in favour of arbitration as an example to other Powers. Arbitration is a matter on which something ought to be done, and until the Government do something in that direction, they will not, in my opinion, be doing their duty. Let them throw overboard these titled classes at the West End of London; they are no good to anyone. Let them, instead of fighting, emigrate these people to the backwoods of Canada, or to Australia. My third point, and one upon which I shall dwell a little longer, is the question of keeping soldiers in Ireland. I have no objection to quartering soldiers in Ireland. What I object to is their occupation. We were told in 1885 by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) that there are 30,000 soldiers in Ireland permanently encamped as in a hostile country. I object to the 30,000 soldiers in Ireland on that ground. I also object to soldiers being employed to assist in the collection of rents. That is undoubtedly why these men are kept there. They cannot get soldiers to collect rents in England. If I asked for soldiers to collect my rents, the Secretary for War would tell me he had none to lend me. Then, I say, we have no right to employ them for that purpose in Ireland. It may be said that if these men are not kept in Ireland, they must be kept somewhere else, and that, as a matter of fact, these men are sent to Ireland as a matter of convenience. But that is not correct; for everyone knows the soldiers are kept in Ireland for the purpose of overaweing the people and for the sake of governing the country as a conquered country. That I object to; and I say that these soldiers are absolutely lost to us, and should be removed. I object to soldiers being employed in carrying out cruel and wicked evictions, and assisting landlords to collect their rents. That is most degrading work, and must be very hateful to the soldiers themselves. Then the soldiers are used for the purpose of interfering with the rights and liberties of the people—for stopping public meetings, for instance. That, also, I object to; and taking all these things together, I say I have good ground for moving a reduction in the Army. I may not carry my Motion now. [Cheers.] It is all very well to cheer that; but the time is coming when I shall carry it.

Motion made, and Question put, "That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 123,696, all ranks, be maintained for the said Service."—(Mr. Morton.)

(11.25.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 25; Noes 142.—(Div. List, No. 62.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £5,632,700, be granted to Her Majesty to defray the Charge of the Pay, Allowances, and other Charges of Her Majesty's Army at Home and Abroad (exclusive of India) (General Staff, Regiments, Reserve, and Departments), which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1892."

(11.35.) DR. CLARK: In moving the Amendment which stands in my name, I should like to point out why the British taxpayer ought not to pay for the occupation of Egypt. My contention is that the bondholders should pay for the useful work which is being done by the British troops in Egypt, for good interest is being secured to them. Were the Egyptian people wealthy no doubt they ought to be called upon to pay. But we know that this occupation took place in the interests and for the benefit of the bondholders, whose case was taken in hand by Messrs. Fruhling and Goschen, and I say that that firm ought to pay for the man in possession. We are now told that the Egyptians in their last financial year had a surplus of £650,000. We know that they are saving £300,000 a year by the conversion of their debt, and that this is one of the results of British intervention. Surely the people who are benefitting by it should pay the cost, and not the unfortunate British taxpayer. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War has said, somewhat irregularly, that we pay nothing at all in respect of the occupation of Egypt, but may I draw his attention to a Return, signed by "Edward Stanhope," and presented to Parliament, which shows in the amount included in the Army Estimates for military purposes in the colonies there is a sum of £135,000 for the pay of the General Staff and other expenses in connection with Egypt. If you look at the final total you will find you are going to spend over £300,000 this year in Egypt. The last Return given to this House set the cost per man maintained there at about £105, and of this Egypt pays only £25, the other £80 being defrayed by the British taxpayer. The Secretary for War suggested that we required these men, and that it was immaterial whether they were stationed in Egypt or in Cork or in Scotland. But that is not the case. How do we treat our colonies? If we look at the Return we find that the Mauritius pays us £30,000 for troops; and if you take the case of the Straits Settlements, where we maintain a very considerable force, we compel them to pay a sum of £100,000 to cover the cost. In Ceylon, as in the Straits Settlements, the cost under Vote 1 is £52,000, and Ceylon is called upon to pay £72,500.
Mr. Morton

Even Malta, where we keep a garrison for Imperial purposes, has to pay a sum of £5,000. Now, apart from the charge for arms, barracks, hospitals, and various stores, we spend on men in Egypt a sum of £227,123, and, including the charges above referred to, over £330,000, and the only portion paid by Egypt is £87,000. It has been decided by the House that 3,320 men shall remain in Egypt. A majority of hon. Members have voted in favour of that. If the Egyptians were not so prosperous—if they had not got a surplus of £650,000, with a prospect of doubling it in the forthcoming year—I, perhaps, should not object to the Vote; but this being the state of the case, I feel bound, on behalf of the taxpayers whom I represent, to object to this country being taxed for the benefit of the Egyptians, who are so prosperous. Therefore I move a reduction of the Vote. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian some years ago said he regretted the course he had taken when he permitted troops to be sent to Egypt for the benefit of the bondholders. The bondholder has got his pound of flesh from the Egyptians already. The people of that country are very much better off than they were before, and therefore, as I said before, I object to the British taxpayer being taxed under the circumstances. Take the case of India. That is a poorer country than Egypt, yet you do not treat it in the same fashion as you treat Egypt. If you did, there would be a considerable burden thrown on the British taxpayer for the benefit of the Indian ryot. If you were making Egypt pay on the same basis as you make India pay, she would have to contribute at least £500,000 a year towards the Imperial Finance. But you do not; and, therefore, I repeat that I am against this organised philanthropy. I beg to move, consequently, the reduction of the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £5,532,700, be granted for the said Service."—(Dr. Clark.)

(11.48.) MR. BRODRICK: The hon. Member is mistaken in supposing that this country pays any money for the benefit of the Egyptian bondholder or any other person. For everything connected with the troops in Egypt beyond the establishment Egypt pays. I assure the hon. Member that we have carried out a pledge given to the House that the Army of Occupation in Egypt will be brought within the sum necessary for its defence. Every single item of expense has been duly discussed between the two Governments.

DR. CLARK: But why do you not charge them on the same basis as you do Ceylon and the Straits Settlements?

MR. BRODRICK: They are on an entirely different system. We have only done our duty in asking for the contributions we have received from the colonies. I repeat we have thoroughly carried out the pledges we gave four years ago. I hope we may now be allowed to take the Vote.

(11.51.) MR. LABOUCHERE: Here is a Vote of £5,000,000, and we are asked to take it after one or two remarks from a Member of the Government. I hardly think we should be doing our duty to our constituents if we allowed this Vote to be taken. I perfectly admit that the Government are following up the assurances they gave to the House of Commons, but we contest the whole principle upon which this Vote is estimated. It is not a mere question of money. We say that for the last nine years there have been, more or less, 3,000 or 4,000 men in Egypt, and if we were not occupying Egypt we should not require those 3,000 or 4,000 men for the protection of this Empire. My hon. Friend has shown, by his references to Ceylon and to the Straits Settlements, that we are taxing our own countrymen for the benefit of Egypt, while we make the colonies pay for the British troops which are stationed there. If you make Ceylon and the Mauritius pay on the basis you now do, surely you ought to insist on the Egyptian Government paying for the troops there on a similar basis. Seeing that the troops are sent to Egypt to maintain order and to defend the Egyptian frontier against attacks, I suggest that we should demand from Egypt neither more nor less than we obtain from our own colonies, and, speaking as the Representative of the taxpayers of Northampton, I say that they join in the protest against paying 1s. in order that the Southern Frontier of Egypt may be defended against the Soudanese. I think we ought to have some sort of reply from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. I cannot think that any hon. Member would say that Egypt ought not to pay these expenses. We have British officers there, and I suspect that even if we are not paying them they are qualifying for pensions. Again, we keep more troops in Malta than are really necessary, in order that we may have a force within easy reach of Egypt in case of necessity. An hon. Member opposite just now said there are at the present time fewer British troops in Egypt than ever before; but if he will carry his mind back to the time the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was in power he will remember that at one time the troops were reduced to a corporal's guard at Alexandria, and they were only retained there in consequence of sickness.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Resolution to be reported to-morrow.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday.

ARCHDEACONRY OF CORNWALL BILL [LORDS]—(No. 177.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 17.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 24, to leave out from the word "Where," to the word "borough, in line 25 inclusive, and insert the words—

Mr. Labouchere

"Section Four of 'The County Electors Act, 1888,' shall be deemed to have applied Section Thirty of 'The Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878,' to a parish situate in a Parliamentary but not in a Municipal borough, and to have provided that."—(Mr. Knowles.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I beg to move that we do now report Progress.

*MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I hope the hon. Member will not press his Motion. The object of the Bill is simply to remove a doubt on a technical subject, and this Amendment is intended to meet a point suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton in an Amendment which he has proposed to the Registration of Electors (Acceleration) Bill. The Bill contains only two clauses.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I think the very fact of absence of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton is a reason for reporting Progress.

*MR. LEES KNOWLES: I have no wish to press the Amendment, and I proposed it chiefly in deference to the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): If the Bill is of the brief and non-contentious character indicated by the hon. Member in charge of it, there can be no objection to two or three days' delay.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 64.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

House adjourned at ten minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 24th February, 1891.

STANDING COMMITTEE.

Report from the Committee of Chairmen of Standing Committees, That they have (in pursuance of Standing Order No. L.) appointed the Lord Herschell Chairman of the Standing Committee; read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

House adjourned at half past Four o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past
Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 24th February, 1891.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY FORCE FUND.

Copy ordered—

"Of Treasury Minute, dated February, 1891, on a Deficiency in the Royal Irish Constabulary Force Fund."—(Mr. Jackson.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 118.]

ARMY (STOPPAGES OF PAY).

Address for—

"Return of the average number, during the year 1890, of Private Soldiers in each of the No. 1 Companies of the Line Battalions now stationed at Aldershot."

"Of the total amount of Stoppages from the pay of the Private Soldiers in each of these Companies, thus classified: Stoppages for tailor's bill or repairs of clothing; for shoemaker's bill; for regimental necessaries; for barrack damages; for deficiencies in old clothing; for washing; for hair cutting; for library; for fines; for repairs of arms and accoutrements; and remaining Stoppages."

"And, of total for each Company, and average per Soldier."—(Colonel Nolan.)

QUESTIONS.

INDIAN RAILWAY ANNUITIES.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of VOL. CCCL. [THIRD SERIES.]

State for India whether it is intended to renew the system in practice before February, 1885, under which the Government of India converted Railway Annuities into India Three per Cent. Stock, it being at that time temporarily suspended with the understanding that it would be renewed after 1888; and whether the advantages of that operation to the Government of India were considerable?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): There is no present intention of renewing the offer to holders of Indian Railway Annuities to convert them into India Three per Cent. Stock. When the practice was suspended there was no undertaking that it would be renewed at any particular time, though the Secretary of State in Council may, perhaps, renew it if he should think fit. The direct advantages to the Government from the operation were considerable. In 1888, however, Parliament authorised the creation of a limited amount of India Stock in connection with the construction of railways by the agency of companies; and under this power a certain amount of Stock has been annually issued on public tender. It is not desirable to be offering Stock to the market in two different ways at the same time.

CIVIL SERVICE SECOND DIVISION CLERKS.

MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will take into consideration the grievances of certain clerks in the Inland Revenue who entered the Second Division from the Excise branch, and were next transferred to the Taxes Surveying branch on the faith of an assurance from their Board that they would thereby become eligible upon having completed a service of 10 years, inclusive of their Excise service, to compete for promotion as assistant surveyors; whether the Treasury afterwards repudiated this assurance by stopping the promotion of the first successful competitor, on the technical distinction that his 10 years' service was not wholly in the Second Division; and whether, in consequence of this decision, these clerks have been recalled to the head office and placed at the bottom of the establishment, to the great detriment of their position and prospects; and whether, having regard to the practical equality of the service rendered and the service formally required, and the exceptional rules applying to the Taxes branch, also to the fact that the claims of these officials have the full support of their own Department, he will endeavour to mitigate the hardship of their position by recommending the Treasury to withdraw its objection, and permit their Excise service to rank in the qualifying period as it has since been modified under the Ridley Scheme?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am informed that the Board of Inland Revenue were under the impression that in the case of certain clerks in the Inland Revenue who entered the Second Division from the Excise branch, and were transferred to the Tax Surveying branch, service in the Excise branch would count as part of the period of 10 years necessary to qualify them for admission to the Tax Surveying branch, and that competitors were so informed. The certificate of the Civil Service Commissioners was, however, necessary before appointment to the Tax Surveying branch, and those Commissioners pointed out that under the Order in Council it was clear that none but service as Lower Division clerk could count as part of the qualifying period, and they refused to certify. The Civil Service Commissioners are, of course, bound by the Order in Council; the Treasury has no power to override it. I may add that there has been no repudiation by the Treasury of any assurance given by the Inland Revenue Department, and I am informed that only one clerk successfully competed for the position in the Tax Surveying branch.

BANK NOTE ISSUES.

MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I had intended to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state whether it is his intention to propose any change as to existing issues of bank notes this Session? but I am informed that the right hon. Gentleman is suffering from a severe cold, and is unable to be present. I will, therefore, postpone the question.

Mr. Twite

STRENGTH OF THE ARMY, MILITIA, AND VOLUNTEERS.

LORD HENRY BRUCE (Wilts, Chippenham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will inform the House what is the number of men under the present reduced standard the Regular Army is still short of; what is the number of men the Militia is still short of, and how many captains of companies in this branch of the Service are deficient; and what is the number of men the Yeomanry is still short of, and how many officers in this branch of the Service are deficient?

MR. HANBURY (Preston): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question may I ask how many men beneath the standard chest measurement, height, and weight were recruited in 1890?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The European regiments and corps are short of their establishment by 1,657 men, which is a smaller number than is to be expected at this season, when the drafts for India have recently started. Colonial corps are nominally deficient 2,391 non-commissioned officers and men, but some of the corps have not yet been raised. The deficiency in the Militia amounts to 23,731 non-commissioned officers and men; and there are 102 captains' commissions vacant. The Yeomanry is short by 94 officers and 3,389 non-commissioned officers and men of the full establishment. In reply to the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) I may say that the number of recruits enlisted below the standard in one or other of the above particulars is, exclusive of men enlisted at the headquarters of regiments, 7,975.

MR. HANBURY: Was the number 6,000 in 1889?

MR. BRODRICK: I think it was rather less.

MANICALAND.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, when the news of the invasion of Manicaland by the South African Chartered Company reached Lourenço Marques, the Portuguese Governor of the Province officially complained to the British Consul (or Vice Consul), stating that Mr. Colquhoun was probably not aware of the modus vivendi, and begging the Consul to inform him of it; whether a letter was written by the Consul to this effect, and sent up to Mr. Colquhoun under the care of a Portuguese lieutenant and five Portuguese soldiers; whether, on their arrival at their destination, they were all detained as prisoners; and whether all Papers in respect to this matter will be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Governor General of Mozambique made a verbal communication to the Acting Consul at Mozambique, not at Lourenço Marques, respecting events in Manica, and the Consul, not being aware that the agents of the South African Company had received news of the modus vivendi from the Cape, sent through the Governor General a letter to inform them of it. Inquiry has been made as to the reported arrests, and we have received information that there is no truth whatever in the statement, and that the messenger bearing the Consul's letter returned with an acknowledgment of its receipt. The correspondence on the subject will be included in the next set of Papers respecting South African affairs.

MASHONALAND — LOBENGULA'S CONCESSIONS.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies has received a letter from Mr. Arthur Douglass, a Member of the State Legislature, who is now in England, and representing the interests of Mr. Wood and others in regard to a mining concession from Lobengula granted previously to that granted to Mr. Rudd; why no answer has as yet been sent Mr. Arthur Douglass; and whether, in the event of Mr. Arthur Douglass showing that this previous concession was granted, Her Majesty's Government will see that those to whom a Royal Charter was granted, on the assumption that Lobengula could grant a mining concession to them over his entire territory, do not retain any power or any rights over such portions of the territory that are included in the previous concession?

SIR J. GORST (for Baron H. DE WORMS): The answer to the first paragraph of the question is, Yes; to the second, because his letter was received only so recently as the 19th instant; and to the third, that the matters referred to in this question and in Mr. Douglass's letter require full consideration before Her Majesty's Government expresses an opinion upon them. A reply will be sent to Mr. Douglass as soon as possible.

INFLAMMABLE LIQUIDS BILL.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE (Exeter): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will postpone the Second Reading of the Inflammable Liquids Bill for such reasonable period as will enable representatives of the mineral oil trade to consider the details of the measure, and submit to the House of Commons such Amendments as they may deem necessary in its clauses?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I have already stated, in reply to a question in this House, that I will take care that a sufficient interval shall elapse before the Second Reading.

THE WEST INDIES.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the trade depression in the West Indies, the Government will reconsider their determination not to assist the proposed lines of steamers between those islands and Canada and the United States?

SIR J. GORST (for Baron H. de Worms): The Secretary of State has approved of the Government of the Leeward Islands subsidising a line of steamers between those islands and Canada, which is also subsidised by the Dominion Government, and he is prepared to consider any proposals that may be made by any other West Indian Colonial Governments for granting similar subsidies; but if the question refer to a subsidy from Imperial funds, no such proposal has been made, or, if made, could be entertained by Her Majesty's Government.

ROSSLEA NATIONAL LEAGUE.

MR. HENRY CAMPBELL (Fermanagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state on what grounds he directed the suppression of the Rosslea branch of the National League; is he aware that the police have been constantly parading the neighbourhood; can he explain why, on 31st January, District Inspector Dagg and four constables kept marching round the Catholic Church during the celebration of mass; if it has been brought to his notice that the police assaulted a Mr. Smith, a miller of Rosslea, and broke the door of the mill off its hinges, in search of a meeting of the branch; and under what authority they took this course?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Rosslea branch of the National League was suppressed because it persisted, after being twice warned, in passing and publishing in certain newspapers resolutions inciting to intimidation and boycotting. The police have since patrolled the neighbourhood at such times as they deemed necessary. The Constabulary authorities report that the allegations contained in the third and fourth paragraphs are without foundation.

THE DUBLIN POST OFFICE

MR. HENRY CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the seven hours' system has been introduced into the General Post Office, Edinburgh; and, if so, why the same system has not been put in operation in Dublin?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The seven hours' system is not yet in force in Edinburgh, but it is hoped that it will be possible to introduce it in the clerical branches both at Dublin and at Edinburgh on Monday, the 2nd of March.

IRISH DISTRESS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a resolution, passed by the Scarriff Board of Guardians, stating that the ratepayers cannot bear the great strain involved by a rate adequate to cope with the exceptional distress which exists in the Union, and suggesting the carrying out of reproductive relief works, such as the Scarriff drainage scheme and the projected railway from Ennis to Scarriff; and what steps he proposes to take upon it?

Sir J. Gorst

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A resolution passed by the Board of Guardians of the Scarriff Union has been received, and further inquiry will be made.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): In the event of the ratepayers being unable to bear the strain involved by a rate, what steps do the Government propose to take to relieve them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: At present I am not prepared to say.

MR. COX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will comply with urgent local demands for the erection of a fishing pier at Farrihy Bay on the West Coast of Clare; and, if so, when the works will be commenced?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is, I believe, no distress in the locality mentioned that cannot be met by the resources of the ordinary Poor Law. I may, at the same time, mention that some employment is afforded in a locality not far distant in connection with the Kilrush and Kilkee Railway.

MESSRS. DILLON AND O'BRIEN.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the result of his inquiries as to the condition of health of Messrs. John Dillon and William O'Brien; and whether they have both been removed to the infirmary from the ordinary cells of Galway Gaol?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is true that the two gentlemen are now in the infirmary ward of Galway Gaol, but I believe the Report as to their health is satisfactory.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Has the doctor made any Report as to the probable effect of their imprisonment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The medical officer made a Report, and I gather that he anticipates no evil effects from their imprisonment.

MR. SEXTON : Would the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to state the terms of the Report, as the public papers state that their health has broken down ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I can re-assure the hon. Gentleman. A very careful Report has been drawn up by the medical officer, from which it appears that the health of the two gentlemen has not broken down.

MR. SEXTON : What course is it intended to take in regard to the recognisances of Mr. Dillon and Mr. O'Brien ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I suppose the ordinary course of estreating the recognisances.

MR. SEXTON : Why should the recognisances be estreated now that these gentlemen are undergoing their sentences ?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University) : The application referred to by the hon. Member related to a case stated on the part of the defendants, and was for the purpose of having this case struck out of the list, on the ground that it was not being duly prosecuted by the defendants.

MR. SEXTON : Do the Government propose to exact the penalty of the recognisances, although the two gentlemen who have been prosecuted are now in gaol ?

MR. MADDEN : That is a different question.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) : Will not the effect be that these two gentlemen will have suffered six months' imprisonment and have to pay £2,000 as well ?

MR. MADDEN : I merely rose to correct an error into which the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Sexton) had fallen, in regard to the case stated. The right hon. Gentleman now asks for further information of a totally different kind.

MR. SEXTON : I will put a further question on Thursday.

THE LABOUR COMMISSION.

MR. BECKETT (York, N.R., Whitby) : I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is true, as announced in the papers this morning, that Her Majesty's Government propose to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the relations between employers and employed ; and whether he can state what will be the scope of the Inquiry and the particular questions which will be submitted to the Commission ?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster) : It is true that Her Majesty's Government intend to recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission, with the object generally stated by my hon. Friend. I shall be prepared, in the course of a few days, to state the terms of the Reference to the Royal Commission to the House ; but I may say generally that the object we have in view is to institute an independent and careful inquiry into the causes of the differences between employers and employed which have produced such painful results during the past year, and also to inquire whether it is desirable or possible to introduce legislation on the subject.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) : Will the right hon. Gentleman give the names of the Commissioners ?

*MR. W. H. SMITH : As the Commission was only decided on last Saturday, it will hardly be expected that Her Majesty's Government has as yet determined on the names of the Commissioners.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) : Is it intended that the Royal Commission should in any way interfere with the Select Committee which it has been resolved shall inquire into the hours of labour of railway servants ?

*MR. W. H. SMITH : Certainly not.

MR. BROADHURST : Will Her Majesty's Government consult the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Unions in reference to the terms of the proposed Reference ?

*MR. W. H. SMITH : Her Majesty's Government will be glad to receive suggestions from any quarter ; but the hon. Gentleman will see that if Her Majesty's Government were to undertake to consult any particular body, either on the part of employers or employed, they would be placing themselves in a position of some difficulty. The Government must act on their own responsibility in this matter.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) : Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake that one half of the Members of the Royal Commission shall be closely connected with the labour interest of the country; not employers like myself, but men who have lived by the labour of their hands?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): Will questions relating to coal mines come within the scope of the Inquiry?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Will the terms of the Reference to the Royal Commission come before the House, so that they can be amended if necessary?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: This is not usual in the case of Royal Commissions. The terms of the Reference will be placed before the House. That is all that I can undertake.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): Is it the intention of the Government to limit the time during which the Commission will sit and report?

*SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): Will the Commission be instructed to inquire into the hours of labour in coal mines underground?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for West Salford, and also in answer to the hon. Member, for Lichfield, it certainly is not intended to exclude from the scope of the Commission questions relating to mines. No term will be placed on the sittings of the Commission. It would be improper to fix a limit upon the sittings of the Commission, or to determine what evidence they are to take.

MOTIONS.

INCOME TAX.

*(4.5.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I rise for the purpose of moving—

“That, in the opinion of this House, a Committee should be appointed to inquire into the Income Tax, the mode of its collection, the system of appeal, the payment of poundage for collection, and generally to report on the present working and incidence of the tax as now imposed, and whether some juster system could be adopted, by a different rate being imposed on income derived from realised capital to that derived from industry.”

I very much regret that I have to bring forward this Motion in the absence, from illness, of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and under the circumstances I should have postponed it, if I had felt that it was possible to obtain any other opportunity for bringing it before the House. It is a matter which is becoming

Mr. O. V. Morgan

ing more and more pressing day by day, and I think it is a subject which deserves consideration at the hands of the House, with a view of getting the Income Tax placed upon a more just and equitable footing. The tax was originally imposed at the end of the last century, but it was subsequently taken off, and was not re-imposed until 1842, when Sir Robert Peel introduced it as a temporary tax, which was not intended to be of a permanent character. But from that date the tax has continued and also grown and developed. Chancellors of the Exchequer, one after another, have gradually increased its pressure. As a matter of fact, the tax is so easy to collect and the law-abiding Income Tax-payers of this country are so easily squeezed, that the incidence of the tax has never been regarded except in its financial aspect. The hardship involved in the tax, and the injury it inflicts upon the trade and commerce of the country, has been too much forgotten, although there can be very little doubt as to the unfavourable manner in which it handicaps the small traders. Many persons have a notion that it is a tax which is only paid by the rich. Nothing can be more contrary to the fact. It is true that the rich pay it, but not only is it paid by the rich, but it materially affects the lower and middle class of society. Schedule D. applies to shopkeepers, merchants, professional men, traders, lawyers, doctors, newspaper men, and to that large class of persons who are really the working bees in the industrial hive of this country, excluding perhaps, but not entirely, the working classes. The number of persons who pay the tax under Schedule D. are in round numbers 450,000, and of that number no less than 225,000, or about one half pay it upon incomes of less than £200 a year, 106,000 pay upon £200 and under £300. That fact alone proves conclusively, I think, that a very large number of the payers of the tax are in the very bottom of the middle strata. About 60,000 pay Income Tax on incomes between £300 and £500 a year, and there are altogether 386,000 out of 450,000 who pay it on less than £500 a year. This is an important fact when we consider the growth of the tax. In 1842 the tax per penny in the pound produced £850,000 a year; in 1861 it produced £1,250,000; and last year it produced more than £2,000,000 per penny. This rapid growth is due to the larger number of persons who have been brought within the meshes of the tax. From 1846 to 1874, or thereabouts, between 30,000 and 40,000 persons paid Income Tax on sums above £200 and below £300. From 1874 to 1889 the number of persons who paid the tax upon incomes of between £200 and £300 a year rose from 39,000 to 106,000, while those who paid it on incomes from £500 to £1,000 a year remained almost stationary, and those who paid upon incomes of more than £1,000 a year absolutely decreased. These figures show that the cause of the increase in the product of the Income Tax is that a large portion of the community at the bottom of the social scale is being gradually drawn within the operation of Schedule D. I do not express any opinion upon the question whether this is right or wrong, but I do hold that if the tax is affecting more and more persons who fill positions low down in the social scale, it behoves this House to take great care that the incidence of the tax should be equally adjusted and that the law should be administered fairly. It is supposed that the tax is one upon income, but the question arises—What is income? and I am unable to derive any definition of the term from any Act of Parliament. If a man sells goods over the counter he deducts from his income the cost of the materials and the amount of wages he pays. But it seems to me that that is not enough, and that he ought to deduct all the expenses that are absolutely necessary in order to produce the income. Income ought to be the net amount after a fair deduction of all charges which go towards the making up of that income. In tens of thousands of cases at the present moment the tax on income is not a tax on what ought fairly to be called income, but on a fancy sum fixed by officers who are personally interested in making the sum as large as they possibly can. I will give a string of typical cases which bears out this remark. Let me, first of all, take the case of houses. A man owns a house which he lets for £50 a year, and upon that house he is charged Income Tax upon the full sum of £50, notwithstanding that he may have to incur an expenditure of from £5 to £20 for repairs and other causes. The same remark applies to land in occupation and use. Expenses are necessarily involved, but no deduction is allowed, and the Income Tax has to be paid upon the full rateable value. Therefore the action of the Government has the effect of discouraging the possession of houses and land by persons of small means, a result socially to be deplored. Take the case of a man who pays £1,000 for a short lease, and who receives in rent £250 for six or seven years. Throughout the tenure he has to pay to the Chancellor of the Exchequer Income Tax upon the full amount of £250 a year, although a part only is really income and the rest is required to recoup the capital advanced in the original purchase. In such a case I maintain that Income Tax is not paid upon the income but on a fancy sum which is not truly represented as income. Then, take the case of cottage property. We often express a desire to encourage the improvement of cottage property, but it is a well known fact that the sums received from these cottages do not represent the real income. In some cases the outgoings even exceed the amounts received, and in no way does the rent show the actual income. Nevertheless, the Chancellor of the Exchequer demands Income Tax on the gross valuation. This is unfair, and further, out of consideration for the well-being and happiness of the people, is socially a mistake, as it discourages the building of improved cottages. I contend that it is most unfair to tax cottage property in this way. Then, again, there is the case of warehouses and other property which are only partly let. A building partly occupied with one or two rooms let and others unlet is charged Income Tax upon the entire annual value of the building. I have known houses partly let so heavily taxed that they have been emptied rather than pay the outgoings, which were larger than the rents received. There is another very large case of injustice in which property is assessed at a higher rate than the lease justifies. Let me take the case of a house let at £50 a year, the purchaser having paid no premium upon it. In numerous cases he finds himself rated at £60, so that he has to pay Income Tax upon £10 more than he actually gets. Is there any possible way in which that can be regarded as income? I know the case of a property which brings in £90 a year, but which pays Income Tax upon £120, and I believe that that is the case in regard to very many properties in London at this moment. In a case of my own, I was charged Income Tax at the rate of £300 upon property which brought in £250, but upon an appeal the extra charge was deducted. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer has now secured an ally in the London County Council, who have protested against my being rated at £250, and demand that I shall pay upon £270, although the extra sum can in no possible form be termed income. Then, again, the depreciation of machinery must not be forgotten. In fitting up a workshop a considerable sum is expended in machinery, but in collecting Income Tax nothing is allowed for the depreciation of that machinery. Surely, if I spend £1,000 in machinery which cannot last for more than five or six years, the depreciation ought to be taken into account. In regard to depreciation, there have been very extraordinary decisions. In one case in which I was personally interested—that of a large educational institute—a considerable sum of money was spent in school fittings and in making provision for renewing short leases. When the Income Tax assessment was appealed against an allowance was made for these items, and they were deducted from profits, on the ground that they were a necessary provision to replace the furniture and fittings and to renew the leases; but another Income Tax Commissioner came upon the scene, and refused to make any allowance at all. Another typical case is that of a Company which has been in operation for four years. Four years ago it made a profit of £470; the year after the profit fell to £160; the third year there was an absolute loss of £120; and last year there was a loss of £300. Nevertheless, the Company have been compelled to pay Income Tax upon the profits of each year; so that the shareholders have paid to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in Income Tax absolutely more by £60 than their entire profits during the four years. Take, again, the case of patents. A patent can only last for a limited period, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer will allow no sum to be deducted in order to provide for a sinking fund, which would only be equitable, seeing that the patent is not allowed to extend for more than a certain number of years. A medical officer in a Union receives, as a rule, a very small salary, but, as a matter of fact, in assessing Income Tax, he is not allowed to deduct from the salary his expenditure for drugs and other things that are necessary in visiting the poor. Their income is small, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer insists upon levying the tax upon the gross income. Life annuitants form a very large class of persons in this country, but an enormous sum is raised from their incomes every year, and devoted to the decrease of the National Debt. But is it fair that a life annuitant should contribute towards the Income Tax in the same proportion as another person whose capital produces an income in perpetuity? Let me take also the case of life insurance. The Life Insurance Companies invest their money in various ways; but on every penny they invest they have to pay Income Tax. The interest received from life insurance investments amounts to £6,000,000 a year, but the actual profits are very little more than £2,000,000. Therefore, as a matter of fact, the State is taxing life insurance three times more heavily than an ordinary business would be taxed. The same state of circumstances applies to banks. A penny savings' bank with which I am connected pays in Income Tax what would pay a 4 per cent. dividend upon the capital, and, as a matter of fact, for some ten years when no profit at all was made, and during which time it cost its shareholders some £10,000 to carry on, it paid over £2,000 as Income Tax. These are only a few out of a variety of cases which I might select to illustrate the extent to which the hardship bears; but I think I have said enough to prove my case up to the hilt—that the Income Tax, in thousands and ten of thousands of cases, is not a tax upon income at all, but a fancy sum levied at the hard rate of the Income Tax collectors. Now I come to the second point on which I wish to detain the House for a few moments, and that is as to the mode of collecting the tax, about which the greatest possible discontent exists. It is a startling fact that there are societies in existence for the purpose of assisting men to get their Income Tax fairly adjusted. A man pays a certain sum; the society takes steps to get the Income Tax reduced, and takes remuneration according to the amount they get taken off. Surely that indicates something very wrong in the system of collection. There are four officials concerned in the payment of Income Tax. The Surveyor of Taxes is paid by salary, but all the other officers are paid by poundage; and the result is, if even you have a difficulty or complaint, the Inland Revenue turn you over to the local people, and the local people turn you over to the Inland Revenue; and between the one and the other you can rarely get what is a reasonable adjustment. The great charge we have to make against the collection of the tax is that three of the officials—the local assessor, the local collector, and the clerk to the Commissioners—are all paid by poundage; and, therefore, all have an interest in getting assessments raised to the utmost possible amount. We pay the sum of £200,000 a year to the local collectors and assessors as poundage, and the sum of £80,000 to the clerks to the Commissioners. Upon what plan do these people work? A firm or individual sends in a Return, and without giving any reason the local officials perhaps double or treble the amount returned. I have known cases in which men have sent in a Return which has been doubled or trebled by the officials who did not condescend to give a reason for their action. A collector once boasted that a few years during a time of depression he increased the receipts for Income Tax in his district by 33 per cent. It is urged that individuals can easily appeal against the assessment of the collector. There is, as a matter of fact, nothing worse than the system of appeals. The Local Commissioners are often rival tradesmen and merchants of those whose appeals come before them. They have no knowledge of how to conduct such delicate inquiries, and are entirely guided by their clerks or local collectors. The appellant is not allowed to be assisted by a lawyer, and after he has stated his case—probably he is a business man and not accustomed to such proceedings—he is compelled to retire from the Court; but the local officials, who are as personally interested in the result of the inquiry, usually remain and advise the Commissioners, thus reducing the appeal to a perfect farce. The Committee I wish to see appointed ought to inquire into this question of appeal, and suggest some more satisfactory method. In 9 cases out of 10 the Commissioners do exactly what they are told to do by the officials, and against the decision, except upon a matter of law, there is no appeal. The next question is whether the time has not come for some change in the mode of assessing incomes, whether it is only fair and reasonable to draw some distinction between incomes derived from current labour and incomes derived from the result of past labour, or capital, or wealth. The two classes of income have been described as industrial and spontaneous income—industrial income being income derived from present industry, and spontaneous income being income derived from the result of past industry. This is no new idea. In the year 1842, when Sir Robert Peel re-introduced the Income Tax, Lord Brougham urged that such a distinction should be drawn. It was then thought that the tax was but a temporary expedient, and so this subject was shelved; but as the tax has now remained for 50 years, and is practically a permanent impost, it is time to re-consider the question. If this distinction were drawn, the great bulk of the difficulties in the collection of the tax would disappear. It is comparatively easy to fairly tax spontaneous incomes. It is easy to determine the amount invested, therefore the difficulty would be very much less if the scheme I suggest were adopted. The man who derives his money from wealth is in a totally different position to the man who has to earn his living and get it by present industry. A man who has to get his living by present industry, must provide for the future, must insure his life and do a number of things that the other man need not do. It is clear that the man with a spontaneous income may freely be called upon to pay on a very different scale to the man who has to earn his living. Many of those men who get industrial incomes have to work a good many years before they really obtain the practical result of their work. It often happens that, before a man receives the full results of his industry, he has to endure years of loss; but in the time of his prosperity he is not allowed to make deductions for these inevitable losses. Of course, if spontaneous incomes are taxed on a higher scale, it will be necessary to make special provision with regard to the very small incomes, such as those possessed by widows, orphans, &c., as is now done by the rebatement on the tax of £120 under £400 a year. In a Return presented to Parliament, No. 345 of 1885, there is a statement made as to the difference of amount derived from spontaneous and industrial incomes. It is shown that about three-tenths of the gross receipts from the Income Tax are paid by the industrial incomes, and about seven-tenths by the spontaneous incomes. Supposing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to say that no industrial income should be taxed; three-tenths of the Income Tax would disappear. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would lose about £4,000,000 a year, a sum which 3d. in the £1 on spontaneous income would more than make up the deficiency. I have always held that capital even now is not paying its full share of the burden of taxation. I apprehend, however, that this abolition of Income Tax on all industrial incomes would be an extreme thing to do; but supposing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to say that he would take off Income Tax from industrial incomes, on all incomes under £500 a year, the practical result would be that the right hon. Gentleman would lose Income Tax on about £40,000,000, or about £1,000,000 a year. Three farthings in the pound on spontaneous incomes would make up the loss, and a penny would leave a margin; but the benefit to the trading community, to the small tradesman, the small professional man, would be immense. The relief would benefit no fewer than 386,000 families connected with the working trade and industry of the country. I think I have shown that the time has come to consider this great question by a Committee of the House. Some persons have advocated a graduated Income Tax. No doubt such a tax has a great fascination for the poorer people of the community, but any one who has considered the subject must be convinced that in this country, at any rate, it would be practically impossible to collect such a tax. It could not be collected at its source, and the amount of evasion which would ensue would be such as to render its collection practically impossible. It is possible, however, although it may be difficult, to separate the industrial from the spontaneous incomes, and by doing so the change will lead to a much fairer arrangement of the tax; and it is also possible to arrange the Income Tax so that it shall be a tax on income and not on a fancy amount. If the Government grant the inquiry I am sure that they will confer a benefit on a class, next to the artisan class the most numerous in the community and a class by whose industry, energy, and enterprise this great Empire and its trade has been largely built up, and without whose contentment and prosperity we can hardly hope and expect that our trade and commerce will extend and continue.

Mr. Bartley

Mr. Bartley

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, a Committee should be appointed to inquire into the Income Tax, the mode of its collection, the system of appeal, the payment of poundage for collection, and generally to report on the present working and incidence of the tax as now imposed, and whether some juster system could be adopted, by a different rate being imposed on income derived from realised capital to that derived from industry."—(Mr. Bartley).

*(453.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): After the very exhaustive and clear speech of my hon. Friend, it is not my intention to trouble the House with many remarks. I regret the absence, through indisposition, of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this occasion, because the House is thereby deprived of the benefit of the great knowledge and experience the right hon. Gentleman would otherwise have been able to bring to bear on the question. I am sure the House will feel that my hon. Friend is quite justified in bringing this matter forward, for we all are aware of the friction, annoyance, trouble, and loss which arises from the present system under which the Income Tax is assessed and collected. I particularly want to deal with Schedule D, and to confirm by a few figures what my hon. Friend has said as to that Schedule being an increasing contributory to the Income Tax. I find that while the annual value of property and profits assessed under Schedule A has increased by £50,000,000 in 20 years, Schedule B has only increased by little over £750,000, Schedule C by something under £10,000,000, and Schedule D by over £123,000,000. There is a matter respecting appeal which affects Income Taxpayers under Schedule D much more adversely than it affects the Income Taxpayers under other Schedules. Nowadays time represents money, and the loss of time, annoyance, and worry inflicted on the more ignorant, the less cultivated, and the less knowledgeable portion of the community is greatly aggravated by the present system of appeal. I think the real question underlying my hon. Friend's Motion is the definition of the classes who fall under Schedule D. In the part of London with which I am most conversant there are many houses in the middle of a dense population unoccupied for reasons resulting from the system of taxation to which my hon. Friend has referred. That in itself is a matter which deserves serious inquiry. There is one matter connected with the incidence of taxation to which my hon. Friend did not refer, and it is that there is an important class of people who altogether escape from the payment of Income Tax. Large trading firms in this country are required to pay heavy Income Tax and all sorts of Local and Imperial Taxes, but foreign firms doing large business in the home markets, and making large profits in competition with English firms are only required to pay Income Tax upon the salary of their agent in England. I trust the Government will give the Committee my hon. Friend asks on behalf of the small traders and of the lower end of the Income Taxpayers. I maintain the hon. Member has made out a very substantial case, and I heartily second the Motion.

*(5.0.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I think the House is much indebted to my hon. Friend (Mr. Bartley) for having introduced this subject. There is a very strong feeling of dissatisfaction as to the way in which Income Tax is assessed and collected and also as to the mode in which appeals are conducted. Many people are very unfairly assessed, and they have very little opportunity of getting redress; at all events there is so much trouble in getting redress that they very frequently submit to pay a good deal more in the shape of Income Tax than they ought to pay, rather than undergo the inconvenience surrounding an appeal. I can confirm what the hon. Gentleman has said as to the unfairness in the assessment. I know that in the case of cottage property the absence of allowance for repairs inflicts very great hardship upon owners. I am acquainted with a part of the country in which there are many old cottages the repairs of which are so considerable that they very nearly absorb the whole income derived from the property. With some owners it has been a question whether they would not pull the cottages down; but if they did, much suffering would be occasioned to many poor people. If we are to keep the people in the rural districts the question whether some special relief cannot be given in such cases as I have mentioned is deserving of the serious attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Reference has been made to the difference between assessment on the gross rather than upon the net income derived from property. The present system is very unfair. Then there is the question of a fair allowance for property while unlet. It will be said one can get an allowance from the Surveyor of Taxes in respect to empties, but there is the greatest possible difficulty in getting the matter properly adjusted. It would be much better if the parish assessment and the Income Tax assessment were both upon the net, so that there could be an actual assessment on the actual income. I hope the Government will see their way to grant a Committee. I believe a Committee would discuss the matter in a practical way. Although the appointment of the Committee might not lead to very much change in connection with the Income Tax, it would, I am persuaded, lead to a practical redress of several grievances which are of an irritating and objectionable character. I was sorry to hear my hon. Friend make an unfavourable observation with reference to a graduated Income Tax. Many of us believe that a graduated system is not only feasible, but fair, reasonable, and just.

MR. BARTLEY: I only said it was not practical.

MR. T. H. BOLTON: We think it is practical. I trust that observation of my hon. Friend will not influence any of my hon. Friends on this side of the House to look with disfavour upon his proposition.

(5.10.) MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): I am very glad the hon. Member for St. Pancras has said a word as to the Income Tax levied upon cottages in the country. Everyone will acknowledge that it is most important that our agricultural labourers should as far as possible be provided with good cottages; one of the reasons which induce the agricultural labourers to come up to the great centres of industry is that the cottages in some of the rural districts are not as good as we wish them to be. I am sure Radicals, even though they are not very friendly to the farmer or the country landlord, will agree that there ought not to be anything in the way of taxation which prevents a landlord providing decent cottage accommodation for the labouring people in his neighbourhood. But the point to which I particularly wish to draw the attention of the Government is the process of appeal open to farmers who think they have a grievance with reference to Schedule B, or, if they are the owners of the land, to Schedule A. If farmers are dissatisfied in respect of the Income Tax they are called upon to pay, they are informed that they can state their case before the Commissioners on appeal day. It often happens that a man farms land in different parts of the country, and very likely the Income Tax one considers unfair is in reference to a small area of land. To appeal against the tax, the man may possibly have to go many miles, and wait for hours, it may be in the draughty passages of an inn, until his case is called. The sum in dispute may be only £1, and many farmers say, "Rather than lose a day, rather than go 20 or 30 miles, and spend hours in a draughty passage, I will pay whatever is required of me." Whether this Committee be granted or not, I implore the Government to consider most seriously whether, as regards the people in rural districts at all events, they may not, in the first instance, be allowed to state their case to the Commissioners in writing. That would be a great boon to a large number of men. If the Government kindly give an answer to this question of mine when replying from the Front Bench, I, as a farmer, shall be very much obliged.

Mr. T. H. Bolton

*(5.15.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I think the House owes a debt of gratitude to my hon. Friend for bringing this Motion forward, for whatever view may be taken of the principle of the Income Tax, there can be no doubt of its importance, not only to the individual taxpayer concerned, but to the taxpayers at large, because I believe if this tax were placed upon a fair basis we might derive from it a larger proportion of Imperial taxation, and some relief might be given under other items of revenue. I understand that my hon. Friend does not in any way desire to affect the Income Tax itself. In principle it is an admirable tax, easily raised or lowered as necessity may demand; it is invaluable as a tax upon property, and as such ought to find a prominent place in our taxation system. My hon. Friend and those who support him have brought forward this Motion in the belief that the time has arrived when an inquiry should be made into the incidence of and mode of levying the tax. There are two reasons for appointing a Committee, one on the ground of administration, which is largely a departmental matter, and upon which there is much dissatisfaction throughout the country, and upon which the Committee might certainly recommend improvements. But the second is the more important reason, and it has been referred to by my hon. Friend, namely that in the manner in which it is assessed this tax falls with much greater weight upon the precarious than on the permanent income—with more severity upon skill and labour than upon property. The reply which I suppose will be made to this argument will be that no plan has yet been devised by which this difficulty can be overcome, and no scheme has been elaborated by which every individual in a class shall be fairly taxed. Further, it may be said with considerable truth that there are compensating advantages in regard to other branches of taxation, and that property pays a considerable proportion of taxation in addition to what is paid by these precarious incomes in the shape of death duties, from time to time increased, so that the burden on property is proportionally increased. But it is just because no one has yet been able officially to propose a practical scheme whereby the levy of the tax can be reformed that we ask for this Committee. For the last 30 years there has been no inquiry into this question, and, as has been pointed out, the two former inquiries, in 1851 and 1861, were really not genuine inquiries to a large extent, not bond fide inquiries. That of 1851 was an abortive Committee; that of 1861 was appointed against the wish of the Government of the time, and strongly opposed by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and had not a fair opportunity of inquiring properly into all the great questions affecting the tax. We have had the tax in existence for 50 years, and there has been no inquiry at all on the subject for 30 years. Surely the accumulated experience of 50 years, and the increased intelligence of those who levy the tax, will be able to throw some light on the question of administration, if not on the mode of framing the assessment. But I have another reason for desiring the appointment of the Committee. The Income Tax, this great source of revenue, was imposed specifically and practically as a temporary tax. It was originally imposed by Mr. Pitt as a War Tax, and again re-imposed when war again broke out after the Peace of Amiens, as a temporary tax. It was again re-imposed by Sir Robert Peel, and again as a temporary tax, and so much so that, instead of endeavouring to improve the basis upon which it was assessed and levied, he simply copied, almost word for word, the clauses from the Act of 1815. Again, as marking thus more its temporary character, he gave no reduction or abatement on the lower class of incomes. He did not desire to complicate his temporary tax with these abatements; he simply levied 7d. in the £1 on all incomes over £150. Further, the tax was imposed and re-imposed time after time as a temporary tax, and Government after Government hoped and believed they would be able to get rid of it. So long as it was thought to be a temporary tax there was not the same reason, necessity, or desire for its reform as there is now. But I think that we all feel, even if there had not been the rejection by the country of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1874 to abolish the Income Tax, we all feel that the tax has lost its temporary character, and I am quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman opposite will not say it is ever likely to disappear as a source of revenue. Therefore we argue that as the tax was imposed with all its faults in a rough-and-ready way, as a temporary tax, now that it has become a permanent tax it is the duty of the Government and of Parliament to inquire into the whole system of administration, into the incidence and assessment, to see that it is placed upon a fair basis. In one matter I do not agree with my hon. Friend. He desires that the Committee should also look into the question of exemptions, and, as I understand, desires that all individual incomes, or all incomes under £500, should be exempt from the tax. That would relieve a very large number of persons, but would, I think, be a great mistake. I think it was a mistake to raise the limit of exemption to £150, at which it stands now, because I think that so long as it is leviable—of course in the case of weekly wages it is not possible—but so long as it is leviable upon defined profits and salaries the tax ought to extend as low down as possible. Let it be fairly graduated from the bottom by means of abatements, and in the same way, be graduated as high up as it is possible to take these abatements. I should be sorry if the Government accepted a proposal to relieve the lower scale of incomes of the tax. Nor do I altogether agree with my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Bolton.) I would have the tax graduated to a certain point. My hon. Friend seems to think it might be graduated from top to bottom, but this, though I do not say it is impossible, would be inexpedient. At the present moment a large proportion of the tax is practically self-collecting and self-assessing, being raised at the source and comparatively without friction. While, if you graduate it, every individual must return his individual income, upon which return the Income Tax must be levied. Such a system as that would lead to considerable evasion, and, I think give rise to a great deal of additional irritation and difficulty of collection. I assert, however, that the Government could go a good deal further than they have gone in graduating the tax at the lower end of the scale, and I do not see why we should not have a system of graduation extended up to, say, £1,000. The collection would not be rendered more difficult, for the onus of proof would be on the persons assessed. I would extend the system of abatements, but not the system of exemptions. I hope the Government will accept the proposal, and that now the tax has assumed a permanent character, it will be carefully and thoroughly examined, and that in the future we shall derive an increase, not a diminished revenue, from this source, for I believe it is in principle a most valuable tax, though I take exception to some of its details.

(5.27.) MR. ATKINSON (Boston): The tax is valuable because it is so easily raised, and hence it is that it has been resorted to as a War Tax, and I think it should be the desire of all friends of peace to get rid of the tax. There is really need of reform in the administration and incidence of the tax. I am old enough to remember that when it was imposed by Sir Robert Peel he gave a direct pledge that it should not be a continuous tax, and certainly, of all taxes that ever have been imposed, this has caused the most irritation and heart-burning. I would add my voice to the voices of hon. Members who have spoken in request to the Government that they will consent to the appointment of this Committee, that the subject may be comprehensively examined. When we bring forward instances of hardship under the existing system of levy, we are met with replies from successive Chancellors of the Exchequer that they admit the particular grievance complained of, but that it is only part of a large subject which, if dealt with at all, must be dealt with altogether. Well, here is a favourable opportunity for that; let the Chancellor of the Exchequer avail himself of it and, instead of his lending his large intellect to schemes for harassing the banking interest, I would suggest to the First Lord that he should ask his right hon. Friend to attend to this grievance which has been a grievance to all Chancellors of the Exchequer and everybody else who has paid Income Tax for the last 30 or 40 years. As it is admitted that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer has been the greatest success in the office of all those who have filled the post during that period, we may rely upon his being able to do what none of his predecessors have been able to accomplish, and deal with this subject in a manner satisfactory to the vast number of persons concerned. At the same time I beg to offer a suggestion to the Leader of the House—a suggestion that will occur to us all as we look at the empty benches usually occupied by Representatives from Ireland. I take it that means that they do not pay the tax and are not interested. I would suggest that the tax should be levied in Ireland as it is in England. The hon. Member who spoke last said this tax should not be applied to weekly wages. But why not? As a ship-owner and ship-builder, I have known cases where riveters and boiler makers have earned as much as £5 per week. If there comes a time when the question before the country is whether we shall go to war or not, the question is settled by these men who receive weekly wages and I maintain that these are the people who ought to be made to feel what it is to have the screw put upon the Income Tax in order to pay the cost of wars. I say these men have no right to decide these questions at the polls unless they pay their fair proportion of the cost. The Income Tax Commissioners will tell you that they communicate with the employers of clerks, and ask them to furnish a return of all those who are receiving weekly or monthly salaries of such amount that they get in the course of the year sufficient to bring them within the grasp of the Income Tax collector. Why should not these weekly wage earners—who in times of prosperity can afford to drink champagne, and who are much better off than the small tradesmen of the present day—pay their share of the Income Tax?

Mr. Sydney Buxton

The boilermaker who earns £5 a week, or £260 a year, has not to dress in black cloth, and his children are going to be provided by hon. Gentlemen opposite—if they get the opportunity—with education free. Why is he to be exempted from Income Tax, while the man who earns £150 a year as a tradesman, and makes bad debts, and has to wear black cloth and to send his children to school and pay 2d., or 3d., or 4d. a week for their education, has to pay the tax? It may be said that it is a political necessity, and that neither side dare take the working man by the throat, and force him to bear his fair proportion of taxation, but that for mere Party purposes they are bound to say to him, "You shall not pay Income Tax because we want your vote at the next election." That is an unworthy motive, and I hope that the Government and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby will not admit this principle. I hope they will say, "If there is a Committee we will serve on it and will look into the matter with a view of doing justice, and will propose that all people should be liable to pay Income Tax whether they receive their earnings weekly or not." I think I have made two valuable contributions in the form of suggestions to this Debate, and if the course I recommend is adopted, I feel sure the Income Tax will not be a permanent tax. I feel certain that as soon as Irishmen and working men are made to pay this tax they will "improve" it off the face of the earth as unjust. So long, however, as they are not compelled to pay they will go with a light heart into wars, as they know that we and not they will have to pay the piper. I trust that the Government will give us this Committee, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and wise men on both sides of the House will be able to devise some system of taxation which will be just. The Mover of the Resolution said he did not believe that capital contributed its fair share. No, Sir, it pays more than it ought to do compared with the man whose labour pays nothing. If there is an adjustment, I predict that it will not be against capital, but as against the labour of these men whose votes are so eagerly touted for by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

*(5.37.) MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I must say I think the Income Tax a fair one when properly assessed. In collecting the tax from the land the principal collector has an annual salary, but all the sub-collectors are paid by poundage, therefore it is to their interest to raise the amount as much as possible. Generally speaking the Income Tax is assessed on the basis of the Poor Rate, but that rate is collected on the net value instead of the gross, and the difference between the net and the gross in regard to the poor rate varies from 15 to 25 per cent. according to whether it is assessed on land or houses. I should like to know why the Income Tax could not be collected in the same way. In the case of houses and cottages, as was pointed out by the hon. Member for St. Pancras, great expense has to be incurred in order to keep them in repair. All cottages must be kept in repair, but that being so, why should not some allowance be made from the gross assessment of the Income Tax in respect of them? If that were done no one would mind paying the tax. The Income Tax is a tax the people groan at in the country because they have to pay it without receiving that for which it is a consideration, namely, the rents. As to other securities, stocks for instance, the Income Tax is only paid on the net income. In regard to land you pay whether you receive income or whether you do not. Then, as to appeals, though you have to pay the tax in January the appeals do not come on for several months, and it is often months even after a successful appeal before you recover the money. That is a great hardship, especially in the case of farmers who farm their own land and who have to pay the property tax under Schedule A and then pay again under Schedule B for the same property though very often there is very little return from the property. With regard to what has been said as to a graduated scale of Income Tax, that sounds very plausible, and it might be a good thing if it could be carried out; but I do not think it would be practicable, because Englishmen would not stand the interference, and the prying into their incomes that would be necessary in order to carry the system out successfully. No man would like to be asked how much his income was, and the system would be considered too inquisitorial, and would not be popular. I wish strongly to urge on the Government the desirability of accepting the Motion, so that the Income Tax assessment may be made in a more reasonable manner.

*(5.44.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I think the House generally will share the regret expressed in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Bow at the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the present occasion; and if there is one Member of the House who regrets that more than another it is the unfortunate First Lord of the Treasury, who is bound to fill, however unsatisfactory, the place of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in order to answer the speeches made in support of the Motion before the House. I will do the best I can to give expression to what I believe to be the sentiments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the Motion. My hon. Friend has made a most interesting statement, and has exhibited the inequalities which prevail in regard to the Income Tax, and has dwelt upon the dissatisfaction which exists in many quarters as to the incidence and method of its collection. I fully admit the charges he has made, and I admit that there is a good deal of dissatisfaction. I am afraid it is hardly possible or conceivable that we could impose any tax of this character which would not create dissatisfaction, and which would not be disagreeable to the person who has to pay it. The fact of the case, however, is that the Income Tax is now regarded as one on which we must place considerable reliance in the adjustment of the finances of the country. It must be admitted that, under the able guardianship of past Chancellors of the Exchequer, the Income Tax has been a method by which great relief has been afforded to the industries of this country, and great advance has been made in the material prosperity of the country. I do not say that if we could do without it altogether it would not be a still greater advantage; but when we look back on the course of finance during the last 50 years, I think it must be admitted that, with all the inconveniences and all the dissatisfaction and all the inequalities, the Income Tax has, nevertheless, been an instrument by which enormous relief has been afforded to industry, and an enormous amount of pressure upon the general business and trade of the country has been averted. My hon. Friend spoke of the poor taxpayer. I sympathise with him most heartily in the appeal he has made on behalf of the poor taxpayer; but I observed in his speech, and that of the hon. Member for Bow, an absence of any allusion to the relief which the poor taxpayer obtains so far as Income Tax is concerned. The hon. Member for Poplar was the only speaker in the Debate who referred to that relief. As my hon. Friend knows, persons whose income is under £150 are exempt from the tax, and I believe this same class of persons are generally relieved from the House Tax, so that it cannot be said that the House of Commons, or past Chancellors of the Exchequer, have been insensible to the pressure which rests upon the poor taxpayer. But, in addition, up to £400 an allowance of £120 is made, so that a person having an income of £200 only pays on £80; a person having an income of £300 only on £180, and an income of £400 pays only on £280. It is, therefore, inaccurate to say that the circumstances and condition of the poorer middle class have not been considered by past Chancellors of the Exchequer. My hon. Friend referred to numerous Returns that have been made on this subject, and I think that he will not be surprised when I tell him that, not having expected to speak on this subject, I have not been able in the last two hours carefully to examine those Returns. But, no doubt, he is perfectly accurate when he comes to the general conclusion that there has been a decrease of large incomes as shown by the Income Tax Returns, and an increase of small incomes. But, instead of speaking of this as a matter for regret, I think that it will be a matter of satisfaction to the House that the Income Tax Returns disclose the fact that there is a large class which is increasing in wealth and coming within the purview of the Income Tax who, formerly, were not assessed because they did not possess incomes sufficiently large to render them liable to pay. I think, therefore, that my hon. Friend is under a misapprehension; it is not that these people have been dragged into the

Income Tax, but that they have risen into the payment of Income Tax, and that they are better able to bear a share of the taxation of the country than they were a few years ago, when they only paid indirect taxation. In fact, it is another evidence of the prosperity of the country in which we ought to rejoice. My hon. Friend spoke of the necessity of deducting all the expenses necessary to produce the income, and he is under the impression that sufficient allowance is not made in this respect in making up accounts to show what the income really is. I am under the impression that a tradesman in making out his income under Schedule D is fully justified in claiming any expenses he incurs in the production of that income, as a set-off against the gross income. It would be absurd that a man should not be entitled to set off as against gross income the wages paid, and the manufacturing costs he has incurred. I notice that in the first part of his Motion, and in his very moderate speech, my hon. Friend referred to the question of houses; that is to say, to realise property; but in his Motion he speaks of a different rate being imposed on income derived from realised capital to that derived from industry. But I would remind him that a house is realised capital. He proposes that there should be a deduction of 10 or 20 per cent. in the case of houses. But this is realised capital, and therefore my hon. Friend desires to make not only a reduction in favour of incomes derived from industry, but also desires to make a reduction on incomes derived from realised capital. I only refer to this to show the extreme difficulty of the subject in which my hon. Friend has embarked. He says that income derived from industry ought not to pay the same rate as income derived from realised capital, and at the same time he says that on incomes derived from realised capital there is to be a reduction. There have been cases of hardship in connection with the question of Income Tax which have been examined by Committees and Chancellors of the Exchequer in times past. I do not say that it is impossible to find remedies for these grievances; I know that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been examining and considering the question from every point of view.

But to say that there are grounds on which, without further examination, a Committee should be appointed to give relief to industrial incomes and to realised capital, I think would not be very wise. My hon. Friend referred to the case of houses which are assessed at an amount in excess of the rates paid. I know that is a considerable grievance—that it is a double grievance. It is more serious so far as the rates are concerned, for the rates may be 4s. or 5s., while the Income Tax is only 6d. in the £1; but that is a matter which can only be dealt with on the question of general valuation, but it shows the necessity of some measure dealing with valuation. My hon. Friend asked that depreciation shall be considered. I trust that at some time the Chancellor of the Exchequer will consider these hard cases; but if you go into the question of Income Tax it is not possible to avoid meeting with hard cases; but neither is it possible to deal with the matter from the point of view of hard cases, to remedy which past Chancellors of the Exchequer of great ability and great desire to meet all possible grounds of complaint have found it to be impossible so far as they were concerned. My hon. Friend spoke of the grievance of being assessed by the ordinary Commissioners or by the general Commissioners. If my hon. Friend can bring forward some plan that shall secure the taxpayer being assessed by a perfectly independent tribunal, I am sure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government will be only too glad to accede to his suggestion. Who are the Commissioners to whom there is an appeal? They are gentlemen nominated from the Commission appointed under the Land Act passed at the beginning of every Session. They are practically the nomination of the neighbourhood or district in which the taxpayer resides. I have not heard that there are any complaints against the system under which they are appointed, anomalous though it may be. The Land Act Commissioners appoint from among themselves every year gentlemen who act as Income Tax Commissioners. They receive appeals and attend to them. But I would remind my hon. Friend that the Income Taxpayer has an alternative if he wishes. There is a body of Commissioners at Somerset House, paid public officers, and if the taxpayer desires to be assessed by them, he is at full liberty to apply to them, and to decline to be assessed by the general Commissioners. He can also, on being assessed by the general Commissioners, appeal to the special Commissioners. I only mention this to show that though there may be trouble and a sense of injustice, such as all men feel who may consider that they are unfairly taxed, there are methods provided under the Income Tax Act by which they can get redress. They can appeal in their own neighbourhood if they choose, or they can appeal to a Government Department. I have gone into this to show what the present system is; I do not say that it is perfect, or incapable of amendment; and if my hon. Friend will only be so good as to suggest a better, we shall be very glad to consider it. My hon. Friend says, "Appoint a Committee." We have had Committees on this subject before, and I venture to submit to the House that a roving Committee to look for methods which are not even suggested by my hon. Friend is not likely to have any very satisfactory result. The suggestions and complaints which have been made have been brought forward on previous occasions, and were examined by strong Committees without any really satisfactory results. Now, Sir, the hon. Gentleman has contended that a distinction ought to be made between income derived from realised capital and income derived from industrial pursuits, but the hon. Gentleman has also indicated that past wealth ought to be relieved of some of the charge it already bears.

*MR. BARTLEY: I in no way intended to imply that. I stated with regard to houses that the net income of a house let at £50 a year is not £50. The expenses connected with it may be £10 or £20, but the income derived from that house would not be £50, but the smaller sum obtained after deducting the expenses.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Exactly so; but I think if you deduct 10 or 15 or 20 per cent. from the amount of past wealth you must find that amount somewhere else; and this means that for the accommodation and for the allowances you may make on industrial income, by some means or other, other people will have to pay an increased tax in the place of those who are relieved. I should like to mention one fact that has only been glanced at by the hon. Gentleman, and that is that the net Income Tax raised under Schedule D, which represents the industrial income of the country, is £5,500,000; but past wealth contributes in the shape of Death Duties and stamps on deeds and bonds no less a sum than £10,300,000 in the course of the year. My hon. Friend will say, "But that is a charge on past wealth." Well, Sir, it is a charge on the acquisition of property; it is a charge paid by realised capital, either in the shape of land or in the shape of movable property, every year; so that the duty on capital on death or transfer equals an additional Income Tax of 1s. in the £1—that is to say, 1s. in the £1 on the annual income derivable from realised capital. This is a fact which appears to be not very generally known, or if it is generally known it is one which has not been made a matter of observation. But, Sir, an impression obtains that this realised capital is in the possession of the rich people. I am perfectly ready to acknowledge that there are a great many rich people who possess a large amount of realised capital, but in dealing with it you must bear in mind that the enormous majority of owners of realised capital are poor people. If you lay down the principle that you are to tax realised capital at a rate exceeding 1s. in the £1, at which realised capital is now paying, you must consider the case of those who are dependent upon very small incomes derived from realised capital, and I will venture to suggest that there is hardly any class in the community who deserve more consideration and, I may say, commiseration than the class of poor persons with only a small income derived from realised capital. They have to educate children, and have no other means whatever of obtaining a livelihood by industry, owing to the absence of education, or to the fact that they are widows or orphans. We have hardly a conception, I think, of the large amount of capital which is held by poor persons in all the great industrial undertakings in the country. It is customary to speak of the great Railway Companies as the great financial enterprises of this country, but in reality the Railway Companies are trustees for a number of poor people, and, therefore, any legislation which we might contemplate should take into consideration the fact that the enjoyment of the incomes which such persons possess may be very seriously affected by a mistake made in reference to the character of the matter with which we are dealing. I have information from the Bank to the effect that in 1888 63,356 dividends were paid on amounts of Stock of £333 or under, 28,007 dividends on £666 and between that amount and £333, 56,983 dividends on amounts of Stock between £666 and £3,333. Here we have something like 150,000 dividends, each less than £100 per annum. I will only trouble the House with one more set of figures. In the case of depositors in the Post Office Savings Bank for the year ending December 31, 1889, the number of accounts was 46,993, and the amount of Stock held £4,175,634, making the average sum invested £88. I only mention these figures in order to induce the House not to deal rashly with what appears to be enormous realised wealth, for in doing so we should be creating a great hardship for these people. Now, Sir, my hon. Friend has also asked that the mode of collection should be inquired into. He objects, and objects with considerable force, against the principle under which poundage has been paid to clerks and collectors. Well, Sir, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has already made a statement with reference to that, and my hon. Friend has referred to it; but an inquiry into the system is no longer necessary, as it is to be abolished. We all agree that it is not a system that can be defended, and that it ought to be abolished. I do not know that I need detain the House any longer. In the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I can only say to my hon. Friend and the House what I believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer would say himself, and that is—that we think that this inquiry at the present moment would not be proper. We do not see that we could place before the Committee any scheme which would direct inquiry into a useful channel. I cannot help referring for a moment to the Report of the Committee which sat in 1861. In the Report of that Committee it is stated—

Mr. W. H. Smith

“The attention of your Committee on the present occasion has been mainly directed to another scheme proposed by their Chairman, and explained by him both in written memoranda and in oral evidence, the principal features of which appear to be as follows :—

“1. A proposal to make net instead of gross income the basis of assessment to the tax, not ascertaining the net income by an account of actual outgoings, but assuming it by a deduction, founded on an average, from certain classes of gross incomes.

“2. A proposal to divide all incomes into two classes, of which the one shall comprise incomes called spontaneous, and the other incomes called industrial, and to tax the former upon the full amount of the net income and the latter upon two-thirds of that amount.

“3. A proposal to distinguish in certain cases between the interest of invested capital and the repayment by instalments of the invested capital itself, and to levy the tax upon the interest only, and not upon the repaid portions of the capital.”

Now, Sir, this Committee, which everyone will admit was a strong Committee, by a majority of 7 to 2, came to this conclusion—

“Your Committee, however, after full consideration, have arrived at the conclusion that the plan proposed by their Chairman does not afford a basis for a practicable and equitable readjustment of the Income Tax, and they feel so strongly the dangers and ill-consequences to be apprehended from an attempt to unsettle the present basis of the tax, without a clear perception of the mode in which it is to be reconstructed, that they are not prepared to offer to your honourable House any suggestions for its amendment. This tax having now been made the subject of investigation before two Committees, and no proposal for its amendment having been found satisfactory, your Committee are brought to the conclusion that the objections which are urged against it are objections to its nature and essence rather than to the particular shape which has been given to it.”

The members of that Committee were Mr. Hubbard, the Chancellor of the Exchequer (then Mr. Gladstone, I think), Mr. Cardwell, Mr. Sotherton-Estcourt, Mr. Lowe, Mr. Baxter, Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir William Heathcote, Mr. Pollard-Urquhart, Mr. Cave, Sir F. Heygate, and Mr. Crawford. I think it will be admitted that that was as strong a Committee as could be nominated at the present day, and, for my part, I am inclined to think that that Committee arrived at a just conclusion. I am inclined to think that the hardships of the Income Tax, so far as they exist, can only be dealt with successfully by a Chancellor of the Exchequer with a full sense of his personal responsibility, and with a full desire to remedy any grievance that may be supposed to exist. I am sure the present Chancellor of the Exchequer is fully conscious of that responsibility, and I know that the subject has engaged his attention for a long time past. I know, moreover, that he is not the man to hastily make any recommendation to the House, and I earnestly ask the House not to imperil the basis on which the Income Tax stands, but to leave to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government entire and complete responsibility for the financial arrangements that may be necessary from time to time. In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon (Mr. Gray), perhaps I may be allowed to add that if any improvement is shown to be possible with regard to appeals in country districts, it shall certainly be made.

(6.15.) The House divided :—Ayes 106; Noes 161.—(Div. List, No. 63.)

CAPITAL AND LABOUR.

(6.29.) MR. E. W. BECKETT (York, N.R., Whitby), who had upon the Paper the following Resolution :—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the Board of Trade should appoint a Standing Committee, as far as possible representative of the interests of Capital and Labour, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and report upon all strikes, lock-outs, and disputes of a public character between employers and the employed; that this Committee be authorised to arbitrate between the contending parties if requested by both sides to do so; and that it have power to appoint Sub-Committees to assist it in the performance of its duties,” said: Sir, if any justification were needed for my not troubling the House with the Motion that I put upon the Paper four weeks ago, it is to be found in the announcement in the newspapers this morning of the decision of the Government to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the relation between capital and labour. The publication of their decision has, as it were, taken the wind out of my sails, but still the right thing has been done. I am not at all disposed to cavil or to complain because the decision has been announced in a way which discouraged the Debate which I wished to raise. Of course, under the circumstances, I do not feel justified in moving my Resolution, but perhaps I may be allowed to console myself with the reflection that my Motion has helped to stimulate the Government to take action on the labour question. In conclusion, I should like to express the hope that the deliberations of the Commission will not be unduly prolonged, because I feel that the matters with which the Commission had to deal are pressing and acute and ought to be remedied without any loss of time.

Mr. W. H. Smith

RAILWAY SERVANTS (HOURS OF LABOUR).

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the Select Committee on Railway Servants (Hours of Labour) do consist of Twenty-four Members.”

(6.34) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I hope the Government will not press this Motion to-night, but that hon. Members may have an opportunity of substituting the names of other gentlemen in the place of some of those whom the Government propose to nominate on the Committee. Out of 24 Members whose names appear on the Paper, at least seven are directors of Railway Companies, some of which companies have a very disgraceful record. I should like to strike out the names of both Conservatives and Liberals, and to replace them by the names of gentlemen who are not Directors of Railways. I should especially like to see more Labour Members on the Committee. At present it is proposed to appoint only one Labour Member on the Committee. I shall certainly object to the appointment of Mr. A. Gathorne-Hardy, who sits on the Conservative side, and of Mr. Mac Innes, who sits on our own side of the House, and propose some Labour Member in their stead. I think the Whips have made a very unwise selection. To make men judges of their own cause is quite preposterous. I trust we shall be afforded the opportunity of putting other names on the Paper.

*(6.36.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I hope that the Government will not press for the appointment of the Committee to-day. There is only one Metropolitan Member on the list of the proposed Committee. Having regard to the fact that the Metropolis has five millions of people and the termini of all the great railways, with tens of thousands of resident railway men, the Metropolis will be inadequately represented unless a change is made in the list.

*(6.37.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I hope the Motion will be adjourned, in order that an endeavour may be made to secure upon the Committee the presence of more Members representing the workmen.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): This Committee has been selected in the ordinary way by the Whips. I do not understand the objection to the presence of Railway Directors on the Committee. If there are seven Directors on a Committee of 24 Members, that does not appear to me to be an unfair proportion, having regard to the fact that the Committee is to be appointed to consider a matter of special importance to the Railway Companies. The railway servants will be adequately represented by hon. Members who represent places in which railway servants reside, and who have taken up the question from their point of view. I do not agree that the Metropolis should have any special number of representatives on this Committee, for the rest of the country is rather more interested in this question than the Metropolis. It is very desirable that the Committee should begin its labours as soon as possible; and if it is not appointed this evening, it will be impossible to say when another opportunity of appointing it will occur. Therefore, we feel we must proceed with the Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Sir M. Hicks Beach, Mr. Channing, Mr. Radcliffe Cooke, Mr. Crawford, and Baron Henry De Worms nominated Members of the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Alfred Gathorne-Hardy be one other Member of the Committee."

DR. CLARK: I beg to move to leave out the name of Mr. A. Gathorne-Hardy. The hon. Member is a Director of a Company that has one of the most disgraceful records in connection with the overwork of servants. I shall at the proper time move that the name of Mr. Baumann be substituted, that hon. Member being, I understand, neither a Railway Director nor a shareholder.

(6.42.) The House divided: Ayes 174; Noes 69.—(Div. List, No. 64.)

Mr. Herbert Gladstone, Mr. Heneage, and Mr. Howorth nominated other Members of the Committee.

*(6.53.) MR. MORTON: I should like to know whether it would be in order to ask these Gentlemen if they are Railway Directors or holders of Railway Stock.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman can object to any particular name.

*MR. MORTON: I want to know whether I should be in order in asking such a question from each of them.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. MacInnes be one other Member of the Committee."

DR. CLARK: This is the first of the Railway Directors who sits on this side of the House. I have already objected to the name of an hon. Gentleman sitting on the opposite side of the House, and in order to show there is no Party feeling in this matter, I shall take a Division on the name of a gentleman belonging to our own Party. From this side of the House there are two Railway Directors and one Labour Member; if there had been two Labour Members and one Railway Director the proportion would have been fairer.

(6.54.) MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I think the Government have been very unfortunate in the selection of the Committee. Several Gentlemen whose names appear on the list have either spoken or written against the movement of the railway servants. One of the Gentlemen it is proposed to put on the Committee has written a very strong article, which appeared in the Nineteenth Century, in denunciation of railway servants, and he is also a Railway Director. If the President of the Board of Trade is really anxious that this Committee shall give satisfaction, he will consent to adjourn the appointment of the Committee, so as to give hon. Members an opportunity of arriving at an amicable settlement. I beg to move the adjournment of the Debate.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: I beg to second the Motion of the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Fenwick.)

(6.55.) The House divided:—Ayes 71; Noes 151.—(Div. List, No. 65.)

Original Question again proposed.

(7.5.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I hope the Government will not press the appointment of the Committee to night. It is quite obvious that a mistake has been made, although, I believe quite unintentionally. The idea in composing Committees is to represent the interests of the House proportionately to the Members. According to that standard, as the Railway Directors in the House are as one in 13, it is quite sufficient to have on this Committee two Railway Directors. But we find there are to be eight Railway Directors, which is one in three, as against one in 13. It is easy to understand how this arisen. Railway Directors have operated upon the four different Parties in the House, who are interested in the formation of Committees, each of the Parties has secured its Representatives, and, therefore, Railway Directors have exactly four times too much representation on the Committee. There is only one Representative of Labour out of the 24. It would be much more satisfactory, and would have a better result in the long run if the Government would postpone the further nomination of the Committee in order that there may be a better adjustment of the two classes.

*(7.7.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not think that what the hon. Member has said is quite fair to those who composed the Committee. He described Railway Directors as a class of Members in this House, and Representatives of Labour as another class, and said there is only one Member representing the latter class on the Committee. There are many members of this Committee who represent labour, if having a great majority of the working class in their constituencies can fairly be called representing labour. No doubt the hon. Member for Aberdeen refers to those Members who, being connected with labour organisations, are called "Labour Representatives." He complains that not more than one of those is appointed on this Committee. That is not the fault of Her Majesty's Government, for it so happens unfortunately that those Gentlemen sit on the other side of the House. So far as the Government are concerned, we are perfectly willing to agree that two more Members shall be appointed on the Committee, and that one of them shall be one of the gentlemen to whom the hon. Member refers. I hope that, for the sake of enabling the Committee to proceed in its work, the Motion for the adjournment of our proceedings will not be pressed.

(7.9.) SIR E. J. REED (Cardiff): I should like to say that I personally have no desire to sit on the Committee, but having evinced a strong sympathy with the railway servants on a remarkable occasion recently, I felt when asked to serve on the Committee that I could not rightly refuse. But in justice to those who constitute the Committee I am bound to say it is in that sense and for that reason that I am nominated. As to the question of Labour Representatives, there is considerable truth in what has been said by the President of the Board of Trade. It is not fair for the House to assume that there are no Labour Representatives but those connected with the workmen themselves. I have done what few men in the House have done. I have served seven years' apprenticeship to a trade. I have been intimately associated with the labouring classes for that reason, and I claim to be as good, true, and competent a representative of the working classes of this country as any man in this House. It is a little hurtful to one like myself who has been associated all his life with the working classes, and who has evinced sympathy with the men in the recent railway strike, to be told that he is unfit to represent the railway servants.

*(7.12.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): Those of us who sympathise with the railway servants have a right to complain of the composition of this Committee as arranged by the Whips on both sides of the House, for there are only two out of the 24 Members who are known sympathisers with the railway servants. There are four gentlemen against whom, personally, I have not a word to say, but who made manifest the other day their very strong opposition to the action of railway employés. In the interest of the men, I protest against the constitution of this Committee. The Report of a Committee so constituted is a foregone conclusion against the railway servants.

Mr. ATKINSON (Boston): Why should there be known sympathisers with either side on the Committee? The fact is, we here are as much in touch with the working men as those who are supposed to be the special representatives of working men.

Mr. BURT (Morpeth): I entirely agree with the President of the Board of Trade and the hon. Member for Cardiff that the representatives of the working man are not confined to those who are usually called Labour Members. I personally do not object that there is only one so called Labour Member on this Committee, but I think there are far too many Railway Directors on the Committee. I think it is quite evident a mistake has been made in the constitution of the Committee; but I do not think it would be helpful to us to prolong the controversy on this occasion. I, for my part, am perfectly satisfied with the suggestion made by the President of the Board of Trade to add two Members to the Committee, one of whom shall be a so-called Labour Representative. I think, perhaps, the President of the Board of Trade has suggested a way of meeting the difficulty and preventing our wasting an evening in an unprofitable, acrimonious, and necessarily personal controversy.

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. Mac Neill and Mr. McLaren nominated other Members of the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Sir Herbert Maxwell be one other Member of the Committee."

(7.19.) Dr. CLARK: I shall not trouble the House any further, because I think the suggestion of the President of the Board of Trade is a fair one. It might be desirable to change the composition of the Committee by and bye. The hon. Baronet is a Director of a Scottish Railway Company, and he has written strongly in regard to the recent dispute. I think the Committee should not contain a partisan from either side—it should be an unbiassed jury before whom evidence should be freely given. The hon. Baronet has, however, committed himself to a strong opinion, in an article in a review. He is a Director, as 50 per cent. of the Members suggested on the other side are.

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. Milvain, Mr. Muntz, Mr. Murdoch, Mr. John O'Connor, Sir Joseph Pease, Sir Edward Reed, Mr. Somervell, Sir George Trevelyan, Sir Henry Tyler, Mr. Vernon, and Mr. John Wilson nominated other Members of the Committee.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That seven be the quorum.

Mr. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman when he proposes to place the additional names before the House?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: In the course of a day or two.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CHEAP TRAINS (LONDON) BILL.

(No. 65.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(7.25.) Mr. THEOBALD (Essex, Romford): The Bill, the Second Reading of which I have the honour to propose, is a short and simple one, and few words are necessary in explanation. The necessity for workmen's trains has been recognised by the Cheap Trains Act of 1883, which requires Railway Companies to provide proper and sufficient workmen's trains at such fares and at such times after 6 p.m. and before 8 a.m. as may appear to the Board of Trade to be reasonable. There has, however, been some difficulty in ascertaining the reasonableness, there has been an unwillingness to incur the expense, and I am not aware that the Board of Trade has ever been moved in the matter. The object of the Bill is to make it obligatory on the Railway Companies having a terminus in London to run workmen's trains within a radius of 12 miles from the London terminus, arriving at the terminus before 8 o'clock, the tickets being available for the return journey by any train departing from the terminus after 5 p.m. on the day of issue, and after 12 noon on Saturdays, and to fix for the passengers a maximum return fare of one halfpenny per mile of the distance between the station and the terminus. At present the Great Eastern Company runs workmen's trains to and from Liverpool Street and Enfield, a distance of 11 miles, for a return fare of 2d., and the Directors admit that the trains pay when full. The fare to and from Elstree is 6d., a distance of 12 miles; Barking, eight miles, 3d.; and when the Hotel Metropole was being built at Brighton, I believe trains were run to and from London for workmen for 8d. per day. It is of great advantage to the working men, as well as to their families, that they should live in the country. If there is anything that tends to show the advantage of this, it is the presence among us of that unwelcome guest—no stranger and whom your authority, Mr. Speaker, cannot cause to withdraw—I mean the fog. It may be said that this same fog might prevent the carriage of the working classes quickly and punctually to their work in the early hours of the morning, but I may mention that a recent telephonic invention will enable two trains rapidly travelling on the same line to maintain a given distance without danger of accident. I do not think I need elaborate the advantages of such a system of cheap trains, the object of the Bill is well understood and I hope the House will give it a Second Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Theobald.)

* (7.28.) MR. MAPLE (Camberwell, Dulwich): The object of the Bill is to make clear what the maximum charge of the Railway Companies for these workmen's trains is. The Act of 1883 provides that within the hours specified trains for workmen shall be run on terms that may appear reasonable to the Board of Trade, and, of course, the Board would not require such trains to run unless there were passengers to carry. But the all-important item in the arrangement is the fare charged, because it is obviously out of the question that an ordinary workman can afford to pay at the rate of 1d. a mile for distances up to 12 miles. Owing to the present system of charges for workmen travelling on the railways, houses for working men are not being built to the extent that they ought to be outside the Metropolis. Many of the Railway Companies have recognised the fact that workmen's trains do pay while running at a lower figure than the statutory 1d. a mile; and something is being done even now to give workmen an opportunity of breathing fresh air and enjoying the country. But the object of the Bill is to fix a maximum charge, and it is better for Parliament to do this than the Board of Trade. The Bill would not be required if the Board of Trade would fix a maximum charge on its own account. Wage-earners are bound to regard railway fares as so much added to rent. If the workers in London could be carried a little further afield, as they might easily be in a very short time, they would be enabled to live under much more healthy and pleasant conditions than they do at present. The Bill does not take away from the Board of Trade any of its present powers. From having looked thoroughly into the figures I am convinced that a return fare of one halfpenny a mile is a remunerative one to the companies. Indeed, this was demonstrated by a speech of the Chairman of the Great Eastern Railway, in which he stated that the 2d. return fares between Enfield and London—10½ miles the single journey—paid the company when the trains were filled. This Bill fixes a maximum which would allow 5½d. to be charged for such a distance as that which is found to be remunerative at 2d. When one goes over a block of workmen's dwellings and sees the height some poor creatures have to climb in order to reach their rooms, one cannot but wish they were nearer the ground, as they might be in the country with those little gardens which are of such an advantage. But it is only with the co-operation of the Railway Companies they can be carried out of London. No doubt the President of the Board of Trade has at heart the interests of these poor people; but he must also have regard to the interests of the Railway Companies; and, therefore, if the House fixes the maximum fares at certain hours, we may see a greater development of cheap trains, which the working classes are petitioning for in large numbers, one petition presented to-day having 2,000 signatures attached to it. I second the Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Theobald

*(7.32.) SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): Although I am a Railway Director, I am not a Director of any Metropolitan Railway affected by this Bill. It is a philanthropic Bill on the face of it; but if you examine it you find that it is an example of a nice, easy, and cheap way of doing good, after the manner of A saying that B ought to hand something over to C. Hon. Members think it is a very nice thing to get something out of the Metropolitan Railway Companies for the good of their constituents, but I think the effect of this proposal will be that instead of giving them something, they will take away from them privileges they already have. The Bill as I read it will give the power to take away a privilege that is now possessed, for it will enable the Great Eastern Railway Company to charge 5½d. where they now charge 2d. for carrying class traffic to Enfield. The hon. Member has mentioned these trains by which passengers are carried 21 miles for 2d., but he proposes by this Bill that the companies shall all have power for that distance which is now charged 2d. by the Great Eastern Company to charge 5½d. The Board of Trade has at this moment power to regulate such traffic, and such—

MR. MAPLE: No, the Great Eastern Company have to run those trains under statutory enactment; they are workmen's trains run under certain conditions imposed when the company obtained their Act for the Liverpool Street station, and they cannot be altered.

SIR J. PEASE: I am aware of the special provision inserted in that Act. Let me tell the House what is the actual position of these Metropolitan lines. This Bill would lay down a hard and fast line for all Railway Companies as to maximum fares before and after certain hours. Under present arrangements, the remission of passenger duty to the companies depends upon their running workmen's trains after 6 p.m. and before 8 a.m. Now, irrespective of what any of the companies have done or are doing, the evening hour is to be changed to 5 o'clock. If this takes anything from the Railway Companies, the Bill makes no provision for supplying the abstraction out of these fares. But the supporters of the Bill pretend that it will be for the advantage of the companies, but surely the House can leave the Railway Companies to look after themselves? I think I can show that the Railway Companies have been able to do this while they do carry on a cheap and speedy traffic in the interest of the working classes. If anything is taken from the companies it will simply be off the net earnings of the companies over and above the present working expenses. The existing Act of 1883 has established an arrangement by which when a company goes to the Board of Trade to obtain some remission from the passenger duty the Board of Trade says—"Yes, we are quite ready to take off a portion of the duty, provided you take off something from your fares and facilitate the carriage of the working classes to and from the country." These trains arrive in London before 8 and leave after 6 in the evening. This Bill says the return trains are to be run after 5 p.m.—an hour when very few working men can, under the present hours of employment, reach the stations. That is the very time at which the rolling stock of the companies is taxed to the utmost at present, and it will be impossible for them to find carriages, and opportunity for running additional trains. If cheap trains are run at 5 o'clock it will be impossible for the companies to distinguish between the working classes and other classes, and people who now pay ordinary fares will use the workman's train. There is not so much objection to the farthing a mile fare as there is to the inconvenience occasioned. Possibly the trains might pay the companies, but everything would be disarranged by the congestion of the traffic, and there would be more blocks than Members know now occur on the Metropolitan lines at that hour. The powers of the Board of Trade are now ample. The Board has the power to take away all remission of duty from a company if the company does not comply with the Board's behest, and run sufficient workmen's trains at such fares and at such times before 8 and after 6 as to the Board of Trade may appear reasonable. The circumstances of each line vary, the geographical conditions vary, gradients differ, and the powers of working traffic are dissimilar. Parliament has, therefore, vested discretion in the Board of Trade. But the Bill proposes to take out of the hands of the Board of Trade this power that has been so carefully and usefully exercised. The hon. Member would deprive the working classes of the means of obtaining that consideration through the Board of Trade which they now possess. The Bill will subject the companies to the greatest inconvenience, not for the sake of bond fide working men, but for the sake of the class above them who are able to leave business at 5 o'clock and at 12 o'clock on Saturdays. If the companies do not run the trains that are required, there is at present the power of complaining to the Board of Trade. As far as I can find out, after extensive inquiries, few or no complaints have been made to the Board of Trade, and I therefore regard this proposed legislation as perfectly gratuitous, and unlikely to do any service to the working classes. The number of passengers carried last year in the workmen's trains by the various Metropolitan Companies is as follows:—The East London, 69,000; the Great Eastern, 6,100,000; the Great Northern, 1,400,000; the Great Western, 647,000; the North Western, 114,000; the North London, 470,000; the London, Chatham and Dover, 1,477,000; the Tilbury and Southend, 557,000; the Metropolitan, 1,670,000; the Metropolitan District, 800,000; and the Midland, 500,000. In addition many of these Companies issue cheap weekly return tickets. I think these figures show that the legislation of 1883 has been eminently successful. The Railway Companies have satisfied the legitimate demands of the working classes in the neighbourhood of London, and their only difficulty now is that their stations are too small for the enormously increasing traffic. There has not been, so far as I am aware, a single reference to the Board of Trade or the Railway Commission in respect to the power the Board and the Commissioners have of taking away by certificate remissions of Passenger Duty. There is no difficulty or expense in putting the Board of Trade in motion; it is simply a matter of complaint which is at once investigated at the public expense. The companies have given the travellers before 8 and after 6 cheap fares, and in many thousands of cases these are not the working classes only, but for residents who take advantage of the cheap fares to go to London. I may just observe that the London County Council may, as a representative body, be supposed to know the requirements of those they represent, and they propose that the present time should remain unaltered. I hope the House will refuse a Second Reading to the Bill which will give no advantages to the public beyond those they can now secure, while it will be most unjust to the companies who have done so much, to meet the requirements of the working class traffic in the suburbs of London.

Sir J. Pease

*(7.50.) SIR H. TYLER (Great Yarmouth): It is quite true that, as the hon. Baronet opposite has stated, that the Great Eastern Company carried last year some 6,000,000 of passengers from Enfield and intermediate stations to London and back at the maximum fare of 2d., and I may add that there is no Metropolitan service carried out with more punctuality than this workmen's traffic, which begins at 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning, continues until 8, and returns after 5 in the evening. The Great Eastern Company are now enlarging their Liverpool Street Station, and are spending £1,500,000 on this work and on the approaches from various directions, including the provision of special platforms for this workmen traffic. I think I may fairly claim for the Great Eastern Company that they have done their duty towards, and much to encourage, the working class traffic. The hon. Member who introduced the Bill has, as I understood him, admitted there is no reason for the Bill by admitting that the Railway Companies have done so much to meet the object he desires to secure. That is to a great extent the case. The Act of 1883 was a compromise, there was a great deal of discussion over it, and the result arrived at was a compromise between the demand of those who advocated cheap trains and the views of the Railway Companies. But there appears to be no finality in these matters. The greater the exertions a Railway Company may make in the interests of the public the more is demanded. Already the Great Eastern Railway have done much more than they were compelled to do; and it is discouraging, under these circumstances, to be continually met with fresh legislation. I must say, in regard to what passed earlier in the evening, that there are Railway Directors who act more strongly in the interest of the working classes than the so-called Labour Members. There are Railway Directors who are just as anxious for the welfare of their servants as the Labour Representatives, and who actually do more for their welfare than those who make so much noise about the matter. I do not think that the Bill will benefit the community, as it provides for the companies charging higher fares than they are actually charging now; it is unfair to the companies who have done so much, it discourages further efforts in the same direction, and I hope the House will reject the Motion for Second Reading.

(7.55.)* MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): The hon. Member who has just spoken made a very emphatic statement that he, as a Railway Director, in common with many Railway Directors, was very much more sincere in the desire to benefit the travelling public than the so-called Labour Representatives.

SIR H. TYLER: I did not say more sincere.

MR. CREMER: Did more for them—that is sufficient for the purpose of my argument. The hon. Gentleman then went on to prove his sincerity by opposing the Bill.

SIR H. TYLER: I said nothing about sincerity.

MR. CREMER: I am not putting the word into the mouth of the hon. Member, I simply say that he went on to show his sincerity by opposing the Bill. But, I proceed to say a few words upon the Bill itself. I am not quite sure that the Bill if passed would be of great advantage to the working classes of the Metropolis. It is not at all clear that in some instances it would not lead to an increase of fares on some suburban lines. But the workmen on some lines do travel under considerable difficulty by these cheap trains, and I am inclined to think that the subject is of such importance that it might well be submitted to the investigation of a Select Committee. There is an absolute necessity for some better provision than now exists for the conveyance of working men into and out of London, and this is evident to anybody who knows anything of the requirements of our working class population in London. A very pressing reason is found in the increasing rentals the poor have to pay for miserable house accommodation. Notwithstanding the philanthropic efforts of individuals and public bodies to supply the demands for cheap and healthy dwellings, the rents are advancing year by year, and, of course, to travel out of town means adding the fare to the amount of the rent. A very important consideration is the health of a man's family. I believe it is found to be a fact that when a man leaves the country and settles in London, in two or three generations the children become stunted in size, and their health becomes more feeble. To some extent the demand has been met by some of our Railway Companies, but it has been met in a very grudging spirit. The people who come in by the early trains in the morning are brought in at a cheap rate by Companies who, some of them, fix the hour of departure and arrival in the Metropolis at the most inconvenient periods in the 24 hours. The hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pease) stated that it was not only workmen who travel by the workmen's trains. Well, any hon. Member who chooses to go to a railway terminus in London at 6 o'clock in the morning can judge for himself whether the workmen's trains are filled with workmen or not. No one, unless he were absolutely compelled, would think of getting up at 5 o'clock in the morning—and it is necessary in order to catch these trains to get up at that hour.

SIR J. PEASE: I did not say that workmen did not very largely use these trains, but that others besides workmen availed themselves of them, and that a great many ordinary passengers would wait for them in the evening, if the hour was altered to 5 o'clock, and in that way cause a congestion of traffic.

MR. CREMER: The hon. Baronet said that a percentage of people who travelled by these trains after 5 o'clock in the evening were not workmen at all.

No doubt there is such a percentage, but I believe it is an exceedingly small one and not worth bothering about. The people who travel by these trains, as a rule, are packed like herrings in a barrel. The carriages are so full that the unfortunate travellers are nearly suffocated. I have had to travel by these trains myself, and can, therefore, bear testimony to these facts—though I should be sorry to be the means of tempting any Member of this House to get into a compartment containing 12, 14, or even 16 passengers. No person who can afford to pay the ordinary fare would think of travelling by the workmen's trains, because of the way the workmen are treated by the Railway Companies. If we are to tempt the working classes to live out of London under those healthier conditions that we are all so desirous of seeing applied to this class of people, the Railway Companies will have to provide a larger number of trains, and trains running a little later in the morning. That is one of the difficulties that would have to be surmounted, and I think if the Railway Companies were approached in the matter, and there were some uniform rule laid down by some authority, that the companies could be induced to overcome the difficulty, and to meet the working classes in a spirit of equity and fair play. In reply to the argument of the hon. Baronet, it occurs to me that if there is a percentage of travellers by these workmen's trains who are not workmen, that if the companies gave increased facilities to third-class passengers they would cease to travel by these trains. Possibly there is a percentage of travellers by these trains—who do not work with their hands. There are hundreds and thousands of clerks in the Metropolis who receive salaries somewhat above those of the ordinary day labourer and artisan, and whom we should be anxious to assist in the direction the Bill indicates. They are people who cannot afford to take first-class season tickets. They would gladly live out of London in the pure air if facilities were granted them by the Railway Companies. There are a few Railway Companies who grant third-class season tickets, and I think the system is found to be attended with very satisfactory results. If all the Companies would adopt the system, they would find their dividends largely increase, for after all it is the third-class passenger who is the most profitable to the Railway Company. Any one who travels on our great Metropolitan trunk lines must have observed that generally the third-class carriages are packed so that the passengers can hardly breathe, that the second-class carriages have very few in them, and that the first-class carriages are almost empty. Why then should not the companies be compelled to grant third-class return tickets to those who desire to avail themselves of them? Even if they did, it would be found that much more would be paid in proportion by the third-class season ticket holders than by those holding first and second-class season tickets. It has been stated that the first-class season ticket holders, who travel between London and Brighton, do so at the rate of a farthing a mile, whereas the third-class passengers are only permitted to travel at the rate of 1d. per mile. I cannot for the life of me imagine how such a state of things can be allowed to continue by a sensible body of men, even from a pecuniary point of view. If the companies were compelled to grant these third-class season tickets, I think the third-class travellers who cannot be described as workmen, would cease to use the workmen's trains and would gladly avail themselves of the season tickets. This question is so important to hundreds of thousands of people in the Metropolis, and to the shareholders of the Railway Companies, that I think it would be worth while to wait a little. I hope the promoters of the Bill are not too anxious to press their views on the House just now, but will be willing to receive evidence and have it presented to the House, so that later on we may legislate in a much clearer atmosphere than that we are in at present. I, therefore, submit that the best thing we can do is to refer this Bill to a Select Committee in order to see whether some measure can be framed which will be satisfactory at once to the public and to the shareholders. (8.10.)

Mr. Cremer

(8.35.) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): As my name is on the back of this Bill, and as the subject is one in which I feel a good deal of interest, I desire to say a few words in support of the measure. The hon. Baronet who spoke from the opposite Benches, but who has lately left the House, has stated that we Metropolitan Members want to get something out of the Railway Companies for the benefit of our constituents. In one sense that is true. We consider that as the Railway Companies enjoy large privileges they ought in return to pay something in the nature of a toll to the public, and that they ought to be compelled to make certain arrangements for the convenience of the very large number of working men who are at the present moment obliged to live in the outlying parts of the Metropolis. The hon. Baronet spoke of the matter in the true spirit of a Railway Director. He said we want to take the regulation of cheap traffic out of the hands of the Board of Trade. That also is partially, but not wholly, true; because, by the ninth clause of the Bill, we still leave in the hands of the Board of Trade the power to vary or rescind any Order they may see fit to deal with under the Act. I certainly think we ought to take the question of cheap traffic out of the hands of the Board of Trade, and for this reason. The Cheap Trains Act of 1883 has not been altogether a dead letter—I am far from saying that—but, on the other hand, it is quite true that the Board of Trade has not acted so often nor so energetically as it might have done in the direction of compelling the companies to run a sufficient number of workmen's trains in and out of London. A year or two ago I presented a Petition from a large body of my constituents, praying the Board of Trade, under the Act of 1883, to cause an inquiry to be made as to the reason why the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company did not run more workmen's trains, and, if possible, to make an order on that company to remedy this. Well, Sir, I do not know what the Board of Trade did with that Petition, but I know that I have never heard a word about it from that day to this; and I am also aware that the number of workmen's trains run by that company is not large enough to satisfy my constituents. I give this as one of the reasons why the matter should be taken out of the hands of the Board of Trade, who are sluggish, and ought to put a little more pressure on the Railway Companies. The question before us is: Are the railway facilities for the convenience of workmen at the present time sufficient, having regard to what is the population of London? I maintain that they are not. Doubtless, if all the companies who run trains into London were as liberal as the Great Eastern Company we should have no occasion to complain, because that company runs no fewer than 49 workmen's trains in and out of London. But their example is by no means followed by the other companies. For instance, the Great Northern Railway Company run only six, and the Great Western Company none. I am, however, informed by an hon. Friend of mine who is a Director of the Great Western Company that they do run workmen's trains over the metals of the Metropolitan and District Railways, and that these are included in the latter's return; so that it is not, perhaps, fair to say that the Great Western Company run no workmen's trains. Then, I find that the North Western Company run only five workmen's trains, and the Midland Company only one, and that at 5 o'clock in the morning, arriving in London at 5.33. My old friend the South Eastern Railway Company, runs only six trains a day. The London, Tilbury, and Southend, running from Barking to Fenchurch Street and through the districts in which are resident great numbers of the middle and working classes, only run four workmen's trains. I do not think it is unreasonable to say that that is not a sufficient compliance with the Act of 1883. On the one hand the Railway companies have not done their duty, and on the other, the Board of Trade have been deficient in not compelling the companies to do their duty by exercising the power which they possess under the Act of 1883. I heartily support the Bill, and I hope it may be read a second time. The hon. Baronet opposite said there was no great desire or demand for this Bill. Though a Railway Director, the hon. Baronet represents a constituency remote from London, and he will, perhaps, allow that Metropolitan Members are better authorities than himself as to the wishes of Londoners on this subject. I can tell him that the working classes of London and neighbourhood are keenly interested in this Bill; and look forward to its passing with the greatest wishfulness, and with the certain belief that it will confer upon them a great boon. I agree with the hon. Member for Shoreditch that further evidence is required before the Bill becomes law, but the readiest way to obtain that evidence is to read the Bill a second time and refer it to a Select Committee.

(8.48.)* SIR C. RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I see that the Bill is endorsed with the names of 10 Members of Parliament, and I certainly expected to find a Bill of more consequence than the present, and one which would actually do something effectual towards remedying the deficiencies which, I cordially agree with hon. Members opposite, really exist. I notice that a very scanty proportion of those hon. Members who endorsed the Bill mark their interest in it by being present to support it. I confess, also, that the speech of my hon. and learned Friend leads me to the conclusion that a great many of the hon. Members whose names are on the back of the Bill have not read it. Why am I afraid that the hon. and learned Member himself has not read it? Knowing his acuteness, I think he would not have made the speech—with which speech I thoroughly agree—had he read the Bill. Does the hon. Member observe that the Bill would not in the least assist him in obtaining redress for the constituency which he represents? There is not a single word in it to increase the number of trains to be forwarded. So far as my hon. and learned Friend has spoken of the insufficiency of the number of trains, and the deficient accommodation, I thoroughly agree with him. I very frequently travel by the North London and the Great Eastern, and I have always observed that the workmen's trains are exceedingly crowded, almost as many standing as have found seats in a compartment. The natural remedy for that is an increase in the number of trains. But this Bill will not move the subject one inch forward; it does not touch the point. I should be very sorry to oppose any effort in the direction of increasing the workmen's train accommodation, but this scheme which is put forward is exceedingly inadequate, and falls far short of the objects the promoters have in view. My hon. and learned Friend said the Board of Trade was lethargic. I would suggest that the proper remedy is to put pressure on the Board of Trade, which means the President of the Board of Trade in this House, or out of it, to give full effect to the power which Parliament has emphatically conferred upon the Department by Sub-section 2, Sec. 3, of the Act of 1883, to see that Railway Companies provide at such fares as the Board of Trade think reasonable sufficient railway accommodation for working men travelling to and from their work, as well as for their other passengers. Even the hon. Member for Dulwich pointed out that in one instance the Bill might have the effect of increasing the fare. While I wish joy to efforts which are effectually aimed at remedying the evils complained of, and while I do not wish to vote against this Bill, I am bound to observe that I think the measure deals with a very small part of the difficulty, and I greatly doubt whether it is worth the labour which has been bestowed upon it by the 10 Members whose names are on the back of the Bill, but who are not present here to support it.

Mr. Baumann

(8.55.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

(8.58.)* MR. T. H. BOLTON: While this Bill will not do all that the working classes desire, it will do something in the direction of giving them cheaper trains at more convenient times than at present. Cheap fares would be of enormous advantage to a great number of persons who work in warehouses and factories—clerks and others besides working men—whose incomes are small, and who have to get to their business in the City in the morning, before 8 o'clock many of them, and leave about 5 or 6 o'clock in the evening. I cannot help thinking that the hon. Baronet and hon. Gentlemen opposite do not quite realise the duties of Railway Companies to the public. In consideration of the monopoly they have they are bound to provide for the requirements of the public, and as those requirements increase, the Railway Companies must keep pace with them. It is admitted that under pressure certain companies are doing a good deal to meet the public requirements, and, surely, if further pressure were judiciously applied, other companies might be induced to follow their example. It is because this Bill extends the legislation of 1883 that I shall vote for the Second Reading. If the Board of Trade would vigorously put into force the powers it possesses, or, if necessary, come to the House for increased powers with which to protect the interests of the public, that possibly would be a more desirable way of dealing with this matter. It cannot, however, be hoped that the Board of Trade will take such steps without great pressure being brought to bear, and the best way of exercising such pressure is by the introduction of some such Bill as this. The Bill goes further than merely providing for the running of purely workmen's trains, and I agree it is desirable it should go further. It is of no use our talking of giving the working classes healthier dwellings and make the conditions of life more acceptable to them, unless we provide means whereby they may live outside London and in a purer and healthier atmosphere. That you can only make practical by having cheap trains, and cheap tramcars and other means of communication between the homes of the working classes and their places of employment. A suggestion has been made that the Bill shall go to a Committee, but I cannot help thinking that, as a preliminary to dealing with the question, whether the subject goes to a Committee or not it is desirable that the House should emphasise its opinion on this question by reading the Bill a second time, and thus affirming the principle not only of increasing the number of trains run at reduced fares, but also of providing additional accommodation for clerks and employés in warehouses whose duties make it necessary for them to reach the City at an early hour in the morning. This is a question eminently interesting to London Members, and one having a practical bearing on the condition of the people. It is not unfair to ask the Railway Companies, in consideration of the great privileges they enjoy, to meet the public in this matter. There has been no statement that the cheap trains run by the Great Eastern have not paid, or that they are not adequately patronised by the public, and I am confident that if other companies, under the stimulus of this Bill, try the experiment of running cheap trains they will have no cause to complain of lack of support. It has been suggested that the adoption of this Bill would have the disadvantage of putting up the fares in some cases; but the hon. Baronet who stated that surely has not read the Bill, for it only provides the fares shall not exceed a farthing per mile, whereas the present maximum is 1d.

*SIR J. PEASE: The Bill of 1883 left this question in the hands of the Board of Trade.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: If I thought the Board of Trade would fix a maximum of less than a farthing a mile I might be disposed to agree with the hon. Baronet, but there is nothing to prevent the Board of Trade fixing the maximum at even a fraction of a farthing. The fact is that this argument of the hon. Baronet is a red herring drawn across the trail by those who are interested in defeating the Bill. These disinterested persons tell us they are doing everything they ought to do in this matter, and that interference would only make things worse, as it would discourage and dishearten them. But they will not thus frighten us. The Railway Companies, from a mistaken policy, are not very fond of these cheap fares. They must get over that sort of feeling; for the public will insist upon having their cheap trains. This Bill can do no harm; by reading it a second time the House will be affirming the principle that an improved service of cheap trains is required in the interests of the working classes and of the public generally, and I therefore hope it will be pressed to a Division.

*(9.12.) MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): No doubt the supply of workmen's trains on lines running into the Metropolis is miserably inadequate, but I am afraid the Bill does little to better that state of things. My hon. Friend talked about compelling the Railway Companies to run trains at certain hours—to enable men, for instance, to reach their places of employment by 8 o'clock in the morning, but may I point out that the Bill makes no alteration in the morning limit of time. It seems to me nothing could be more unsatisfactory than the present system of bringing men to London long before their hours of work commence, to leave them hanging about the streets, 'exposed to a great deal of temptation under conditions which few of us would like to face. I do not know why Railway Directors should oppose this Bill. It is a very small instalment of the obligation which will one day be placed upon them. We have listened with great pleasure to the glowing accounts given by my hon. Friend of the wealth and strength of the great Railway Companies, and he surely cannot after that expect Parliament will not impose somewhat more stringent conditions in the interests of those we look upon as needing legislative help. But I should like to point out that under the Act of 1883 the Board of Trade can do pretty well as it likes in these matters, and it should be left to the Railway Department to insist on the improvements that are so necessary. However, the object of this Bill is a good one, and I shall vote for the measure if it is only for its title. I am afraid that hon. Members will find there is not much else in it. There cannot be the slightest doubt that the congested state of the population in the central districts of London is a growing evil, and it is by the running of cheap trains that an effective remedy may be applied, for the working classes will thereby be enabled to live within reasonable distance of their employment, for reasonableness depends upon communications, in a purer atmosphere and in more comfortable homes.

* (9.19.) MR. SOMERVELL (Ayr, &c.): I feel disposed to vote against the Bill, merely on account of its title. I do not see why London should be dealt with specially in regard to cheap trains, why you should by legislation provide that within a radius of 12 miles around it trains should be run at a certain cheap rate. It may be the largest city in the Kingdom; but the workmen in other large towns are equally entitled with London workmen to cheap trains. The ground for the Bill, according to the memorandum attached to it, is that the Midland Railway run workmen's trains within 24 miles of London at one farthing a mile. That, according to the promoters of the Bill, is the reason why it ought to be provided that the maximum charge should only be a halfpenny a mile. The argument is a reductio ad absurdum. In the Memorandum accompanying this Bill the promoters show, not that there is a grievance to be remedied, but that the companies are at present doing more than the Bill calls upon them to do—I shall oppose such a parochial tinkering measure as this. Any measure dealing with railway fares ought to be a general measure, and not confined to any particular district. This is an attempt on the part of the Metropolitan Members to secure a little cheap and spurious popularity with their constituents. But they will not show themselves to be the real friends of the working classes if they deal with this matter in a half-hearted way. As it is, you will be making the working men in the country generally pay for the running of cheap trains, for the benefit of London workmen—I object to any such preference being given to Londoners. I reserve to myself the right of supporting any general measure in the interest of working men throughout the Kingdom, but I shall certainly vote against this Bill.

Mr. Lawson

* (9.26.) SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): I think the hon. Member's speech shows that he is new to London and to this House. London stands in an altogether exceptional position, and many measures have been passed dealing with it specially, and not affecting in any way the other parts of the Kingdom. Frequently it has willingly been the corpus vile on which experiments have been tried. It is now desired to relieve the congested districts of London, and it is believed that the proposals of this Bill will have that effect, because it will enable the working classes to live out in the country. By fixing a maximum charge it does not prevent the Midland or any other company charging less. I have during the past few days been looking at the returns of railway traffic, and I find it is astonishing to note the increase in the number of third-class passengers. The companies mainly owe their prosperity to that class. It seems to me that the managers of suburban lines are forgetting that. The Brighton Railway, during the course of the year, took thousands of people to Brighton and back for half-a-crown. The fact is that the interests of the public are not opposed to those of the Railway Companies. The essence of success is first cheapness and then numbers, and if the companies desire to make this traffic successful let them run more trains at convenient hours. The speech of the hon. Member opposite is a most extraordinary one. He says he will not support the Bill unless its provisions apply to the whole country. Well I, for one, shall be content to do without his support. During the 18 years I have been in the House of Commons I have found that a common excuse for obstruction is the complaint that a Bill does not go far enough. We are, however, willing to accept a small and moderate measure as a step in advance, and therefore I hope the Government will support the Bill.

*(9.30.) MR. LAFONE (Southwark, Bermondsey): My Friend's excuse for opposing the Bill seems to me very much like that of an hon. Member who, when asked to support a Bill extending the electoral franchise to the police, refused because the franchise was not given to women. My hon. Friend declines to support this Bill because it applies only to London and not to the country generally. I would strongly urge the desirability of reading the Bill a second time. What the supporters of the measure want to do is to support the President of the Board of Trade by a decision of the House, so that he may take steps to extend the privileges which the labouring classes already enjoy. We know that among railway magnates a considerable odium attaches to the right hon. Gentleman by reason of his recent action in regard to railway rates. Well, we do not want to increase the difficulties of his position, and we therefore think the House should take upon itself the responsibility for these proposals by reading the Bill a second time. It is an enormous advantage to labouring men to get out of the crowded courts and alleys of the Metropolis. We have it on the evidence of a Director of the Great Eastern Railway Company that the Railway Companies can take the steps the Bill contemplates with profit to themselves, and I therefore hope we shall strengthen the hands of the President of the Board of Trade in this matter.

*(9.34.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not know whether I shall express a very unpopular opinion when I say that the tendency of the time to agglomerate people and factories and places of business into the great cities is really a public evil. I should very much prefer to see some of these places of business for workmen whom the Bill proposes to benefit located at some little distance from London, and therefore in purer air. Unfortunately, facts as they exist have to be dealt with, and Parliament endeavoured to deal with this subject in 1883. At that time, after full consideration by a Committee of the House, it was decided that the Railway Companies should be relieved of a considerable portion of the passenger duty which they then paid, and, in return, that they should be compelled to provide, by order of the Board of Trade or of the Railway Commissioners, further facilities for workmen's trains, for the conveyance of soldiers, and for third-class accommodation. That was certainly in the nature of a Parliamentary bargain with the Railway Companies, and it was a bargain of a very sweeping character. Nothing could be larger than the words of Section 3 of the Act of 1883, which declared that if at any time the Board of Trade had reason to believe that upon any railway carrying passengers proper trains were not provided for workmen at reasonable fares and at reasonable hours, then the Board of Trade might order such provision to be made. Nothing could be wider than that power and nothing could better establish the intention of Parliament that this matter should be dealt with in a comprehensive spirit throughout the country. I agree with my hon. Friend behind me that any principle which the House may establish for the Metropolis must also apply to other great centres of industry. The power of the Board of Trade being such as I have described, there is a question whether it has been wisely exercised. The Board has been accused of being lethargic in this matter. In the first place, the section I have referred to expressly indicates to the Board of Trade that they shall not initiate action themselves, but that it shall be suggested to them from outside, and I do not think it can be shown that any demand that has been made upon the Board of Trade by any sufficient authority for putting into force the provisions of the section has been neglected. I can quote instances in which the matter has been dealt with by the Board of Trade in communication with the Railway Companies to the great benefit of the public. In 1888 there was a case which had eventually to be brought before the Railway Commission, in which the Commissioners gave a decision which resulted in the provision of greater accommodation. It cannot, therefore, be fairly urged that the Board of Trade has neglected the duties imposed upon it by the Act. It appears from the report made by Major Marindin that while in 1883 there were 110 workmen's trains on the railways having termini in London, with a mileage of 763 miles, in 1890 the number of trains had increased to more than 700, with a mileage of 1,807 miles. These figures show that there has been a distinct progress since 1883. I do not say that the progress is sufficient, or that it is such as ought to satisfy us, for we have to bear in mind the circumstances of the Metropolis, with its growing area, its increasing rents, without any possibility of workmen obtaining accommodation near the places of their work, and also the atmosphere of the Metropolis, which every year is becoming more intolerable. Having regard to these circumstances, it is essential that not only such progress as I have described shall continue, but that it shall increase at a rapid rate. What the House has to decide is whether this Bill is adapted for this purpose or not. It has been said—and no doubt with truth—that in these times particularly the income of a Railway Company really depends upon the number of its passengers; but that statement has been made as if the number of passengers that can be carried was really illimitable. This is certainly not the fact, especially in the case of the lines which converge within 12 miles of the metropolitan termini. It is not only necessary to have regard to the convenience and safety of the workmen and others who wish to get to and fro within that distance of London; it is also necessary to think of the convenience and safety of that vast number of persons travelling up to London from long distances. It is impossible for the railways to carry with safety more than a certain number of trains during the 24 hours, and if it were attempted to include an excessive portion of those trains within the limits of the hours named in the Bill, the capacity of the lines would be overtaxed. Two years ago Parliament established the system of block-working; and as President of the Board of Trade it is my especial duty to insist on it as essential to safety for the public, and to see that no more trains are put upon the lines than can be safely carried. What will happen? Under the provisions of this Bill these workmen's tickets, instead of being available, as now, only between the hours of 6 o'clock in the evening and 8 o'clock in the morning, are to be available by any train departing from the terminus after 5 o'clock p.m. on ordinary week days, and after 12 o'clock noon on Saturdays. Five o'clock is the hour of all in the 24 on an ordinary day when there is the greatest amount of traffic, and the same may be said of the hours following 12 o'clock on Saturday. The Railway Companies, in order to cope with this increased traffic which the reduction of fares would be likely to produce, would have to increase their lines. Hon. Members may look upon this as a very simple affair, but it is not. It is a difficult and very costly thing for the Railway Companies to obtain the land and accommodation necessary for this purpose, and what the House is asked to do is to impose on the Railway Companies an enormous liability for such an extension of the lines. Although I have been lately described by Sir R. Moon as a confiscator of railway property, I think Railway Companies will have some right to complain if Parliament, while imposing this liability upon them, does not give them larger powers for the acquisition of the property which may be required to carry out that liability. If we once allow Railway Companies to obtain private property below its value we shall open up a much larger question. I hope the House will excuse me for dwelling on these matters. They seem to me, speaking I hope impartially between the Railway Companies and the public, and being anxious to do justice to one and the other, to be grave difficulties. What is the state of the law? As I have shown Parliament has given to the Board of Trade ample powers, which have been exercised by the Board of Trade so far as they have been demanded by the public within the bounds of possibility. It may be said that until recently it has not been the duty of any public body representing the Metropolis to bring its needs in this respect to the notice of the Board of Trade. That is no longer so. The London County Council have been blamed by my hon. Friend and others for not attending to the business which belongs to it. But that cannot be said of them in this case. They have taken this matter up, and it will be my desire and my duty to try and carry out the wishes of the County Council in such a matter. The question is whether the House will or will not be well advised in giving a Second Reading to this Bill. There is, I think, force in the suggestion that the Bill, as far as it goes, proceeds in a wrong direction. You have conferred unlimited powers on a Department of the State, and you can, if you choose, call that Department to account in this House for an inadequate exercise of those powers. You are called upon to limit those powers by fixing the fares to be charged at a certain sum. It may be quite true that the words "not exceeding that sum" are inserted in the Bill, but whatever the figure inserted in the Bill is, I am sure that it will be found in practice that there is a tendency for that figure to become established. I would, therefore, suggest, while admitting that the question is not a very large one so far as this Bill is concerned, it would be better not at present to proceed with the Bill, but to leave the question in the hands of the County Council, and to trust them to press it upon the Board of Trade. I think it will be admitted that I have not neglected these questions, and in dealing with this matter I can have no other desire but to increase the facilities of the working men of the Metropolis in going to or returning from their places of labour.
VOL. CCCL. [THIRD SERIES.]

3 K

Sir M. Hicks Beach

(9.54.) SIR E. WATKIN (Hythe): I appear as the representative of those who first gave to workmen cheap means of communication between their homes and their work. I also represent another institution who first issued third-class contract tickets for the benefit of the working people of London. I therefore do not appear before the House with any record against me in this matter. I claim to be the initiator of enterprises of this kind into which those who now come before the House as the friends of the working man have not put one 6d. We are all anxious to facilitate the transmission of labour to the places where it is employed, but I want to know whether this House is to be a regulator of the hours of labour in London. If it attempts any such thing it will be a great mistake, the usual relations of capital and labour will be seriously damaged, and great difficulties will be experienced. The President of the Board of Trade is right in thinking that the question ought to be more carefully considered. I personally have done everything I could to improve the means of communication available to the working classes, and I shall vote against the Bill because it will damage the circulation of labour.

(9.56.) MR. DIXON - HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): While I sympathise with the object of the Bill, I cannot see why a 12 miles radius should have been fixed. My constituency is just outside that 12 miles radius, and a very large number of my constituents come into town every day. I cannot understand why a man, living 12½ miles out of London, should not have the advantage of cheap trains while a man living within 12 miles has such an advantage. The result will be that the congestion of London will be increased, because all the workmen will flock to places within the radius, and that will be detrimental to property beyond the radius. I am strongly of opinion that any Bill which creates such a difference ought not to pass, and, therefore, I shall record my vote against this measure.

(9.57.) The House divided:—Ayes 54; Noes 73.—(Div. List, No. 66.)

LOCAL BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND) AMENDMENT BILL. (No. 151.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(10.7.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): In the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Down, whose name stands first on the back of this Bill, I have to move the Second Reading. I am glad to say the Bill has support from both sides of the House. It is a very small measure of reform rendered necessary by a defect in the Local Bankruptcy (Ireland) Act of 1888, which, no doubt, was due to inadvertence. In that Act it was provided that local bankruptcy proceedings should be taken at Belfast and Cork. That Act was intended to save time and secure the realisation of estates in the cheapest manner by local administration. But creditors or debtors were given the option of going to the Bankruptcy Court in Dublin, which causes great waste of time and money. Thus in one case in Belfast a debtor made an offer in Belfast of 3s. 4d. in the £1, and this being refused took his application to Dublin, and upon inquiry by the Local Court the creditors were eventually paid 17s. 6d. In another instance a principal creditor, a mortgagee, supported the offer of a debtor of 5s. in the £1, but after inquiry by the Local Court the creditors were paid 20s. in the £1. The principle the Bill lays down is that, unless in exceptional cases, a matter of arrangement or bankruptcy arising in the district of a local Court ought to be initiated in that Court, and adjudicated upon within that Court, unless the Court should see cause to remove the proceedings to Dublin. That, I think, is a reasonable proposition, and sufficiently safeguarded by the discretion of the Judge. The fourth and fifth are the operative clauses, and provide that on the occasion of a vacancy in the office of a Judge of a local Bankruptcy Court, and at any other time with the consent of the existing Judge there shall be power given to the Lord Lieutenant, by Order in Council, to direct that no bankruptcy proceedings shall be taken as to a person resident or having a place of business within the district of a Local Bankruptcy Court except in that Court, provided that the Judge may, in his discretion, transfer the proceeding to the Court of Bankruptcy in Dublin. This the Judge may do on the application of debtor or creditor, the widest discretion being allowed. Speaking as one of the representatives of Belfast I can express my belief that all mercantile and instructed opinion in Belfast is in favour of the Bill. The Chamber of Commerce has petitioned in its favour. I am glad to observe from the affirming ejaculations of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Johnston) that this is one of the few occasions upon which we agree. I believe opinion in Cork is equally unanimous with that in Belfast in favour of the Bill, and I trust the House will give the Bill a Second Reading.

Mr. Sexton

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Sexton.)

(10.11.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): In rising to support the Second Reading, I do not think it is necessary to detain the House beyond adding the expression of my opinion that an absolute unanimity exists in Belfast in favour of the Bill, as it does throughout the whole district connected with the commerce centred in that important town. I have hardly anything to add to what has been succinctly stated by the hon. Member for West Belfast. The evils the Bill proposes to remedy have been felt keenly by the commercial community, and I believe the Bill provides a remedy that will in no way inflict any injury upon bankruptcy proceedings. The Judge of the Local Court is a man to be thoroughly trusted, and I have no doubt that he will exercise with discretion the power conferred upon him of sending a case to Dublin.

(10.13.) MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): I can testify to the fact that the opinion in the Belfast Chamber of Commerce and among influential persons in commercial circles is that the Bill will confer great advantages on the trade and industry of Belfast. With such an unanimity of opinion, I hope the Government will not oppose the Bill.

*(10.14.) S^R ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I took some interest in the Bankruptcy Act passed for the United Kingdom, and I am quite satisfied from my own knowledge and from what I have learned of the feelings of Chambers of Commerce that the entire commercial community is in favour of the localisation of law, and I am equally satisfied that that principle ought to be acted upon as far as possible in regard to bankruptcy. Estates often pay little enough, and there is every reason for avoiding all possible expense in their administration; and increased expense there must be if proceedings take place at a distance from the locality in which the suit arises. I am also inclined to support, whenever I find the opportunity, proposals for assimilating the law in England and Ireland, which must lead to a feeling of unity. The provisions now sought to be applied to Ireland exist in this country. These are sufficient reasons why I should support the Second Reading of the Bill.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I also express the hope that the Government will agree to the Second Reading. The opinion of Belfast has, I think, been sufficiently expressed, and I do not think I need say more.

(10.15.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The Government have already given proof that they realise the importance of providing a suitable system of local administration in bankruptcy affairs by passing the Act of 1888, which the present measure seeks to amend. I cannot altogether accede to the proposition of the hon. Member that there has been an oversight in the preparation of that Act, which the present Bill proposes to remedy. The intention of the framers of that Act was to provide an optional system of local administration for bankruptcy in Belfast and other large towns. It was not intended to provide that all proceedings in bankruptcy should be commenced in the locality where the debtor resides, nor do I think, if this Bill went to that extent, I could on behalf of this Government accept the Bill. Our experience in Ireland of local administration in bankruptcy has been very short. I do not say that it has been unsatisfactory, but I think it will be necessary to consider this subject in connection with the position of the Dublin Court of Bankruptcy in relation to the general judicial system in Ireland. This Bill, however, leaves it in the power of the Lord Lieutenant in Council to do what I believe will be ultimately necessary in Ireland, namely, to localise to a great extent the administration of bankruptcy, and, therefore, as the Bill goes to that extent, and it enables the Executive to safeguard its application,

I think that, in those circumstances, I can recommend the House to agree to the Second Reading.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

DURATION OF SPEECHES (PARLIAMENT) BILL.—(No. 143).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(10.22.) MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I have had a long time to wait to move the Second Reading of this very small Bill, which everyone understands, so I need not occupy much time in speaking about it. It is a small measure, but I believe that every hon. Member and the public generally will gain by its being passed into law. We know that if an hon. Member speaks for two or three hours he does not get reported in the Press, and he does not deserve to be reported. I remember one of my first experiences when I entered the House some six years ago. I asked one of the Whips to make an arrangement by which I should be enabled to leave the House, and go and dine at the Carlton Club. An hon. Member had at that time been speaking for half an hour, and had said nothing; and the Whip said, in reply to my question, that I might go and dine at the Carlton Club because this hon. Member had received orders to address the House for two hours longer. It was added that if I went to the Carlton Club and came back to the House at 10 o'clock I should be in plenty of time. I was a little incredulous as to this, but when I returned from the Carlton Club at 10 o'clock I found the same hon. Member still addressing the House, and saying nothing. I should have liked an absolute quarter of an hour Bill, but I am modest in my proposition, and, as the House will see, it will be possible to extend the time. I have had a large experience in public affairs, and for 30 years I have been a member of a Corporation of one of our large towns; and my contention, founded on that experience, is that unlimited time for speeches tends to the waste of time and the pre vention of useful business being done. If members of the Corporation with which I am acquainted had made the same use of their time as Members have made of time in this House, I believe that we should have been able to put that matter right in about 15 minutes. I know the argument is that this is a very important place for the discussion of very important subjects, and that if we err at all we should err on the side of leniency in the latitude allowed to a speaker. No one, however, can deny that we have during the last five or six years erred too much on the side of leniency. I have many times seen 12 or 14 hours at a stretch go by with nothing done. I remember one occasion when I waited for my Bills to come on—Bills that have not yet been carried—from 4 o'clock in the afternoon until a quarter to 6 the next morning. On that occasion we had 16 Divisions—I will not say which Party initiated them—but can any man say he has done the State any service by such waste of time? Five hours and twenty minutes did we occupy in the useless occupation of walking through the Lobbies and recording the fact that we had done nothing and that our friends opposite to us did not intend that we should do anything. Well, we have had a slight reform since then. Things are not so bad now, but they might be made a good deal better, and so I submit this Bill to the good judgment of the House. I applied to a gentleman who, in the political world, is well entitled to give an opinion, and asked him did he approve of such a Bill—it was then a 15 minutes' Bill—he replied that he did approve of it, but, said he, let the Privy Councillors have 30 minutes. My remark was that in my experience some of these gentlemen were the greatest bores in the House, but, said I: "If you say they should be excepted it shall be so." Therefore, I have put down 30 minutes for the Right Honourables. A short time ago I remember there was one precious hour of a Sitting left; Irish business was coming on, and one of these Right Honourables was called upon to use the hour, but he said he could not say what he had to say in an hour, and so he refused to utilise the time. Now, if I had asked any 12 Members if they wanted to hear that right hon. Gentleman for an hour upon Irish affairs they would have repelled the idea with horror—they would say they would rather not hear him for 15 minutes, because they had already heard everything he had to say inside or outside of the House. Yet this right hon. Gentleman refused to be content with this hour. With this Bill in operation that right hon. Gentleman would make the best use of his 30 minutes, and then if the House desired to hear him longer he would be allowed another 30 minutes. But I think I shall be a very old man if I live to see the House accord another half hour in an instance of that kind. My opinion is that if a man cannot, in ordinary circumstances, say all he has to say on every subject before the House in less than 15 minutes, he ought to be sent to his constituents to be cashiered, and another hon. Member sent back in his place. At the Ecumenical Conference in London delegates came from California and Australia to address their brethren here. Each speaker who had to introduce a Resolution was allowed 10 minutes, five minutes being allowed to the subsequent speakers. It was found that the speakers who had five minutes allotted to them distinguished themselves by rattling out their speech to the time of 230 words a minute. It was very good practice for them; but if they had anything to say worth hearing they took pretty good care to put it in the beginning of their speeches. No matter how eloquent they were—and some of them were very eloquent—the speech was ruthlessly cut short by the ringing of the bell, and the speaker had to resume his speech when the time was up. Now some very cheap wit has been exercised at the introduction into Parliament of such a bell as used at Diocesan Conferences. But the bell is not the essence of the Bill. I do not care whether it is a bellman's bell or a muffin bell, or any other kind of bell, because I feel sure that the dignity of the House of Commons will provide such a bell as shall be heard, and if the speaker is deaf, there are plenty of hon. Members who will cry "Order, order!" when an hon. Member has gone beyond his allotted time. I do not want to occupy more than five minutes on such an occasion as this, and so I commend the Bill. If there is anything to reply to I will reply, but I do not think that a valid argument can be found against the Bill.

Mr. Atkinson

(10.30.) The House divided:—Ayes 44; Noes 72.—(Div. List, No. 67.)

MARRIAGES OF NONCONFORMISTS
(ATTENDANCE OF REGISTRARS)
BILL.—(No. 144.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(10.38.) MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I beg to move the Second Reading of this Bill. I do so knowing that the principle has been approved again and again, and that hon. Members now present will not allow any longer to exist a religious disability in the case of the members of the Wesleyan Methodist Society. I brought in the Bill once before, and this Government once brought it in, but we were obstructed by those who ought to have helped us to pass it, and the reason they gave was that a Bill of this kind, being in relief of religious disabilities, ought not to come from this side, but from the other side, of the House. I presume the other side propose to bring in the Bill when they are in power, but, my opinion is, that that time is a very long way off, and that, therefore, they should take the reform when they have the chance, from whichever side it is offered. I am a Wesleyan Methodist and a Conservative—a person called by my brethren on the other side of the House, from political motives, a monstrosity. I do not mention this in any bitterness at all, because I know it is not true, and therefore it recoils on those who say it. When I was canvassing at elections in Cornwall and North Lincolnshire, Liberal Methodists told me they were ashamed of a House of Commons which left on the Statute Book an Act which placed Wesleyans at such a disadvantage as compared with members of the Church of England. I mentioned this matter to my chiefs in Parliament, and they would scarcely believe that such a law existed. But let me tell the House what the disability is which we have to undergo. Members of the Church of England can have a legal marriage performed by their clergyman, but when any Nonconformist goes to have his children married by a man whom they consider quite good enough to light the way to Heaven and to teach them and baptise their children, they are told that in consequence of what Parliament has done, in the dark ages probably, they are not allowed to have any spiritual adviser to marry their children, but that the marriage must be conducted by some lawyer's clerk, who may come in a fit state to marry, or in a state more spirituous than spiritual. I object and protest, and have always objected and protested against such a measure being left on the Statute Book, because my idea of Conservatism always has been that it is safe progress, and I think that it is very safe progress to remove out of the way such a stumbling-block as that. I say that I have as much right to go to my minister to marry my children as any Churchman has to go to his spiritual pastor. The Wesleyan ministers are an educated body, containing men of recognised eminence, such as Dr. Moulton, who was placed on the Revision Committee, and is frequently hand and glove with Bishop Ellicot. Wesleyans naturally object to being told that one of their ministers cannot legally celebrate a marriage without the attendance of a registrar or his representative. Sometimes, under the present law, a marriage has to be delayed three or four hours' waiting for the registrar, owing to that official having failed to keep his appointment. The object of the Bill is to dispense with the attendance of registrars at the marriages of Nonconformists, by providing that before a marriage a form shall be obtained from the registrar, and that the minister who solemnises the marriage shall be made responsible, under a penalty of £2, for the subsequent registration. I appeal to the legal leader on the Front Opposition Bench to support the Bill! [Sir C. RUSSELL: "Hear, hear"] of which I move the Second Reading, claiming the votes of my Friends opposite who, although they think that the Bill should have come from their side, are all of them in favour of religious liberty.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Atkinson.)

*(10.48.) MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I wish to support the speech that has been made by my hon. Friend, who says he has moved the Second Reading as a Wesleyan Methodist. I am in favour of the Bill as a Churchman. In my election address of 1885 I stated that I was anxious to support such a measure, and I repeated that statement in my election address of 1886. Since then I have backed such a Bill as this on two occasions. My hon. Friend has made a statement as to the grievance under which Nonconformists labour. It is a grievance which is emphasised, I think, by the fact that at least two among religious bodies, namely, the Jews and the Quakers, do not suffer under it. It seems to me that that is an anomaly, and that if the presence of a Registrar is not necessary at the marriages of Jews and Quakers, there is, under certain conditions, no reason why he should be present at the marriages of Nonconformists. Furthermore, I think it is desirable that the difficulty, if it is a difficulty, in the way of matrimony should be removed. I know that my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General has, on former occasions, introduced a Bill dealing with this subject, and I have every confidence that to-night he will support the measure of my hon. Friend. I did not see the Bill before it was printed, so that I am not answerable for its drafting, although my name is on the back of it. I think that probably in its drafting, and in its provisions, it may need some alteration and amendment, which can be made in Committee. That, however, does not affect the question of the Second Reading, because in voting for the Second Reading we simply vote that we are in favour of the principle of the Bill.

(10.52.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): The hasty manner in which the Bill has been presented to the House has probably prevented the hon. Member in charge of it from giving a full explanation of its scope. The title does not at all agree with the body of the Bill, but is altogether misleading; and I can only wonder that an hon. Member, who is himself labouring under a religious disability, should forget that other Nonconformists belonging to other denominations are under the same disability.

MR. ATKINSON: I have offered over and over again to admit all Nonconformists to the Bill who will come into it. I had them in before, but they obstructed me instead of helping me.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: The hon. Member must excuse my saying that I think his consistency is still at fault, because he knows very well that the substance of the Bill does not agree with its title. This is not a Nonconformist Bill, but a Bill for the relief of a single Nonconformist body—though I admit a very influential and respectable body. I protest against the other Nonconformist bodies being left out in the cold. No one on these Benches would think of applying to the hon. Member opposite the epithet "monstrosity;" but I think if he were described as a "curiosity" he would well deserve the description; particularly because I find that the respectable denomination to which the hon. Member says he belongs has through its Committee of Privileges passed a resolution condemning this measure.

MR. ATKINSON: I object to the word "says." I do belong to the Wesleyan-Methodist body.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: I wished to pay a compliment to the hon. Member, because it is not for me to describe the religious opinions of anyone. I took the fact from his own statement; but my point was that this Bill had been condemned by the Committee of Privileges of the Wesleyan body, and that the Committee had expressed an opinion in favour of the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for the Louth Division of Lincolnshire.

MR. ATKINSON: I was present myself at the meeting of the Committee of Privileges, although the partner of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton was not present. At that meeting the Bill was approved. At another meeting, however, when I was not present, but when the political secretary, who is partner of the Member for Wolverhampton, was present, together with the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, another resolution was passed.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: I am afraid the explanation does not mend the case, and the hon. Member must take the second meeting as expressing the revised opinion of the denomination. A few minutes ago the hon. Member was engaged in endeavouring to save the time of the House, but now he seems anxious to fritter it away. ["No, no."] Well then, why should he have included in this Bill only one of the Nonconformist bodies? The provisions of the hon. Member's Bill do not seem to me to be satisfactory in regard to the civil aspect of marriages—although, of course, I admit the desirability of paying due regard to their religious solemnity. This is scarcely the time to make suggestions; but, in the long run, I believe that this country will incline to the course of separating the two parts of the ceremony altogether, and not making one part hang upon the other. I think the civil ceremony should go first. The Registrar should attend at his office, the parties should go before him, and the marriage ceremony should take place, so that, so far as the law was concerned, all the consequences that might follow from the marriage should be secured. It is a mistake to consider that the religious ceremony would be in any way depreciated or deteriorated by the civil marriage. According to the Bill, in the case of non-compliance with the requirements as to registration a fine of 40s. would be imposed, but I do not think that would be sufficiently binding in all cases. Altogether, I think the hon. Member would be well advised if he did not press the Second Reading of his measure to-night. If he would introduce a Bill dealing with all Nonconformist bodies, I should be very happy to accept the proposal as coming from him. What we want is the removal of the disability, and that it should apply to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. I feel sure the hon. Member will not wish to stand convicted of pushing the claims of the one religious denomination with which he happens to be identified; and as it is manifest that the measure only covers a corner of a wide area, I trust he will not press it to a Division.

*(10.58.) MR. DE LISLE (Leicester, Mid): I ask leave to say a few words in a certain sense as a Nonconformist. From a Catholic point of view the Established Church is a Nonconformist body, but here I am speaking from an English point of view. I object to this Bill absolutely and in toto, and in so doing I am, I believe, expressing the view of the Roman Catholic Bishops of England. I do not oppose it for the reasons given by the hon. Gentleman opposite, namely, because it does not include every Nonconformist body, but I object to any alteration of the law. Nothing is more important, from a social point of view, than to have an unchallengeable marriage register about which there can be no doubt. It is quite true that from a Catholic point of view it is felt to be a disability to a certain extent that marriages simply by a priest are not recognised in this country. On the other hand, the Catholics recognise that they are only a small minority; their only wish is to see the law as stable as possible, as they are, generally I believe, quite content with the existing order of things. The religious ceremony has no force in the eyes of the law, but when performed duly in the presence of the Registrar the marriage becomes legal, and is entitled to the same status as a marriage in the Church of England. As I had the happiness to go through the ceremony myself some two years ago I gave particular attention to the law on the subject. A few years ago I do not know whether it was necessary for the Registrar to put the legal questions, but now the whole ceremony can proceed at the altar, and it is not even necessary to go to the vestry in order to sign the register. In my own case the Bishop of Clifton put the legal questions at the altar, and the register was signed at the altar. So far as the Catholics are concerned, it would be impossible to have the civil act before a Magistrate or a Registrar first, and the religious act afterwards. The Council of Trent has not been promulgated in this country, and therefore the ceremony before the parson or the civil official renders the contracting parties man and wife, and to repeat the ceremony religiously would be a sacrilege. I may be pardoned for referring to Roman Catholic theology, but the question is one of great social importance. It would be impossible for me to agree to the Second Reading of this Bill, because it comes into conflict with our views as to what constitutes the essentials of matrimony.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: I did not say that the civil marriage should precede the religious ceremony. I simply had in my own mind the ultimate consequences.

*MR. DE LISLE: I have no doubt the hon. Member would agree to such Amendments as would satisfy Roman Catholics; but how can you distinguish the 200 sects claiming equality as Nonconformists before the law? In fact, I do not see why the same argument which is applicable to the ministers of one form of religion should not be applicable to another; so that if the principle of this Bill be admitted we might have Atheistic ministers performing the marriage rites, because if you once admit the ministers of one form of religion I do not see where you can possibly draw the line. It is for these reasons, and because of the uncertainty which might arise, that I ask the House to reject this Bill.

(10.0.) MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I quite agree with the hon. Member who introduced this Bill in saying that the grievance it proposes to remedy is one that is very extensively and painfully felt throughout the country. No one who has any relations with the Nonconformist body can help sympathising with the extreme humiliation they must feel in being obliged to secure the presence of the Registrar in order to validate the marriages which take place in Nonconformist places of worship. This must be the more severely felt, because the ministers of the Established Church are able to celebrate marriages without any such condition. But the disability is one which is experienced not only by Wesleyans, but by every other Nonconformist Body. The whole of the Methodists, Primitive Methodists, Baptists, Independents, and every other Nonconformist section are excluded from this Bill. Why is this, when there are bodies whose ministers have a more settled status than even that of the Wesleyan Body, and who might, therefore, be held to be more trustworthy agents of the State, for the purposes of registration? The hon. Member (Mr. Atkinson) has, no doubt, assured us that although the Bill is drawn in the interests of one section of religionists only, he is willing to make it applicable to the other Nonconformist Bodies; but why should not the Roman Catholics be put in the same position as the Nonconformists? Supposing the Bill is amended in the fullest and most literal sense, where will it land us? With regard to our Marriage Laws, it is impossible in any civilised country to find such a condition of things as exists here. In Scotland, Ireland, and England the Statutes are contradictory; almost every denomination has special provision. Why should we allow these denominational and polemical differences of ours to prevent our arriving at a simple solution of this question, with a conscientious regard, as sincere religionists, to the requirements of the Civil Law? Surely we can hardly be ignorant of the fact that under the Code Napoleon, in France and Italy, and, I think, most of the countries of Continental Europe, the one end about which the State troubles itself is that there shall have been a civil marriage contracted before the Mayor or some other civil authority, which shall assure to the parties concerned and to their offspring the fullest protection that the State can afford. I believe I am right in saying that although the law requires the civil contract, yet in France more than 90 per cent. of the marriages before the civil officer are duly completed by the religious ceremony.

Mr. De Lisle

*MR. DE LISLE: The religious marriage in Catholic countries always precedes the civil.

MR. WOODALL: I think I am correct, but the circumstance is new to me. I hope the hon. Gentleman will not think I am questioning his authority on the subject if I say that I think I am still right. One of the most popular writers of France dwelt very picturesquely on the simplicity and bareness of the civil ceremony compared with the ornate and extremely interesting character of the religious ceremony which followed on the next day. At any rate, the point I wish to urge is, that while the State recognises civil marriages, the religious ceremony is regarded as necessary to the completeness of the marriage. I think we may dismiss from our minds the idea that we shall do away with the sanctity of marriage if we increase the facilities for the civil contract. There is, however, one objection to the Bill, which I think the Attorney General will endorse. I refer to the evidence furnished by the Reports of the Registrar General and by the experience of the Attorney General and every lawyer in this House, of the extremely dangerous way in which the Registers have been, and even now are, kept by the clergy of the Established Church. Serious scandals have repeatedly occurred, and grievous wrong has frequently been inflicted, owing to the lax system which has prevailed. Nevertheless, the ministers of the Established Church, whatever their faults or shortcomings, do reside in their parishes; whereas the Wesleyan ministers and those of the Methodist Bodies are usually stationed in one district for a period of three years only—a term which is very rarely exceeded. Doubtless, this itinerant system has largely contributed to the efficiency of these ministers and to the general advantage of the Religious Bodies over which they exercise their ministerial functions. But, on the other hand, it is evident that as regards registration purposes these itinerant ministers must necessarily be less trustworthy than the resident clergy of the Established Church. It is said that the Nonconformist ministers are not to keep the registers, but merely to deliver certificates within a week to the parochial officer. I venture to say that the provisions of this Bill are such as will make it still more necessary than at present to enact additional legislation, because they will more than ever complicate the varied system of our existing Marriage Laws, while failing to effect a perfect solution of the present difficulties. I trust, however, that the effort now made will induce the Government to consider the propriety of endeavouring to frame some statesmanlike measure that may prove an adequate solution of this important question, creating something like a uniform system throughout the country; but if that be impossible, at any rate so amending the existing law as to render it more satisfactory to the general community.

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): I trust that the measure introduced by my hon. Friend will at least be allowed to pass a Second Reading, so that the principle it embodies—a principle in which the different sections of the great Nonconformist Body are in cordial agreement—may be affirmed by this House, leaving the defects which have already been pointed out, and which undoubtedly exist in the drafting of some of its clauses, to be dealt with in Committee.

*(11.15.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): The hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) has advised the hon. Member opposite to withdraw his Bill on the ground that the Member for the Brigg Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Waddy) is about to introduce a Bill that will cover the ground more completely. I hope my hon. Friend will not listen to that advice. I say so for this reason: first of all, the hon. Member for the Brigg Division is not here; and, in the second place, we do not know when he may have an opportunity of bringing in the measure he desires to see carried. The fact that the present Bill only covers one section of Nonconformists and does not cover the rest is no reason why the House of Commons should refuse to assent to the principle of the measure, when the House knows that if the Bill goes into Committee all the other sections may be added. I confess that I do not like the opposition offered to the Bill by some hon. Members on this side of the House. It proposes to remedy a long-standing grievance in the Nonconformist community, and it certainly is an awkward fact that the main opposition to it should come not from Members on the other side of the House, but from those who sit on these Benches—men who admit the grievance which they profess to be anxious to remedy, but who are mainly anxious to show that Codlin is the friend and not Short.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: The measure to which I referred was in the House last Session and, I believe, the Session before.

MR. ATKINSON: It was not in the House last Session.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: Perhaps I may be allowed to explain—

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I hope I did not convey that impression. I have received many communications from the Wesleyan Methodists of Ireland about this Bill, and I hope the House will waive all these minor considerations in favour of a Bill which, if it does not go far enough in favour of the principle they desire to see adopted, can at all events be amended and extended in Committee.

*(11.21.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Sir, perhaps the House will allow me a few minutes to speak on a subject to which I have personally given a good deal of attention. I am bound to say that, if the hon. Member for Bradford did not take objection to the previous Bill on this side, those closely connected with him opposed it most strongly. It dealt not only with the Wesleyan, but with other Nonconformist Bodies, and yet Members sitting opposite declared that they would never allow the Conservatives to deal with this question.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: I did not make any such declaration, though I do not pretend I was in favour of the Bill, which had one fatal defect—that it did not deal with Wesleyan ministers.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I had not in mind the hon. Member for Bradford, but those who are closely associated with him, and whose names I should mention were they present. The hon. Member's memory is defective, for both the Bills previous to this dealt with Wesleyan Methodist ministers. In 1886 I introduced a Bill when I was sitting on the other side of the House. It received very considerable support from the Government of the day, but that Government did not allow it to proceed. In 1887 I brought in a Bill as Attorney General; and that Bill, which can be seen in the Library, as well as the first, contained safeguards against all those matters referred to by hon. Members opposite—with regard to registration, to notice, to fees, and other matters. But that Bill was persistently opposed by hon. Members on the other side. Why I support this Bill to-night is, not that I think it contains sufficient safeguards, but that it recognises the fact that there is a grievance to be remedied, and, though it deals only with the Wesleyan Methodists, the House, in assenting to the Second Reading, will express its willingness to deal with that grievance and remove it. The hon. Member for Bradford objects that the Bill includes the Wesleyans alone. Why is that? It stands in this way: One of the difficulties besetting the question is that various bodies of Nonconformists admit to their pulpits various persons of great ability who have not the status of ministers, and some of whom, as the hon. Member for Stoke happily described it, are itinerant ministers. In the Wesleyan Body, however, the Conference have full power over the appointment of the Wesleyan ministers, and can dismiss them in case of misconduct. The ministers of the Wesleyan Methodists, therefore, have an official and recognised status which enables us to deal with them in a Bill like this, and to allow them to replace the registrar—a course which it would be difficult to follow in the case of ministers of Nonconformist Bodies who have not that recognised status. That is the difficulty we have to encounter in dealing with the matter. I have not the slightest objection to extend the application of this principle; only I observe that some Members who professed their anxiety on a former occasion to remedy this grievance are now conspicuous by their absence. We are told to wait for the Bill of the hon. Member for the Brigg Division. I do not think that Bill has either been printed or read a first time. But there is one remarkable circumstance connected with the Bill of the hon. Member for Brigg and the factious opposition to the hon. Member for Boston. It is that one of the candidates for a neighbouring division, Mr. Perks, is closely connected with that section of the Wesleyan Committee of Privileges, who have opposed the hon. Member for Boston, and Mr. Perks is extremely anxious to claim the credit of having been the first to remedy this grievance. In common justice and fairness to those who have worked at this question for years, and in fairness to the hon. Member for Boston, I think I have shown reasons which should be sufficient to disarm the opposition to this Bill. I hope the House will recognise the principle of the Bill by reading it a second time, and with regard to the omissions, reasonable provisions may, I think, be inserted in Committee dealing with due registration and proper public notice in regard to marriages and other matters. That, I take it, would induce the hon. Member for Brigg, when he comes down to the House ready to oppose the Bill, to bow to its decision. I repeat I hope the House will read the Bill a second time, and that such clauses will be inserted in Committee as will make the Bill a working measure.

Mr. Illingworth

(11.31.) SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I should not have intervened in this Debate but for the appeal to me by the Mover of the Bill, and I say at once that I speak for myself only, and not in any representative capacity. I will not pursue the theme suggested by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General as to the differences existing between members of the Wesleyan Methodist Body. I shall support the Second Reading of the Bill for the reason that it aims at removing an existing disability, and I hope it will emerge from the Committee in so different a condition that its author will hardly be able to recognise it. I would suggest to the Attorney General that the title of the Bill is wide enough to cover all cases likely to come within its provisions, such, for instance, as the case of Jewish marriage.

SIR R. WEBSTER: The Registrar does not have to be present at a Jewish marriage.

SIR C. RUSSELL: I was not aware of that. My hon. Friend the Member for the Loughborough Division of Leicestershire, who speaks with authority on these matters from the Catholic point of view, said one or two things with which I cannot agree. I fully agree with him that Catholics regard the religious service as a most important matter. They look on marriage as a sacrament, and not as a civil contract; but they also recognise that it is for their interest, as for that of other members of the community, to have preserved complete and satisfactory evidence of the marriage under conditions which the Civil Law will recognise. Therefore, I cannot entertain the difficulty which seems to occur to the hon. Member for the Loughborough Division. Provided always that the religious service is in no way affected, and also that adequate provision is made for giving notice to the Registrar, both before and after the ceremony, no objection to this Bill will be entertained. It is to the interest of Catholics as well as of members of any other Religious Body that marriages should be performed and registered as the law directs. My hon. Friend near me, who made a very excellent speech, seems to be under the impression that the religious ceremony in Catholic countries is necessarily preceded by a civil marriage. He will forgive me, perhaps, if I say he is mistaken, and that he has been misled by his reading of French romances. When once a civil marriage has taken place (except where the Catholic Church has declined to recognise such) no other ceremony is necessary, although, of course, the parties may choose to have a religious recognition of the marriage. But that religious service is not a fresh marriage; there can only be one marriage. Although the Bill as it stands seems to me to be incomplete I shall vote in favour of the Second Reading, as all the omissions may be supplied in Committee.

(11.37.) MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): When the hon. Member for the Loughborough Division was speaking I feared from the cry of "Order!" which was raised, when I called "No, no," that I had offended some susceptibilities by suggesting, as I certainly intended to do by the interjection, my doubts whether a recent happy event had made him a special authority on this subject. But when I recollect my own case, I must confess that I subsequently knew very little about the ceremony. The hon. Member told the House that if this right to perform the marriage ceremony, without the presence of the registrar were granted to Wesleyan Methodists other sects would claim a similar recognition by this House, and that thereupon the right would have to be granted to Religious Bodies which have no settled organisation and no recognised ministers. But I have no fears upon that score. I am satisfied that the kindly feeling among Nonconformist Bodies will make those bodies which are not large enough to be included in the privileges of the Bill perfectly ready to perform their marriage services in the places of worship of the larger Nonconformist Bodies. At present great pain is often given to Nonconformists by the insistence on the presence of the registrar at their marriages, and I congratulate myself on having been here to-night to hear from all sides of the House a condemnation of the system.

(11.40.) MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): I wish to make but a small contribution to the Debate. I must say I think the difficulty raised by the Attorney General with regard to the free and elastic system which obtains among such denominations as the Baptists and Congregationalists will be found to be a really vital one. Speaking for ministers of those denominations I can say that their main objection to the provisions of the Bill is that they do not wish to be constituted State servants, amenable to the State as registrars, and punishable by the State if they neglect their duty. I hope the Bill will be so enlarged as to provide for all the differences as to the recognition of the functions of these ministers.

(11.42.) MR. FURNESS (Hartlepool) As a Methodist, I am pleased to witness the willingness shown on both sides of the House to do a simple act of justice to those who have suffered so much in the past. Although the Bill in its first clause refers to only one particular body, I am willing to support it on the assurance of the hon. Member for Boston and of the learned Attorney General that its defects will be supplied in Committee.

(11.43.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE, (Carnarvon, &c.): I, too, hope that, in Committee, the provisions of the Bill will be considerably enlarged. No doubt, in England, the Wesleyan Methodists constitute one of the most powerful among the Nonconformist Bodies; but in Wales they only rank third or fourth, and, unless the Bill is made applicable to other bodies, very few of the Welsh people will benefit by its enactment. I repeat I shall support the Second Reading in the hope that the scope of the Bill will be enlarged.

Mr. Brunner

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS (GUARDIANS) BILL.—(No. 217.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(11.45.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I desire to move the Second Reading of this Bill. No doubt Members of the House are generally acquainted with its provisions, and I trust they will agree to this Motion. Boards of Guardians now constitute the only authority left on an electoral footing entirely by itself. I propose that in future the Guardians shall be elected by exactly the same constituencies as elect Corporations and County Councils. At present no one has a vote at a Guardians' election but a person who directly pays rates, and in the City of London alone there are thousands of occupiers who are deprived of the privilege of voting simply because the landlord pays the rates in bulk. I myself am so deprived, and have been for 20 years. We pay high rents and equally high rates, yet we have no voice in the election of Guardians. Again, this provision cuts out the class of working men voters for the same reason. These men are allowed to vote for Councillors or for Vestrymen, but they may not vote for a Poor Law Guardian. Again, under the present system owners get an accumulation of votes. Why should this provision exist? It is all in favour of the rich and against the poor. Altogether the present system is most unsatisfactory. Voting papers which are left at the houses are often not collected, and often are not filled in because people know nothing about them. As we have the ballot for all other elections, why should we not have it for elections of Guardians? I need not at this late hour take up further the time of the House. For the reason that it will still further reduce the number of lists of voters, and for the other reasons I have stated, I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Morton.)

*(11.52.) THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): The hon. Member appears to have taken his cue from a Bill proposed earlier in the evening, and to have limited the duration of his speech, which, however, does not appear to me to have been at all commensurate with the importance of the subject with which he was dealing. This Bill proposes to abolish the present qualification of voters for the election of Guardians, and to substitute in the boroughs the burgess roll and in counties the county register of voters. I think the House will agree with me that the position of Boards of Guardians is widely different from that of any other Local Authority, and the constitution is one which the House ought not to alter without grave consideration. Possibly some reform is needed; but the hon. Gentleman is not entitled to ask the House to abolish the present system—to abolish the right of owners to vote as owners, or to substitute the burgess roll or the county electors roll for the one in existence unless he can prove he has a better system to take its place. This is a very important matter, and the Bill does not provide any adequate machinery for carrying out the change that is proposed. One result would be that Boards of Guardians would be elected on a register eight or nine months old. Another defect is that the Bill contains no provision for placing the burgess or county electors roll at the disposal of clerks to Boards of Guardians. It may be said that if the principle of the Bill is adopted, the details for working out that principle can be arranged in Committee. But that is not a fair way of dealing with the House. Those who propose to abolish the present system ought to be prepared with a plan for substituting what is to replace it. I hope that the hon.

Member will be satisfied with having raised this discussion, and will withdraw the Bill, though no doubt the present system of voting by voting-papers is eminently unsatisfactory, and requires to be dealt with. But the hon. Member had better wait until the matter is brought forward in a more practical form. The Government cannot assent to the Second Reading of the Bill.

(11.58.) MR. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I intend to oppose the Bill. I am not surprised that the Government will have nothing to do with it. I doubt very much whether we should get a better set of men as Guardians than we have now under any such system as the Bill proposes. The hon. Member wishes to get the service franchise, the lodger franchise, and other franchises available for the elections.

*MR. MORTON: I do not propose the service franchise, or the lodger franchise.

MR. J. R. KELLY: Well, the hon. Member proposes the lodger franchise, and I should like to know whether a lodger has the same interest in the expenditure of the rates as an owner or occupier?

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Friday.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [23rd February] reported.

ARMY ESTIMATES.

"That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 153,696, all ranks, be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland at Home and Abroad, excluding Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1892."

Resolution agreed to.

REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 17.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 24, to leave out from the word "Where,"

to the word "borough," in line 25, inclusive, and insert the words—

"Section 4 of 'The County Electors Act, 1888' shall be deemed to have applied Section 30 of 'The Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878,' to a parish situate in a Parliamentary but not in a municipal borough, and to have provided that."—(Mr. Knowles.)

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Craig.)

Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Chairman left the Chair, to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Sir JOHN MOWBRAY reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had nominated the following Members to serve on the Standing Committee for the consideration of all Bills relating to Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure which may, by Order of the House, be committed to such Standing Committee:—Mr. Tyssen Amherst, Mr. Atherley-Jones, Mr. J. B. Balfour, Mr. Bartley, Mr. Beach, Mr. George Cavendish Bentinck, Mr. Jacob Bright, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Caldwell, Sir George Campbell, Sir Edward Clarke, Dr. Commins, Mr. Radcliffe Cooke, Mr. Donald Crawford, Mr. Cremer, Mr. Darling, Sir John Dorington, Mr. Dugdale, Mr. Arthur Elliot, Mr. John E. Ellis, Sir Thomas Esmonde, Mr. S. T. Evans, Mr. Forrest Fulton, Mr. Herbert Gardner, Mr. Herbert Gladstone, Mr. Haldane, Mr. Hall, Sir W. Vernon Harcourt, Sir Edward Harland, Mr. T. M. Healy, Sir John Pope Hennessy, Mr. Staveley Hill, Mr. Hinckes, Mr. Samuel Hoare, Mr. Hobhouse, Mr. Isaacs, Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth, Mr. Kenyon, Mr. W. F. Lawrence, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Llewellyn, Mr. Lockwood, Viscount Lynton, Mr. Francis Maclenn, Mr. Swift Mac Neill, Mr. Madden, Mr. Mahony, Mr. Story - Maskelyne, Mr.

Matthews, Mr. Milvain, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Mulholland, Mr. Muntz, Mr. William O'Brien, Mr. Pickard, Mr. Picton, Mr. John E. Redmond, Mr. John Bryn Roberts, Mr. Bannerman Robertson, Sir Albert Rollit, Sir Charles Russell, Sir George Russell, Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Ernest Spencer, Sir Richard Temple, Mr. Whitmore, Mr. Wodehouse, and Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

Sir JOHN MOWBRAY further reported from the said Committee; That they had nominated the following Members to serve on the Standing Committee for the consideration of all Bills relating the Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufacture which may, by Order of the House, be committed to such Standing Committee:—Mr. Addison, Mr. Asher, Mr. Baring, Mr. Barnes, Mr. Barran, Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Sir Edward Birkbeck, Mr. Bolitho, Mr. Bonsor, Mr. Boord, Mr. A. H. Brown, Mr. Brunner, Mr. Burt, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, Mr. Childers, Mr. Jesse Collings, Mr. Colman, Sir James Corry, Mr. Craig, Sir Charles Dalrymple, Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Dixon-Hartland, Sir George Elliot, Mr. T. E. Ellis, Colonel Eyre, Mr. Hayes Fisher, Mr. Penrose Fitzgerald, Mr. Gilliat, Sir Julian Goldsmid, Mr. Grotrian, Mr. Heath, Sir William Houldsworth, Mr. Howell, Mr. Hoyle, Mr. Jackson, Mr. William Lowther, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. J. M. Maclean, Mr. Peter McDonald, Mr. M'Lagan, Mr. Morrogh, Mr. Mowbray, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Murphy, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Sir Richard Paget, Mr. Parnell, Sir Joseph Pease, Mr. Richard Power, Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Edmund Robertson, Mr. Round, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Sheil, Mr. William P. Sinclair, Mr. Samuel Smith, Mr. Mark Stewart, Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Mr. Tomlinson, Sir George Trevelyan, Sir Richard Webster, Mr. Whitley, Mr. Stephen Williamson, Mr. C. H. Wilson, Mr. Winterbotham, and Mr. Wood.

Ordered, That the Report do lie upon the Table.

House adjourned at ten minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 25th February, 1891.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at a quarter past 12 o'clock, but it was not until 12.35, and after attention had been called by Mr. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox) to the fact that 40 Members were not present that a House was made.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PAROCHIAL BOARDS (SCOTLAND)

BILL.—(No. 3.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(12.40.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): In asking the House to read this Bill a second time, I do so in order to induce the House to affirm the principle that Local Boards entrusted with the important duty of administering taxation in Scotland should be constituted on an analogous basis with Municipal Councils, School Boards, County Councils, and other administrative bodies in this country; the functions performed by these local administrative bodies are of great importance. A sum of £728,000 is levied by them in the shape of poor rates, in addition to £546,000 of Education Rates, and other sums for registration, public health, burial grounds, &c., which bring up the total amount levied by the Parochial Boards of Scotland to at least £1,300,000 per annum—or an average taxation throughout Scotland of 1s. 4d. in the £1, and in certain parishes as much as 3s., 4s., 5s., and even 8s., and 9s. The incidence of other rates is prescribed by Act of Parliament generally, but in the case of rates levied by the Parochial Boards with the solitary exception that they are levied, one half upon the occupiers and the other half upon the owners, owing to a system of classifications and deductions, the enormous sum thus raised is allocated

VOL. CCCL.

[THIRD SERIES.]

upon different classes of ratepayers at their own discretion. Consequently, in many parts of Scotland, houses, shops, and agricultural land all pay the same rating. In others, houses are taxed upon the full value, whereas land only pays one-third, one-fourth, or one-fifth of what is paid by house property. In some cases a dead set is made against offices and banks. For instance, in Greenock offices are taxed three times as much as houses, and banks pay four times as much; while in Aberdeen the taxation of shops is only one-half as high. The fact is that the preponderance of any single class of members on the Parochial Board gives rise to the danger of an unfair allocation of taxation among the various ratepayers for local purposes. There is this theoretical check: that the sanction of the Board of Supervision is required, but the Board of Supervision has no power of initiation, and its recommendations are treated with very scanty respect. The Board has been constantly recommending a fair system of classification, but so far only 180 out of more than 800 parishes have adopted any form of classification at all. It has been recommended that shopkeepers and farmers should be classified on favourable terms, but so far as the shopkeepers are concerned, the recommendation has been almost entirely disregarded, with the result that the shopkeepers almost universally consider that they are unfairly taxed in reference to the rates levied by the Parochial Boards. The Board of Supervision, in their circulars, have made a strong point of the income of the working men, and have pointed out how heavily the taxation falls upon the possessors of small incomes, but in no single instance has any reduction in the way of rating been accorded to the small householders. Yet the principle is well understood in Scotland in connection with municipal taxation, where, in many instances, half rates are levied on the occupiers of houses of less than £10 value. I believe I am speaking within the mark when I say that not in 50 out of the 835 assessed parishes is the local taxation allocated in accordance with the equitable principle advocated by the Board of Supervision, namely, that it should be proportionate to the means of the contributor. Unfortunately the public have no effective control over the constitution of the Parochial Boards, and I maintain that the first step in the direction of reform must be a thorough and radical reform of the Boards themselves. In Scotland there are three forms of government in existence in connection with the parochial system. The first is that which exists in the burghal and combination parishes; the next is that which exists in the rural parishes; and the last that which exists in the non-assessed parishes. The un-assessed parishes are gradually dying out in Scotland. In 1860 there were 130, in 1870 there were 93, in 1880 there were 65, and in 1890 the number had fallen to 51. Passing from the non-assessed parishes, which, as I have said, are gradually dying out, I come to the burghal and combination parishes. That class consists of 11 parishes, of which three are very small—Stranraer, with a population of 3,000; East Anstruther, with a population of 11,000; and Queensferry, with a population of only 900. Queensferry enjoys the unique distinction among this class of having a larger number of managers of the poor than there are poor to manage. It is a Board which consists of 16 members, and they have only 14 paupers to look after. But these combination parishes contain eight of the most important parishes in Scotland, including Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, Paisley, and part of Aberdeen, and comprising one-fourth of the entire population of Scotland. Dundee has been created a combination parish since the last Return on the subject. In the other seven parishes there are 156 members elected by the ratepayers, 36 representatives of the Kirk Sessions, and 16 representatives of the Magistrates. The elected representatives are thus in a majority of 156 to 52, or three to one. That principle might work well if the representation was a real and popular representation, but I think I shall be able to show that it is nothing of the kind. Let me explain how the Kirk Sessions have found a representation on the Boards. In olden times the Kirk Sessions of the Established Church were the medium through which parochial relief was administered in Scotland. The church door collections were devoted to the relief of the poor, not entirely but to a very large extent, and the heritors possessed a number of bequests which had been left to them by pious founders for the same purpose. When their parochial system was adopted in Scotland in 1846 it was provided that these funds should continue to be allocated to the relief of the poor, and the Kirk Sessions were granted representation on the Parochial Boards to the extent of four members. But so far as the bequests in their hands are concerned, they have never been handed over to the Parochial Boards, and no account has been rendered of them, although repeated attempts have been made in this House to obtain some account. So far as the church-door collections are concerned, out of the sum of £39,000 returned to the Board of Supervision as having been collected in this manner in 1890, only £16 was handed over to the Parochial Authorities for the purpose of parochial relief. Not only is this so, but I believe it is largely owing to the representation of Kirk Sessions on the Parochial Boards that manse and glebe have been allowed to escape altogether from the range of assessment for Poor Law purposes. One thing is clear, that these Kirk Sessions have no pretence to any right of representation upon the Parochial Boards. As to the elected representatives who stand in the proportion of three to one, how is it that they do not control the policy of the Parochial Boards in the public interest? No doubt, to a certain extent, they do control the policy of the Boards, but how are they elected? They are elected by ratepayers who, at the date of the election, have paid their yearly rates. The assessment notices for these rates are issued in the month of October, but payment is not exacted before January or later. In the majority of cases the ratepayers have no desire to pay the rates in advance. The poorer classes are not in a position to make any payment any sooner than they can help, and the consequence is, that when the Parochial Boards are elected in November and December, as is frequently the case, the majority of the electors find themselves completely disfranchised. Then again, the voting is upon a graduated scale, running from one to six in the case of each voter; and what makes the case worse, is the hole and corner manner in which the elections are carried out. Mr. Walker, the Chairman of the Board of Supervision, giving evidence before a Committee in 1878, after stating that the nomination papers were handed to the Inspectors of the Poor prior to the day of election, said that if there was an excess of candidates the vote of the electors present decided the election, but any 10 ratepayers could render the election void by demanding that voting papers should be issued to all the electors of the parish and district. Contests were extremely rare. In the parish of Aberdeen there has never been a contest at all. When I first introduced this Bill in 1883, on the faith of the evidence of the Chairman of the Board of Supervision, I supposed that this system had formerly existed in Glasgow and still continued there, but it turned out that that was not so, and I was consequently subjected to much denunciation. It turned out, however, that at the election of 1883 in Glasgow City parish there were three wards in which there were contests. The number of the Municipal electors was 45,000, and they must all have been ratepayers in order to have obtained a qualification; in addition to a number of owners who possessed a Poor Law qualification, but were disqualified for Municipal purposes, because they lived too far from the Municipal boundary, out of the total number of over 45,000 only 7,964 were qualified to vote at the time the election took place, and as a matter of fact only 1,400 did vote. Nearly five-sixths were disqualified owing to the time at which the rates were collected and the date at which the election was fixed. It is curious to note the influence that the date of the elections for the Parochial Boards has upon the reforming or anti-reforming tendencies of the Board. There is the Govan parish. The Board there is elected in April, by which time a large number of electors have paid their rates and are qualified. That parish sends up a Petition in favour of this Bill. The city parish, which has its election in December, Petitions against the Bill; it does not want reform, though I am bound to say that the majority against the Bill was only one. The Barony parish goes dead against the Bill.

3 L

Dr. Cameron

Its election is in November. These burghal parishes might be placed on a fairly good basis without any very fundamental or radical change. What we should require to do would be to remove from them all the ex officio members, to fix the date of the election sufficiently late to allow persons ample opportunity of qualifying themselves by the payment of their rates, to abolish the system of multiple voting, and to enact some simple uniform and intelligible system of taking the parish vote in the place of the very unintelligible and varying system that at present prevails. If you did this you would secure in these eight parishes a system of representation which would be satisfactory and popular. It is quite different in the case of the next class of parishes with which I have to deal, the non-burghal or rural assessed parishes. This class of parishes embraces 824 out of the 886 parishes in Scotland—it embraces very many important towns such as Greenock, Leith, Kilmarnock, Perth, Inverness, Stirling, and a large portion of Aberdeen. In these non-burghal or rural districts every heritor or proprietor who pays rates on more than the annual value of £20 is entitled to a seat upon the Parochial Board, and the Kirk Sessions are entitled to send six representatives to the Board. The smaller heritors and occupiers hold elections at which they choose such numbers of representatives as the Board of Supervision may think good to allot to them. Thus constituted some of these Boards are of the most enormous dimensions. There is Old Machar in Aberdeen, which is probably the largest deliberative and administrative assembly in the world: it has 2,180 members. Then comes South Leith, which at the date of the return had 1,639. Next there is Greenock with 1,134 members, and I could cite a number of cases in which the Parochial Boards have a sufficient number of men to completely fill this House of Commons. Taking all the Parochial Boards of this class in Scotland together, I find they consist of 90 per cent. of owners of property above the annual value of £20, to the extent of 5 per cent. of *ex officio*s representing the Kirk Sessions and Commissioners of Supply, and to the extent of 5 per cent. of representatives of the ratepayers and of the smaller heritors. The first proceeding of a cumbrous Board of this sort is necessarily to delegate its functions to a Committee sufficiently small to perform the work. On this Committee the routine work of the parish devolves; but if there is any stirring question, if there is some job to be perpetrated—the election of an officer for instance—mandates are canvassed for, and the decision of the Committee may be upset. But independently of these occasional occurrences, a most unsatisfactory state of matters in regard to the election of the Committee itself prevails. Here again mandates or proxies are made use of. A person may get sufficient number of proxies as to enable him to name the Committee himself. In this way it constantly happens that the ratepayers, after going to the trouble of electing representatives, find the elected representative turned out of the Committee of Management altogether. That was the case only the other day at South Leith. A meeting was held for the purpose of nominating the Committee of Management, and only one of the 15 elected representatives was nominated. Eventually, however, three more elected representatives were added to the list. It is a curious fact that mandates are valid until they are recalled, consequently if a member collects a number of mandates in respect of something which is to take place in 1891, he may be at liberty, if he preserves them, to use them, provided they have not been recalled, in respect of something which may take place in 1901. Over the whole of Scotland I find the Committees of Management consist to the extent of 60 per cent of proprietors paying rates on property above the annual value of £20, to the extent of 24 per cent. of elected representatives, to the extent of 14 per cent. of the representatives of the Kirk Sessions, and to the extent of 2 per cent. of the representatives of Magistrates and Commissioners of Supply. Almost in every case the heritor element cuts down the number of elected representatives; in no fewer than 30 parishes at the date of the Return they were turned out altogether. In only one parish—Colace, in Perthshire—at the date of the Return did the representatives of the ratepayers monopolise the Committee of Management.

Dr. Cameron

In four parishes the Committee was exclusively composed of members of the Kirk Sessions, and in 38 parishes the representatives of the Kirk Sessions outnumbered the heritors and the elected members combined. I am sure it is only requisite to make such a state of things known to a House elected by household suffrage to secure its abolition. When I brought forward my Bill in 1883 I was told that the system was full of anomalies, but it worked well. In 1883 I culled a considerable number of facts from Blue Books and elsewhere to show how badly the system worked. I do not think it is necessary to weary the House with those facts now, and I do not want to make any attack on individual Boards. Opinion in this House has vastly advanced since 1883, and I think I may assume that the principle is now admitted that Boards entrusted with such extensive powers of administration and taxation as are the Parochial Boards should be elected like other similar bodies. In 1883 the Second Reading of my Bill was supported by the Liberal Government then in power, and it was carried though not by a very large majority. In the Division there were three Scotch Members for the Bill to two against it. In 1888 the Bill was opposed by the Conservative Government on the ground that the Lord Advocate was about to introduce another Bill on the subject. I, however, went to a Division and was defeated, but on that occasion two-thirds of the Scotch Members who voted, voted for the Bill. Later on the Lord Advocate brought in his Bill. That Bill was gratifying to me, in so far as it went almost entirely on the lines of the Bill I had previously introduced. The measure did not expressly abolish mandates, but I have no doubt the omission was unintentional. The two Bills differed in this, that in the Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman it was proposed to divide the Members of the Parochial Boards into two equal parts, one of which was to be elected by owners and the other by occupiers. I presume his idea was that as owners pay half the rates they should have half the representation. I have not the smallest hesitation in saying that the Lord Advocate advanced vastly ahead of any of his predecessors. His predecessors only tinkered against the subject, but he went to the root of the matter. Had it not been for the vicious principle respecting elections which he adopted, his Bill might have been regarded as perfectly satisfactory. The principle of election the right hon. and learned Gentleman wished to establish was entirely novel, and so far as Boards of such magnitude are concerned entirely revolutionary. Various objections have been taken to my Bill. A most elaborate statement of them is to be found in the petition from the Barony parish; but every one of the objections will, I think, be found to apply to the Bill of the Lord Advocate. The first objection is that all parishes in Scotland, burghal and rural, will be placed in the same position. That is the case under the Lord Advocate's Bill. My Bill proposes, it is said, to revolutionise the existing system of election. That applies equally to the Lord Advocate's Bill. It will create, the Petition goes on to say, a second roll of voters. The Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman propound the same thing. Then we come to the objection as to the enfranchisement of the people who have not paid rates. That applies equally to the Lord Advocate's Bill. I must say I think the proposal is a right and proper one. In these days, when Parliament gives huge grants in aid of local taxation, when every person is compelled to contribute towards those grants in aid, it is absurd to argue that only those who pay rates directly are entitled to representation. But the main objection urged by the Barony parish is that under my Bill a number of non-resident ratepayers, people who at present pay large sums in rates, but who do not live within seven miles of the boundaries of the parish or municipality in which they pay, will be disfranchised. I have no desire to disfranchise them, and I am perfectly prepared to allow their names to be added to the roll. I do not think it will make any practical difference in the constitution of the Board. I want representation of the widest possible character—one man one vote, but as many voters as possible. But whatever the value of that objection is, it applies equally to the Bill of the Lord Advocate. Then the petitioners say this is not a complete measure. It is just as complete as the right hon. and learned Gentleman's. Neither Bill proposes to deal with a parochial system as a whole, and I am afraid that any Bill dealing with the whole subject would be sure to meet with defeat. There is only one other point on which I have a word to say, and that is the franchise I have selected. If you want an instance of Boards of modern constitution levying rates, half upon owners and half upon occupiers, I would point to the School Board. I am quite prepared to take the School Board franchise, but I know some people will say, a large number of people who enjoy that franchise do not pay rates. I know the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not like the School Board franchise, for he proposed to amend it last year. I wish to fall in with his views as far as I can, and I have adopted his proposed Amendment as to the School Board franchise. I did so because, by doing so, I at once met the objection which I knew would otherwise be raised. I thank the House for having listened to me with so much patience, and beg to move the Second Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Cameron.)

(1.28.) MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): The House has listened with great attention to the long and able speech of my hon. Friend, but I wish to remind hon. Members that there is a side to the question which the hon. Gentleman has not presented. My hon. Friend has used strong language as to the present system. The present system has existed since 1845, and has, in my opinion, on the whole, worked extremely well. Let me, however, preface what I am going to say by stating that I shall speak chiefly for rural parishes, as my experience of Parochial Boards has been gained in such parishes. I have been the Chairman of a Parochial Board for nearly 25 years, and I have attended innumerable meetings. I have seen how things work out, and I have no hesitation in saying that the present system, although it is by no means perfect, secures fair and ample justice being done. The Bill is most sweeping in its character—it abolishes a system that has worked very well. The system which existed before 1845 has been explained by the hon. Member for the College Division. At that time there was no systematic assistance given to paupers except by the church door collections; the Kirk Sessions were the only recipients and distributors of relief, they and the parish clergy. Naturally, when the Act of 1845 was carried, the element of good in the system which had worked so well for many years was inserted in the Act. The system in Scotland differs a good deal from that in England. Poor relief is only given to those who are disabled, or partially disabled, by age or infirmity, or incapable of earning their own maintenance; whereas in England it is possible, I believe, to relieve able-bodied men, and such relief is given. Now, I think anyone who has had experience of Parochial Boards will agree with me that the poor are not taken care of. The only fault to be found—a fault that is found by the Board of Supervision—is that too much money is given, that there are too many paupers on the roll, that the roll ought to be purged. The Board of Supervision draws a strict line as to persons to receive relief and those who should be supported by their relations, whoever they may be. In the parish with which I am best acquainted the rule of the Board is to give relief to those who have for a long time preserved a position of respectability and industry, and have done their best in the parish. But we are confronted with a very serious difficulty arising in the City, a division of which the hon. Member represents. There are a great number of our poor who work out their lives there, and yet fail to obtain settlement of residence in the City of Glasgow, and come back crippled or in bad health, and are thrown upon the parish of their birth because they have lost that five years' residence which establishes a settlement in Glasgow. Glasgow, it may not be known to all hon. Members, has very many parishes so divided that the mere crossing of a street may be entering another parish, so that when it is difficult to trace an actual settlement the man is at once thrown back upon the parish of his birth. Now, the local management of the Boards which has been impugned to-day is, on the whole, I think good. You have anomalies, but the Boards are thoroughly well qualified to deal with the poor of the surrounding districts. The large proprietors are represented by themselves or their factors, and I should certainly hope that in any Bill passed by this House the system will be continued, which allows proprietors to give mandates. How is a Member of Parliament to discharge his duty to the poor in his own district when he has to attend to his duties in this House? A large proprietor long resident knows the circumstances of the poor in his district, and though hon. Members may object to the system practical experience has shown that it works well, and I hope it will long continue. Then you have also the elders of Kirk Sessions, who, generally speaking, live in the vicinity; they are in constant communication with the minister of the parish, and are usually on very friendly terms with any dissenting community in the parish, and their advice is quite as much regarded as that of the proprietor or the minister of the Church. Then you have the elected members specially representing the ratepayers. So you have in that way five or six different classes represented. All can "have their say" and give their vote in regard to the proper care to be bestowed upon their poorer neighbours. The system has worked so well that many of its branches have been introduced and, as I may say, engrafted upon other Local Bodies. A few years ago it was thought a strange thing in England to board out pauper children, but we have done that with advantage in Scotland for many years. We have placed such children in the hands of respectable families, and these children brought up without the Poor House taint, have become independent useful members of society. We have another system now being adopted in England of boarding out lunatics, and there are other matters I might adduce to show that this present system now so much decried, has done good and useful work in the country. No doubt the Board of Supervision has taken an active part and rendered itself unpopular with several Boards; but the Board of Supervision has done very useful work, reducing expenditure which would otherwise have fallen upon the ratepayers by the too benevolent intention of the Boards. The Board of Supervision has laid down the principle that a man shall be assessed according to his classification, but in rural parishes there is no classification. The hon. Member draws a line between house proprietors and shopkeepers.

Mr. Mark Stewart

*DR. CAMERON: I said the Board of Supervision recommended that classification, but only a few Boards have followed that recommendation.

MR. MARK STEWART: I understood the hon. Member to urge that the Board of Supervision insisted upon it. My point is that we hardly know of such a thing, and that this experience of the Board has been extremely useful. I maintain that at the present time the change would be most inexpedient. We have recently had County Councils set up, and there have been discussions whether County Councils should take up this matter of local Poor Law provision working it through Committees. I do not think that County Councils have come to any resolution on the subject, and I am quite certain they have not considered it in its full bearing. I should be sorry to see any sweeping measure such as this passed, throwing over an old system, before we are thoroughly prepared to say what we are going to have in the future. I question very much if the County Councils could, or would, take it up, properly speaking. Of course they could do so, but whether they could know all the relations and connections of individuals with the parish to judge whether they would be proper recipients of parochial relief is matter for question. I should like to know has the hon. Gentleman received any letters or Petitions upon this subject—is there any feeling in the country in regard to it at all? I have received but one resolution from the burgh of Govan which, I think, has been alluded to. In that, by no means unanimously arrived at, several propositions in this Bill are disputed, and these objections constitute a strong argument against the Bill. Objection is taken to Parochial Board Elections taking place in April. They would like elections to take place every three years instead of a third of the representatives going out every year, so inviting a possible election every year in parishes where so many elections already go on. Further they protest against the expense which might attach to members of the large burgh Boards being placed in the same position as burgesses on Town Councils. Further, they say it is only but fair that all ratepayers who have property in the burgh should be permitted to vote in that burgh—whereas the present Bill would exclude those who live at a certain distance from the burgh from exercising their vote. Now, if the present system works well—if there is no demand for such a measure as this—what is the reason for the anxiety of the hon. Member on the subject? It is improper to impute motives to hon. Members in this House, but I cannot help feeling that we are approaching or are within measurable distance of a General Election, and the hon. Member is influenced, perhaps, by the effect this Bill might have on the result. A word on the constitution of the Parochial Boards. The hon. Member has referred to the elective members being fixed and arranged by the Board of Supervision. This was settled many years ago; and, as a rule, there is no dispute about the elected members being too few or too many. The members nominated are well able to give their time and attention to the work; the members of Kirk Sessions are limited to four; and surely it is a very fair Board to decide on oft-times very difficult matters involving questions of law. I know the Scotch Law of Settlement requires a very much more acute mind than hon. Gentlemen may think who have not followed the procedure in Burgh Boards. I have alluded to the Kirk Sessions, to the owners of property over £20, and members elected by the ratepayers fixed by the Board of Supervision; and then there is the case of the Royal Burghs, where there are the additions, and where the system has worked well. One of the reasons that influenced the Committee of 1871 in drawing up their Report was that you ought to have persons who are specially responsible for the rates, occupying a strong position—not necessarily a majority—but occupying a strong position on the constituted Parochial Board; and they pointed out the necessity of some check on the action of those on the Board who, connected with the possible recipients of relief, might be disposed to throw upon the rates expenditure they might be required to bear themselves. The presence of the parish minister, too, on the Board has sometimes a tendency to increase the allowances and to foster objection to the application of the Poor House test. Further, they recommended the raising of the qualification of members from £20 to a minimum to be fixed by the Board of Supervision, but not to exceed £500. These were recommendations of a very strong Committee that took all this subject into full consideration. Hon. Members have but to look at the names on the Committee—they will see they were Members distinguished on both sides of the House. The Committee made a thorough inquiry extending over many days. They recommended that farmers paying the largest rent in the parish should be qualified to sit on the Board without election. To the proposed constitution of the Board under the Bill I do not object, but I do wish to see the constitution of future Parochial Boards, if we are to have them changed, so mixed that all classes will be sure to have a voice in the matter. I do not want to throw the influence into the hands of one class, and I deprecate the idea that owners should have a dominant voice. I do not, however, want to have that voice excluded, and so I would retain the owner's mandate upon matters of so much importance to himself and his neighbours. There is one point in the Bill I do not quite appreciate—that the elective Members may be females.

*DR. CAMERON: It is a right which they possess. I simply guard an existing right.

MR. MARK STEWART: I have never heard of them taking up that position, but, of course, if the hon. Member tells me I am wrong in law I accept his ruling. There is a further point in relation to the number on the Board. I think that in large parishes where meetings are frequent, sometimes fortnightly, it is desirable to have a full number to allow for the absence on business which many men find unavoidable. The hon. Member criticised the somewhat antiquated form in which the elections are conducted, and I am not concerned to defend it. There is ample room for improvement, but I would point out that it is rather a piece of testimony to good management that so little interest is excited in these elections. Time after time, year after year, in different parishes I have seen the same men returned without contest, the ratepayers being thoroughly satisfied with the work of the members. I do not defend the form of election, but I cannot admit it is a "hole and corner" election, and I do not think anybody will say so who is fully acquainted with the facts. If a person qualified to vote does not vote it is his own fault. The time of election was another point to which the hon. Member referred. Is he aware that years ago the Board of Supervision fixed the time in conjunction with the Parochial Board?

Mr. Mark Stewart

*DR. CAMERON: There is a dispute whether the Board of Supervision was willing to accede to the request of Parochial Boards to change the date. Parochial Boards say they have applied for a change and the Board of Supervision has refused it. On the other hand the Board of Supervision say it is willing to suit the convenience of Parochial Boards.

MR. MARK STEWART: I have always heard there is no difficulty in making the change in special instances. You cannot expect it to be convenient alike in all parishes, and I believe the Board of Supervision is quite willing to acquiesce in a convenient arrangement. You cannot have a hard and fast line all over Scotland and if it is convenient in Glasgow to have elections in April or May, I think there would be no difficulty in coming to an arrangement. The elections are not held in a "hole and corner" manner, they are advertised I know ten days at least previously in the local newspapers, so that people have ample notice. I conclude my remarks with the Motion that the Bill be read a second time this day six months. There is no demand for the Bill, or very little demand indeed. The present Boards are in the main working very well, and though the system has some anomalies that require amendment, on the whole I think it works well, and I hope it will long continue.

(1.59.) SIR ARCHIBALD ORR-
EWING (Dumbarton): I beg to second the Motion; but in doing so let me say that, while I question very much whether such a change as this Bill proposes would be very beneficial to the country, I admit that the principle is one that we cannot oppose, seeing that it is a principle that has been recognised on this side of the House, that Boards for the management of their own affairs should be elected. I confess my first objection to the Bill is due to the fact of it having been introduced by the hon. Member for the College Division. It is a question of such delicacy and complexity that it should be dealt with by the Government. I am not against the extension of the elective principle; but I think hon. Members from Scotland and this House will be wise in rejecting the measure, in the hope that the Government will, either this year or next year, be able to bring in a large and comprehensive Bill which will change the present system and be satisfactory to Scotland. (2.0.)

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "this day six months."—(Mr. Mark Stewart.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*(2.21.) MR. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose, &c.): If anything had been wanting to convince me of the necessity of the Bill before the House, the want would have been supplied by the speech of the hon. Baronet who last spoke. The hon. Baronet is a gentleman of great experience in matters relating to the business of Parochial Boards: he has told us that he is chairman of at least one Parochial Board, and it is not to be doubted that in the discharge of his duties he has studied carefully the many questions that have to be dealt with by those bodies. He is well versed in the necessity of getting people on the Boards who are capable of discharging the duties; and, bringing his experience to bear on the question before the House, the hon. Baronet has laid down two propositions. He has said that he approves the principle, that all Parochial Boards should be representative, and he added that he was generally in favour of the principle of the Bill; and how an hon. Member, holding those two opinions, and in face of the fact that the Government now in office brought in a Bill two years ago in the very direction of the proposal of the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow, can find it consistent with his former action to vote now for the rejection of that measure, I cannot understand. But the hon. Baronet did give a reason and let us examine what it was—He said in effect "Although I am in favour of the principle of the Bill, and although I consider that all such Boards should be representative, although I admit that these Parochial Boards are not now representative, I intend to wait till the Government introduces some more comprehensive scheme." Well, the Scottish Members on this side of the House would like to know what more comprehensive scheme can be devised or has ever been suggested for reforming the constitution of Parochial Boards in Scotland. The hon. Member should have remembered the action of the Government in 1888. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate and the Government, of whom he was the mouthpiece on this question, acknowledged the necessity for reform by bringing in their Bill. What did that Bill acknowledge? Why, that these Boards, not being representative, ought to be made representative. It acknowledged, in the next place, that the present system of voting which now is multiple, as has been described, ought no longer to exist. It proposed to abolish the system and proposed a new franchise for the election of a representative Board such as is proposed in this Bill, and I believe I am right in saying that, substantially, the only point which the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman did not cover, and which this Bill does cover, was the question of voting by proxy for the Parochial Boards. What is it that we have to understand by the remark of the hon. Baronet who last spoke that we should wait until a Bill is brought in by the Government? Passing, however, from that speech, I wish to say a few words as to the speech to which the House has listened from the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stewartry. The speech of the hon. Gentleman appeared to have for its object the conversion of the Lord Advocate, because all the arguments used in it were arguments which must have been rejected by the Government, when the Government in their Bill in 1888 sought to do what it is sought to do now, though perhaps as regards details in not exactly the same form. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stewartry said he could find no fault at all with the present system, which is 45 or 50 years old. That was enough for him. Indeed, that it was a fine old crusted institution—which, as he said, had been doing good. I am prepared to admit, if the hon. Gentleman likes, for the purpose of the present argument, that the existing system has worked well, but I would remind the House that when the Local Government Bill for Scotland was passed it was said from the Benches opposite, and admitted from those on the Opposition side, that the Commissioners of Supply had worked well. The time, however, had come—and everybody acknowledged it—when representative bodies ought to have control of local business, and it was agreed on all hands that the existing Boards should be supplanted by the means which the Local Government Bill for Scotland effected. Then, having used that argument, the hon. Gentleman went on to give a few other reasons why the Bill should not be accepted. He denied that there was any necessity for abolishing mandates, and said he would speak for rural parishes. I may be permitted to remind the House how the rural parishes of which the hon. Member spoke are nominated or elected. Every owner of land or heritages of the annual value of £20 or over is on the Board as a matter of course, without nomination or election. Then, in the next place, you have the Provost and Bailies of any Royal Burgh within the parish appointed ex officio. Then, again, you have the representatives of the Kirk Sessions—or, if there are more than six, you have six of them nominated by the Kirk Sessions. After that vast multitude of people—for the owners may amount in some cases to over 1,000, as has been pointed out by the mover of the Second Reading—you have a certain small number of elected members, the number being named by the Board of Supervision. Now, I cannot imagine, on the first blush of it, any Board more likely to work inefficiently, and to serve its purpose more inefficiently than a Board so constituted. What is everybody's business is nobody's business. If you have Members on the Board of a certain rateable value, they can give to some person a mandate to vote for them when he pleases, for what he pleases, and under what conditions he pleases. I should have thought that the time had come, when even the House of Lords having discontinued their system of voting by proxy—that this system of voting by proxy in the parishes of Scotland might very well be considered inadequate, or that something better might be put in its place. The next argument was that the members of the Kirk Session are on the spot—a most remarkable argument. I should have thought that other Ministers of the Gospel were also on the spot; and I assume that had we representative Boards we should also find the elected members on the spot. Then the hon. Gentleman says that the Kirk Session know all about the people. I challenge that entirely. I quite agree that the Kirk Sessions may know their own business, but I question that they know all about the business of other people. I think there are other Institutions in the parishes of Scotland, moreover, who know quite as much about the wants of the people. The hon. Gentleman spoke of boarding out lunatics, and said that in this respect the present Institution works remarkably well. I do not deny the efficiency of the hon. Gentleman as a member of the Boards to which he belongs, and that the duty to which he refers will be as efficiently discharged as it can be by a non-representative Body. Nevertheless, a representative Body would probably do it as well, if not with more satisfaction to ratepayers. The hon. Gentleman's next argument was in defence of the Board of Supervision. Nobody attacks the Board of Supervision in connection with the Bill before the House. It is a Board similar to the Local Government Board of England, and has a general control over the Parochial Boards and Rural and Urban Sanitary Authorities. It has been said that this Bill is not wanted, and that it has been introduced for electioneering purposes. I will tell him who wants the Bill. The Government wants it. They introduced it in 1888—and presumably because it was wanted—and I should have thought that a sufficient answer to the hon. Gentleman. Besides, my hon. Friend introduced substantially the same Bill in 1883, and more than once in the present Parliament. I appeal to the Government to allow this Bill to pass the Second Reading, so that it may go before a Committee. If the Government see fit to adopt the suggestion, Amendments on matters of details may be suitably introduced, and hon. Members opposite may have an opportunity of enforcing their views. It would be wrong to delay a measure which is wanted in Scotland, and can be made useful.

Mr. Shiress Will

* (250.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I think it is about time that we had some arguments addressed against this Bill. There have been none so far. The hon. Member for the Stewartry is the usual exception to the rule, and, lurking behind his own trench, declares his opposition to this Bill. Probably he is the only man who, after an experience of 20 years of the present condition of things, would say that the present system of Parochial Boards in Scotland is not indefensible. The hon. Gentleman has not taken into consideration the circumstance that it is not every Parochial Board in Scotland which possesses so excellent a chairman as he is, and that those interested in the question have not found the Parochial Boards exactly the most representative Bodies even in recent years. The hon. Member very properly referred to a Report of 20 years ago on the subject, but I am not sure that the recommendations in that Report support his contention against a change in the present system. There has been a great number of changes within the last 20 years, and I am sure the Lord Advocate would be the last to use an argument based on a Report of 20 years ago. The hon. Baronet who seconded this Motion declared with great good sense that the present parochial system was entirely indefensible, and he frankly admitted that his whole and sole reason for opposing the Bill was that the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow had introduced it. The hon. Member for the College Division made a most able and incontrovertible speech. In my constituency I have made a study of this parochial system, and I find that the land is assessed at one-fifth of the value of the dwellings in villages; that is to say, the first is assessed at 6d. in the £1, and the other is assessed at 2s. 6d. in the £1. It is natural that the landlords, who are all influential on the Parochial Boards, should take as little out of the land as possible, and as much out of the villages and the householders as they possibly can. They have the power, and they use it. They follow out the policy of doing the best they can for themselves. But the system is one which I am sure will not be defended by the Government, or by anyone who has paid any attention to it. This subject, I say with all sincerity, is one of supreme importance. I know of nothing which affects the condition of the working classes more than the administration of the Poor Law. It is constantly coming to my ears that people belonging to the Dissenting churches are not cared for or looked upon in the same way as those who belong to the parish churches; and they feel it a matter of humiliation that in their troubles they cannot go to their own elder, or minister and have their case fairly represented. They find that it is necessary to go to the parish minister, who, thereby, has a superior position in the Kirk Sessions, compared with their own minister and their own Kirk Sessions. I am quite aware that members of the Kirk Sessions go out of the way to allay this feeling, and deprive it of force. But you cannot expect to destroy it, and it is a source of great jealousy and heart burning, widespread, and well understood in most of our parishes. It is said that the people of Scotland are satisfied with the existing state of things because they take no interest in the elections. But it only requires that a coterie should have the mandates in their pockets, and they can control the whole parochial system. The people know this, and that it is useless to manifest interest in the elections, so long as the wealthier classes have the control. My hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcudbright has said it was a dangerous thing to give poor people the power of electing those who administer relief to the poor.

MR. MARK STEWART: I rise to Order. I read an extract from the Report of the Select Committee of 1871, I did not give it as my own opinion at all.

*MR. ESSLEMONT: I thank the hon. Member for the explanation, but at any rate he read the opinion as one which he approved; if he does not approve it but condemns it, I should be glad to hear him say so. I maintain that it is a hard thing for the poorer class whose friends are placed in the unfortunate circumstances necessitating the receipt of poor relief to be told that they have no right to take part in matters bearing on the welfare of those in whom they take the strongest interest; for my part I believe that they would be more likely to arrive at just and fair decisions in regard to those with whom they can feel and with whom they can sympathise, than the better class who do not understand the wants and conditions of the poor as they do. I fully admit that there may be a good deal to be said regarding the details of this Bill, but those are matters which can be dealt with in Committee. What we now ask the House to affirm is, that the present system is anomalous, and requires Amendment, which the House ought to do the more readily seeing that both sides have already gone a long way in the direction of suggesting a large and substantial reform of our parochial system. What we need in Scotland as much as in any part of the Empire is a greater simplification of our Parochial Boards. I trust the present Lord Advocate, during the limited period of his power, may yet carry a measure which will bring about the simplification of these Boards; we have already gone a long step towards this; but I trust we may soon go several steps further, so that we may have these bodies elected on a similar principle to that which governs elections of School Boards, County Boards, and Parliamentary Representatives. The vote for Members of Parliament is of little consequence to the working man compared with the interest he feels in his own parish, and matters which are of constant occurrence at his own door. We have had trotted out to us the improvement that has taken place in the Law of Lunacy under the boarding out system. But where did that originate? Why, in places where a popular election was most thorough. For my part, I hope that this system will be greatly extended, as I believe it to be the means of doing much good. I will not, however, detain the House further; but for the reasons I have given I shall give my cordial support to the Bill. I think it will be shown that a large proportion of the Scotch Members will vote for it; and if it be rejected through Government using the overwhelming force of their majority against the Scottish people, they will merely be furnishing another argument in proof of the fact that although the bulk of the Scotch Members are endeavouring year after year to do the best they can for their country and their constituencies their demands are negated by an adverse majority which neither knows nor cares for the wishes of the Scottish people, but merely uses its power at the bidding of the Government to frustrate the wishes of the overwhelming majority of the Scotch Members. I would remind the Government that these things are noted, and constantly noted, by the Scotch people, and I again warn them, as I have warned them on former occasions, that if they wish to prevent the growth of a Home Rule feeling in Scotland, it will be by listening to the reasonable requirements of the Scotch Members as put forth in this House, not unduly nor too frequently, but, at any rate, with earnestness and sincerity.

Mr. Esslemont

(2.50.) MR. A. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): Perhaps I may be allowed to call the attention of the House to the subject with which we have to deal. We are not dealing with the question of the constitution of a legislative representative body, we are merely engaged in considering the constitution of a body whose function it is to deal with the administration of the Poor Law. For my own part, I have always been one of those who have taken a strong line in the direction of making the franchise as wide as possible in regard to the Representatives who are sent here for legislative purposes. But when we are engaged in the consideration of a measure relating to the constitution of a totally different body, charged with the control of a purely local system, the questions which arise are of a totally different character. What the House has to consider is, what are the functions the Scotch Parochial Boards have to perform, and how we are to get the Boards which will best discharge those functions. I must confess that on first reading this Bill I was struck with the importance attached to it. It should not be forgotten that it is intended that the Poor Law electors in Scotland are to be the same persons as elect the County Councils and Parliamentary Representatives. Doubtless, every householder in Scotland is interested in the manner in which we legislate here, and the decisions we arrive at on the general policy of the country. To my mind, it does not matter how much a man pays in rates and taxes as long as he is concerned in the course of policy pursued by Parliament; but when we are asked to deal with the mode of electing a Parochial Board who have to make the rates and raise the funds for the relief of the poor, and also to determine how the money shall be spent, it does strike me that it would be an unwise thing if the electors, having to choose the men composing those Boards, should largely consist of persons who pay no rates at all. I can understand that the rural labourer, the gamekeeper, or the gardener, who, doubtless, are much under the influence of their employers, should take their fair share in the Imperial concerns of the country; but, on the other hand, I do not think it right that the labourer, the gamekeeper, and gardener, who do not contribute a single sixpence to the Poors Rate, should be empowered to decide by their votes who shall be responsible for the local administration of the Poor Law. My hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) in the exhaustive speech he has made has spoken of these Parochial Boards being constituted in some cases of hundreds and, indeed, thousands of individuals, and it is clear that we ought in some way to have the Committees properly constituted. Here arises the question whether certain individuals should be ex officio members of the Board. That is an important matter for our consideration. And with regard to the Kirk Sessions representatives, I would say I see no sense or reason in any ex officio representation of the Kirk Sessions as such. Again, I do not see why the Provosts and Magistrates of the rural burghs should not be entitled to act as ex officio members of these Boards. Nevertheless, I am not prepared, as a matter of principle, to support the proposition that all ex officio representation on the Parochial Boards of Scotland is to be condemned. The Magistrates in the burghs are generally men of great experience, and in the majority of cases the Provosts and Magistrates are found extremely useful on the Parochial Boards. With regard to the question of allowing those who do not pay their share of the rates to assist in controlling their expenditure, we have heard of remarkable cases in Ireland where relief which has come from sources other than the ratepayers' pockets has been administered in the most lavish manner. This is a thing that can hardly be possible in Scotland, but I think it will be generally admitted that there is always a tendency to be a little reckless in the distribution of relief, which has not been provided out of the pockets of those by whom it is administered. If this Bill is to be rejected I hope the Government will be enabled before very long to bring forward some measure of their own by which these Local Boards may be thoroughly overhauled and reconstituted. I cannot approve of the principle of the Bill, and must, therefore, vote against the Motion for its Second Reading.

(3.30.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I need not detain the House with any arguments in support of the Bill, because none whatever have been advanced against it, for what my hon. Friends have said by way of objection to the principle of the Bill applies with equal force to the Bill introduced by the Lord Advocate two years since. It is too late in the day now to try and do away with the elective principle, which it is the sole purpose of this Bill to extend to the Parochial Boards. We already have in the County Councils and School Boards of Scotland, the purely elective principle in force, and we are only asking that the Parochial Boards, which exercise much the same powers as the other bodies, shall have the franchise on which they are elected altered, so as to make it in conformity with the general principle. The Parochial Boards have to deal with a local taxation amounting to £728,000; the School Boards deal with a local taxation of £546,000 in addition to a Government grant of £500,000 sterling; and the School Board, which deals with the larger amount of money, is based on the purely elective principle. No one better knows the state of feeling in Scotland than the hon. Member for Dumbarton, and he says it is too late for anyone to dispute that principle. His only objection to the Bill was that it was introduced by my Colleague the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow instead of by the Government. It has also been alleged that the Bill has been introduced in view of a General Election. But the Bill was originally introduced in 1883, and it has been before the House several times since. When the Bill was introduced in 1888 I voted against it, and for the reason that it was said the Government were about to deal in a comprehensive manner with local government for Scotland; and it was advisable to see their scheme before we began tinkering with existing institutions. But what has since happened? The Government have introduced their Bill, and we know that instead of having gone on the principle of a purely elective body, they adhere to the system of making the rates payable half by the landlord and half by the tenant, and of having a Board one half of which consists solely of owners' representatives. I venture to say that a proposal of that kind is most reactionary. I am not at all surprised to find that hon. Members opposite fear that the question of the constitution of

Mr. Caldwell

Parochial Boards is one likely to influence the voters at the next General Election. The present system is manifestly unfair; and if the Government think to beat down Scottish opinion by simply defeating this Bill without argument, they will discover to their cost that the voters in the counties lay very considerable stress upon this matter. It may be said that if the landlord pays half the rates he is entitled to half the representation. The answer is that the landlord does not pay half the rates. He purchases the property with the burden upon it, and in paying the rates he is only paying that burden which he has taken into consideration when he fixes the price he gives for the property. The rate is really a tax upon industry. It is a mistake to suppose that only ratepayers have an interest in this question. What of those who do not pay poor rates? Is not that rate levied in order to give relief to those who are indigent? Have they no interest in the question of its administration? They have a substantial interest in the just and fair management of Parochial Boards, and ought not to be excluded from their just influence upon the elections. They may be few in number and not able to materially affect the general result; but, still, they ought to have their rights. I hope that hon. Members from Scotland will vote in favour of the principle of the Bill, which is in accordance with modern ideas and with those Liberal principles which predominate throughout Scotland.

*(3.8.) MR. SOMERVELL (Ayr, &c.):

When hon. Members for Scotland who sit on the opposite side of the House discuss a Scottish measure they usually favour us with peculiarly Scottish opinions; they take the opportunity to instil upon our minds the fact that they alone are imbued with Scotch Liberal principles, and that they alone represent the people of Scotland. They are, too, always holding out terrible threats against the Government of the day as to what will happen if it does not follow the sound advice which they tender. But much of what has been said to-day is altogether beside the question we are now discussing. There are two points raised by the Bill, and in introducing his measure the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow laboured considerably over the first—as to whether the present system of electing Parochial Boards should be continued. I am not going to occupy the time of the House in defending that system. I am of opinion it should be altered, and the sooner the better; but I cannot join in the wholesale condemnation that system has met with. The present constitution of the Parochial Boards is somewhat intricate, and not altogether devoid of the popular element. Objection has been taken to Provosts and Magistrates being members of the Board; but it seems to be forgotten that these gentlemen are elected by a popular vote; and if the Boards were elected by the proposed suffrage, it is probable that in many places these gentlemen would come in at the head of the poll. It is now on record thanks to the speech of the hon. Member for the Montrose Burghs, that the average number of owners of the annual value of £20 and upwards in Scotch parishes is 400; and it cannot be said that a Board consisting of 400 members would be wholly unrepresentative. The question is whether the Board proposed by the Bill is the best that can be suggested in the circumstances. Last night I gave as my reason for voting against a Bill my objection to its title. If I had merely looked at the title of this Bill I could have given it my most cordial support; but on looking through the Bill I find in every clause something to object to which is incapable apparently of being altered in Committee. The hon. Member for the St. Rollox Division objects to any consideration being given to this question who pays the rates. He thinks that while the rates are divided equally between owners and occupiers it is a very wrong thing that owners should be considered at all in the constitution of a Board which is largely responsible for the administration of the rates. The hon. Member was, I believe, in this House when the Scotch Local Government Bill was passed. That measure met with his unqualified approval, and in it he will find express recognition of the principle that due consideration must be given to the incidence of taxation. Yet now he says that property ought not to be considered at all, although it pays half the rates.

MR. CALDWELL: Perhaps I had better explain that I opposed those particular clauses in the Local Government Bill, and am, therefore, not to be held responsible for their adoption.

*MR. SOMERVELL: I was not aware of that, and therefore withdraw the expression unqualifiedly. Still we have the fact that the majority of the House thought those clauses fair and proper. If the owner bought his property at a lower price because of the burden of rates upon it surely the occupier stands in the same position, and in deciding what rent he is willing to pay takes into account the amount of rates; therefore, if the argument of the hon. Member is good for anything at all, it applies with equal force to both owner and occupier. Whatever the opinions of the hon. Member for the St. Rollox Division may be, we all know that the principle obtains in this House that taxation and representation should go together. Yet it is entirely ignored in the present Bill, and, therefore, I am unable to support it. There is another important point which ought to be borne in mind. It may be that in some of the parishes which elect the Parochial Board there is a populous place by reason of some special industry being carried on in it. If this Bill were carried it would be possible for that portion simply to swamp the agricultural interest, which pays the larger share of the rates. Reference has been made to the School Board franchise, but hon. Members have failed to point out that in that franchise there is a cumulative vote which secures minorities a chance of representation. No such safeguard is included in this Bill. Again, as it is proposed that one-third of the members shall retire every year, the majority might, by the exercise of brute force, so arrange things as to deprive the minority of any representation whatever. I have always been opposed to a system which would permit such a state of things, and it is because I fail to see the slightest appearance of fair play in this measure that I oppose it. I think it has only been brought in in view of a General Election. I am willing to support any measure which embodies the principle that taxation and representation should go fairly together ; but this Bill violates that principle, and, further, I think it would be a mistake to tinker with the constitution of the Parochial Boards unless we are prepared to constitute a body to which may ultimately be transferred all the functions hitherto conducted within parochial limits.

(3.22.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): This Bill is being opposed on various grounds. The hon. Member who last spoke, if I rightly understood him, did not oppose some measure of reform in the constitution of the Board, but I could not quite gather in what direction he wished that reform to proceed. Then the hon. Member who moved the rejection of the Bill took up the position that the administration of the Poor Law was very well as at present, and he did not seem disposed to admit the necessity of any reform whatever.

MR. MARK STEWART: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I quite admitted there was need for reform.

MR. D. CRAWFORD: Well, the hon. Member at any rate did not indicate what reform he thought necessary; indeed, he was at great pains to defend the system as it stands. But I do not think that that is the position taken up by the Conservative Party. I hold that those who maintain that the law works well in its present form are assuming a Quixotic attitude. No doubt the hon. Member has exhibited much gallantry in his willingness to defend any weak system however indefensible it really is. But it is impossible to support the attitude he has taken up, and the Government are not at all likely to back him up. Accepting the Bill of the Lord Advocate in 1889 as embodying the views of the Conservative Party on this point, I think the issue between both sides is really a very narrow one, though it is not unimportant. My hon. Friend the Member for the College Division gave a very interesting and graphic history of this question. The story of the Parochial Boards in Scotland cannot be too often repeated; it is the example of an anomaly, a monstrosity, I might even say, in the administration of the affairs of Scotland, that is singular and unique. The Lord Advocate in his Bill accepted the franchise which was recommended, not only because it was popular, but because it practically became the basis of all the representative institutions of the country. The right hon. Gentleman was prepared at the same time to sweep away official representation on the Board, yet he coupled those proposals with one which I consider to be the most reactionary I have ever heard made in the House—to erect a new description of representation franchise, to separate the owners from the occupiers, and to make them into two equal classes. It is impossible too emphatically to condemn that principle, and I trust my right hon. Friend will never again make that proposal to the House. I can readily believe great pressure was put upon him from certain quarters to induce him to make such a proposal, but I doubt whether, if he consulted the landed interest, he would find a general fear of an open franchise even for the election of a Board for the administration of parochial affairs. The issue before the House is: Is this popular franchise to be retained for the purposes of the Parochial Board, or is it for that one purpose to be excluded when it has been accepted for all the other representative institutions of the country? We hope that in the two years which have elapsed since the Lord Advocate introduced his Bill he has changed his mind. We hope to find that he is prepared to accept the principle of this Bill, and that he will base the Parochial Boards on the popular franchise by which County Councils and School Boards are elected.

Mr. Somervell

*(3.30.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Sir CHARLES PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): A good deal of the discussion has turned on the question as to how far the present administration of the Poor Law in Scotland is or is not defensible. I am not disposed to support the proposition that the present system is not open to amendment, and I will not enter into the questions regarding the abolition of mandates, the electorate, or the constitution of the Board. Those questions may well be left open for re-consideration.

In considering this question we are at once met with the fact that the present system has not only been some time in operation, but has undoubtedly worked well in almost every particular. The hon. Member for the College Division (Dr. Cameron) has uttered some hardly veiled threats that he has a large armoury of objections to the working of the system.

DR. CAMERON: Illustrations or instances.

SIR C. PEARSON: Yes, illustrations of cases in which the present system has not worked well; but the test is not to be found in instances here and there, where there may have been dissatisfaction or friction. One single fact which I will mention will show that no one can fairly say that the present system has not been successful in Scotland—the fact, namely, that while since 1868 the population of Scotland has increased by something over 700,000, the pauperism has decreased by something like 40,000. I think I would be unduly courageous if I endeavoured to satisfy the craving of some hon. Gentlemen opposite for arguments against the Bill. They have over and over again complained that there has been no argument brought forward by the opponents of the Bill. I rather think the explanation of that complaint is that the argument desiderated is argument which will convince those whose minds are already made up; and I cannot hope to change them. There are, however, two main lines of objection to the Bill, either of which is sufficient to induce the House to vote against the Second Reading. The one raises large considerations of policy; the other has reference to the Bill itself, as an ill-considered measure, labouring under serious defects, and one which will not work satisfactorily in the main. I cannot call it a hastily considered measure, because we are told it has been in the minds of its promoters for eight or nine years; yet in some serious respects it is an ill-considered one. On the important point of policy,—this Bill, if passed, will bring about a change not merely in the franchises in the country, but in the Poor Law administration of the country, which is a totally different thing. The measure seems to me to contain elements of risk and danger as regards a Poor Law administration which has been built up with the utmost care through a long series of years. This may well make the House pause before giving a Second Reading to the Bill. What is the justification which the Mover of the Second Reading has pleaded in this House? I apprehend that, apart from the general consideration of the benefits of representative government in all spheres, the hon. Member's main illustration of the necessity for the change is based upon a matter, which the Bill hardly touches, namely, the inequalities between various parishes in Scotland as regards the classification of assessment. The Member for East Aberdeenshire carried that further, and said that in his investigations of the administration of the Poor Law he found a totally different state of matters in each parish.

MR. ESSLEMONT: The hon. and learned Gentleman, I am sure, does not wish to misrepresent me. I never should have thought of saying such a thing. What I said was that there are material differences.

SIR C. PEARSON: If the hon. Member says there is no particular or specific difference, I will say no more on the point; but what I think the hon. Member really meant to say was, that apart from the differences in the constitution of Boards in burghs and country parishes there is a marked difference of classification. Well, that is a matter which is really not touched by the present Bill. Those who support the Bill may think this is a thing which will be amended by the operation of the Boards which will be called into existence by this Bill, but the question of classification depends on a Statute which this Bill does not displace, namely, the Statute of 1845; and the Board of Supervision in this matter of classification will continue to control it as before. Another serious question is raised by the illustrations given by hon. Members opposite as to the analogy which they think exists between the franchise for municipal and School Board elections and the franchise they desire to introduce for Parochial Boards. But, again, I will remind the House that this is not in the main a question of franchise, but of the constitution of the Boards. Therefore we have to take into consideration in connection with this question the question whether there is an analogy not merely in the act of voting for the one Board and the other, but in the operations of the Boards. It is true that School Boards have power to assess, and they have Government grants; but the assessment and the Government grants are distributed on certain fixed lines, which almost exclude discretion, and which act almost automatically, as in payment by results or on average attendance. But it is different in the case of Parochial Boards. Their funds are not spent on public works or matters like education. They are spent on what are, though not legally, yet, in the larger sense, really charitable purposes, and are, therefore, open to all the difficulties and niceties which surround the distribution of relief. I need not enlarge upon those difficulties, but they are difficulties which seem to me to touch very nearly the question which has been raised as to the constitution of these Boards, and it appears to me that the references made on this point to the Government Bill of two years ago are entirely beside the question, unless we take into account—first, the constitution of the Board in view of its duties; and, secondly, the position of the question in 1889. The position two years ago was that owners, all along had, ipso facto as owners of a certain value, a seat on the Parochial Board. It was, therefore, reasonable for the Government Bill to say that if we are to alter that state of things, and to cut down, say, the Old Machar Board from 2,000 members to 20, it can only be done fairly by proposing, as the Government Bill did, to allow owners an equal representation in respect that they pay one half of the rates, while the occupiers pay the other half. I dispute, therefore, the analogy between the Bill of 1889 and the present one, because it fails at the vital point—to wit, the constitution of the Board. Let me remind the House that the present system of Poor Law administration in Scotland has been built up with the utmost care for a long series of years. I deprecate any proposal to remit the matter to a totally new body, who will not regard the policy and the traditions of that administration, which are so necessary to prevent the dislocation of the whole Poor Law administration. I say so advisedly, and I can point to the absence of any reasonable objection during this discussion to the present system so far as actual administration is concerned. I would add that it is in the highest degree not only unfair, but dangerous, to put the administration of the Poor Fund into the hands of the class who are nearest to the pauper class itself. That would operate unfairly to those who have to pay one-half of the assessment, and, in the second place,—

Sir C. Pearson

DR. CLARK (Caithness): The system which the Solicitor General is condemning obtains at present in all the burghal parishes.

*SIR C. PEARSON: I do not quite follow the application of the hon. Gentleman's remark, and I do not think he and I can be referring to the same thing. I rather think that the history of the Poor Law, both in Scotland and England, shows that the risk to which I was about to refer is a real one, namely, that when we get so low in the scale as to give a preponderance to a certain class in the administration of the Poor Law, there is a tendency to wastefulness and to pauperisation.

DR. CLARK: Is the hon. and learned Gentleman aware that in all the burghal parishes, and in the combination parishes of Glasgow and Edinburgh—over 1,000,000 population—they have that condition of things now that the administration is controlled only by those elected by the people?

*SIR C. PEARSON: I understand the hon. Member's point now; but I think the hon. Member forgets that the franchise is a graduated franchise, and, moreover, entirely fails to discriminate between the two matters under discussion, namely, the franchise under which the election takes place and the constitution of the Board. I have been speaking of the constitution of the Board. To come to my second point, I think the Bill is open to the observation that it has not been prepared with sufficient care. It is a remarkable fact that the Bill will operate largely as a disfranchising measure. The Barony parish in their Petition have shown that the result of the Bill will be the disfranchisement in that parish alone of £1,250,000 of annual value out of £1,750,000.

*DR. CAMERON: Precisely the same as the Lord Advocate's.

*SIR C. PEARSON: I think that is quite an unnecessary interruption. This disfranchisement of rental represents in the rating of that parish the disfranchisement of £22,000 a year of poor rates, out of £29,000 a year. The hon. Member says that the Bill of 1889 was open to the same objection, but that Bill contained provisions which by their operation removed the slur which the hon. Member's remark would throw upon it. Again, the clauses of this Bill operate towards disfranchisement in another direction. The hon. Member proposes for voting purposes to take the burgh or the county roll. In the case, therefore, of a ratepayer who has property in parishes A, B, and C, whether in a burgh or a county, the Bill will actually disfranchise him in regard to all but one.

*DR. CAMERON: The Lord Advocate's Bill.

*SIR C. PEARSON: I do not think it was so in the Lord Advocate's Bill; but I will pass from that point. So far from this Bill simplifying the electoral roll—and the hon. Member for the College Division seems to think there should be one roll, one franchise, and one area for all purposes—actually another roll will be necessary to give effect to this Bill. Then the hon. Member proposes a sort of sliding scale, according to population, to fix automatically the number of members of each Parochial Board. At present the Board of Supervision fixes the proper number according to the needs of localities, because many things have to be taken into consideration besides population. Moreover, the Bill contemplates a maximum of 100,000 of a population as determining the number on the Board; yet the Barony parish of Glasgow has a population of over 300,000. Upon the principle of representation you must have regard to the fact that a parish may largely exceed your maximum. On the grounds I have stated I think it will be obvious that the only course open to us is to support the Motion for the rejection of the Bill.

*(4.0.) SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): The hon. and learned Gentleman, in the beginning of his speech, seemed desirous of leaving out of sight the evils of the present system; but it is absolutely impossible for us to leave these evils out of view, for on these evils turn this Debate. Scotland has waited long enough for the redress of these evils, and it is most extraordinary proof of the vitality and tenacity of a great abuse that such an exposition as my hon. Friend the Member for College Division made of the system of parochial elections in Scotland in the year 1883 should yet have been followed by eight years during which no serious attempt has been made to correct these evils, and that now we are told by the Government that we are to wait for an indefinite time longer. Observe how indefinite the time is; for the hon. Member for Kirkcudbright (Mr. Mark Stewart), speaking with almost unnecessary courtesy, told us that he did not like to attribute motives, but he was afraid the Bill was brought forward with a view to the General Election. Why, think what that means. Suppose we have a General Election 18 months hence. After that at least two years must pass before the Government which succeeds, or the present Government, can bring in a Bill to correct these evils. So that means Scotland is to wait three and a half years for the redress of these abuses, so flagrant that they are almost incredible when they are enumerated. The hon. and learned Gentleman has brought forward objections, every one of which, with one exception, is an objection which could be removed in Committee, and this I think the hon. and learned Gentleman himself will not deny. When the hon. and learned Gentleman seriously objects to the Bill upon the Second Reading because it fixes the number of members of a Parochial Board in parishes of different sizes, a principle already laid down in our Education Act, I say that is a principle which, if he objects to it, he can alter as much as he likes by the aid of the Government in Committee. He can hardly be serious in making this a Second Reading objection. But upon one point he goes strongly against the Bill, and grapples with it; and that point had been previously treated by my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. A. Elliot). It is not fair to say no argument has been adduced against the Bill, because on this point both my hon. Friend and the Solicitor General argued fully, though not, I think, in a satisfactory manner. The real point upon which the Debate turns between the Government view and the Bill is whether there shall be a separate franchise of owners and occupiers, or whether all members of a Parochial Board are to be elected by the great body of the people. On that point it has been argued that there is something very different between the functions of a Parochial Board and the functions of a School Board or Municipal Council. They allow that the franchise we propose is the franchise upon which these other bodies are elected; but what does my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh say, and what does the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Scotland say? The functions of the bodies are different, says the hon. and learned Gentleman; these Parochial Boards have to discharge delicate and important duties in relation to the distribution of parish relief; but what have these other bodies to do except to take over the Government grants and give them out in the manner laid down by Statute? But can it really be maintained that a School Board has not the power to involve the community in very serious expenditure by means of the policy it adopts. I do not mean only in the necessary form of expenditure for buildings, or the proportion of schools to population. In Glasgow the School Board had the power to settle the question whether elementary schools should be fee-paying or not. Then, when you turn to Municipal Bodies, remember the London County Council has not only the control of enormous funds, but I believe the Council has taken over the debt of its predecessor of £40,000,000. How can you say that the franchise upon which such bodies are elected is not fit for the election of a Parochial Board when it is deemed safe in relation to the administration of the municipal affairs of London, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Leeds, or Sheffield?

Sir George Trevelyan

MR. A. ELLIOT: What I wished to put was this: that the electors under the Bill would be entirely different from the electors under the School Board or County Council elections, because a vast number would come in as electors who never saw the face of the collector at all, were never liable to the rates, or charged with the rates.

*SIR G. TREVELYAN: In the first place, I was replying to the special argument of the Solicitor General, but I quite understand the point of my hon. Friend. In towns so far from it being the case that the School Board electorate is less wide, though I allow in country districts it is, so far from it being less wide than the electorate that elects to the Municipality, it is a very much wider electorate, and no one knows that better than the Lord Advocate. What we maintain is that, as in the School Board and the Municipality, so in the Parochial Board it is not necessary to have any special representation of a class for the protection of that class. Surely if an owner is a man who takes a real interest in the affairs of a locality he will get elected to the Board; and if he is an owner in that rare position of being a Member of Parliament and has to come up to London, he must have a badly-managed popularity if he cannot get a relative, an agent, or a trusted friend elected in the district where his interest lies. Wealth rightly administered will always be able to exercise a legitimate influence in any elective body. Not only is the present system a bad one, because under it elected members are swamped by ownership votes, but its evils are aggravated in proportion as communities become more active and rich, and, presumably, more intelligent. I take the constituency the Lord Advocate represents. In Bute there is a parish called Kilbride, a comparatively small parish in which there are two elected members—or I take another parish, Kingarth, though it is not so strong a case for my purpose—in Kingarth there are 25 owners to two elected members; but in Rothesay, which we presume to be the centre of energy and thought in the district, you actually find 399 owners to seven elected members. This is not by any means the strongest case we can find. Take an instance in Invernessshire in Barra, a parish of an extremely rural description, there is one heritor to three elected members; but in the town of Inverness there are 616 heritors to 12 elected members—that is to say, the non-elected members are 50 to 1 of the elected members. Then, in Roxburghshire, in that, in most respects, delightful parish of Minto, there are four heritors and only one elected member. Then in the old town of Hawick we find seven elected members to 290 heritors, a proportion of 40 to 1, and anyone who knows the circumstances of Hawick must acknowledge that this is a preposterous proportion. Much has been said by the hon. and learned Gentleman about a Petition presented against the Bill; but I am authorised to say that the Petition was passed by the majority of one, and I think hon. Members will agree that when a body comes within such a narrow majority of voting its own dissolution, then it is time for that body to put its house in order. In these burghal parishes, though it is quite true that the great body of ratepayers vote, yet in the first place they vote under a very defective system of registration and under the plural system of voting, and, according to the extent of his property, a man has from two to six votes to his neighbour's one. And now a word to show how extremely important it is to deal with this matter quickly. It is not the case that Parochial Boards have only the function of administering to the wants of the poor. In addition to that, under the Act introduced by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, they take part in those District Councils which is the first instalment, I hope, for the whole of the United Kingdom of the right method of conducting local government. They send representative members to take part in functions which my hon. Friend behind me must allow are of the highest importance—matters relating to the public health, to the administration of roads, and other matters of great importance. Now, when we consider under what influences these Parochial Boards are, when we hear my hon. Friend the Member for Forfarshire—not a man to speak at random—declare from his experience that the practical effect of the present system is to put, subject to certain limitations, the administration of the Board funds in the hands of the parish minister; and when we consider that the best answer is that from the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Mark Stewart) that Nonconformists can always rely on the kindness, sense of justice, neighbourliness of the parish minister—or words to that effect—when we find that outside the Kirk Sessions there is this extraordinary system of ex officio representation on these Boards, then we say to send one or two members of Parochial Boards from each parish to manage roads and administer Acts in relation to public health, is to give the merest fragment and mockery of representation to the great body of the people. I conceive that no English Member can have been present during this Debate without feeling that the system which has been described is an absolute monstrosity, and I trust our English friends will assist us to abolish it. Some of them have heard the speech of my hon. Friend; more of them have heard the answers, and they must feel that no argument of any sort or kind has been brought forward against my hon. Friend except this claim that owners should have the right of special representation. Therefore, I trust they will assist us on this occasion. A great deal has been said about the Members of the Opposition wasting time. I know of no instance of it, but here is an opportunity for the Government to save time by accepting this Bill. There is only one objection urged to the principle, and only one of any serious kind to the details, of the Bill of my hon. Friend. If the Government would allow this Bill to be read a second time they would be doing a very gracious action indeed, one that would send the Bill through the House, so far as this side is concerned, with unanimity and great celerity, and a desire to stretch every point we could to meet the Government view. If the Bill is read a second time to-day it might be taken again on either the 27th of May, the Derby Day—and I earnestly hope the House, breaking through a bad custom, may meet on that day—or the 3rd. or 17th of June, and the Bill could easily pass this Session, and thereby the old scandals of the existing system could be swept away. I do not doubt that to-morrow certain newspapers will throw every sort of contumely upon this Debate, which will be characterised as dull and a mere waste of the time of the House of Commons, and other things will be said that Scotchmen care very little about. If the Government accept the Bill they will give to Scotland a satisfactory measure of Home Rule, and excellence of detail and of practice is sure to follow where a right principle has been established.

(4.24.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): Repeated references have been made to the Government measure of 1889, as it related to Parochial Boards, and we have been invited from more than one quarter of the House to state how far we adhere to the spirit of the proposals made at that time. The House will remember that we then laid before the House what unquestionably was a very large and extensive measure of local government. It was thought well by the Government that there should not be exempted from that general overhaul of local institutions the Parochial Boards of Scotland, and in that view, and more especially as, in the Local Government Bill as presented to the House there was direct connection established between the Parochial Boards and district administration, it was considered necessary to present the views of the Government as to Parochial Boards. I should be the last to underrate the anomalies of the existing system of election to Parochial Boards, and the Government in no way recede from the views which they formerly expressed on that subject, nor would they refrain, did any favourable occasion present itself, from taking advantage of the opportunity of carrying their views into effect. We have heard the word "abuses" used several times; and if this means that the present system presents many anomalies and complications susceptible of improvement in many particulars, then I assent to the use of the word "abuses," though I regard the use of the word "anomalies" a more appropriate. I deny, however, that there are any abuses in the system as far as the relief of the poor is concerned. The Government are entirely with those who desire to put the Parochial Boards upon a more rational and sensible footing as regards their mode of election, whilst they desire to preserve the same spirit of administration that has characterised them during the last 45 years. The Government desire that the representation of both owners and ratepayers should be simplified, and in presenting in 1889 a proposal that the Boards should be constituted half by owners and half by occupiers, we thought that we were presenting an instrument or engine for the administration of poor relief, equitable and free from the anomalies that may render the Boards unpopular. But I turn to the proposal now before the House; and in reference to what has just been said by the right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Trevelyan), I feel bound to point out that it is not legitimate for a Government to do even gracious acts at the expense of the vast social interests concerned in Poor Law administration. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that he will hear nothing from me tending to minimise the importance of this question, which concerns so deeply the social life of Scotland. My objection to the Bill is that its essence and pith is to entrust to a popularly-elected body, the majority of whose constituents are the poor, the administration of Poor Law relief. That is a novel and dangerous experiment, and contains the germ of evils from which the country is at present free, and may lead to a lax administration of the Poor Law. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan) was not exempt from a fault which has vitiated many of the arguments in support of the Bill. We have heard much of the defects of the present system, but what was missing from the speech of the right hon. Baronet as from preceding speeches was any perception of the subject-matter of the administration which is entrusted to the Parochial Boards differing in essential details from the functions of other bodies. It has been said that, after all, this is merely a question of rating, and that the Government ought not to be too diffident in trusting a body which, to a large extent, will represent occupiers. Sir, let us open our eyes to facts which are not of so remote occurrence as to render them inapplicable at the present time. It is said on the other side that this has been a bad system of Poor Law administration, and that you would get a better one if you had popularly-elected Boards. There have been systems of Poor Law relief which have succeeded, and some which have failed, and I ask can you say that the evils of the systems which have failed are not more likely to recur if you have popularly-elected bodies than if you have Boards constituted of more firm material? What are the functions these Boards have to discharge? Parochial Boards have to consider such questions as this—Shall A B receive relief, A B's case involving similar action in many other instances; or shall C D have the offer of the House, as it is called, or receive outdoor relief? These are cases which require to be dealt with by firm Boards, and not by persons, in a small community, elected by those who are in close relation with the recipients of relief. Let me point out the proper way to consider this matter. It is not to have regard to the more prosperous and orderly parts of the country, but to have regard to those parts where there is or may be distress. In these cases, if you have a popularly-elected body, are you not running a very great risk of popularity being obtained by immorality in the administration of relief, more especially when poverty is at the door of a considerable number of the electors? I am not speaking with the smallest disrespect of those who would elect or those who would be elected. Fortunately, it would be the more amiable weaknesses of human nature that would influence Guardians in giving way to popular feeling in relieving distress, whereas the general interests of the country and the interests of industry and prosperity require that the Poor Law shall be firmly and not laxly administered. I do not think the evils which at one time existed in connection with the parochial system would necessarily be repeated under the Bill before the House; but I appeal to the House to consider whether it is not a subject of the most delicate description—whether for a Government to do a gracious act upon matters involving such consequences would not be the height of political folly, and whether it is not better for the House to adopt an attitude firm and cautious upon this most grave and serious subject? I think anyone who has heard the whole of this Debate, and looks back on it, will see that I have touched on topics that have not been grappled with by hon. Gentlemen opposite. We have heard a great deal about admitting everybody to vote upon every subject, and of assimilating the administration of the Poor Law to the administration of the Education Act, but we have not had the smallest contribution to the discussion in the way of discriminating between the subject-matter of administration as regards Parochial Boards and as regards these other bodies. It is said we need not be afraid of the ratepayers' representatives wasting the ratepayers' money. I say you are quite safe in this sense: that if there be a little extravagance in the way of adopting pretty extensive schemes under the School Boards or Municipalities, it is all to the good—the money is there; but if, on the other hand, you are extravagant in the matter of poor relief, and spend money in a manner that has a demoralising effect upon the poor in rendering them disinclined to seek employment or to shift for themselves, the money is not there; it is lost to those who have contributed it, and you have done evil instead of good to those who receive it. I hope the House will pardon me for regarding this aspect of the question as one which deserves its primary attention and consideration. The House has not realised the fact that in Scotland there is no precedent for an election upon any such footing as that laid down in the Bill. We have as an ingredient of the Parochial Boards elected members, but they are elected on an ad valorem scale.

Sir George Trevelyan

*DR. CAMERON: No—cumulative—graduated.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The hon. Gentleman's phraseology may be more correct than mine; but when I say ad valorem, I mean that when a man pays £50 for rent he has so many votes, and when he pays £100 he has so many more. I should have, therefore, thought that the phrase ad valorem more correctly described the system than cumulative.

*DR. CAMERON: The man who pays £5,000 has the same number of votes as the man who pays £500.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Yes, but the number of votes admitted under the smaller amounts are so large as to put altogether out of question any distinction there may be between the gentleman who pays £5,000 and the gentleman who pays £500. The hon. Member's interruption assures me that in the hurry of arguing this matter out he has not had present to his mind facts which he ought to have taken note of in giving comprehensive consideration to this question of the administration of the Poor Law. We have to face a state of society where, while there are many Parochial Boards to which it would not much matter who were or who were not elected, there are many districts where a very different state of feeling would prevail, and the question would be viewed with widely different eyes. You must ask yourselves whether you are going to set up a safe or unsafe system of relief. In maintaining the view which I have stated, the House will not be surprised to hear that the Government must support the Amendment. The position I take is not one of receding from the proposals of the Bill of 1889. It is not one of indiscriminate or general admiration of the existing system. It does not involve the giving up of any hope of being able to rectify the anomalies which characterise that system, but it represents our definite resistance to a system which presents the possibility of danger from which politicians ought to shrink.

(4.43.) DR. CLARK: If we have been unable to meet the case of the right hon. and learned Gen.
Mr. J. P. B. Robertson

tleman, it is because until now we have not heard anything against the principle of the Bill, and also because the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow has adopted the principles of a Bill for which the right hon. and learned Gentleman is himself responsible. It is doubtful whether the Solicitor General for Scotland and the Lord Advocate agree, because the bulk of the arguments and most of the speech of the former were dead against the principle of the Bill introduced by his hon. Colleague. We seem to have the Government on this occasion speaking with a divided voice, the Solicitor General for Scotland declining to go on the revolutionary lines marked out by the Lord Advocate. I have frequently thought that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is revolutionary when he attempts reforms; and the Government now see that that is so, and that they are being led in Scotch matters by a gentleman of a revolutionary turn of mind, though the Conservative element is coming out to counteract his views. I will now reply to the two arguments which have been used against the principle of the Bill. Just now we have in the burghal parishes and in the two great combinations of Edinburgh and Glasgow no members on the Boards representing the heritors. The Boards are composed of members elected by the people, with one or two representatives of the Kirk Session and one or two representatives of the Magistrates, and one or two representatives of the Barony. Then there are four members of the Commissioners of Supply. Taking the case of the Barony, it is constituted of 21 elected members, four members of the Kirk Session, and five of the Commissioners of Supply. These members of the Kirk Session and Commissioners of Supply are entirely overwhelmed by the elective members. In the whole of the combinations of Edinburgh and Glasgow there are no representatives either of the Kirk Session or Commissioners of Supply. I cannot concede the point made by the Solicitor General for Scotland that you would be reducing the number of the elected members on the Barony Parochial Board by this Bill. You would reduce the total number from 29 to 24, but you would increase the number of elected members from 21 to 24. In from one-quarter to one-third of the entire population of Scotland you have now got Parochial Boards dominated and controlled by popularly-elected members, property, as such, having no representation at all on them. If a Bill on the lines suggested by the Solicitor General for Scotland or the Lord Advocate is brought in and carried, it will replace on these Boards men who are elected by the people, by men who represent nobody but themselves. But the ad valorem vote exists there. Let us look at that ad valorem vote. It is true that owners have a right to vote for the men elected in the parish, and that they have up to six votes. But if you take that vote it is not 10 per cent. of the other, so that so far as 90 per cent. is concerned you have the great principle to which you object of popular representation. If you give the representation to property you at once open the door to extravagance, for, in order to be popular, men would be liberal—they would compete with one another. Twenty-four or 25 years ago I was member of the Parochial Board of Govan, which is now in the combination. At that time we had several thousands of heritors, and about 30 were elected by the people. Where a system of that kind prevails the Board performs no function at all. It only has two half-yearly meetings, and all the work is done by an elected Committee. Having adopted the system of popular control has there been any change? Do the men now elected profess liberality, and have you any increase of the rates? No; and any argument to the contrary cannot be supported by facts. In the town districts you have popular control, and in the country districts you have control by the heritors, and I maintain that the latter system is working badly. In a place in Ayrshire you have 2,164 heritors who do not pay half the rate on the Board as against 20 elected members. Of course the Board cannot itself work, and has to carry on its functions by means of a Committee. That Committee is composed of 34 heritors and six ratepayers.

They think very little of the Kirk Session there, and do not put one representative of it on the Committee. In Ayr there are 428 heritors on the Board and 12 members elected by the ratepayers, and the Committee is composed of 17 heritors, 6 ratepayers, and 1 member of the Kirk Session. In my own parish of Kilmarnock there are 603 heritors on the Board, 18 elected members, and six members of the Kirk Session; and the Committee is composed of 22 heritors, 12 elected members, and two members of the Kirk Session. That, I maintain, is altogether unfair, the ratepayers having nothing like the representation they ought to have. Another point is that, in altering the law, something should be done to put an end to a system which is not very creditable to the Church of Scotland. The Church of Scotland, as compared with the Church of England, is pure in the sense that she has no useless offices, no sinecures. The ministers of the Church have to work hard for their money, and none of them are overpaid. The Kirk Sessions have the right to put a certain number of members on the Parochial Boards, because the kirk door collections are for Poor I, though they do not go e or those purposes now. A is collected at the kirk d this only £16,000 goes to F poses, the remainder being il for other purposes. The C steals that money from the poor, though I do not say that the money collected by the Church ought not to be spent for Church purposes. In this matter some churches are, legally speaking, honest, and others are not, though there is no one to see that the latter class do not misappropriate the money. The Member for the Ayr Burghs is an advocate of the doctrine that taxation and representation should go together; but he is going to oppose the Bill, though he is in favour of that reform. He thinks that the two do not go together under the Bill. As a matter of fact, he is fighting for the ad valorem vote. Is that a system hon. Members would like to apply to the representation in this House on the plea that a large amount of money is spent by us? Certainly not. You do not disfranchise the heritors in the case of the House of Commons. They still have their votes, and, under this Bill, the same principle would be applied to the Parochial Boards who spend a comparatively small amount of money. On the whole, I think the present condition of things in regard to the Parochial Boards is unsatisfactory. Evidently the Government are unable to suggest any remedy, and are inclined to let the present system go on until they are replaced by some other Government, who will deal with a state of affairs which is admitted to be anomalous.

*(4.59.) MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland) : The Lord Advocate stated that there had been no attempt made by any hon. Member on this side of the House to grapple with the essential difference between the business which has to be transacted by the Parochial Boards and the business which has to be transacted by other Boards. He said that if the Bill passed it would lead to bidding for popularity in the poorer parishes, and would bring about an increase of the rates. But everything depends on what the right hon. Gentleman supposes the Parochial Boards exist for. If they exist for keeping down the rates, I could understand the argument; but the matter can be looked at in another light. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to say that there is no bidding for popularity the other way?—that gentleman would come forward asking to be returned in order that they may keep down the rates? And do not the same arguments apply in the case of School Board elections? Do not gentlemen come forward to solicit the support of the ratepayers, saying that, if elected, they will keep down the rates. The Solicitor General has said that the claim for the special representation of property holders on the present Parochial Boards is dependent on the fact that before 1845 they alone were entitled to sit on the Parochial Boards, but the right hon. Gentleman forgot to say that before 1845 there was no rate at all for the maintenance of the poor; consequently, if they alone had the power of administering parochial relief at that time, they alone paid for it. But, subsequently to 1845, it was found necessary that something further should be done, and the rate hitherto levied on property holders only was extended to the general ratepayers, with the result that the only return they got was the miserable fragment of representation they now enjoy. It has been said that taxation and representation should go together. To that there can be no objection, and I ask why is it that the Government do not carry out that principle now that they have so good an opportunity? They have already, by a proposal presented to this House, asserted that the property owners are entitled to half the seats on Boards because they pay half the rates, but I fail to see in what way the Bill of my hon. Friend imposes any injustice on those persons. True, he takes away their present monopoly of representation and puts them on a level with the other electors; but what injustice is done to them if they, who pay half the rates, are put on the same level as those who pay the other half. In point of fact, I have not heard a single tangible argument against the Second Reading of this Bill. Hon. Gentlemen opposite oppose it not upon its merits, but in order to support their Party. I quite agree with what has been said as to the effect the rejection of this Bill will have in Scotland. The people there are of opinion that their wishes ought to be dealt with in this House according to the views put forward by the majority of their Representatives; and if they find that those views, when thus expressed, are constantly overriden by the action of a Party majority, they will be more and more driven to the conclusion that they will never be enabled to give effect to their demands until they have obtained the control of their own affairs.

Dr. Clark

(5.5.) The House divided:—Ayes 159; Noes 185.—(Div. List, No. 68.)

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

RATING OF MACHINERY (No. 2)

BILL.—(No. 18.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(5.20.) MR. H. S. WRIGHT (Nottingham, S.): I rise to move the Second Reading of this Bill, and I regret that a measure so important to the industries of this country has been reached at so late an hour. The subject of this Bill was thoroughly threshed out last year, when the Second Reading of a somewhat similar Bill was moved by the hon. Member for Cirencester. A whole Wednesday afternoon was devoted to it, and its Second Reading was carried by an overwhelming majority namely, 152, the figures having been 239 for and 87 against), and this rather in spite of the opposition of the Government. But now, instead of having the opposition of the Government, I believe they are favourable to the measure, and are convinced that the law requires to be amended and defined, in order to put an end to the state of chaos and confusion that now exist. The present Bill differs from the previous one essentially in that, instead of defining what machinery should be rated, it defines what should not be rated, thereby leaving everything as it is save the defined exceptions contained in the present Bill. The course now pursued was suggested by the Attorney General, and I believe it has received the most favourable consideration of the Government. The object of the present Bill is not to exempt that class of machinery from rating which has hitherto been rated, but to prevent the threatened rating of what has not been rated in past years, and the rating of which would most seriously handicap English manufacturers in their competition with foreigners, especially with regard to textile fabrics. We want to make the law the same as it is in Scotland, where the system works very well. We want to draw a distinction between machinery, as it is commonly understood, and machines which are movable, the former being such as would be included in a mortgage of the premises, whilst the latter would pass by a bill of sale. Moreover, I should here like to point out that often in a lace manufactory a machine which is to-day worth £500 is perhaps not worth £100 a short time after, because of the introduction of some newer pattern. If the Bill does not sufficiently carry out the object I have described, we are quite willing to accept such Amendments in Committee as may make it more perfect. In fact, there is one part of the definition—that relating to special construction and adaptation of premises—which we think decidedly should be altered or omitted, as being ambiguous, and likely to lead to litigation, and we are already prepared with several suggestions to remedy this. I would point out to agricultural Members that their hostility to this measure might result in their having to pay rates in respect of the farming implements necessary to their industry, just as are the machines of lace manufacturers in our northern towns. Property owners who oppose this Bill, with the view of lightening the rates on their houses, should remember that a rate imposed on machinery to the injury or destruction of trade will eventually result, by the movement of population, in their property being rendered almost valueless. This Bill is only in protection of industries. If you want to rate personal property, let us have it all round. Begin at the right end—Consols, Debenture Stock, pictures, billiard tables, perambulators. Do not rate the tools of the blacksmith and the carpenter, because you might just as well do that as rate this class of machinery. If you do allow such rating to take effect you will earn the eternal gratitude of foreigners and anything but the gratitude of English manufacturers and the thousands of men, women, and girls they employ. I beg to move the Second Reading of this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(5.28.) MR. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead): Sir, I can hardly congratulate my hon. Friend on the circumstances in which he has moved the Second Reading of this Bill, there being hardly time to touch even the fringe of a subject of great importance, involving as it does many complications of a legal and controversial character. The measure is essentially in the interests of English manufacturers, as could be amply proved were there time. It is an invidious thing to talk out a measure; but considering the range of the subject and the desirability of having all views expressed upon it, including those of the Government, I beg to move the adjournment of the Debate.

*(5.29.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): Sir, as we have not had an opportunity of giving that consideration to the Bill which it calls for, I beg to second the Motion.

Debate adjourned till Tuesday, 7th April.

RATING OF MACHINERY BILL.

(No. 16.)

Order for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [11th February], "That the Bill be now read a second time," read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (SCOTLAND)

LOANS BILL.—(No. 57.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [18th February], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS BILL.

(No. 92.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

MUSEUMS AND GYMNASIUMS BILL.

(No. 159.)

Order read for consideration of Bill in Committee.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the hon. Gentleman in charge of the
Mr. W. H. James

Bill if he objects to my Amendment extending its operation to Ireland?

*MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): No, Sir.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I have not had an opportunity of reading the Bill. Will the Lord Advocate say if it is desirable to extend it to Scotland?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I will consider that before Report.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday, 5th March.

PARLIAMENTARY VOTERS' QUALIFICATION BILL.—(No. 97.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 17.)

Considered in Committee, and reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

VOTERS' SUCCESSIVE OCCUPATION BILL.—(No. 169.)

Order for Second Reading upon Monday next read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

OCCUPIERS AND LODGERS (METROPOLIS) BILL.—(No. 170.)

Order for Second Reading upon Monday next read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

PARLIAMENTARY VOTERS' REGISTRATION BILL.—(No. 24.)

Order for Second Reading upon Wednesday, 10th June read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Fifth Report brought up, and read; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 26th February, 1891.

COPYRIGHT BILL [H.L.]

Petition that the Bill may be referred to a Select Committee, and to be heard by counsel against; of the Stationers' Company; read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.

(No. 38).

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for going into Committee, read.

*LORD BRABOURNE: My Lords, before the House resolves itself into Committee, I should like to ask a question of the Government, if they are able to answer it in the absence of the Prime Minister. There was a little conversation which went on across the Table between the Prime Minister and the Front Opposition Bench, during the discussion of this Bill on the last occasion, one of those conversations which are inaudible to many of the Members of the House, but which are not without importance. I understood the noble Marquess at the head of the Government to say that he intended that important Amendments should be discussed in your Lordships' Committee in full House, and that all other Amendments should be left to the Grand Committee to which this Bill is to be sent. I want to know what position we are in with regard to this Bill. Is there any definite line by which we may know whether an Amendment is important enough to be discussed in Committee of the whole House, or whether it is to be referred to the Grand Committee? I want to know whether the labours of the Grand Committee are to be restricted in any way. I do not think we ought to go on in a slipshod manner, not knowing whether we are to be debarred from discussing here anything that may be important, or whether the discussions are to take place upstairs. A great deal of valuable time will be wasted if we have to go into the matter again when the Bill comes back.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): As I understood the noble Marquess, what the noble Marquess meant—and I speak from recollection of what I heard, because I was no party to the conversation—was this: that the House itself would decide whether it would or would not take certain Amendments, and whether it would be advisable to go on discussing them here, but that certain Amendments which are more matters of draft and detail than of principle might very well be left for more careful consideration in the Grand Committee. As I understood, the point will be determined by the House itself, as it arises upon the various Amendments by the selection of the House.

LORD HERSCHELL: I also quite understood it as the noble Lord has said. There was no limit intended or laid down as to what may be done in Committee of the whole House. Of course, when the Committee of the whole House has dealt with the clauses of the Bill the idea is that they may receive in greater detail more careful supervision subsequently. Of course, the Committee would not be limited in any way, as I understand, in going into the matter. It must be dealt with in Committee of the whole House, because, if not, the only result would be that the Bill would come back on Report from the Grand Committee, and the whole of its work might have to be done again.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

*LORD BRAMWELL: My Lords, I do not know what description of Amendments your Lordships will deal with in this Committee, but certainly I should at some time or other like to have an opportunity of striking out what appears to me to be an erroneous and mischievous part of Clause 1 in the 1st section. I mean that which says that, notwithstanding any contract, the tithe rent-charge, as defined by this Act, issuing out of any lands, shall be payable by the owners of the lands, notwithstanding any contract to the contrary between the owner and the occupier. The words which I object to are, "Notwithstanding any contract to the contrary between him and the occupier of such lands." No contract to the contrary between the owner and the occupier of such lands could in the least degree affect the rights of the tithe owner, and I think the suggestion that this clause makes that it could is a mischievous one, and that those words should therefore be omitted. Whether the House would think this is a case for having attention called to the matter here, or whether it should be done in the Grand Committee, I do not know.

LORD BRABOURNE: While the noble Marquess is thinking how he will answer that question I should like to point out to your Lordships that this is the beginning of the difficulty to which I referred just now. You have got here a charge which is now payable by the owner of the land, but which may be payable at present under a contract through his tenant or otherwise. The noble and learned Lord opposite has said this appears to throw doubt upon the validity of the contract between the landlord and tenant. I, not being a lawyer, am anxious to know the legal bearing of those words. The Bill provides that the tithe rent-charge shall be payable by the owner, and what I want to know is whether it is not payable by the owner now. I should desire to be informed whether I am within my legal right when I make a covenant with my tenant, as I have done with several tenants before now, that he shall take his farm at a smaller rent upon his paying the tithe rent-charge for me. Am I in my right in making this proviso: that the tenant shall at the end of the year pay to the landlord a sum equivalent to the tithe rent-charge which the landlord has paid? I want to know whether this section affects that proviso. It has been said that this measure is necessary in order to avoid friction, but how do you get rid of the friction in that way? The tenant will have to pay, and whether it is paid through his hands or mine does not much signify. If there is any friction, that friction remains. I should like the legal luminaries of your Lordships' House to give us an explanation of this part of the section: whether, in the first place, the tithe rent-charge is not really payable by the owner; and, secondly, whether this section will have the effect of making the owner pay it directly with his own hand? Will it not be perfectly competent for me to make an arrangement with my tenant of this kind: "You shall send me a cheque for the rent, and I will send on a cheque to the clergyman?" It does not signify in the least whose cheque is sent. This, my Lords, is only a sample of the enormous difficulty you will have to surmount in dealing with this question and in attempting by legislation to correct a system which has grown up naturally.

Lord Bramwell

LORD BASING: There is a question arising anterior to this, which seems to me to require explanation, and that is: who is the owner of the lands when they have been let for building purposes; whether, after land is built upon, it can be covered by one and the same definition? How would it operate in the event of the land being sub-divided for building purposes, as it is in many cases in regard to lands throughout the Kingdom, and especially round London? Most of this building has taken place since the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act, and I therefore apprehend it is hardly the intention that "owner" shall be taken in reference to the Tithe Act of 1836.

LORD HERSCHELL: With reference to the point which has been made by my noble and learned Friend, there is no doubt an inaccuracy of language used in regard to this question of the payment of the tithes, but it is absolutely sanctioned by the expressions used in the Act of 1836. It speaks of the tenant being bound to pay the tithe. Now, strictly speaking, the tenant is not bound to pay the tithe except in the sense that the land may be distrained upon. But I would suggest this, whether it might not be better to alter the 1st sub-section in this way: that the "Tithe rent-charge as defined by this Act issuing out of any lands shall be recoverable only in manner provided by this Act."

The 2nd section deals, to a certain extent, with the words "Notwithstanding any contract to the contrary," because it provides what is to be done in that case, and we might avoid all ambiguity by using a general expression of that sort, which I apprehend is what is intended. I would suggest that it might be better to alter the 1st sub-section by making it dec're that the tithe should be recoverable only "in the manner provided by this Act."

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I do not know whether, as this is rather a drafting Amendment, it would not be better to reserve it for the consideration of the Standing Committee.

LORD HERSCHELL: I think so.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I quite concur in the view that the noble and learned Lord takes, that that will be the most satisfactory way of dealing with the sub-section, which, as it stands, is scarcely sense. The words, "to the contrary," ought certainly to come out. Then, with regard to the definition of "owner," we took that given in the Act of 1836. That is a very wide and extensive definition. I shall be very glad to consider any alteration of it, but I do not think we shall be able to improve upon it.

LORD BASING: The Act of 1836 certainly gives a very wide definition for the word "owner."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: With regard to the definition of "owner," I think that will require to be most carefully considered. The definition of the word "owner" given in the Act of 1836 was for quite a different purpose. I apprehend that the Act of 1836, being an Act for dealing with the tithes, required that every person who, as owner, had any interest, large or small, in the land that was titheable, should have full opportunity of being heard before the authority dealing with the matter. Not being myself a lawyer, I must confess that I find myself totally unable to construe the half page of definition in the Act of 1836, and without in the least intending to say that that definition is not applicable to the present Bill, I think the noble Marquess will agree with me that as this measure is different, inasmuch as it places the direct burden upon the owner, it will require very careful consideration in Standing Committee to see that the definition does that which the Bill intends. I do not think it is possible to do that without further minute discussion of the clause.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: Under the Act of 1836 it did not signify to the tithe owner who the landowner was, because he could go on the land, and it remained with the tenant to find out who was owner, which, of course, he knew. But when there are two parties both interested in baffling the tithe owner, the question becomes entirely different. It is clearly something more than definition that requires attending to now.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I quite agree as to the necessity for being very careful in this matter, and I also agree that there is one purpose in view now, whereas there was another when the Act of 1836 was passed. The result of a careful study to my mind is, that the definition will not require substantial alteration, but that it will require some words of qualification to this effect: that as between landlord and tenant the landlord shall in all cases be treated as owner and not the tenant. The necessity for that, to my mind, arises chiefly out of the provisions of the Act of 1836 in reference to joint owners. Under the Act of 1836, if a lease is for more than 14 years, and the rent is not two-thirds of a rack-rent, he is made a joint owner; but it is clear, I think, that for the purpose of this Act, that ought not always to be the case.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I think it is inconvenient to discuss the sufficiency of a definition without some Amendment being moved upon it. You do not say that the definition is bad, and I do not know how we can discuss it unless somebody will point out the faults to be corrected.

LORD BRABOURNE: I should be glad to have an answer to my question, which is, I think, rather an important one; that is, that if the tithe is payable by the owner already, how can you enact in this section that it shall be paid by him? If it is so now, what is the use of saying it shall be so hereafter? What I understand the noble Marquess wishes to do is to make the owners pay it direct, and I think if you are going to do that you had better do it in plain language.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I do not defend the language of this clause. I think it should be considerably modified not as a question of substance, but of drafting. Certainly I think, as the noble Lord points out, we should be re-enacting here what already exists. That is a very harmless practice, though I do not know that it can be said to be a useful one. At all events, I do not understand the noble Lord who raised this discussion to move any alteration in the 1st sub-section?

LORD BRABOURNE: Not now.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Then in line 11, page 1, I move to leave out the words after "but" down to "he" in line 12. That is in connection with another Amendment to leave out the word "that" in line 14, and, after "tithe rent-charge," to insert the words "which such occupier has contracted to pay," so that the clause will read—

"Such sum as the owner has properly paid on account of tithe rent-charge that the occupier has contracted to pay."

It is practically merely a drafting Amendment expressing the same thing as has been previously provided for.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD HERSCHELL: At this point I wish to call attention to the words immediately following the part of the clause which has just been dealt with in regard to cases where the occupier is liable under any contract, that

"Every receipt given for such sum shall state expressly that the sum is paid in respect of that tithe rent-charge."

I gather that the object of those words is to earmark the payment as one which has been made on account of the tithe rent-charge, but there are two objections to those words which occur to me, assuming that intention. One is that the words are not clear, because the payment may have been undertaken by different persons in different ways. Some have thought that the receipt referred to is the receipt given by the tithe owner to the landlord, and some have supposed it is the receipt given by the landlord to the tenant. I think it will be seen on reading the words that it is by no means clear to which of those receipts this proviso applies. That is one objection to the words I have read. The other is this: that they do not provide any means for enforcing it. The clause says that every receipt shall expressly state that fact, but it does not say what is to follow if that is not done. Are we to suppose that the person who does not do it would be indictable for a misdemeanour? But there is nothing said as to what is to follow. I think it is a thing that is either meant to be enforced or not, and some provision ought to be made for that purpose, as, for instance, that "such receipt shall not be adducible in evidence" unless that is done. It is a question which I think is worth consideration, whether having regard to those two objections it is worth while keeping the provision. Some people object to its being retained, inasmuch as ear-marking the tithe rent-charge might have its disadvantages as well as its advantages.

The Marquess of Salisbury

LORD BRAMWELL: It seemed to me to be open to the same objection, but I understood the noble Marquess that there was an objection to taking it here instead of in Grand Committee. I thought it was not to be considered there.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Not the slightest objection.

LORD BRABOURNE: It would be absurd to indict a man for the wording of a receipt; and if you are not going to impose a penalty of some kind, and if it is left in that way it will not be done, and the thing is not worth retaining.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It seems that the words "tithe rent-charge" there might point to some particular land. I understand the charge is payable in respect of particular pieces of ground, and not of the whole letting; and therefore the receipt would have to show, if necessary, that the money was paid for some particular piece of ground, and not for the whole of it. That would lead to considerable confusion, and I think we had better drop the words out of the clause that "Every receipt given for such sum shall expressly state that the sum is paid in respect of that tithe rent-charge."

I have moved to omit those words subject to any resolution we may come to afterwards in respect of replacing them by others.

Moved, to omit after "rent-charge," in line 16, the words

"And every receipt given for such sum shall state expressly that the sum is paid in respect of that tithe rent-charge."—(The Marquess of Salisbury)

Amendment agreed to.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: On Thursday last the noble Marquess mentioned a good many differences between the Bill which is now before the House and the Bill of last year; but I think he omitted to mention one portion which is of considerable importance, which makes the landowner liable and leaves him to recover the amount of tithe which the tenant has not paid, as tithe instead of as provided in the Bill of last year making it payable as rent. If this is retained in the Bill it will entirely neutralise the effect of the measure. It will keep alive the ill-feeling existing with regard to tithes, and will make necessary distraint for tithes. There is no explanation given why the Government should have departed from the course they took last year. I was informed by one of the noble Marquess's supporters that the reason was for the sake of novelty; but I have also been informed by one who is not a supporter of the noble Marquess that it was in consequence of a compact made in another place to remove obstruction. But, my Lords, you have nothing to do with obstruction. All you have to do with is to see that the Bill is a measure which is workable, fair, and just. As I have said, this will keep alive all the troubles with regard to tithe rent such as we have seen of late in Wales. Not only will it be an injustice to the landowners, but they will be unable in many cases to make agreements in time with their tenants. They will have paid possibly as much as four half-year's tithe, and it will be putting them to trouble and causing ill-will and making them quarrel with their tenants in order to distraint for tithes if their tenants refuse to pay. We have had an intimation in what has taken place elsewhere that this agitation is not to cease. It is also enacted that the landowners shall be subject to County Court procedure, and they will not be able to avail themselves of the County Courts for that which is a respectable debt, since the tenant has contracted to pay it. I think the noble Marquess must have been put in possession of the detailed objections from North Wales to this measure. It is possible that I see this matter from a different point of view, and that the noble Marquess is only thinking of those persons in the eastern part of the country who would, but cannot, pay their tithes; whilst many of these tithepayers who live in Wales could pay their tithes, but will not. The noble Marquess spoke the other night of the fluctuations of the tithe as being injurious to the tenants. Since 1874, or thereabouts, the fluctuation of the tithe has gone in favour of the tenant, and has been reduced from time to time until now it has come to nearly the lowest point. Though the lowering of the tithe did not, perhaps, keep pace with the lowering in the value of the produce, the tenant has now got the benefit of it. If the noble Marquess has so much sympathy with tenants why did he not abolish Schedule B at the time agriculture ceased to be so profitable. I think the Government ought to have done something when there were no longer any profits to be paid under Schedule B, by which relief should have been given to the tenants. I am afraid I must take the sense of the House on this Amendment.

Amendment moved,

In page 1, line 25, Sub-section 3, leave out all the words from the beginning of the sub-section down to ("provided") in line 27, and insert the following words ("(3.) Such sum shall be recoverable from the occupier in like manner as if it were rent in arrear."—(Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

LORD HARLECH: My Lords, I quite agree with the object which the noble Lord who has just spoken has in view, but I confess I did not catch all his remarks. The object of this Bill was understood to be to put an end to the discreditable scenes which have been going on, and are going on, in Wales. But if this clause is to stand as it is it will settle nothing. The only effect will be to transfer the odium which now rests on the tithe owner to the landowner. I must say that the Government has shown considerable weakness in giving way upon this point to persons who are known to have ulterior objects in view, or they have failed to perceive what those ulterior objects were. The Amendment of the noble Lord will, I think, meet every legitimate object; but if it is too much to expect that his Amendment should be adopted, I would suggest that a provision should be inserted for dispensing with the necessity of notice of distraint being given. It appears that notice in case of distraint for tithes is necessary, where no notice is necessary in cases of distraint for rent. The only effect of notice being given in cases of unpaid tithe would be to give an opportunity for the removal of all goods and articles from the farm which might be subject to the distraint for tithe. It has been argued that it is unfair to put the tenant in a worse position than he was before; but I maintain that he would not be in a worse position than he was before, because, as this clause stands, it would be necessary for the tenant to undergo two processes of law, instead of one, if the tithe is not made recoverable with the rent. Besides that, it would prevent the landowner also from being subject to two processes when one would be sufficient. I beg to support the Amendment moved by my noble Friend.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I cannot myself quite follow the object of enforcing upon the landlord that he must proceed by way of distress. If the noble Lord had confined his Amendment to dropping out the words, "and not otherwise," I would certainly have recommended that Amendment should be adopted. But even if you drop out the words "and not otherwise," I am disposed to think that that should be made the only mode in which it would be recovered. If the words were added, "as well as by the process provided under this Act," that would perhaps satisfy the noble Lord. I rather concur with my noble Friend that there is no reason why an actual distress should be enforced against the landlord; but if more modes of enforcing payment are open to him, I do not see any objection to the Amendment. I think, however, that the mode in which that should be done had better be left for consideration in the Standing Committee.

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not quite understand what the mode is to which the noble and learned Lord refers.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: That he should be sued under this Act. Upon the hypothesis the tenant would owe a debt to the landlord, and why should not the landlord be at liberty to sue for it?

LORD HERSCHELL: I think that would be expressly provided for.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Then I quite agree.

*LORD BRAMWELL: If the landlord has agreed with the tenant to pay the tithe, he is subject to an action if he does not pay it. I think if the tenants knew that, there would not be much difficulty, and I submit that it is very desirable to make an alteration in this clause. I do not know that I pity very much the man who will not pay and who will have to be distrained upon; but he will be subject to two different distresses; that is to say, to the ordinary distress for rent, and then in respect of the tithe which he has not paid. He will be subject under the Tithes Commutation Act also. That is as I read it. So that this ridiculous consequence would result: That if he owes £50 for rent, and should have paid £10 for tithe, and he has paid £20 on account to his landlord, if the landlord can attribute that to the tithe, one distress would be enough; but if he must attribute it for the rent, there would be a distress for £30 for rent and another distress for tithe. It seems to me a most unreasonable thing to allow this clause to remain as it is when once it is understood what it really means.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I should like, in answer to what has been said by the Lord Chancellor, to observe, that I think my noble and learned Friend overlooked the words at the beginning of the sub-section, which provides that he shall cease to be liable upon that part of his contract. If he ceases to be liable upon that part of his contract an action cannot be brought upon that part of his contract, but the remedy must be only what you expressly give him by this clause, so that, if no further attention is made, the omission of the words "and not otherwise" would make no difference.

*LORD MONK BRETTON: I should like to point out another absurdity, in having different processes. In regard to distraining for rent, you can distrain for one year only, but for tithe, you can distrain for two years' arrears.

*LORD BRABOURNE: One finds that it is never wise to be too simple and confiding. The noble Lord yesterday told me that he was going to move an Amendment which was equivalent to mine; but his Amendment is exactly the reverse of mine. My idea is that to permit two distresses would be very wrong, as well as inconvenient, and that you should give to the landlord the same remedy as you give to a parson. He would have a remedy which the parson has not unless the whole procedure has to be in the County Court, as far as the rent-charge is concerned.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: If I understand the clause as it stands the words have been introduced for this reason: that it was contended that, you ought not to place upon the tenant any burden greater than he now bears. That was the idea. What I mean is that the tenant, in respect of the amount he at present pays for tithe, is liable only under the Tithe Acts, but now he is to be made liable in a different way; and all his property, including the goods and furniture in the farmhouse, would be liable. It is pointed out that under this Bill you should not put an additional burden upon the tenant; and that words should be introduced so that the tenant, in respect of that part of the rent which he formerly paid to the owner, should be put in the same position. But there are great difficulties in the way. I confess that I see now what I did not see before, what was the meaning of the ear-marking paragraph which has been struck out. It is quite obvious that whoever introduced that paragraph saw the difficulty which would arise if you treated the money which the tenant might pay on account of tithe as rent, because there are two different remedies; and unless you know for what the money is paid you do not know to what remedy there should be recourse. That is one difficulty, but there are a great many others, as I maintain, in it. I may say that I am not prepared myself with an Amendment now, but I think the matter is worthy a very careful consideration.

*LORD BRAMWELL: I think the noble and learned Lord (Earl Selborne) has not quite appreciated the words. It provides that the occupier shall cease to be liable under that part of his contract by which he is to pay the tithe rent-charge. He is not to be bound by that, but he is to be liable to pay to the owner such sum as the owner shall properly pay. Now, I venture to say that it is a well-known proposition of law that whenever a Statute gives a man a right, by implication he has an appropriate remedy; and if his right is to a sum of money, he can maintain an action to recover it. Therefore, I think the objection to the 3rd sub-section remains in full force.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I think it is evident, after the discussion we have heard, that these words are subject to the pitfalls of which my noble Friend spoke on the last occasion. At a later period it will be my duty to move that the clause immediately following be struck out; and I think, on the whole, it would be the most convenient plan to strike out Sub-section 3 of this clause altogether, though probably it would be necessary to put in some other words at a later stage. I do not see my way to framing a satisfactory formula across the Table, and, therefore, I think we had better do it in that way. I move that Sub-section 3 be omitted.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: As I understand the noble Marquess, he has moved two things at once; that is to say, to omit Sub-section 3, the first part of which we object to, and also the concluding lines of the same clause, of which he has given notice.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: No, I have moved to omit the whole of Sub-section 3.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: That refers to the Amendment of Mr. Taylor, which the Government in another place thought would be reasonable. It seems to me that it would be offering a premium to tenants for dishonesty. For instance, a tenant could go out in September and take away with him all his goods, and when he was called upon to pay in January he might decline to pay, and say he was not liable; but the theory of the matter is that he is responsible for that half year's tithe. Taking the Act of 1836 that it is no longer an annual charge on produce, but on the land, still he has contracted with his landowner to pay for the three months, and yet he would escape. I object to the last part of the sub-section being struck out.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I have only to say that I do not imagine anybody could defend the justice of the proviso as it stands. It provides that—

"The owner of the land may at any time during the last three months of the tenancy pay any instalment of the tithe rent-charge, that such occupier would but for this Act have been liable under his contract to pay, and may, notwithstanding such instalment not being yet due, recover the same from the occupier in manner as in this Act provided."

It seems to me a proposition which cannot be defended.

Amendment moved, to omit Sub-section 3 of Clause 1,—(The Marquess of Salisbury,)—agreed to.

Clause 2.

LORD BRABOURNE: Now, my Lords, I have a very important Amendment to this clause, which I shall endeavour to explain in a few words to your Lordships. I wish, however, to amend the notice which I have given. It is to omit the words "whatever is the amount" in this proviso that the person entitled to the tithe rent-charge in arrear may apply to the County Court, and in their place to insert the words "Provided the sum exceeds £1 in amount." These are the words I propose to insert, "If the total amount due from the tithepayer in arrear exceed the amount of £1." That is to say, in broad language, I propose to exempt the small freeholders throughout the country from this burden of tithes. Of course, I know very well that the agriculturist is in a very unfortunate position just now. He has got on one side the friends of the Church, who exclaim against robbing the Church, and on the other side he has got the gentlemen who believe that tithes are national property, and who are determined that they shall not be depleted; so that, like the ancient Britons of old, the agriculturists are between the deep sea and the barbarians—I will not say which is which in this case. The effect of the Amendment I move is this: that the small freeholders throughout the country possessed of five, six, or seven acres would be exempted from the very grinding burden which at present falls upon them. Already it is very difficult for them to keep going. They are a class which has been dying out for a considerable period on account of the legislation of Parliament. They are still, however, an important class, and the strange thing is, that while their complaints are not attended to, noble Lords and noble Gentlemen go all over the country declaring that their wish is to see them prosper, and that there shall be a great multiplication of the small owners. Well, here is an opportunity of testing the sincerity of that wish in your Lordships' House. You cannot do a better thing than exempt from this payment this small struggling class. No large landowner will benefit by this legislation. It is only these small people who have got little pieces of land, with a tithe upon it of 4s. or 5s. an acre, who will benefit by it. I ask, where would the robbery be? There will be no robbery. I believe the Church will gain considerably, and when there comes the final battle, as sooner or later it will come, the Anglican Church will be all the stronger if she has got these people on her side instead of against her. I cannot help thinking that this great Church, one of the richest Churches in the world, and claiming to be the national Church of the richest nation in the world, having so much wealth belonging to her, and, with the exception of a few Catholics, counting the whole of the aristocracy and the greater part of the wealthy classes among her members, ought not to put her hand on these small people, but ought to be able to maintain her ministers without coming upon them in the way that is now done. I speak these words in the firm conviction that they are wise words. Do not let us make a mistake. There are great issues coming before the country before many years are passed; Establishments will be upon their trial; and if you wish to maintain the Established Church, you had better sweep away everything that can attach to her as a stigma. Do not let her be weighted by the stigma of putting her hand upon this small and struggling class. What would be the loss? It would only be a few shillings or pounds here and there—a very little matter indeed to the Church, but of enormous importance to these poor people. It is entirely in their interest that I make this proposal. My belief is that it will be a wise thing to do. All through this Bill there is an attempt to set the interests of the Church against the interests of the people. I am not sure at all that it is a wise thing, this putting an end to the payment by the occupier. My noble Friend smiles at that, but a little straw sometimes shows the way the wind plays, and I may mention that a farmer said to me the other day, "If this Bill passes and the occupier ceases to pay tithes we shall not have any tithe dinners, and there will no longer be any occasion on which the clergy and the people will be brought together. The only class that are affected by this provision, in my opinion, are the small people. They may not be so important a class in your Lordships' view as they are to the Members of the other House; but I may tell your Lordships that they are watching these Debates with keen anxiety, and if your Lordships will do them the kindness of exempting them from this burden they will be everlastingly grateful. I hope that the special representatives of the Church will be amongst the foremost to support this Amendment. They will, I am sure, see how advantageous to the small people this Amendment is, and I resume my seat thinking that, whatever support I may get or fail in getting, I shall at least have the enthusiastic support of the guardians of the Church.

The Marquess of Salisbury

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 9, to omit the words "whatever is the amount," and to insert the words "if the total amount due from the tithepayer in arrear exceed the amount of £1," instead thereof.—(The Lord Brambourne.)

LORD NORTHBOURNE: This Amendment appears to me to be contrary to all principles of taxation whatever. No doubt, for instance, the payers of the Income Tax who pay upon very small sums feel the burden very severely, but I ask your Lordships whether it would be possible upon that account to do away with all small Income Tax whatever. Is it to be supposed for a moment that because a person is a poor man he is not to pay according to his means towards the taxation of the country? I think if we were to go on the principle of the noble Lord we should be committed to a course of legislation which would be altogether absurd. With regard to this Bill, I have given my candid support to the noble Marquess upon it; because I think that the proceedings in Wales have been, as they have been very properly designated by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell), rather a disgrace to the country, and although I do believe that the tithe comes upon agriculturists in a manner and to an extent at the present moment which is very hard upon them, I think it is much better to submit to those two hardships in the matter of tithe than to do anything which would in the slightest degree risk the safety of property or lead to an inclination to tamper with the law. I do not know that I have much more to say upon this point, but I think also that some of the noble Lords who are warm supporters of this Bill, have not tried perhaps quite so much as they ought to have tried to alleviate the pressure of small burdens upon the farmers. I should like to ask the noble Marquess, for instance, whether any attempt has been made to provide for an investigation into the system of averages. There is a strong feeling among the tenant farmers of this country that they are paying their tithe upon an average which is far above what they realise for their corn. It must be well-known to your Lordships, who are most of you landowners and many of you farmers too, that the farmer very frequently uses a great quantity of low-priced corn in his own farmyard. That corn not being fit to come into the market cannot be sold at all, and its value is very small. I contend that, according to any principle of ordinary justice, this corn ought to come into the average. It does not, and the farmer is obliged to pay the tithe upon an average which is very much larger than what he actually receives. I do not know whether Her Majesty's Government can do anything in that matter. There are other matters with regard to this question of tithe average which I think your Lordships would do well to consider. I would suggest, also, that you should not consider merely the tithe owner, but the tithepayer. I know that in my own immediate neighbourhood there is a clergyman who hardly gets any tithe at all. I think the living is £300 a year, but I believe that gentleman has only realised for his total income between £30 and £40. Unquestionably that is a sad case for the clergyman. But, my Lords, it is highly desirable that in these matters we should hold a just balance between the two interests, and that we should, as far as we can, do what is just not only to the tithe owner, but also to the tithepayer.

LORD BASING: My Lords, I think my noble and learned Friend's Amendment will require a little further amendment before it can be put to the House in order to secure the beneficent object which he has in view. Although it might be very well to excuse small holders on the ground that their payments would form but a small portion of the tithe, those insignificant portions may be very important to the owners of the rent-charge. I have received a letter from Lancashire in which a tithe owner tells me he has to collect about 190 tithe rent-charges, every one of them below 20s., and it is in reference to those cases of which I believe there are a great many that I would suggest that the word "owner" might be defined in the interest of such persons, seeing that under the operation of this Bill they might be placed in a very difficult position if they have to serve notice in every one of 190 cases in which tithe is due. The taking away from the owners these small tithe rent-charges would, in a vast number of cases, be of very great importance to them indeed.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY: My Lords, I think we ought to remember that the small owner in many cases in all probability bought his plot of land for less in the market because it was subject to the charge, it might be, of £1 per acre; and I do not see what right he has to take that £1 more than his neighbours. If you once adopt this principle that because a debt is small it ought to be remitted, I do not see where you are to stop; therefore, I do not think we should adopt the proposition of the noble Lord, though, of course, we should all be desirous to benefit small holders as far as possible.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: This is really a proposal to take away the property of the tithe owner when it happens to be very small in amount, and to give it to the landowner. I should have thought if the County Court was good for anything at all it would be good for the recovery of small debts. It seems to me these are cases in which the County Courts could most easily act. I am not sorry the noble Lord has raised a discussion upon the point, for this reason: that it gives me the opportunity of expressing my earnest hope that the question of the redemption, and it may be the compulsory redemption, of these small sums may be considered at an early period. The Commission over which my noble Friend Lord Basing presides will have a much larger subject to consider than this matter itself involves. I would venture to submit that if it were possible for the question of the redemption of these very small rent-charges to be taken in hand first, and made the subject of a special Report, we might hope to have early legislation upon that part (which is really a very important one) of the general question. I should not like to sit down without saying a word upon what my noble Friend (Lord Northbourne) said with regard to averages. I do not see how it is possible to go into that question now; or, if you did, that it would ever be possible to construct any system of averages which must not proceed upon the selling value of what is brought into the market, and is the subject of actual Statistical Returns. My noble Friend said that certain things were not brought into account; but a great many other things were not brought into account under the Commutation Act, particularly those things which have latterly been most profitable, the increase of cattle and live stock. I do not think it would be possible to go into that without disturbing the whole settlement.

LORD BRABOURNE: Of course, the few words spoken by my noble Friend Lord Basing will have shown that this Amendment would have a much wider effect than I thought, and it will certainly want re-casting. I should not think, therefore, of asking the House to divide upon it as it stands; but I would make a few remarks, in reply to the noble Lord opposite (Lord Northbourne), before parting with it now. One is with regard to the small tithe-payers being exempted. The practice has already been put in force with regard to small payers of Income Tax, and, therefore, this would not be a novelty. In the next place, as to relieving the small tithepayer, I would point out that the tithe owners have very greatly benefited; and my contention is, that this tithe being national property the Representatives of the nation could not do better than say that it shall be partly applied in relieving the small tithepayers. Under the circumstances, I propose to withdraw the Amendment.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: The noble Lord has mentioned the Income Tax as having a supposed analogy to tithes; but there is this difference: the Income Tax was a new imposition by the State for public necessities, whereas tithes are not a tax, but property almost as old as any in the Kingdom.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: There is also this point, that a certain amount of the tithe is in the hands of lay owners who have paid money for them.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I think, my Lords, it would be slaying the slain to further discuss the noble Lord's Amendment. I only rise to answer the noble and learned Lord opposite who spoke with regard to the inclusion of redemption clauses in this Bill. The objection to these clauses which were originally in the Bill is purely Parliamentary. This dealing with the question of redemption, as the Government proposes to deal with it, is exposed to very considerable difficulties, more particularly in another Assembly, where the time at their disposal is not quite equal to the work to be done. If a measure does little or nothing, it has a good chance of passing, because it is only opposed by those who want it to do more. If it does much, it likewise has a chance of passing, because the only people who oppose it are those who want it to do less. But if a Bill is a moderate measure, it is opposed by those who want it to do more and by those who want it to do little, and, therefore, the chances of its passing are less. The noble Lord denounced the Bill generally, because he said that its tendency would be to drive the occupier from the Church. I may suppose, then, that my noble Friend's definition of marriage would be that it is a relation in which one of the parties has a right to levy something on the other. That is a new definition of marriage and divorce, but I can hardly think the occupier will love the Church less because he has less to pay her.

Amendment, by leave of the Committee, withdrawn.

LORD HERSHELL: I have to make an observation upon Sub-section 2 of Clause 2. This subsection gives to the officer the same powers of restraint under the County Court proceedings where the owner is in possession as were conferred before in respect of the tithe rent-charges. I will call the noble Marquess's attention to a matter to which my attention has been drawn. Section 84 of the Tithe Rent Act gives a greater power of distress in the case of Quakers than in the case of anybody else. As regards the rest of the world, you can only distrain on the land out of which the rent issues. In the case of Quakers, it is provided that you may distrain on the goods and chattels of such persons, whether on the premises or elsewhere, and consequently, as regards Quakers, you may distrain upon their goods anywhere in respect of tithes which are due anywhere. My attention has been called by some of the members of the body of Quakers to this fact, and I would suggest that when you are dealing with this remedy over again, you should not re-enact this provision relating to the Quakers, and which renders their position different from the rest of the world. They do not see why their goods should be liable to be distrained upon any more than the goods of the rest of the community. I only desire to call the noble Marquess's attention to the existence of that difference.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It is very clear that a remedy ought to be applied for that, but I think we had better reserve it for the present.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, I have four Amendments connected with Clause 2, and I believe that the first three will not be objected to on the part of the Government. I do not know how it may be with the last. With regard to the first, I will explain it in a few words. The most reverend Primate the Archbishop of Canterbury, on the Second Reading, said he had received many representations to the effect that in cases where the lands were practically left waste, there might still be instances in which the remedy now provided by the Tithes Act of taking possession might be valuable as leading to the cultivation of the land in one way or another. I do not think myself, that, if we had to deal only with large cases, it would very often be for the benefit of the tithe owner to avail himself of that remedy; but I can conceive that in cases of small parcels of land, it might be a remedy which would operate as a considerable inducement to the person who ought to make the payment to do so: and even in other cases, it might operate to produce payment without being put into actual operation.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 23, insert at end of line, as a fresh sub-section—

“Provided that if such officer satisfies the Court that there is no sufficient distress on the said lands, the Court may authorise the owner of the rent-charge to sue out a writ of habere facias possessionem in accordance with section eighty-two of the Tithe Act, 1836; and the owner of the rent-charge on obtaining possession shall, in accordance with the Tithe Acts, pay the surplus (if any) after payment of the tithe rent-charge and expenses, to the owner of the land, and shall, while in possession, be under the obligation not to permit or commit any waste.”—(The Earl of Selborne.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: There is no doubt as to the reality of the grievance pointed out by the noble and learned Lord. The precise remedy to be afforded has been a matter of considerable discussion. There are two ways more or less imperfect of getting at the owner under those circumstances; but I think, on the whole, the one proposed by the noble and learned Lord is the one that is exposed to the least objection. I may say, in assenting to it, that I will leave the advocacy of it in his hands.

Amendment agreed to.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: With regard to the next Amendment, I think that needs no remark, as there will probably be no difference of opinion about it. It is to provide for the case where lands are held at one rent with other lands in a different parish; that in such cases the Court shall apportion the rent between those lands according to their rateable value. That is clearly necessary; and it is not at present provided for by the Bill.

Amendment moved, in Sub-section 3, page 2, line 28, at end of line 28, insert—

(“And where any of such lands are held at one rent together with other lands in another parish, the court shall apportion the rent between the said lands and the lands in the other parish in proportion to their rateable value.”)—(The Earl of Selborne.)

Amendment agreed to.

The Earl of Selborne

LORD HERSCHELL: I must say something on Sub-section 5, which I think needs consideration. It provides that, where the occupier of lands is liable under a contract to pay a tithe rent-charge, and is liable to pay the amount to the owner, steps are to be taken which will enable notice to be given to him. It is not any point of substance which I am desirous to raise any question about; it is only in order to carry that out—that before an order is made under this sub-section there shall be such service on the owner as may be prescribed. Now, supposing the landowner does not serve such notice on the tithe owner, there is no sanction to the contract; then the tithe rent-charge owner will, of course, have no evidence of the existence of any such contract on the part of the occupier, and that which has been done previously will have no effect; because the object here is that, where the occupier is the person liable under a contract, he shall have due notice of the proceedings, so that he may be able to raise any objection on the hearing. There is a provision that the landlord shall give that intimation to the tithe rent-charge owner, but you do not say what shall happen if he does not do it. The occupier, of course, will hear nothing about it.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Does the noble and learned Lord propose any words to modify that?

LORD HERSCHELL: No; I only wished to call attention to it. No doubt it will be considered by the Government draftsman. I thought it might be convenient to call attention to some of these points, because it gives an opportunity to those who draft the Bill of considering how they should be dealt with.

*LORD BRAMWELL: I was going to make an observation upon that clause. I suppose it was intended as a sort of third party clause under the Judicature Act; that is to say, where a man is interested in a litigation between two other persons, and is responsible for the ultimate decision, he shall have notice and be able to interfere. I suppose that is the object of the clause; and if that is so, there should be some specific provision made for binding the occupier.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I should like to point out to the noble Lord that his objection might be met in this way—if in Clause 1 Sub-section 2, where the occupier has been liable, and it is provided that he shall cease to be bound, and so on, words were inserted—

“Provided that he should have received the notice he shall be liable to pay the amount to the owner;”

that is to say, notice hereinafter referred to.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I have to propose another Amendment at the end of Sub-section 6. The Bill is framed in a peculiar manner in one respect. It does not fix a particular time for the Act coming into operation, otherwise than by saying in the 7th section that it shall extend to every sum on account of tithe rent-charge, which first becomes payable on or after the half-yearly day of payment of such tithe rent-charge which occurs next after the passing of the Act. Therefore the Act cannot operate upon any tithe rent-charge within a shorter period than three months, because the tithe rent-charge must be under the previous provision in arrear for three months; but, as far as appears, the Act may come into operation at or about the end of three months from the time of its passing. Now, the Act cannot possibly be brought into operation at any time until those matters are provided for which are attempted to be provided for by the Amendment which I now move. The 6th sub-section says that Rules of Court may be made on certain subjects, with the most pressing of which this Amendment deals. As the Bill stands, those rules will be made, like all other rules affecting County Courts, by a certain Committee of County Court Judges, who act for that purpose, subject to the approval of the Lord Chancellor. I have great doubt whether it may not be desirable, though I have not proposed it at present, on account of the peculiarity and importance of this subject, that the rules should be made by the Lord Chancellor himself in a different way, with whatever assistance may be necessary. But, however they may be made, there is nothing in the Bill to cause their being made at all before the time at which the Act may come into operation: and, until they are made, it is necessary to provide for those points which are mentioned in my Amendment. All that Amendment does is, to give power to the Court in the meantime to do what in that state of things would be absolutely indispensable for the working of the Act. I propose to add words, as stated in my notice, which will enable the Court in such cases to proceed upon an application against an owner not named, and in such cases, and also in the cases of owners who are abroad, or whose place of residence is unknown, or who for any reason cannot be served in the ordinary manner, to direct what service shall be considered good service for the purpose of the Act. It has been suggested that no doubt rules will be made within the three months after which the Act may come into operation. I hope they may. I presume that there would be a sincere desire to make and publish them as soon as possible. But the rules will not be confined to these particular indispensable matters, they will extend also to other matters which will require a good deal of consideration and a good deal of deliberation; and if they are to be made by the County Court Rule Committee the members of that Committee are gentlemen whose ordinary duties may make it sometimes difficult for them to assemble, and they must afterwards be carefully considered by the Lord Chancellor. I think, therefore, that looking at the consequence of bringing the Act into operation before such rules are made, some security ought to be taken against the contingency which may happen of the rules not being made within the necessary time. I cannot conceive any objection to my proposal beyond this: that if the rules are made it will not be necessary; if so no harm will be done; but if they are not made it is a point which really requires to be provided for.

Amendment moved,

In sub-section (6), page 3, line 11, add at the end of the sub section (“In the meantime, and subject to such rules when made, the court may, in any such case as aforesaid, receive and proceed upon an application against an owner not named, and may, in every such case, and also in the case of an owner who is abroad, or whose place of residence is unknown, or who for any other reason cannot be served in the ordinary manner, direct what service shall be good service for the purposes of this Act.")—

(The Earl of Selborne.)

EARL STANHOPE: I trust this Amendment will be accepted by Her Majesty's Government, because, by a subsequent clause every Rule of Court made for the purpose of this Act is to be laid before Parliament within 40 days next after it is made, and thus a great deal of time is wasted. I quite see that what with the Easter Recess and other causes (though I sincerely hope the Act will come into operation at an early date), such a proposition as the noble and learned Earl proposes is necessary. A great deal of consideration will be required, and I suppose the Lord Chancellor will probably frame such rules as are necessary. They will be considered by the County Court Judges throughout the Kingdom. Many matters will have to be considered, and, taking all these objections into consideration, I trust some sort of provisional arrangement may be accepted by your Lordships which may bring this Bill into earlier operation than would otherwise be the case.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I think what the noble Earl says is perfectly true. I do not deny that some provision is desirable; at the same time, I would suggest to him that I think a wider provision than this might be made, and I should be willing to undertake, on the part of the Government, to bring forward in Grand Committee something in substitution for it. I doubt very much whether this rule-making power is completely workable. There must be some alteration in that rule-making power, but how that may best be done is a matter for consideration afterwards. My noble and learned Friend is in error in supposing that all the County Court Judges in the Kingdom have to concur. It is only a Committee of five who have to concur in the rule. But what struck me about it is, that the language of the noble Earl's Amendment says that the Court may in any of those cases proceed on the application, and so on. That means the County Courts generally, and would apply to any one of the County Courts in the Kingdom. It might be extremely inconvenient, and might give rise to unpleasant consequences, particularly in Wales, and I think the Amendment might be open, therefore, to exception. However, I will undertake, on the part of the Government, to bring forward something on the point in Grand Committee. I should prefer to lay the proposals of the Government on the subject before the Grand Committee. I hope, therefore, the noble and learned Lord will not think it necessary to press his Amendment to a Division.

The Earl of Selborne

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I am perfectly satisfied with what my learned and noble Friend has said. Of course, if he should not succeed, I should have an opportunity of proposing the same Amendment, or something else.

LORD HERSCHELL: With regard to this rule-making power, I should certainly like to earmark this from the ordinary rule-making under the County Courts Act. The ordinary County Court rules deal with litigation, and I think the further removed you can make this procedure from the rule procedure, the better. The simpler you can make it, and the cheaper, the better it will be. When you have the ordinary rule-making power, I do not think that is sufficiently impressed on the minds of those who have to make the rules. I think something might be done here to point that out, and also to make the rule-making authority the Lord Chancellor, in consultation with the rule-making Committee, so as to make it a distinct rule-making for the purposes of this Act.

Amendment, by leave of the Committee withdrawn, and Clause 2, as amended, agreed to.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I now beg to introduce a clause to meet those cases to which attention was called by the most rev. Primate, as well as by myself, on the Second Reading, that is to say, the cases in which the old remedy being taken away by the Bill, the new remedy might, if it were not provided against, be defeated or obstructed by arrangements between landlord and tenant. That, of course, cannot be the intention of the Bill. The Archbishop of Canterbury mentioned that subject as one of which the importance had been represented to him from several quarters. It has been represented to myself also, by more than one clergyman writing in a most reasonable spirit. The difficulty with which my Amendment deals might arise both when there was good faith on the part of the landlord and tenant, and still more, if there were any attempt to use their powers for the purpose of defeating or obstructing the tithe owner's right. Where from perfectly honest motives, beneficial leases, or family leases were granted rent free or at nominal rents, either for money paid down, or on some condition of service, or without any consideration at all, the effect of the Bill in all those cases, unless they were provided for, would be to take away the existing remedy, and give one which for a long time would be absolutely illusory and nugatory. And the same thing would happen, though perhaps for shorter periods of time, and to a more limited extent, in the more ordinary case of a tenancy rent free or at a low rent for one or more years, in consideration of some outlay to be made by the tenant upon the land. I have considered this whole matter as carefully as I could, and I put down first on the Notice Paper a clause on which the wording was not as good as it might be made. I have now put it down in the present improved form, which I hope the House will accept. The substance is, that in those cases where from any cause land is held without rent, or where it is held at a rent so inadequate that taking into account everything else which the receiver can realise it is by reason only of such mode of letting made insufficient to produce the amount recoverable under this Act by the owner of the tithe rent-charge the occupier is to the extent of the deficiency in any year to be treated as the owner, and the proceeding is to be the same as if he were the owner. I hope your Lordship will accept the clause, and I express that hope with the more confidence, because the noble Marquess opposite recognised the necessity of providing for these cases on the former occasion.

Amendment moved, after Clause 2, and before proposed new Clause A, add new Clause B—

"In any case in which a receiver of the rents and profits of any land shall have been appointed under the last preceding section, if it shall appear that the occupier holds under a landlord, either for the whole of his tenancy or for one or more year or years thereof, rent free or at a nominal rent, or at a rent so far below the annual value of the lands estimated as hereinafter mentioned that by reason thereof the rent payable to the landlord during any years or year while there is such receiver shall be insufficient, after taking into account all sums recoverable in respect of the rents and profits of the other lands (if any) included in the receivership, to pay the amount recoverable during such years or year by the owner of the tithe rent-charge under this Act, then and in every such case, so far as may be necessary for the recovery of such amount, the occupier shall be deemed to be an owner under this Act, and the Court shall have power to order the receiver, for the purpose of recovering the amount of the deficiency so caused, to proceed in the same manner as is by this Act provided in the case of lands occupied by the owner thereof: Provided that any such occupier shall be entitled (subject to the provisions of Section 1 of this Act) to deduct from any sums at any time becoming due from him to the landlord under whom he holds, any amount which shall have been recovered from him under this section in respect of tithe rent-charge or costs."—(The Earl of Selborne.)

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I should like to ask my noble Friend before the noble Marquess replies, what he meant by "the annual value of the land as hereinafter mentioned." There is no figure mentioned in the clause. It may refer to Schedule B.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: It refers to Clause 5, Schedule B, the valuation according to Schedule B.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: If so, the reference is a good way off, and it may cause confusion.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: If that particular phrase seemed open to any misinterpretation, though I do not think it would be, it could be dealt with in Standing Committee.

*LORD MONK BRETON: Before the noble Marquess replies, I should like to point out this: the landowner having to pay the tithe, a receiver is appointed, and the receiver having been appointed finds that the land is let at a peppercorn rent, or, at all events, below the amount of the tithe; thereupon the clause provides that for the amount of the tithe rent-charge, for which the rent is insufficient, the receiver shall distrain upon the tenant, and that the tenant shall be able to recoup himself by deducting in future years from any increased rent or payment he has to make to the landlord, the amount he has been so called upon to advance in payment of a debt which was not his, but his landlord's. It is obvious that he may be kept out of that money for several years. He may have a lease for 21 years, and during the first seven years the rent may be a very low or nominal one, and he will not have the opportunity of making any deduction therefore for several years. It appears to me reasonable, and I think the House will think so, that he should have interest on that money. I should propose a moderate rate of interest, 4 per cent. per annum, on the amount which has been so taken from him for the landlord's debt. I will ask my noble and learned Friend whether he would be inclined to accept that?

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I have no objection.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am rather doubtful whether that would be a just demand. It seems to me, when the occupier is making his bargain with the owner, and makes such bargain, that no rent is payable. The two are practically dealing with money which does not belong to them; they are dealing with the tithe rent-charge, which is due to the tithe owner, and, therefore, he clearly would have no claim to be recouped for making the payment out of his own money within the contract made. However, I am in the hands of the House with regard to the proposed clause, and I do not venture to raise any great objection to this proposition. I am prepared to accept the proposal of the noble and learned Lord on the whole. After the matter has been enormously discussed in private, though no doubt it is surrounded with difficulties on every side, no remedy has been proposed that is entirely satisfactory. Although it is somewhat clumsy, and will operate rather by deterring the owner than by any effect of its own operation, still it will practically prevent that which we have reason to apprehend, namely, a collusive arrangement of the terms of occupancy for the purpose of evading payment of the tithe rent-charge. When my noble and learned Friend first brought this question before the House, I thought it was rather like the question of the Confessor who asked the groom "whether he ever greased the horses' teeth in order to prevent them from eating oats."—"No, but I will take care to do it next time," was the answer of the groom. I thought that the suggestion of the noble and learned Lord was due rather to his own enormous ingenuity, and would rather have a tendency to raise in the minds of evil-thinking men some idea of evading the rent-charge by a method which they never would have thought of themselves. When the noble and learned Lord had once raised it he was certainly bound to find a remedy, and I think the remedy proposed would be satisfactory. The only alteration I would suggest would be that he should not rely on the words "as hereinafter mentioned" for indicating the kind of annual value on which he means to rely. It comes too far afterwards in the Act, and would I think be open to ambiguous interpretations. Otherwise I have nothing to say in objection to the clause. Unless I find the House is otherwise minded I should be indisposed to resist the clause proposed by the noble Lord as not being required.

Lord Monk Bretton

*LORD MONK BRETTON: As to the legitimacy of the contract, of course if there was collusion between the owner and tenant that the land should be let at a nominal rent for the purpose of defeating the tithe owner's claim, it would be an illegitimate act on both sides. But in an ordinary case the illegitimacy of the letting, if there be any, would be, as it seems to me, on the part of the landowner, and not on the part of the tenant. It might be said it was the duty of the landowner not to let his land at such a rent that there would not be sufficient margin to meet the tithe owner's claim—not to let his land at too low a rent. But I think it might be rather hard to say the same of the tenant who took the land perhaps in ignorance that the rent would not meet the tithe.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I thoroughly sympathise with the object which the noble Lord has in view. I suppose no one would wish to countenance any arrangement between the owner and the tenant for the purpose of defrauding the tithe owner; but I must say I am a little alarmed at some of the statements which have been made, because it seems to me they assume that after this Act is passed every landowner is bound to provide sufficient rent on his land to meet every claim that may be made upon him. That is putting an entirely new restriction upon owners. At present if a man chooses to let his land in consideration of receiving a fore-gift, as it is called, of, say, £100 down, he may do so; he may let his land for years at a pepper-corn rent, and there are cases in which that may be a transaction which the landowner may find it convenient to resort to in order to obtain advances of money. He may be very glad to forego his rent for a number of years, and to receive it in that way in advance, but it appears to me that the Bill would lay down that the landowner is to be deprived of his discretion in dealing with his land because he is to be placed under the obligation to see that always upon his land there shall be a sufficient amount of rent to meet the demands under this Bill. That seems to be a serious difficulty arising from the difficulty of placing upon the owner the liability of paying the tithe; because if it is to be accompanied by this restriction upon an owner in dealing with his land in the most advantageous manner, then I think it is a restriction upon his rights, and that neither the Church nor anyone else has a right to take from the owner what is clearly part of his right and incident to his property. I agree that the question might not often arise, and so far I do not feel apprehensive; but I do feel apprehensive in regard to the doctrine being laid down that any landowner, after this Bill is passed, is to be liable for anything except to pay the tithe. He is to be liable to pay the tithe, but not to pay it in a particular manner, and if it is necessary to provide for cases in which the landowner has chosen, at his own convenience, to let the land in a particular way, it would be, I think, better to lay down in a plain and direct manner that where the owner has made such a contract he should be liable to see that the tithe is paid. I know it is difficult to pass such a clause, but I think that you should not restrict the powers of the owner over the letting of his land. There is another objection to the clause. It says at the end of the new clause—

“Provided that any such occupier shall be entitled, subject to the provision of Section 1 of this Act,”

to make deductions. It may be my own want of understanding, but I do not see how this clause is to be read in conjunction of Section 1 of this Act. I suppose it has some reference to the liability of the occupier to pay an additional rent. I suppose that is the meaning of it; but I have considerable doubts as to the operation of it, and I think it would require to be considered, though I dare say my noble and learned Friend has a ready answer to my remarks.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I think my noble Friend somewhat misunderstands the clause. Section 1 applies only to existing contracts in force at the time the Act is passed, by which the tenants may have agreed to pay the tithe rent-charge. It merely provides for the case in which the tenant has agreed to do that. Section 1 says that the landlord paying the tithe rent-charge is to recover it from the tenant, and you will not want in that case the double operation—first of the tenant deducting from future rent and then the landlord making him pay over again. With regard to the other observation of my noble Friend, I cannot help thinking he was misled by an illustration that was used by a former speaker to take a view of this clause, which it will not at all bear. Your Lordships must recollect that as things now stand no landlord can do what is contemplated here, either in good faith or otherwise—either in the way of the most reasonable arrangement in the world with his tenant, or the most unreasonable, so as to defeat the tithe rent-charge, because the owner of the tithe rent-charge has always his remedy against the person in occupation. Well, let us distinguish the cases which may happen, and suppose, first of all, the case of a tenancy existing when the Act is passed. It is 10 to 1 that when a beneficial lease of this sort, either for the whole of the term or for part of it, has been given, the landlord has stipulated that the tenant shall pay the rent-charge, in which case it is clear that the operation of this clause will be in conformity with the tenant's contract. On the other hand, if we are to suppose a special covenant by the landlord to pay the tithe and to indemnify the occupier, that covenant would remain, and the clause would not take away the right of suit under it, but would give the additional remedy of retaining it out of future rent. Then, in regard to all future contracts, they would have been made in view of this state of things:

that if the tenant arranges so that he gets the whole usufruct of the land without paying anything, or so much of it as is measured by the difference between a full and a low rent, he will remain under the same liability as he would have been before this Act passed for the deficiency which the landlord does not pay, and will have his recourse over; the landlord being no longer able, by making a new contract, to arrange that the tenant shall pay the tithe.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: My Lords, I think it is rather inconvenient that we should be discussing this clause here, because in reality the purpose of this clause which is proposed to be inserted is to prevent a mischief which might arise under Section 5. Under that clause if the owner shows that the rent which he receives is so small that the tithe rent-charge will be twice as much (because that is what it comes to) as the remainder, then the tithe rent-charge is to be diminished in proportion to the rent received. In ordinary cases one can understand how that would work, but in such a case as that of a beneficial lease the freeholder will appear in Schedule B for Income Tax as only receiving this supposed peppercorn rent. Of course, I am under correction if that is not so, but in that case it would be entirely gone, and there is a great danger that the tithe rent-charge may disappear altogether. What I want to find out is this: there are properties in which the land will not appear in Schedule B at all, and the consequence will be that as there is nothing in Schedule B the tithe rent-charge will go under Clause 5 entirely. I think that ought to be provided for and I should very much have preferred that all these questions should have been discussed and considered in connection with Clause 5.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I cannot agree with the right rev. Prelate. I do not propose by this clause to interfere at all with the operation of Clause 5. Clause 5 does not proceed upon the actual rent but upon the annual value under the Income Tax Act, Schedule B, which provides that if the letting be not at a rack-rent, then you take the annual value at what the land might be fairly let for, and if, under Clause 5, there should be a remission allowed that would be a reduction under the Act. What the clause aims at is this: The sole remedy which you give, when the occupier is not also owner, is a receiver of rents and profits. Let me suppose, as an illustration, a lease for seven years at a peppercorn rent or at no rent at all; a receiver is put in; what is he to receive? He cannot turn the tenant out, because the tenant has got a seven years' lease, and I presume that, as between him and the tithe rent-charge owner, it is unimpeachable. In that case, unless it is provided for in the way that I propose, or in some other way equally effective, there is nothing whatever for the receiver to receive, and either the clergyman has to run up from year to year a charge against some future rent, which may have to be paid at a distance of time to the same or some other landlord, or else he is to be kept out of his money entirely, a ruinous delay under any circumstances, and under some circumstances an absolute and total loss. Cases in which such might be the effect of arrangements between landlord and tenant must be provided for in some way, so as to prevent that consequence; and no injustice can arise from dealing with them as I propose: for, so far as the occupier has, by such an arrangement, a beneficial usufruct, he is in substance an owner; and this Amendment will impose upon him, at the most, the same liability to which he is now by law subject.

The Earl of Selborne

*LORD BRAMWELL: I cannot think that this clause will have the disastrous effect which the noble Lord (the Earl of Kimberley) anticipates from it. It would be a disaster if it were attended with such a consequence. There is a dilemma—either the tenant whose rent is not sufficient to satisfy the tithe rent-charge has agreed with his landlord to pay it, which he may do, and then he cannot complain of this clause, or he has not agreed, and in that case, if he is distrained upon or compelled to pay it, he will have a remedy against his landlord not quod landlord, but quod a man who ought to have paid that debt which he has been compelled to pay. Every lawyer of us well knows that it has been repeatedly decided that if a man is compelled to pay a debt which is due by another and not due by him, he has a remedy over against the man who ought to have paid it.

LORD HERSCHELL: I think this question is one of considerable difficulty, though I do not object in principle to the proposal of my noble and learned Friend. I do not think there is any real difficulty where the land is held rent free or at a nominal rent, because where land is so held you might reasonably and properly define an "owner" to include any owner who shall hold. The definition would render liable a person who is letting at no rent at all or at a nominal rent. The difficulty, of course, arises when you have a letting which is simply a letting for an annual value. Of course, it may be a letting so far below the annual value that it is not what one may call the ordinary letting value of the land, the ordinary arrangement between landlord and tenant in which the payment of the rates is dealt with in the ordinary way; but the difficulty is where to draw the line, and I cannot help thinking that some difficulty would arise out of my noble and learned Friend's Amendment. I would suggest for his consideration whether for those purposes it might not be possible either to draw the line as to the proportion of the annual value, which shall cause a man to be regarded as the owner, and probably he might in that way include all, or almost all, the value. Or if he does not do that, then—the object of this Bill being to avoid a distraint upon the occupier—whether it might not be better in those cases where the owner has entered into a contract with the occupier different from the ordinary contract of letting, to make the owner directly and personally liable for the rent-charge. Of course it is an exceptional case which, under these circumstances, might be exceptionally dealt with; but I cannot do more now than call attention to some of the difficulties which arise on that portion of the clause which provides for cases where the rent is so far below the ordinary rent that it will not meet the tithe, because that might vary in different cases very materially. I thought that my noble and learned Friend might like to consider that question, though I do not myself feel any real difficulty about it.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am told by those who are learned in the views of the other House that the particular remedy suggested by the noble and learned Lord, namely, to make the owner in such cases liable, is precisely what that House will not have. We are rather in an inverted order of things here. This House is usually considered to be one in which landowners are strong and their interests fully guarded, yet in this House I have had no difficulties in regard to this Bill; but in the other House they are exceedingly jealous of the rights of property in this matter, and I am not sure whether, if such a proposal as this were inserted, it would pass in the other House. It is rather for that reason than for any other that I prefer the proposal of the noble and learned Lord, which I think would be more readily accepted. If you wish to make the owner liable you have a simple way of doing it by stating that in those cases the owner shall be treated as a Quaker is under the principal Act.

LORD HERSCHELL: I should like to say, with reference to what the noble Marquess has stated, that I should be far from favouring any proposal to make the owner personally liable generally. What I threw out was with regard to the alterations which would make an exceptional case.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Certainly.

Amendment and Clause agreed to.

Amendment moved, at the end of the new Clause last agreed to, to insert the words "With interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum."—(Lord Monk Bretton.)

Amendment agreed to.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, the Bill as it stands contains a sub-section to the effect that the sum ordered to be paid for costs shall not be personally recovered. I never saw such a clause before, and I cannot think it sound in principle even with regard to ordinary costs. Still, with regard to ordinary costs, as importance was attributed to it in the House of Commons, I am not disposed to create any difficulty. The words (in Sub-section 8) are these:—

"Nothing in this Act shall impose or constitute any personal liability upon any occupier or owner of lands for the payment of any tithe rent-charge or any other sum recoverable or payable under this Act."

As to the tithe rent-charge, there is no personal liability now, and it is not intended to create one; and in deference to the feeling of the House of Commons, I should not take exception to a provision that ordinary costs should follow the tithe rent-charge, and be recoverable in that way only. But, my Lords, it is possible that when persons are in litigation or litigiously disposed, and still more when the power of the purse is upon one side and not upon the other—and yet further, if to those circumstances is added some motive to defeat the right of the owner of the tithe rent-charge costs may be vexatiously and oppressively occasioned. I cannot think it was the intention of the House of Commons to exclude the power of the Court if it is specially found that costs had been so occasioned, to order them to be paid by the person who was acting vexatiously and oppressively in so causing them. I cannot help thinking that is a case which has been lost sight of, and, at all events, I am quite sure that justice does require that there should be power to order such costs to be paid in the ordinary manner.

Amendment moved, to add, after the new Clause agreed to, the following new Clause:—

“Costs Vexatiously Occasioned.—Notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, the Court shall have power to order any costs which it shall find to have been vexatiously or oppressively occasioned to be paid and recovered in the same manner as in the case of an ordinary action in the Court.”—(The Earl of Selborne.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I have nothing to say against the argument of the noble and learned Lord. I have only to repeat, in regard to this clause, the consideration which I employed just now—that I cannot forecast in what way this addition is likely to be received elsewhere, in view of the fact that the whole subject, as the noble and learned Lord is well aware, has been canvassed at considerable length and with considerable heat. But reserving to myself the right to form what opinion I may, if this clause should be altered or objected to elsewhere, I cannot say that I think I ought to advise the House to reject it.

Amendment agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I have now something of the same kind to move to insert. I move after Clause 2, page 3, to insert the following clause:—

The Earl of Selborne

“An application to a County Court for an order under this Act may be made on behalf of the tithe owner by his agent, although not a solicitor, and on such application the costs either of a solicitor or of a witness shall not be allowed in any case where notice of defence has not been given, and when such notice has been given the costs of a solicitor shall only be allowed for work done subsequent to the notice.”

I am not myself familiar with the technical proceedings, but I do not imagine that any hardship can arise under this clause, while on the other hand it will prevent poor tithe-payers being exposed to unnecessary costs.

LORD HERSCHELL: I have no objection to the substance of this clause, but, as regards the wording, I do not think it should be “where notice of defence has not been given.” That seems rather to encourage the notion of litigation, which I am very anxious to avoid as far as possible under this Bill. It will not be so where there is a defence, I suppose. The noble Marquess means probably notice of opposition to an order or something of that sort. I think it would be desirable to alter the wording in that respect so as not to encourage litigation.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The wording can be altered at another stage.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: The noble Lord will, no doubt, consider whether it should exclude necessary costs. The words are where notice of defence has not been given—

“The costs either of a solicitor or of a witness shall not be allowed, and when such notice has been given the costs of a solicitor only shall be allowed for work done subsequent to the notice.”

The costs are given in ordinary cases where the money has not been paid upon proper application. This cuts off the first costs and throws them upon the owner. There may be reasons for doing that, but I think questions may arise in many cases where costs must be incurred. I do not say that in a very simple case it would be necessary to employ a lawyer, and then there would be no costs of this kind at all; but supposing the case is not so easy and one in which a prudent man would hardly do without a solicitor, it does seem a little hard in all such cases to throw the preliminary costs upon the tithe owner. The words disallow these preliminary costs in all cases; not only when notice of defence has not, but even when it has been given. I can well understand that there may be cases where there would be some presumption that there was no necessity to incur such costs; but I cannot understand why costs incurred previous to the notice should not be allowed as well as those incurred subsequently.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I hope the noble Marquess will adhere to his clause. It is exceedingly desirable, when we are bringing in another kind of litigation for the first time, that every possible means should be taken to discourage the employment of solicitors, and to prevent the imposition of costs upon those who pay very small sums. I cannot help thinking the noble Marquess's benevolent intentions ought to have been persevered in in this clause.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I quite appreciate the necessity of avoiding more than is necessary the employment of solicitors, and I think, on the whole, it is better to hold to the clause. It is impossible in framing clauses for the working of a new experiment to ensure absolutely that no hardship shall fall upon the tithe owner, but I think we must not omit to take into consideration the possibility of hardship upon the tithepayer too.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 3.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: My Lords, there is a general feeling on the part of the clergy, and I may say that I have received a large number of letters upon the subject from them, that they are hardly dealt with in this rating clause. Of course I am aware that there is a great deal to be said on both sides, and certainly I have no desire to press any Amendment which appears to the House not to be reasonable. But the case is this: that in this respect the tithe owner is put to considerable disadvantage in comparison with all other ratepayers, and that, too, in a way which constitutes an entirely new departure as regards the rating of tithe rent-charges. The tithe owner is put in this position: that he may be called upon to pay a rate upon a tithe rent-charge which, nevertheless, he is not able to recover. He may be called upon to pay this rate, not only with the possibility of not recovering his tithe rent-charge, but he may be called upon to go into Court for it. The tithepayer has three months' time, but the tithe owner has no time allowed him at all, and he may be called into Court and required to pay his rate, although the tithepayer is meantime quite free for three months from the necessity of making the payment out of which the rate is to come. It seems to me it is only reasonable that you should give to the tithe owner the same limitation of time that you give to the tithepayer. If the tithepayer is to have three months' time let the tithe owner have just a little margin over that three months' in order that he may get his tithe in in those cases where there may be a little unwillingness, or possibly a very great unwillingness, to pay it. What I propose here would come very much to this: supposing a tithe rent-charge was due in January, and supposing the rate was made in the February or the March afterwards, I should say that the tithe owner ought to be allowed to pay his rate in the succeeding May. By that time the three months will have gone by. He will then be able to proceed against the tithepayer, who is the owner of the land, for his tithe, and then he is in a position to pay the rate. If the rate be made in such a case as that after the lapse of the four months, then of course he ought to pay directly if he is called upon to do so, and I should not wish to put any obstacle in the way of the demand that is made upon him. But it seems to me it is very hard indeed that the tithe owner should be placed in a different position as regards the debt due to him from that in which every other ratepayer is in, and yet that he should be subject to precisely the same liability as any other ratepayer. It is urged that they all ought to be upon an equality. If you put them both on an equality that would be reasonable; but you allow any other ratepayer to get in his money by an action, whereas you do not allow the tithe owner to recover by action, and you do not allow him to recover at all for the three months. That seems to be a very great hardship, and I propose to insert a new sub-section to remedy it. I will not answer for the wording, because in these cases the wording may require very careful consideration, so as to exactly convey what it is that is intended. I propose in page 4, line 2, to insert this new sub-section—that,

“No rate assessed on a tithe rent-charge shall be recoverable until four months after the said tithe rent-charge shall have become due.”

I mean by that, that if the rate is made between the two times at which the tithe rent is payable and is paid it should not be recoverable until four months after the first of those two times. If the tithe rent-charge is due in January and July, then the rate should not be recoverable until May or November, whenever it is made between those months. If it is only made in May or November it would be recoverable, of course, without delay. If it were made in February, for instance, still it would not be recoverable until May, and so on, making the recovery of the rate depend upon the date at which the tithe rent-charge shall have become payable. In the vast majority of cases this will not interfere with the ordinary practice in the least, because in most cases they will probably go on just as they have done for a long time, since 1836 or almost since 1836. But there are extreme cases, as we perfectly well know, and there is now and then a strong animus, there may even be a desire to put the clergyman into difficulties, and I think what I am putting before your Lordships is no more than justice. The next Amendment which I have to propose goes a step further still; but in regard to this one, I hope that if the noble Marquess cannot accept it he will be willing to consider the matter, and see how justice might be done in this particular case of a property which is liable to rates, but which is not like any other property capable of being recovered in the ordinary manner. Perhaps if it cannot be done in this way it may possibly be done in some other manner.

Amendment moved, in page 4, line 2, before sub-section insert new sub-section—

“2a. No rate assessed on a tithe rent-charge shall be recoverable until four months after the said tithe rent-charge shall have become due.”

And, in line 3, leave out the words (“if the collector of the rate”) down to (“owner of any tithe rent-charge”) in line 5, and insert—

The Bishop of London

(“If the owner of the tithe rent-charge shall certify to the rate collector that his tithe rent charge has not been paid, and that he has commenced proceedings in the County Court to recover it, the rate collector shall apply to the Court and.”)—(The Bishop of London.)

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: Before the noble Marquess answers that, I should like to say a few words in support generally of the Amendment of the right rev. Prelate. The only point about which I feel doubt at present is whether four months may be necessary; but for a delay of three months I think the case is very strong. The present situation in point of law as to rates on tithe rent-charges is this. It was decided two years ago, in a litigated case which went to the Court of Appeal, that when the rates upon the tithe rent-charge were not paid by the owner of the tithe rent-charge the remedy by law is by distress against the occupier. So that, in point of fact, at present a distraint against the tithe owner's goods, such as will be given by this clause, is not law; he is not liable to it; and the rate is made by the present law a charge upon the present tithe recoverable in the same way as the tithe rent-charge itself, and therefore the tithe owner is not compelled to pay it except out of the tithe rent-charge. That is the present state of the law. This Bill postpones, in the case where the tithe rent-charge is not voluntarily paid, all practical remedy for its recovery until the tithe rent-charge is three months in arrear. A question may be raised as to what the effect of that will be. I own that I think it very likely it will be treated by land agents and others as making payment before that lapse of time unnecessary; and in many cases, at all events, the rent-charge will not be practically receivable even when paid voluntarily until the end of three months; and we know this has been and is felt rather strongly by many of the clergy as putting them to considerable disadvantage in comparison with the present state of the law, which gives them a right to recover in 21 days. I think they have done wisely, and that their friends have done wisely, in acquiescing in that; because some reasonable consideration must be given to the position and convenience of the owner when a change in the law of this kind is made, and I understood the noble Marquess to express the opinion that the landowner might reasonably want some such enlarged time as that which the Bill gives him. But all this tends to the conclusion that advantage may be taken of that provision in perfect good faith, and that the clergyman may not receive his tithe rent-charge for three months. Under those circumstances, it seems to me that it would be a very great injustice indeed if he could have his goods distrained upon in respect of the rates made on the rent-charge before he could in the ordinary course of things get the rent-charge in, certainly before he could have the legal right to recover it. I think the right rev. Prelate has spoken with undue modesty with regard to the framing of his Amendment; as I have myself received many letters pressing upon me this view of the case, and I must confess I do not think I could have prepared it better than it has been done by the right rev. Prelate, or by those who may have assisted him in preparing the Amendments. I think, whether the time given be four months or something else, that not less than three months ought to be given when you are altering the law in this way, and making the tithe owner liable in a way in which he has not been liable before. I do not see why he should not be proceeded against for rates like anybody else, but let it be upon property which he has received, or is at the time when the proceeding is taken in a position to receive. Perhaps it may not be inconvenient that the proposed Amendment should be considered in connection with the right rev. Prelate's other proposed Amendments. I presume the object of making the time four months instead of three was to give a margin within which it might be ascertained whether the owner would be driven to take proceedings in the County Court or not. I am not quite sure whether so large a margin is necessary. However, I think on principle, if he is kept out of his money and obliged to go to the Court, it would be most reasonable that in that case the rating authority should have power to recover through the means of the Court, so that whatever is recovered by the Court should through the Court pay the rate. That is the substance of the second proposition, that upon the existence of a litigation being certified the rate is, in substance, to be recovered through the Court out of the money upon which it is levied. For that there appears to be an additional reason to which I cannot myself see the answer at present. Under the 5th clause of this Bill the Court may reduce the amount. The rate may have been made upon the whole rent-charge, which primâ facie the tithe owner is entitled to receive. Under the 5th clause of the Bill, when the case comes into Court, the tithe owner may claim a remission. Of course, until you know what will be the amount of the tithe rent-charge you do not know that the rate has not been imposed upon a larger amount than it ought to have been. The third Amendment provides for that in the proper place, and, upon the whole, I shall be disappointed if I do not hear that these Amendments are accepted in principle, and, as far as my judgment goes, I think they are quite rightly put forward.

LORD MONK BRETTON: I should like to say a few words before the noble Marquess rises to reply, and they will be to urge that, notwithstanding the high authority of the noble and learned Lord who has just spoken, the House will very carefully consider what it is about to do. It seems to me a proposition of a most serious character. I think it conflicts with the principle on which our system of rating is based. The assessment is made upon the existing state of things, and the existing value may be arrived at by looking at what have been the recent receipts of any property. You never look forward to ascertain what are likely to be the receipts in the next half year in assessing property. You are not to make the assessment in prospect; you are not to listen to suggestions of what is likely to happen, but the question is what is the property to be assessed worth at the present moment. What has been received lately in respect of it? That is one piece of evidence, or may be so, of what the actual value is. You are to determine the existing amount, upon that a rate is fixed of so many shillings or pence in the £1, calculated to meet the immediate wants of the parish, and this rate is due from every one on a certain date. The proposition here is that in the case of one particular class of persons, the tithe owners; before the rate is paid the tithe owner may wait till his next tithe comes in and see whether it comes up to what is estimated by the proprietor. Now that is entirely a new proposition, and I confess I can hardly see the difference between saying that you are to give the tithe owner four months in order that he may wait for the next receipt of tithe and see whether it comes up to expectation; and saying the same thing in the case of a landowner. The landowner might say, "I want to wait till I get my next half-year's rent in hand, or till I have realised my next half-year's profit, and then see whether it comes up to what I expect." The rate, your Lordships observe, is made, and is due on a certain day and ought to be paid. So much is that the case, that I believe I am correct in saying if a ratepayer appeals against his rate, and the appeal is still pending, yet he is called upon to pay the rate on the day on which it is due. If the appeal goes in his favour, and the rate is reduced, in some cases the difference will be refunded, but, I believe in general, it is credited to him in regard to the next rate. Then it is said that the tithe owner is being put in a different position, because formerly he received his tithe in 21 days, and now he will have to wait for it three months. In former cases the tithe might not have been received before his rate became due. He still would have to pay it. I would point this out, that though the tithe owner is by the present law entitled to his tithe in 21 days, he is more often nearly three months than three weeks in getting his tithe in, and, therefore, the change made in fixing a period of three months is not practically so great as has been supposed. Stress is laid upon this, that there might be an abatement made after the rate is paid. That may be so; but the rate he is called upon to pay is based upon past receipts of tithe, and if the next receipt is abated, his proper remedy will be to get his assessment reduced. This question appears to me to be so material as affecting the principle of rating that I should venture to hope that the Committee would be inclined to think this is a matter which should be very carefully inquired into and left for the consideration of the Standing Committee.

Lord Monk Bretton

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I wish to remark that I did not intend the three Amendments I put down to be bound up together of necessity. There is another one on Clause 5 which is quite distinct from what has been said against the first Amendment on Clause 3. The first Amendment on Clause 3 stands on quite a different footing from the last one. It may be quite true that on the mere principle of rating you ought to make the man pay the rate on that which he does not really receive, and I should be quite willing to bow to the authority of those who thoroughly understand the subject upon that point. But that does not apply to this allowance in respect of rate where the tithe is yet to be received, because the property is not yet in the man's hand. It is property out of which the rate is to come, but which he has not got, and he is put in a difficulty with regard to the sum he has not got which no other ratepayer is under. No other ratepayer is required to wait three months before the property belonging to him can be got in; he can go before the County Court the moment it is due, and, therefore, in that respect the injustice of this payment upon tithe seems to me to be plain. The payment of rate upon tithe appears to stand by itself in that respect. Then with regard to the difficulty of collecting the rate; the rate collector can go to the Court and get his money there. There is this difference between this particular class of ratepayers and every other ratepayer: Other ratepayers are assessed upon the visible property which they hold; it is theirs and in their possession, and it is seized, if necessary, by the rate collector from them; but here the property upon which the man has to pay the rate is not in his possession at all, and he cannot get it except through the Court. It is only reasonable, therefore, that what is the ultimate source—that is, the land from which the rate is to come, should be called upon to pay the rate as it is called upon to pay the tithe.

*LORD BASING: My Lords, I concur generally in the argument of my noble Friend against this proposition, which seems to me to proceed on a fallacious view of what rates are. They are not a charge on income or profits—they are a contribution in each parish towards the common funds. It does not follow that other occupiers in the parish have any independent fund which enables them to pay the rate. On the contrary, the occupier of a house has to pay the rent of his house, yet he is charged to the rates in respect of the value of that occupation. And so tithe owners, as well as other ratepayers in the parish, are assessed in respect of the value of their occupation. It does not follow that the rates should not be paid until the means have actually accrued and have passed into the pocket of the ratepayer. That is quite a new doctrine to me, and I cannot understand it. It is very true that the Bill proposes that a margin of three months shall elapse before the necessary payment shall be exacted; but three months' time is not only given now by tithe collectors, but six months, or even 12 months, elapse. Many, no doubt, ask for it as soon as they can get it, but that is very seldom within three months. On the other hand, it is a fallacy to suppose that rates are paid within as short a period as the three weeks now suggested. I do not know what may be the case in some parishes, but I have never certainly heard of a severe or peremptory remedy being taken for the payment of rates within that period. A few weeks' delay is not regarded as a very great matter by the rate collector. Then, again, it proceeds on the hypothesis that all the ratepayers in the parish have combined to withhold from the tithepayer the means of paying his rate. Supposing one tithepayer is in arrear, the tithe owner may have money coming in from other sources; and to assume that the whole body of tithepayers in the parish, who may be a large number of persons, are going to combine to withhold from the owner the means of paying his rates, seems to me the strangest and wildest supposition possible. I trust, therefore, the Government will not consent to this Amendment.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My noble Friend has anticipated a good deal of what I was about to say. I think in the arguments hitherto the ratepayers have been entirely neglected, and you are bound to consider their interests. In any given parish or union all the ratepayers ought in justice to be on an equal footing, and it would be perfectly unjust that contributions should be obtained from one kind of property at one moment and that they should be postponed in regard to other kinds of property in other cases. The contributions ought to be levied equally and at the same time from every person who contributes in the parish, and that without reference to whether the property is tithe or of any other description. The ratepayers otherwise will be paying a portion of that rate which they have a right to look to to meet the expenses of the parish. I do not see how you can, with any justice, postpone by law the payment of the rate when the rate becomes due. Though I do not deny that there may be some hardship in this case upon the tithe owner, I think, as the noble Lord pointed out, it is not likely to be so great as seems to be anticipated under the provisions of this Bill, because I do not think the tithe owners get their tithes by any means punctually at present, nor do I think it is the custom to demand it the moment it becomes due. The tithe owners give a certain amount of law, as it is called, to the tithepayers, just as landowners do. Speaking from my own experience, I believe the time for the collection of tithe is generally a month after it becomes due. If it is necessary to make any special provision in this case it seems to me it is the owner you ought to look to, because in point of fact the property has accrued at the time when the tithe is demandable; that is to say, it is presumed that there is that value existing, though the payer for his own convenience does not pay for three months. Let me ask, is not there a very strong analogy between these cases and the position of the occupier who pays Income Tax under Schedule A? Under Schedule A every occupier of agricultural land is bound to pay the landlord's Income Tax levied under that Schedule, but he cannot escape one single penny of that until he produces the receipt. When the tenant pays his rent to his landlord the receipt is given for so much as the Income Tax amounts to. Supposing he does not pay his rent for a year he still cannot recover one shilling of the Income Tax, and the reason he cannot recover it is that he has not paid his rent; simply for his own convenience the rent is postponed, and until he does pay he cannot recover the Income Tax. Therefore, although I have not the slightest desire to increase the liabilities of owners under this Bill, partly perhaps because I am an owner myself, and partly because I believe on grounds of policy it is desirable not to increase them, it seems to me that if anything is to be done, the most obvious and just mode of doing it would be that the owner should pay the rates, and deduct them when he himself pays.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: That was practically what I meant by my proposition.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, this is not a lively subject, but it is a very difficult one. It seems more difficult to adjust it than any other point which has yet arisen. This clause in its wording certainly seems to go a great deal too far. It would enable the tithe owner to be in arrear with his rent for four months, even though he had received every penny of his tithe up to date. I think that must be dismissed at once as an unreasonable proposal. Then you must go next to the case where he does not receive the tithe until the full limit of three months. Ought he on that account to receive any law when the rate is levied some time before? Undoubtedly my noble Friend behind me (Lord Basing) and the noble Lord opposite (Earl Kimberley) are quite right in their reasoning upon the general principles by which rates are levied on property. If I possess and let a furnished house the rates may be levied four months before my rent comes in, but no law or consideration is given me on that account. But, then, that argument leaves out of sight the other peculiar circumstances of the case—that a personal liability is being put upon the tithe owner, to which he has never before been subjected, and that should be taken into consideration. I certainly think the position of the tithe owner is one deserving of consideration, because the money is levied on the rent-charge as it arises, so that by an automatic process in former times that very law was given him which is now being asked for him. But there is a third case in which his claim seems to be much stronger. A rate is not levied upon a man in respect of property which he does not possess. It is provided by this Bill that in certain instances the tithe owner shall not possess his property—that in certain cases the County Court shall come in and say that the land is not strong enough to pay, and therefore the tithe may be remitted. It does, therefore, seem somewhat hard upon the tithe owner that he should have to pay a rate on a tithe rent-charge which he will never receive. However, I should like to have further time to consider the matter; and if it is the view of the Committee, I should be inclined to accept the suggestion which has been made, but on the distinct understanding that the Government will not be bound in any way in regard to it, and that they will be at liberty to thresh the matter out in order to arrive at some arrangement, if possible, in Standing Committee.

The Earl of Kimberley

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I hope the noble Marquess will pursue that course, and allow this to be discussed in Standing Committee. I feel that there is some difficulty about it, and that it is quite open to some of the remarks that have been made. Therefore, I think if the right reverend Prelate would not press the clauses now, but will be satisfied to move them in Standing Committee, that would be sufficient.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: As that is the view of the noble Lord opposite, I would recommend the right reverend Prelate to adopt that course.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I am quite content with what the noble Marquess said. I only want the case to be thoroughly sifted; and, provided it is fairly brought before the Standing Committee, I am quite content. I will, therefore, withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave of the Committee, withdrawn.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Clause 5.

*LORD BRABOURNE: My Lords, I have an Amendment upon Clause 5 of a very simple character, and I hope it is one that will commend itself to your Lordships. This clause enacts that when the total amount paid on account of the tithe rent-charge for 12 months preceding the date on which the sum claimed becomes payable will exceed two-thirds of the annual value of the land, there shall be a deduction, or remission, of so much as is equal to the excess over the two-thirds. I do not know why this precise figure was fixed upon, nor do I feel quite sure that I have correctly read it; for really this is a Bill which it would require a skilled lawyer to understand and dissect in all its various clauses. Now, the annual value of land for the purpose of assessment under Schedule B seems to be rather an extraordinary thing. Schedule B, as I have always understood it, is Schedule A plus the tithe. Well, how would this work? Supposing you have a farm which is let for £100; under Schedule A there would be Income Tax payable. Now, two-thirds of that would be £66 13s. 4d. Under Schedule B on, say, £120, the amount would be £80. Now, what I want to know is, how much do these gentlemen think they ought to have more than the tenth, which is the amount of the tithe? It appears to me if you have a rent of tithe £60, the tenth of which would be £6, the tithe owner will be doing pretty well if he gets five times the amount of that; that is to say, £30. If the amount of tithe rent-charge comes to half the annual value, is it not right that the deduction should begin then? Is it not a reasonable thing to say that the tithe owner shall be satisfied with a reduced amount of tithe rent-charge if it should be half the annual value of the land. The argument might be carried a very long way if one were to go into the whole history of tithe, and the purposes for which it was originally granted. In that case the argument would be interminable, and, after all, we should leave off very much where we commenced; but, in this case, I think your Lordships will agree with me that when these tithes were granted those who granted them never believed or supposed they were granting half the value of the land. I therefore put it to your Lordships whether, when it is half the value, it would not be a reasonable thing to allow it to go no higher?

Amendment moved, to substitute in Clause 5, Sub-section 1, line 35, the words "one-half" for "two-thirds.—
(Lord Brabourne.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I quite join in the noble Lord's indisposition to go back into the early history of tithes; but I think we may go back far enough to learn that tithe is a tenth part of the gross annual value of the land, and not of the annual rent. That is the basis of tithe. He has again and again complained that the tithe owner receives more than a tenth part of the rent. That has nothing to do with it, and I am quite sure that those primæval donors to whom he refers had no idea of annual value under Schedule B when they gave the tithe of the land. The calculation on which this proportion of two-thirds rests we have already discussed. Several noble Lords in this House feel rather strongly upon the subject of admitting any diminution from the value. The only thing to be said in that behalf is that the land is not as valuable to the tithe owner if he either takes it under process into his own hands or places it in the hands of a receiver, as it is to the occupier; and that both with respect to the burdens upon the land, and the difference in value in consequence of that change in cultivation, some allowance seems to be necessary if you intend to prevent the land going out of cultivation. I do not pretend to defend with any warmth the accuracy of this calculation of two-thirds; but it seems to me more near to what is just after the argument which I have heard than any other figure that can be suggested, and I certainly think the noble Lord's proposal to insert, instead of it, "one-half" would not afford a satisfactory substitute.

Amendment negatived.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: My Lords, I would ask upon his clause a question on one matter which has been brought to my notice by a great many incumbents in the Midland Counties. I want to ask what would be the effect of Sub-section 4 of this clause? This sub-section provides for ascertaining the annual value of any lands which do not appear in Schedule B. What is represented to me is this: that in mining districts it is very often the case that a very large quantity of land is laid waste by mining operations, and that in consequence all the surface has gone as far as regards the purposes of cultivation. Those lands are waste lands, and they will not appear, therefore, in Schedule B at all as I understand. In that case I should like to know what would be the guide to the Commissioners in ascertaining the value of the land. Will the owner of the mine be considered as the owner of those lands, and will he be made liable under this sub-section for the payment of the tithe, or will it be the lessee who is liable? Unless there is some provision distinctly made for such cases, the clergy are afraid that whatever happens in that respect, at all events, the tithe rent-charge will altogether disappear under the application of this clause.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My answer to the question must be to refer the right rev. Prelate to the condition of the tithe owner before the Act of 1836 was passed. If the land was so laid waste by subterranean processes and produced nothing, it is obvious that the tithe owner would get nothing by distress upon the land, and his rights would disappear. You may say that would be hard upon him, but I do not see how you can bring into the value the land that is used in working mines which lie beneath its surface. Those mines are not in any sense titheable as I understand, and you would be departing from the whole principle of your Tithe Acts if you attempted to levy a tithe upon them. It is possible that the wording of Sub-section 4 may require revision, but I do not see my way to giving any tithe upon waste land, even though the land has not been laid waste with the consent of the tithe owner.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I should like to point out to the noble Marquess that one of the operations of the Tithe Act was to exempt from loss of tithe any land which became no longer available for agricultural purposes. Before 1836 land occupied by buildings in the ordinary way ceased to be titheable; but that was changed as part of the legislation, and there are some cases in the Midland Counties where the operation of this clause would be simply to deprive the incumbents of the tithe they have enjoyed ever since 1836.

LORD HERSCHELL: I think there is a question upon this which will have to be considered, because it is not at all an uncommon case that land does not become absolutely waste by means of the mining operations carried on beneath, though it may nevertheless become of very little value agriculturally. It is very common in mining districts for the mining lessee to have considerable surface rights, and of course he can use the surface for spoil banks, for his pits, and for other purposes. As regards that land, I do not know whether in ascertaining the annual value under Sub-section 4 the use of the land in that way would be taken into account. It is possible it might be, and it is possible that all those cases might be, excluded by reason of this section not applying to those lands or to any except such as are used solely for agricultural purposes. In such a case, though the power of distress would have been a remedy which might have produced nothing, you had prior to the passing of this measure the remedy of suing out a writ habere facias possessionem. So far as the land is regarded agriculturally, the value may be very low indeed, yet nevertheless the landowner does in many cases receive consideration for it. He gives this surface as part of the consideration which he receives for the mining rights the lessee obtains, although the agricultural value of it is very small. I think there should be some provision in those cases which would enable the tithe owner to recover against that rent.

The Bishop of London

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I think the noble Marquess in what he said addressed his mind rather too exclusively to the supposed rule of the whole rent-charge being claimed out of land lying absolutely waste. There might be a rent-charge due upon land which was only partially waste from this cause; and what is waste only because it is used in a way more beneficial to the owner than husbandry cannot justly be made the ground of a claim for remission under Clause 5. This particular kind of remission I cannot help thinking was intended for land under husbandry, and ought to be confined to such land. One reason for thinking that it could not be intended to apply to land occupied in connection with mines, to my mind, is this: The Income Tax Regulations are not very easy to understand, though by long practice they may possibly be understood by those who have to do with them. Under Schedules A and B, with one of which we are now concerned, provision is made for assessment upon the principle of annual value; but there are special cases, for which exceptional rules are made; and the case of mines in particular is subject, generally, to an average of five years. In the case of Schedule B there are introduced general words to the effect that the duties under Schedule A and B, except where other provisions are made for estimating particular properties, shall be estimated according to the general rules in the clause: those general rules being inapplicable to land used in connection with mines. I have no doubt myself that this remission clause here can only work under that general provision which applies to agricultural land, and that it was never meant to apply to land which is practically used in connection with mines. Those lands are not absolutely waste in the sense of not producing profit. I would submit for the consideration of the noble Marquess that it might be well to say that this clause is not applicable to cases which do not come under the general rules for assessing annual value for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: There is a difficulty which occurs to me in taking the course recommended by the noble and learned Lord precisely, and that is that the lands so diminished in value are not thereby taken out of the category of lands subject to husbandry. They may be, and often are, pasture lands—a certain amount of grass may still grow upon them, and, as far as my personal experience goes, that is the commonest case. In those cases the tenant asks for indemnification in consequence of the injury done to the land; but I think in this discussion we are going a little further than it is possible to go satisfactorily in dealing with the matter across this Table. It is a question, therefore, which I hope the right rev. Prelate will bring up at a future stage in the Standing Committee.

LORD HERSCHELL: There is a point on this clause to which I should desire to call your Lordships' attention in a word or two. Subject to the technical knowledge which will be at the command of the Government, the test here is the assessment to the purposes of Schedule B. Under Schedule B there are certain provisions that the assessment shall be abated in any year, if owing to floods or other disaster the crops have been injured or destroyed. Notwithstanding the abatement of the assessment, of course it may happen that the rent has not been to anything like the same extent obtained as the amount to which the assessment goes. We will suppose the landlord gets his full rent. There will be no reason why, because of the abatement, the tithe owner should be deprived of his tithe. I do not know whether that abatement is actually entered in the book for that year, and whether then you go back to the old assessment, supposing that to be the case. But I think that would have to be looked into carefully to see whether you can apply to each year the particular assessment for that year, or whether it is not intended to be taken at the general assessment, which lasts, of course, for five years. I really do not know what is the practice followed. It may be there is nothing in the point, but I think it needs to be considered.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: It may be that it is not very important, but there is a suggestion which occurs to me upon this clause—I may be wrong—which would remove any objection to the definition under the Commutation Act. The Tithe Commutation Act has stated shortly the definition of owner thus, that it includes “every person who shall be in the actual possession or receipt of the rents or profits of any lands except,” and so on. Then the exceptions are, tenants for lives or years holding under lease or agreement on which a rent of not less than two-thirds of the clear yearly value is reserved, and all tenants whatsoever holding for less than 14 years, reckoned from the commencement of their term. Then it goes on to say that in the excepted cases, that is to say, of tenancies for more than 14 years, at less than two-thirds of the annual value of the land, the tenants and the landlords are to be joint owners. Now there is this difficulty arising upon that. If, for example, a lease of 21 years is granted at a reserved rent of two-thirds of the annual value, but an amount abundantly sufficient to pay the rent-charge, it cannot be intended that the remedy is to be against the lessee as well as the owner. What I would suggest for the purpose of removing the difficulty arising out of that part of the definition would be this, to add to the words at line 16, after the words "Tithe Act, 1836"—

"And when the occupier is a tenant holding under a lease or agreement the landlord shall be deemed to be the owner for the purpose of this Act."

I do not think it can be intended in those cases to make both the landlord and the tenant owners for the purpose of the Act, and yet they are made joint owners by the definition in the Act of 1836. If the noble Marquess thinks that is a matter which had better be reserved for the Standing Committee, I should entirely acquiesce.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: As this raises a very difficult question of construction I think it would be much better if the noble and learned Lord would bring it before the Standing Committee.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: Then, my Lords, I have another Amendment, which, at all events, can do no harm.

Amendment moved, in Sub-section 2, page 6, line 15, after ("case") to insert ("unless the context otherwise requires.")—(The Earl of Selborne.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7.

*LORD BRABOURNE: I do not know whether the noble Marquess will regard this Amendment of mine with more favour than the last. It is simply to this effect: that the payments to be made up to Michaelmas shall be carried on under the present law until the next year's tithe begins. I move to substitute the words "11th day of October, 1891," for "passing of the Act." I think that would be a convenient time after Michaelmas Day when rent and tithe become due, and would give landlords and tenants, whose annual agreements had terminated at Michaelmas, the opportunity of making some arrangement with reference to the new law. It appears to me a reasonable Amendment, and I hope the noble Marquess will accept it. I will say no more.

The Earl of Selborne

Amendment moved, in page 6, line 34, to leave out the words ("the passing of this Act"), in order to insert the words ("11th day of October, 1891.")—(The Lord Brabourne.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I cannot help thinking that an Amendment postponing the operation of the Bill until a particular date is very reasonable, and I had that in my mind when I referred to the proposal of the noble and learned Lord opposite with regard to intermediate proceedings. Whether this particular date should be accepted is another matter; but I do think that it is necessary that the Bill should not come into operation the moment it is passed, and that some qualification should be accepted.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: It would be absolutely necessary to enable the Rules to be made that the Bill should, for that purpose at all events, come into operation immediately. I think, speaking from what I have heard, it is not desirable that the time should be postponed for any period so long as that which the noble Lord opposite suggests. Those persons who are chiefly affected by the mischief which the Bill is intended to cure are desirous that it should come into operation as soon as possible; and if any time is fixed, I should be inclined to think that as soon after the Rules can be satisfactorily framed would be best; the earlier the time that can be fixed the better.

*LORD BRABOURNE: That is not at all my view in moving the Amendment. What I mean is this: there are a vast number of agreements through the country from Michaelmas to Michaelmas. Why should you put people to a totally unnecessary inconvenience by altering their contracts which expire next Michaelmas? When rent becomes due tithe becomes due in most cases, and I think it is better to give the landlords the opportunity of arranging with their tenants, so that then they may be able to start afresh. How that can be effected by the necessity of certain Rules being adopted I do not understand. This Amendment is not directed against the Bill. I shall reserve what I have to say against the Bill itself for larger audiences and for those whose ecclesiastical sympathies are less developed than those of your Lordships.

LORD HERSCHELL: I think the Government should consider this point. Where you have a measure of this kind, by which you get rid of existing machinery and substitute an entirely new one, there will be a great tendency, if you postpone the day, on the part of certain persons to raise difficulties during the interval prior to the Bill coming into operation.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: I hope the Government will give more time before insisting upon the operation of the Act after it has been passed. A great number of people will not have had time to make arrangements with their tenants. I would suggest that instead of putting the 11th day of October that the 12th or 13th of November should be substituted, as that is the time fixed for giving notice to quit in some parts of North Wales.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: There seems to be a good deal of doubt on the subject. I do not know whether it ought to be fixed so soon after passing. When that will be must depend on the other House. I do not feel quite so sanguine about it as my noble and learned Friend, and I should feel inclined not to put in a precise date now, but to leave it to be fixed. I should deprecate its being fixed, seeing that the passing depends upon the state of business in the House of Commons. I think it would give rise to a considerable amount of discontent on the part of many if their rates were subjected to such a proviso.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am a little doubtful whether it is desirable to invite general negotiations between landlords and tenants throughout the country in reference to the particular date as proposed, the 11th October. I think many noble Lords might find themselves in a somewhat difficult position. At any time they like to make fresh contracts they can do so; but to fix the date of the 11th of October as the time when there shall be fresh agreements made throughout the country would be more likely to cause embarrassment than to facilitate what we all wish should be done.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: This is a Bill which will certainly alter the relative rights of a certain number of persons all over the country. Your Lordships may think there should be some kind of notice given as to when that is to take place, and that they should not have to wait for months until the date shall be fixed at which under the Bill their rights are to be turned upside down.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I would suggest that a date should be fixed when the Bill has reached the last stage in this House.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: On Third Reading.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Verbal Amendments made.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I wanted to ask a question which has been put to me by a great many clergymen with regard to the effect of the Bill in cases of tithe-rent issuing out of lands held by Railway Companies. They seem to think they will have no remedy in that case.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Lands held by Railway Companies are not generally the subject of agricultural interests, and I do not think land of that description is very often held otherwise than by the owner as occupier. Therefore that case seems to me not to require special provision.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: If there is no tithe rent-charge issuing out of such lands held by Railway Companies this question would be superfluous; but if there is, why should not they be subject to the ordinary law? I do not know what the state of the law is with regard to that exactly.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The Railway Companies are in each case governed by certain Acts of Parliament. When those Acts were passed the lands were subject to tithe, and the clergymen may have been paid off, or there may have been a rent-charge reserved to them on the railway. If that is the case, you will, I think, get into some confusion if you include in the Bill a matter so contrary to the ordinary provisions.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee; and to be printed as amended. (No. 46.)

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 26th February, 1891.

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (IRELAND) ACT, 1885, RAINEY SCHOOL, MAGHERAFELT.

ANSWER TO ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Lord ARTHUR HILL) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the humble Address of the 4th December last, as followeth:—

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I have received your Address praying that I will withhold my Consent from that part of the Scheme of the Educational Endowments (Ireland) Commissioners for the administration of the Endowment in Magherafelt, known as Rainey's School, in so far as the proposed composition of the Board of Governors is concerned.

I have directed the Address to be submitted to the Lord Lieutenant, with a view to its being acted on in pursuance of the Educational Endowments (Ireland) Act, 1885, Section 24.

COAL, CINDERS, &c.

Accounts ordered—

"Of the quantities of Coals, Cinders, and Patent Fuel shipped at the several ports of England, Scotland, and Ireland, coastways, to other Ports of the United Kingdom, in the year 1890;

"Of the quantities and declared value of Coals, Cinders, and Patent Fuel exported from the several Ports of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to Foreign Countries and the British Possessions Abroad in the year 1890, distinguishing the Countries to which the same were sent;

"Of the quantities of Coals, Cinders, and Patent Fuel exported from the United Kingdom in the year 1890;

"Of the quantities of Coals and Patent Fuel brought coastways, by inland navigation, and by Railway, into the Port of London during the year 1890;

"And of the quantities of Coal and Patent Fuel received coastways at the various Ports of the United Kingdom."—(Sir Henry Russell Vivian.)

QUESTIONS.

OPIUM SMOKING IN BURMA.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to a pamphlet by Mr. Maurice Gregory, describing the ravages of opium smoking in Burma, wherein he states that there are 1,000 opium dens in the Akyab district instead of a single one, as officially reported; that he has seen large numbers of Burmese smoking, and that, in fact, the great bulk of the opium was consumed by them, although it is stated in Government documents that opium is not sold to the Burmese, but only to the Chinese and natives of India resident at Burma: whether he is aware that opium smoking is forbidden by the ancient Burmese laws and by the Buddhist religion; and that whereas, in the time of the late King of Upper Burma, Chinese opium vendors when caught were flogged and imprisoned, they now travel in first-class railway carriages, and are on terms of friendship with the highest English officials; and whether the Government will ask for information from Burma about the truth of these charges?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The attention of the Secretary of State has been called to the pamphlet. There is but one licensed opium shop in Akyab; and if information were given to the police of the others, they would be suppressed. Opium smoking was forbidden by former Burmese rulers, but the prohibition was much disregarded. Many of the statements in the pamphlet are, so far as the Secretary of State can test them, incorrect; but inquiry as to the facts alleged will be made from the Government of India.

THE BELSIZE COURT ESTATE.

MR. CRAVEN (York, W.R., Shipley): I beg to ask the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Sir J. Mowbray), whether it has been with the consent of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners that the Dean and Chapter of Westminster, in granting leases on the Belsize Court estate, have inserted a clause prohibiting the erection of any chapel or meeting-house for any congregation dissenting from the Church of England as by law established, and also prohibiting the use of any tenement demised by such leases for any ecclesiastical or other purpose in connection with any church, sect, or body of people dissenting from the Church of England; whether it is the practice of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to insert such prohibitions in leases issued by them; and, if only in certain cases, what cases; and if the Ecclesiastical Commissioners insert such prohibitions in any of their leases, do they do so in virtue of any statutory authority, or on their own responsibility only?

SIR J. MOWBRAY (Oxford University): The clause in question was found in the leases granted by the Dean and Chapter of Westminster previous to the surrender of their estates to the Commissioners. It will also be found in some leases granted by the Dean and Chapter, with consent of Commissioners, after the estates passed to the Commissioners. But in 1889 the existence of the clause having come to the knowledge of the Commissioners, they instructed their solicitors that no such clause should be inserted in future. It has not been the practice of the Commissioners to insert such prohibitions in leases issued by them.

*MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Commissioners continue to insist on the covenants in respect of the existing leases?

SIR J. MOWBRAY: Whether they will enforce the penalty?

*MR. LAWSON: Yes.

SIR J. MOWBRAY: I have no authority to speak for the Commissioners, but, seeing that the matter is one for their discretion, and that the enforcement of the covenant would be inconsistent with what has been done in regard to the leases of the last three years, I presume that they would not insist upon it.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Is there any clause in the leases prohibiting the erection of public-houses?

SIR J. MOWBRAY: Yes, there are.

SIR W. LAWSON: There are?

SIR J. MOWBRAY: Yes, Sir.

ROCHDALE HALF-TIMERS.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, whether he is aware that in the town and district of Rochdale, when children are taken from a Board School for employment as half-timers, it is frequently the practice of their employers to insist that the children shall be taken from the school preferred by the parents, and sent to some other school selected by the employer, and most commonly of a denominational character; and whether parents who send their children into employment as half-timers thereby lose the right to the free choice of a school; and, if not, whether he can take any means to prevent the infraction of this right in Rochdale and the neighbourhood?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): So far as I am aware no complaint of the kind suggested has reached the Department, and I do not know of any practice in the matter calling for interference. It is obvious that a parent's right to select a school cannot be affected by the fact that a child attends as a half-timer, but it may be the case that a school is sometimes maintained in connection with a factory in which a child is at work, and the child is expected to attend that school as a matter of convenience.

MR. PICTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman in a position to deny that a large firm, employing a considerable number of half-timers, is in the habit of insisting that they shall go to a particular school?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The question of the hon. Gentleman is of too abstract a character. If he will put it more in the concrete, with the name of the firm and the school, I will make inquiry into the matter.

WARDER SCHOOLMASTERS.

MR. BEAUFOY (Lambeth, Kennington): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether warder schoolmasters were engaged on the distinct understanding that they were to be exempted from sleeping in prison; and whether that privilege has been withdrawn; and, if so, on what grounds?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Chairman of the Prison Board that out of 71 schoolmaster warders all but two were engaged as ordinary warders, and have received extra pay for doing schoolmaster's duty. These warders have been exempted from their turn of night duty, because that unfitted them for their schooling duties next day. This exemption has not been withdrawn. There was nothing in the terms of their engagement or in the nature of their duties to exempt them from sleeping in prison in turn with other warders.

*MR. BEAUFOY: Is it not the fact that a fresh Order was issued on the 31st December, 1890, which practically abolished certain privileges which the warder schoolmasters used to enjoy?

MR. MATTHEWS: I believe the fact is that some of the Governors of prisons misunderstood the Order, and in that respect there has been an alteration in the action of the Government.

ETHER AS AN INTOXICANT.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will lay upon the Table, or supply to the Select Committee on British and Foreign Spirits, the Report made to the Government on the use of ether as an intoxicant in Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): There will be no objection to lay this Report on the Table.

ALLEGED INADEQUATE PUNISHMENT.

MR. S. SMITH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of Luke Cunningham, who was charged on Saturday at the Preston Police Court with a series of brutal assaults upon Bridget Connor, aged 13 years; whether he is aware that it was proved that he threw a poker at her, and it struck her on the forehead, causing a painful wound; that he fastened a strap round the girl's neck, and hung her up in the kitchen for several minutes to a nail in the ceiling; and that the prisoner was sent to gaol for three calendar months, with hard labour; and whether he will inquire of the Police Magistrate what were the reasons which led him to inflict so short a term of imprisonment for such an offence?

Mr. Beaufoy

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Justices that Luke Cunningham was charged on Saturday at the Preston Police Court not with a series of assaults upon the girl Bridget Connor, but with one assault on the 14th inst., namely, having thrown a poker at the girl, and struck her near the left eye, causing, according to the evidence of the doctor, a small bruise and a contused wound of a superficial nature. No other charge than that of the 14th inst. was preferred by the girl, who was represented by a solicitor. In answer to inquiries of the Justices, the solicitor stated that about a week before Cunningham had put a strap round the girl's neck, and hung her to the ceiling. There were no marks on the girl's neck, and her mother stated that Cunningham only kept her up for a minute, and did it to frighten the girl for stopping out late at night. The mother also stated that Cunningham had been a good father to the children, that he had not intended to hit the girl with the poker, and that he was the worse for drink at the time. The Justices, who were unanimous in their decision, thought the ends of justice would be met by the sentence passed by them for the assault on the 14th inst.

INTEMPERANCE IN WEST AFRICA.

MR. S. SMITH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to a letter in the Daily Graphic of February 11th, wherein a contrast is drawn between British rule in West Africa and French rule at Senegal, stating that the native population in Gambia and Sierra Leone is degraded through intemperance, and that since falling under British rule the people have sunk to such a depth of depravity that with many of them marriage rites have been given up; whether the prison is 43 times greater than that belonging to the French territory in St. Louis, which has a greater population than Freetown; and whether he will direct inquiry to be made as to the state of affairs?

SIR J. GORST (for Baron H. de WORMS): The letter referred to contains serious misrepresentations, and is not worthy of credit. There has been a great decrease of crime at the Gambia and Sierra Leone during the past six years, and Her Majesty's Government have received no information indicating that there has been an abandonment of marriage rights. At the Gambia about one quarter, and at Sierra Leone about two-fifths only, of the population are Christians. As regards the second paragraph of the question, in a tropical climate the provision of a large amount of cubic space for each prisoner is not a defect in a gaol. As regards the last paragraph, Her Majesty's Government do not perceive any necessity for a special inquiry into these matters at the present time. The Local Government looks carefully after the welfare and order of the people.

CROFTER FAIR RENTS.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is the case that applications were sent in several years ago for the fixing of fair rents in the parishes of Saddell and Skipness, but no sitting of the Commission has been held in the district; whether one of the crofters applying from this district, has had his case taken to the Court of Session and remitted by that Court to the Commission; and whether the Secretary for Scotland will send a section of the Commission to this district at an early date?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The Secretary for Scotland informs me that he understands that one application from the united parishes of Saddell and Skipness to have a fair rent fixed was received by the Crofter Commissioners in 1889, and was considered by them and dismissed in June of that year. No other applications have been received except ten, all of which have been lodged since February, 1890. None of these appear to be of a very urgent nature, and it is not proposed at present that the Commissioners should make an early visit to the parishes—other districts having a stronger claim on their attention. With regard to the second paragraph of the question, the Secretary for Scotland is not aware that any case from Saddell and Skipness has been remitted by the Court of Session to the Commission. The man whose application for a fair rent was dismissed in June, 1889, raised an action in the Court of Session against his landlord, but it was dismissed as irrelevant.

THE CROFTERS' COMMISSION.

DR. CLARK: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate when the Report of the Crofters' Commission will be in the hands of Members?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The Report is now, I am informed, in the printer's hands, so I hope it will be available for Members before very long. Considering, however, the nature of the Report, and the large amount of figures involved, it would be unwise to hasten its progress through the Press unduly.

THE LATE DUKE OF BEDFORD.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether under "The Coroners' Act, 1887," upon being informed of such a death as that of the late Duke of Bedford, the Coroner's public duty was, as soon as practicable, to issue his warrant summoning a jury; whether, under the 19th section of this Act, a juror is liable to a fine of £5 for non-attendance, and if it is a general custom of London Coroners to issue their warrants so as to enable the summonses to be served upon the jurors as a rule the day before the inquest, and in all cases to give them ample notice; and whether he will ascertain from the Coroner and state the day and hour when and by whom the Coroner was informed of the death, the day, and hour of his issuing his warrant summoning a jury, and of the service of the summonses upon the jurors, and the number of summonses issued, and the name or names by which the deceased was described in such warrant and in such summonses, and by whom such name or names were furnished to him?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Coroner that he is not aware that the general custom of the London Coroners is as stated. It is not the custom in his district. The death was reported to the Coroner between 10 and 11 p.m. on the 14th of January. The warrant to summon a jury was issued by him the next day as soon as he came to his office, between 11 and 12. The service of the summons on the jurors was during the same afternoon. The Coroner's officer made out 13 or 14 summonses, according to the usual practice. The case was reported by the doctors to the Coroner by the name of Francis Charles Hastings Russell, and by the title or occupation "Duke of Bedford." He gave the name and title to the officer next day. The form of warrant is signed by the Coroner, and filled up by the officer. The officer filled up the summonses in the name of Russell, giving the initial "F." The Coroner gave no directions to the officer as to the manner of filling up the warrant or the summonses, which was done in the usual way. The title and description of the deceased person has never been given in the warrant so far as the experience of the Coroner goes.

MR. COBB: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that in the warrant the deceased was described by the name of Russell?

MR. MATTHEWS: I so understand, from the Coroner's letter.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION AT FRESSINGFIELD.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the serious inconvenience caused to the inhabitants of Fressingfield and the neighbouring parishes owing to the absence of telegraphic communication; whether he is aware that Fressingfield has a population of more than 1,200 inhabitants, that the adjoining parishes are also large, and the nearest telegraph offices are Harleston, which is $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Fressingfield, and Stradbroke, which is situated at a distance of 4 miles; and whether he will consent to the establishment of a Telegraph Office at Fressingfield in conjunction with the existing Post Office?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that certain of the inhabitants of Fressingfield have recently undertaken to enter into a guarantee for a Telegraph Office there; that the deed of arrangement is now in their hands for signature; and that if the deed be duly executed the extension can be carried out early next financial year.

Mr. Matthews

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: This is the case of a large parish occupying an important position. Is it necessary to go through the formality of a guarantee before establishing a telegraph service?

*MR. RAIKES: Yes, Sir; that is the universal practice.

TELEGRAPHISTS ON BANK HOLIDAYS.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is now a regulation of the Telegraph Department,

"That all telegraphists who are called upon to work on the four Bank Holidays shall, if it be impossible to give them another holiday in lieu thereof, be entitled to receive their ordinary pay on each holiday, plus extra pay at the same rate for the work performed;"

and whether he will say which are the four Bank Holidays contemplated by the regulation in its application to Scotland?

*MR. RAIKES: The regulation referred to by the hon. Member applies to Post Office servants generally (including telegraphists) in England and Wales. As the Statutory Bank Holidays in Scotland are different from those in England, I am considering to which days the regulation shall there be applied, so that the privilege accorded in Scotland may not be less than is enjoyed in the rest of the United Kingdom.

THE TELEGRAPH SUPERVISING CLASSES.

MR. WALLACE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the scheme of revised scales of pay in the telegraph supervising classes, which he intimated last year, has been put in operation at Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, Leeds, Newcastle, and other places; and whether it is proposed to extend this scheme to Edinburgh at an early date; and, if so, whether the scheme will be ante-dated to the time when it was given effect to at the other large offices?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member I have to state that the Treasury has sanctioned the scheme referred to at the places enumerated. Certain questions have, however, been raised in connection with the scheme, which have led to a delay in carrying it out at other offices. I trust I may be able to remove these difficulties and obtain authority to carry it into effect at every large office. The suggestion made by the hon. Member in the last paragraph of his question is rather one for the consideration of the Treasury.

INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNALS IN EGYPT.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if steps are now being taken to continue for a further period the International Tribunals in Egypt; whether these tribunals have hitherto had authority, in every case in which a European wishes to sue a native, to cite that native from the most distant parts of the country to appear before these expensive tribunals at Cairo and Alexandria, and defend the suit there; and whether, in view of the recent arrangement for European supervision and control of the Egyptian Courts, Her Majesty's Government will now decline to continue to the International Courts an oppressive jurisdiction over natives which was always refused to Her Majesty's Supreme Courts in India?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): (1) No. The existing period does not expire till February 1, 1894. (2) Besides the Courts at Cairo and Alexandretta there is at Mansourah a "Délégation Judiciaire Permanente." The tribunals at those three places are the only Courts in Egypt for trying civil cases between natives and foreigners. (3) The native Courts could not try such cases without the consent of Foreign Powers, and if the system of the Mixed Tribunals came to an end Consular Jurisdiction under the Capitulations would revive.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Would the Consular Jurisdiction extend to the natives of the country?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I apprehend that it would in certain cases.

THE SAVINGS BANK DEPARTMENT.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if it is the fact that in the Savings Bank Department during the year 1890 the total amount of overtime performed by the male staff (numbering 531) was about 268,000 hours' work (overtime worked by the hour amounting to about 106,500 hours, and overtime worked by the piece amounting to a sum of about £6,740, equivalent to about 161,500 hours); whether 268,000 hours of overtime are equivalent to the normal working hours of a staff of about 129 men; whether permanent overtime is only necessary during the first three months of every year; whether overtime (including timework and piecework) performed during the last nine months of 1890 amounted to about 90,000 hours' work, which is equivalent to the normal working hours of an additional staff of about 65 men during that period; and whether he intends to increase the permanent staff of the Savings Bank Department?

*MR. RAIKES: The figures quoted by the noble Lord appear to be substantially correct. The difficult question of the mode of providing for the heavy pressure of work which occurs in the Savings Bank between the 1st January and the 1st May in each year is engaging my attention, and it will be my endeavour to make such arrangements for next year as will enable me to largely curtail the amount of extra duty to be performed. I am not prepared at present to make any statement as to the nature of the arrangement I may ultimately decide upon.

EARL COMPTON: Is it likely that a decision will be arrived at before the Post Office Estimates are taken?

*MR. RAIKES: I am not quite sure when the Post Office Estimates will be taken, but I have no doubt that I shall be able to arrive at a conclusion after I have consulted the Treasury.

FEMALE FACTORY INSPECTORS.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any power at present to appoint female Inspectors of factories and workshops; and, if not, whether he will consider the expediency of acquiring such power, in view of the Return issued by the Home Office in July last, showing that out of 1,084,361 persons employed in mills and factories in the United Kingdom as many as 656,549 are females; and there are important sanitary and other matters respecting which female workers would prefer to communicate with Inspectors of their own sex?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; the existing Act gives me the power to appoint female Inspectors in factories and workshops, but there are strong objections to its exercise on the grounds of administration, economy, and practicability. I cannot in the space of an answer to a question explain these objections. I shall be happy to discuss the matter with the hon. Member, but I may point out that by the Bill now before the House the sanitary supervision of workshops will be made over to the Local Authorities.

LIGHTS ON PUBLIC CARRIAGES.

Mr. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the powers and regulations of the police in the Metropolis, in respect to the carrying of lights after dark by public carriages, especially omnibuses; whether there are any in respect of private vehicles; and whether any special order is issued for the winter months or for foggy weather?

Mr. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): On the same subject I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, having regard to the great increase of heavy vehicular traffic in the streets of the Metropolis, he will, for the protection of the public, procure, either by regulation or legislation, that every vehicle traversing the streets after dark, or in dark weather, shall, under penalty of a fine, be compelled to carry an external light; and whether he is aware that the Postmaster General has issued an order whereby all vehicles employed in the Post Office service are compelled to carry an external light after dark?

Mr. HULSE (Salisbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will consider the advisability of laying down a rule for the Metropolis that every vehicle after sunset and during a fog should be provided with a light in accordance with the invariable custom of other countries?

Mr. WILLIAM LOWTHER (Westmoreland, Appleby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there are now, or have been within the last 20 years, any police regulations obliging all vehicles, circulating in the streets of the Metropolis, to be supplied with lights after sunset?

Mr. Leng

Mr. MATTHEWS: In reply to these various questions, I have to say that Section 14 of 16 and 17 Vic., cap. 33, provides for lamps being placed inside metropolitan stage carriages by proprietors and kept lighted by conductors or drivers between sunset and sunrise. The Commissioner's Order as to this is as follows:—

"The police are to observe and report all stage carriages travelling after dark without being lighted by a lamp inside."

The Secretary of State has power under 32 and 33 Vic., cap. 115, section 9, to prescribe the times during which hackney carriages when plying for hire shall be provided with a lamp. No order has ever been made under this section. The matter has been carefully considered by my predecessors on more than one occasion, and in their opinion cogent reasons have existed for not acting upon this section. I beg to refer my hon. Friends to an answer given in this House by Mr. Secretary Bruce in 1870. I have, however, requested the Commissioner of Police to reconsider this question, together with the whole question of traffic regulation, upon which he is preparing suggestions. At present the police have no power to deal with private vehicles. Legislation would be necessary.

*Mr. LAWSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman lay the Report of the Commissioner of Police upon the Table of the House?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir.

STREET ACCIDENTS.

Mr. HULSE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a small Committee of this House might be appointed to consider the Report of the Chief Commissioner of Police on Street Accidents when presented, and to consider what rules and regulations might be laid down for the safety of the lives and limbs of the inhabitants of the Metropolis?

Mr. MATTHEWS: As I have before stated, the Commissioner of Police, should he find on inquiry that his existing powers are insufficient, will shortly lay before me suggestions for securing more safety to the public. If legislation is found to be necessary the House will have an opportunity of discussing the matter fully in Committee of the whole House.

THE WHITECHAPEL MURDER.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the evidence of the police before the Coroner of East London at the inquiry regarding the death of Frances Coles on Friday last, from which it appears that the man Sadler was left outside the dock gates in a state of intoxication, such as to be thought unable to go on board his ship; that he was struck down and severely bruised in presence of or without remonstrance on the part of the police; and whether, if the man was drunk as described, he was entitled to protection; or, if not, to be taken into custody by the police?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Commissioner of Police informs me that he has only seen a newspaper account of the evidence, and there is nothing in that to bear out the allegation that Sadler was struck down and severely bruised in the presence of the police. The only constable who saw him at the dock gate considered that, although he had been drinking, he was not in such a state of intoxication as to warrant his being taken into custody.

MR. ESSLEMONT: Has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been called to the fact that in the sworn evidence it is stated that this policeman was asked to turn away, and that he did go away 30 yards?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; I have not had a Report of such evidence, but I will make inquiry.

THE DURHAM EVICTIONS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that certain persons who have been brought to the county of Durham by the Marquess of Londonderry to assist in the evictions now being carried on on his property, having refused to take part in the evictions, have been detained by the police; whether he is aware that the persons who were engaged to carry out the furniture of the evicted tenants were prevented by the police from leaving when they desired to do so, and that they were hindered when at their lodgings from communicating with individuals with whom they wished to speak; whether he is aware that the police expelled by force the inmates from houses from which their furniture had been or was being removed; and would he state on what authority the police acted in this manner?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have received a Report from the Chief Constable only as to the first paragraph of the question. He informs me that the persons in question have not been detained by the police, and that those who wished to go have left. I have asked the Chief Constable to supply me with the other information asked for by the hon. Member.

THE CAMBRIDGE "SPINNING HOUSE" CASE.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether the young person who was sentenced last week to 21 days' imprisonment at Cambridge, for leaving the "Spinning House," is still in confinement, or whether she has received a free pardon?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have communicated with the learned Judge, and he informs me that he sees no reason to doubt the propriety of the original committal to custody from which this girl escaped. Looking to the fact that her escape was mainly due to the negligence of the assistant matron, I have come to the conclusion that the remainder of her sentence may properly be remitted. I am in communication with persons of position at Cambridge, who will, I hope, do her real service and assist her to a different course of life.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Do I understand that this girl will be set at liberty at once?

MR. MATTHEWS: The order for her release will be issued to-morrow.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Am I to understand that the liberty of the girl will not be dependent upon her entering into any conditions?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir.

OCCUPATION OF TOKAR.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the district of Tokar is situated in Egypt or in the Soudan; and if the latter, by what right the Egyptian Government claims authority over it, in view of the fact that it gave up absolutely all sovereignty over the whole of the Soudan with the exception of the Port of Suakin; and whether it is intended to organise a civil Egyptian Government in Tokar, and to maintain an Egyptian garrison there; and, if so, will he cause a map to be placed in the Tea Room, with the frontiers of the newly-annexed territory indicated thereon?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Tokar is in the Eastern Soudan. When Egypt, under the advice of Her Majesty's Government, withdrew its troops from the Soudan, it did not abandon the sovereignty of the country. An Egyptian garrison will be maintained in Tokar. There is no newly-annexed territory to be defined on a map.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government can lay Papers before Parliament containing the communications that have passed with the Government of the Khedive on the permanent occupation of Tokar and other places in the Soudan beyond Suakin?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Papers on the subject will be included in an early issue.

MR. J. MORLEY: Has the permanent occupation of Tokar received the assent of Her Majesty's Government?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I stated the other night in answer to a question by the right hon. Gentleman that no final Resolution has been come to, but that there is every reason to believe that the occupation of Tokar will be permanent.

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman stated the other night, in answer to a question from me, that nothing had yet been settled. All I want to know is whether a decision permanently to occupy Tokar has received the assent of Her Majesty's Government?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The matter stands in the same position now. No final decision has been come to, but the circumstances remain as they were then described.

Mr. Labouchere

ALLOTMENTS.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture, if he is aware that, under an enclosure award, 17 acres of land were vested in the churchwardens and overseers of the parish of St. Margaret's, Leicester, for the purpose of allotments, and that such land is now let to an allotments society; and whether the select vestry of the parish have decided to apply to Parliament for powers to sell the said land for building purposes; and, if so, whether, in any Bill giving such powers, the Government will take care that provisions are inserted to compel the vestry, in case of sale, to secure other land equal or more in quantity and suitable as regards quality and situation for the purpose of allotments?

MR. PICTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the land in question is not charity land, but Corporate property, and that owing to the growth of manufactories around it the land is unfit for allotments? Is he aware that the land is intended to be sold not for ordinary building purposes, but for the erection of almshouses—on the principle of the greatest good of the greatest number?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): In answer to the question on the Paper, I have to say that the award referred to was not made under the Inclosure Acts, which are administered by the Board of Agriculture; and I am not aware of the circumstances relating to the allotment beyond what appears in a Bill which has been introduced in the House of Lords, under which powers are taken to sell the land in question for building purposes. The purposes for which it is intended to be sold are accurately described, I believe, by the hon. Member who has just sat down. I am quite in sympathy with the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division in his desire to maintain and promote the provision of allotments. The matter in question is not within the control of the Agricultural Department, but I will give it my attention with the view of securing that the advantages at present enjoyed by the inhabitants shall not be prejudiced by the Bill.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Will the right hon. Gentleman say in what Department rests the duty of securing the allotments which have been made under the award, and which have been enjoyed for a considerable number of years? Is there any security that such allotments may not be taken away for building purposes without granting an equivalent?

*MR. CHAPLIN: As the only danger with which the allotments in question are threatened appears to be from a Private Bill in the House of Lords, that is not a question, I think, which I can be expected to answer. It should be asked in another place.

BACCARAT.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of "Jenks v. Turpin," in which Mr. Justice Hawkins made the following statement with regard to baccarat playing—

"It is a game of cards. It is a game of chance, and though, as in other things, experience and judgment may make one player or banker more successful than another, it would be a perversion of words to say that it was in any sense a game of mere skill. It is, therefore, in my opinion an unlawful game within the meaning of the Statute;"

and whether the Law Advisers of the Crown were aware of this case when they advised him that "baccarat" was not illegal?

MR. MATTHEWS: If the hon Member will read the judgment of Mr. Justice Hawkins in "Jenks v. Turpin," he will find that the Judge was careful to explain that playing at baccarat was an "unlawful gaming" within 17 and 18 Vict., 38, 4, because it was played in a house kept for playing at that game, and that was rendered illegal by statute. The case is familiar to the Law officers.

MR. MORTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain what is meant by a house kept for the purpose?

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Gentleman will find that fully explained in the judgment.

THE IMPERIAL DEFENCE ACT.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, upon the Budget, he will lay upon the Table a Return showing what sums of money have been expended in each year (including the current financial year) under "The Imperial Defence Act, 1888," "The Naval Defence Act, 1889," "The Barracks Act, 1890," and stating in what manner the moneys so expended have been provided; also showing how the sum of £4,570,900, which was the estimated excess of the Army and Navy Expenditure for 1890-91 over the moneys which (as shown in Return, No. 200, 1890) has been provided, and how much debt is now outstanding in respect of moneys raised under the above-mentioned Acts; and also a statement of the sum which it is estimated will be required under the same Acts in the coming year, and the manner in which it is proposed to raise them?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, Sir, I will in due time, in connection with the Budget, lay a Return upon the Table, showing the amounts expended in each year under the Imperial Defence Act, the Naval Defence Act, and the Barracks Act, how the moneys have been provided, and how much debt is outstanding in respect of these amounts. I shall also be able to state the sums estimated to be required under the same Acts in the coming year. I am not prepared to tie my hands by pledging myself to the exact manner in which these sums will be raised, but I shall be able to indicate generally the alternatives. I shall also take an opportunity of showing how any part of the estimated excess on the Army and Navy expenditure for 1890-91 was actually provided for.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: As the right hon. Gentleman is in the habit, like his predecessors, of supplying a printed paper before the Budget Statement is made, will he supply this information on the morning or day before the Budget?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I will consider the matter.

TORPEDO GUNBOATS.

MR. S. SMITH: In the absence of the First Lord of the Admiralty, I will postpone until Monday my question whether any of the seven torpedo gunboats of the Salamander class have yet succeeded in doing their trial speed of 21 knots; and whether the 18 torpedo gunboats, described as sister ships of the Salamander, and also stated to have a speed of 21 knots, are expected to realise that speed.

HOUSE OF LORDS PAPERS.

SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridge-ton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the House of Lords would be willing to communicate to the authorities of this House the titles of Returns and Papers, relating to matters of public interest, which are printed by order of the House of Lords; and whether the titles of those Returns could be brought to the notice of Members of this House in the same manner as in the case of Returns printed by order of this House?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton): Arrangements are being made under which a file of Lords Papers will be kept in the Vote Office for the convenience of hon. Members desiring to consult them, and any hon. Member requiring a copy of any particular Paper can receive it on notifying his desire to the clerk in the Vote Office. It would be neither convenient nor consistent with the regulations affecting the printing and distribution of Lords Papers to place their titles on the pink papers circulated with the Votes and Proceedings of this Honourable House; but I hope the arrangement above described will be found to fulfil the object which the right hon. Baronet has in view.

*SIR G. TREVELYAN: I think that the utmost has been done by the Treasury to secure this object. Might I ask whether House of Lords Bills may be included in the scheme?

SIR H. MAXWELL: I will consult the authorities.

INFLAMMABLE LIQUIDS BILLS.

MR. JOHN KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether, in view of the fact that very considerable alarm is felt by the distributors of mineral oil in many parts of the country at the provisions of the Inflammable Liquids Bill, he will consent to the Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill being postponed for two or three weeks, in order to allow time for a fuller consideration of its terms by the very large class of tradesmen upon whose trade the proposed restrictions would be placed?

Mr. S. Smith

MR. MATTHEWS: My hon. Friend is probably not aware that I have already twice stated, in reply to questions in this House, that a reasonable time will be allowed to lapse before the Second Reading of this Bill. I may add that if the House is pleased to read the Bill a second time I should propose to refer it to a Select Committee, before which the trade can be fully heard.

MR. J. KELLY: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean by a reasonable time, two or three weeks?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): Is the Bill likely to be taken before Easter?

MR. MATTHEWS: My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury tells me it is doubtful.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, before proceeding with the Inflammable Liquids Bill, he will lay before the House Colonel Majendie's Report, and any statistics showing the number of fires attributable to inflammable liquids, the subject of the said Bill, and how they were occasioned?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have already stated in the House that the fires due to inflammable liquids are not reported to the Home Office, and I have not the materials for supplying the statistics asked for. I presume the hon. member refers to Colonel Majendie's Report of April 28th, 1890. That has already been presented to the House (C. 6,059, 1890).

TELEGRAPH IN THE ISLE OF SHEPPY.

MR. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will cause the electric telegraph to be extended from Sheerness to the parish of Eastchurch, in the Isle of Sheppy, Kent?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I am glad to say that I have arranged to have the telegraph extended to Eastchurch early in next financial year, as those who made application to me on the subject have already been informed. The extension cannot be carried out during the current financial year, as the whole of the money voted for works of this kind has been expended.

POST OFFICE SORTERS.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, since the result of the inquiry by the Departmental Committee last year showed that there were 351 vacancies on the staff of the first-class sorters in London, he will state when it is intended to fill up these vacancies; and whether, in view of the fact that most of the officers who have been performing the duties of the first class for a considerable period have done so without any additional remuneration, the appointments to the first-class vacancies will take effect from the 28th of July last?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member's question, I hope that the appointments will be filled shortly. The promotions cannot, in any case, take effect from the date mentioned, as the additional appointments were not created until several months later.

SORTING CLERKS IN EDINBURGH AND DUBLIN.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the postal staffs of the offices in Edinburgh and Dublin are now on an equality, as regards pay, with the telegraphists of those offices; whether their official designation has been changed to that of "Sorting Clerks"; and will he state whether similar alterations are to be made in the London offices; and, if so, when?

*MR. RAIKES: To the first and second questions of the hon. Member the answer is in the affirmative. In reply to the third question, I have to state that it is not in contemplation to make similar alterations in London.

THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will ascertain from the Lord Chancellor if he is aware that dissatisfaction and regret exists among the members of the legal profession and the public as to the manner in which one of the Judges of the Queen's Bench Division is able to perform his duties, and that attention is being called to this subject in the legal newspapers; and whether any change is contemplated at an early date in the constitution of the Bench in that Division?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Lord Chancellor thinks that it would be going altogether beyond any province assigned to him by law if he were to assume such a disciplinary attitude towards Her Majesty's Judges as appears to be suggested by the hon. Member's question. If there is any matter of fact within his jurisdiction in relation to the Supreme Court as to which the hon. Member desires information, the Lord Chancellor would be very happy to give it; but in this case the question states neither any fact nor any person in relation to whom such information is desired.

*MR. COBB: Am I to understand that the Lord Chancellor states that he is not aware that any dissatisfaction or regret exists amongst the members of the legal profession on the subject named in the question?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think I am justified in saying that the Lord Chancellor has had no communication of the kind made to him.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON CAPITAL AND LABOUR.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what provision is intended to be made in the constitution of the Royal Commission on the relations between employer and employed, and in the scope of the Inquiry, for taking cognisance of the special interests of Ireland?

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that the proposed legislation with regard to Land Purchase in Ireland will seriously affect the position of agricultural labourers in Ireland and their relations to their employers in that portion of the United Kingdom, he will take steps to secure their effective representation on the proposed Royal Commission to inquire into the position of employers and employed?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Sexton) asks me whether provision will be made, and, if so, what arrangements will be made in the constitution of the Royal Commission for taking cognisance of the special interests of Ireland. I can only assure him and my hon. Friend behind me that the interests of the inhabitants of Ireland will be considered as well as the interests of every portion of Her Majesty's subjects in the United Kingdom in the arrangements for the constitution of this Commission, and instructions will be given to that effect; but I am quite unable at present, as the hon. Member will see, to go into the details of the question.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): Is it intended that the Inquiry shall only be prospective, or that it shall take into consideration the present state of things?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is intended to consider the whole question, in order to ascertain whether legislation is necessary.

COLONEL WARING: Will the scope of the Commission include agricultural labour?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not understand that there is any reason why it should not, if there is disturbance in the relations between capital and labour in agriculture.

EARL COMPTON: Will the inquiry also include Government offices—for instance, the Post Office, where relations have been strained?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not able to say.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, when he makes his promised statement to the House with regard to the Royal Commission on the Relations between Capital and Labour, he will be able to give an assurance that the scope of the Inquiry shall not be permitted to extend to, or in any way interfere with, the present legal rights and liberty of combination which the organised trades of the country possess?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is obvious that the Commission would not have the power to interfere with the present legal rights of combination of trades; but undoubtedly it will be the duty of the Commission to inquire into all the conditions under which the unfortunate disturbance of labour happened last year.

Mr. W. H. Smith

In answer to Mr. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.),

*MR. W. H. SMITH said: It is proposed to examine into the state of the facts and the conditions which exist; and, therefore, the Commission will consider whether any legislation may be wanted or not.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if any money has been paid from the Constabulary Force Fund to defray the expenses of the Royal Irish Constabulary sports in Dublin; and, if so, to what amount; whether there was originally a special fund for the officers of the Royal Irish Constabulary, which was wound up; and, if so, upon what grounds were the Royal Irish Constabulary officers allowed to share in the benefits of the Force Fund, which was specially established for the men; and if, in the case of a constable of the Royal Irish Constabulary who joined the Force prior to 1883, the Force Fund allowance is stopped from his pay whether he consent or not?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The reply of the Constabulary authorities to the inquiry in the first paragraph of the question is in the negative. A private Friendly Society known as the Constabulary Officers' Widows Fund was at one time started by some of the officers, but not realising the expectations of its founders they wound it up. That fund was in no sense official, and had no connection with the Constabulary Force Fund. The latter fund was never confined to the men, but, on the contrary, the Acts of Parliament governing the fund made it imperative for the officers equally with the men to become subscribers to the fund, with the consequential right to receive grants therefrom. It is the case that all officers and men who joined the Force prior to 1883 are under statute obliged to be subscribers to the fund so long as they are actually serving with the Force. Upon retiring on pension the subscription becomes voluntary.

TARBERT DEMOCRATIC LABOUR FEDERATION.

MR. STACK (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland why members of the Constabulary Force have watched for months past the meeting place of the Tarbert branch of the Irish Democratic Labour Federation, and for what reason, on Sunday the 1st instant, two men of the Force entered the room while the meeting was being held, refused to state their business or authority, declined to leave when called upon, challenged the members to put them out if they were able, and finally only left after having taken the names of all the members present; and whether these proceedings were authorised or are sanctioned by the Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary authorities report that the two constables who were on duty had reason to suppose that an attempt was being made to hold a meeting of the late branch of the National League, which was suppressed in that district as an unlawful association; upon being told by the chairman that it was a meeting of the Labour Federation they left the room. The constables deny the remaining allegations in the question.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): If the only object was to take the names, why were they not taken without entering the room and disturbing the meeting?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I gather that that altogether is denied.

MR. SEXTON: In what form does the right hon. Gentleman desire to receive proof?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: All I say is that the hon. Gentleman has been misinformed. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to ask any further question he had better put it on the Paper.

MR. SEXTON: I presume that the police have now ascertained that this was not a meeting of a suppressed branch of the National League?

THE 1ST MANCHESTER REGIMENT AT TIPPERARY.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has received affidavits from John A. Drew, shopkeeper, Tipperary, John Tohy, and Henry John Lutman, declaring that on the evening of the 4th instant two private soldiers of the 1st Manchester Regiment, stationed at Tipperary, were ordered out of the house of John A. Drew by Sergeant O'Brien, and when at the door were placed under arrest and deprived of their belts by him; whether their offence was against a Regimental Order placing Mr. Carew's house "out of bounds;" has Mr. Carew's house been a well-conducted house, or have any charges ever been made against him for having broken the Licensing Law or any other law; and what is the reason for the above-mentioned Regimental Order?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The Secretary of State has received the affidavits referred to. The offence of the men was against a Regimental Order placing Mr. Carew's house out of bounds, but the officer commanding states that they were not arrested, but were marched away with the picket to avoid a crowd of civilians. As already stated, the Secretary of State has no knowledge as to the conduct by Mr. Carew of his house; and, as the matter is one of military discipline, he again declines to call for explanation of an order which the officer commanding was fully competent in his discretion to make.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I wish to know whether a similar order has been given in the case of any other public house in Tipperary; and, if not, why the house of Mr. Carew has been singled out? I also desire to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that prosecutions have been entered into against persons for the offence known as boycotting in Tipperary?

MR. BRODRICK: I am not aware that any person or persons have been picked out in the way suggested by the hon. Member, and I cannot tell the hon. Member whether any other houses have been dealt with in the same manner, but if he desires I will inquire.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I will put a further question on the Paper, and I will ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary if he will be good enough to take the answer of the hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary for War as a ground for putting the provisions of the Coercion Act into force against the colonel commanding this regiment, who has boycotted the house of Mr. Carew.

BELFAST STREET TRAMWAYS.

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the Resident Magistrates for the City of Belfast, the Local Justices of the Peace who are members of the City Corporation, and also the officers and men of the Royal Irish Constabulary have free passes, or in some cases passes at a merely nominal rate, for travelling by the Belfast Street Tramway Company's cars, although the Magistrates thus privileged adjudicate upon cases in which the Tramway Company are concerned, and whether Magistrates are permitted to accept free passes from companies over whom they have judicial jurisdiction; and if he could furnish a statement of the number of prosecutions brought by the police force of Belfast against the Belfast Street Tramways Company for breaches of the city by-laws before and since the privilege of free travelling has been granted to the police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that neither the Resident Magistrates nor the officers of the Royal Irish Constabulary have free passes from the Belfast Street Tramways Company. They have the right of taking season tickets at the cost of one guinea a year. It appears that hitherto individual policemen, if travelling on the top of a tramcar, have not been charged. The Inspector General thinks this may be open to objection, and has ordered its discontinuance. I have no official information with regard to the Local Justices; but I understand that out of the 15 who are members of the Corporation, one only has a free pass, and that by reason of a courtesy shown by the Tramway Company to ex-Mayors. During the past five years the police have prosecuted tramway officials in 27 cases.

SEED SUPPLY (IRELAND) ACT.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the provisions of the Seed Supply (Ireland) Act, that the Poor Law Guardians may not sell seed potatoes to labourers except upon the application of the occupying owner or the tenant, and upon his agreeing to pay the price of the seed so sold, is he aware that the strict enforcement of this provision will leave two-thirds of the labourers without any potato seed whatever; and will the Local Government Board, under these circumstances, issue instructions to Boards of Guardians to accept solvent security from the labourers for repayment of the price of seed? I also beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he can explain whether Colonel Spaight, in warning the Mallow Board of Guardians, on 20th instant, against any infringement of Section 5, Sub-section (2) of the Seed Supply (Ireland) Act, did so in his official capacity as Local Government Board Inspector; and can the Government suggest any course whereby the bulk of the agricultural labourers may be enabled to avail themselves of the provisions of the Act, so as to procure a supply of good seed in the coming Spring?

Mr. J. O'Connor

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Local Government Board have no power to modify by any regulations that may issue the operations of an Act of Parliament. No doubt Colonel Spaight was acting in his official capacity in calling the attention of the Board of Guardians to the Act of Parliament under which they were proceeding. The Local Government Board have no authority to carry out the suggestion that solvent security should be accepted on behalf of labourers desirous of purchasing seed. But in cases where such security is offered, and when the fact is brought to my notice, I should most carefully consider the possibility of providing seed by other means than the Seed Supply Act.

PROSECUTION OF AN EMERGENCY MAN.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when the Crown intends proceeding with the prosecution of the emergency man, Alexander Fitzpatrick, who was charged at the Castlebellingham Petty Sessions in November last with shooting at Lawrence Reilly?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The man referred to is under bail for trial at next Assizes. Winter Assizes are intended for custody cases, and only under very exceptional circumstances would a bail case be tried there. There is nothing exceptional in the bail case now referred to.

MESSRS. DILLON AND O'BRIEN.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Messrs. William O'Brien and John Dillon, having surrendered to the authorities, the Government intends to estreat their recognisances?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir; I believe so.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman on what principle the bails are to be estreated, the object of the bail having been secured by the voluntary surrender of the defendants?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can hardly think that the object of taking bail was secured. The object of the bail was that the defendants were bound to appear on a certain day. They did not appear on that day; they did not appear until some months afterwards; the object of the bail was, therefore, defeated.

MR. SEXTON: Is not the substantial object of the bail secured now that the defendants are undergoing the sentence inflicted by the Court?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Surely, one of the objects was that they should come forward and stand their trial in the ordinary course. If you are going to allow every prisoner to appear exactly when and how he chooses, I think you will throw the whole course of judicial investigation into confusion.

IRISH DISTRESS.

MR. DEASY (Mayo, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that great distress prevails in the districts of Kilmovee and Kilkelly, in the Swinford Union, he will direct that relief works be at once opened?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Careful attention has been given to the condition of the Kilmovee and Kilkelly Electoral Divisions. It is not considered necessary at present to open relief works in either Division. Works are about to be opened, however, in the adjoining Divisions of Brackloon and Kilbeagh for the relief of such destitute persons as are unable to work on the railway. Any persons who may be similarly circumstanced in Kilmovee and Kilkelly will, doubtless, be eligible for employment. The railway works are, of course, giving a large amount of employment to able-bodied labourers in Swinford Union.

MOUNT JEROME CEMETERY.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will take steps to have the statue of Thomas Davis, by Hogan, at present suffering from exposure to the weather at Mount Jerome Cemetery, removed to the new Science and Art Buildings, Dublin; and whether he is aware that it is the earnest wish of the members of the family of the late Mr. Thomas Davies, and of the original subscribers to the statue, that it should be so removed?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I made inquiry last year in answer to a question, and stated that the Science and Art Department were quite prepared to accept the statue. I will make further inquiry to see if there are any difficulties which can be overcome, and I will ask the hon. Gentleman to repeat the question on a later day.

MR. MAHONY: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last paragraph of the question.

MR. JACKSON: I have no direct information; but I have seen a letter, which would indicate that it is the wish of the family that the statue should be removed.

FACTORIES AND WORKSHOPS BILL.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the opinion of Mr. Cameron, for 15 years Inspector of Factories for Belfast, has been asked concerning the necessity of continuing the certifying surgeons under the Factories and Workshops Bill; and, if so, what is the opinion of the late Inspector?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; Mr. Cameron, who is still an Inspector, has not been asked for his opinion, and I am not in possession of his views.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION.

*MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question of which I have given the right hon. Gentleman private notice regarding the Scotch Private Bills Procedure Bill. It is whether, with a view to secure general agreement on the subject, Her Majesty's Government will be willing to re-consider their present proposals, and whether, instead of sending Scotch Bills to a Commission established in Scotland, they will be willing that such Bills should be referred to a Joint Committee of both Houses, with power to conduct an inquiry in Scotland; and further, whether, if that alternative is adopted, the necessity for legislation may not be avoided?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In reply to the right hon. Gentleman I have to say that the Government consider that the principle of the measure is that there should be a local inquiry with respect to those Bills. They have never attached importance to the constitution of the Commission, and I have already stated that they will be perfectly prepared to consider suggestions for a modification of the Commission, and there will be every disposition on the part of the Government to meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman, if it were practicable, that a Commission consisting of two Members of the House of Commons and two Members of the House of Lords should conduct this inquiry. But as to the further suggestion that the change might be effected by means of Standing Orders instead of by Bill, I am not satisfied that it would be practicable, and I have not had time to consider the suggestion which was made to me this morning. I will, however, communicate with the authorities of the other House and of this House as to the expediency of the course which the right hon. Gentleman suggests. But I am rather disposed to think that the better way would be to proceed by Bill.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not wish to suggest that it would be desirable to withdraw the Bill. I only desire to point out that if it is unnecessary to proceed by legislation there will be a saving of time to the Government and the House.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman.

*MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman, in these circumstances, proceed with the nomination of the Select Committee?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it is only reasonable that the nomination of the Committee should be postponed for a few days.

FIGHTING IN CHILI.

MR. E. SPENCER (West Bromwich): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any confirmatory news of the battle which the evening papers state to have been fought in Chili, on the 15th, 17th, and 18th inst., and of the fact also stated that no foreign residents have been killed, and that much loss of life and damage to property was avoided by the presence of the English warships Warspite, Espiegle, and Pheasant, under the command of Admiral Hotham?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The last official news received by Her Majesty's Government respecting Iquique is, I believe, up to the 20th inst., and is generally as regards affairs similar to those given in the paragraph which my hon. Friend showed to me. In the telegram which was from the naval Commander-in-Chief to the Admiralty there was no mention of the British or other foreign residents, from which I think it may be presumed that they have been unmolested. There has been also to-day a telegram from Her Majesty's Minister at Santiago, dated the 24th. The Commander-in-Chief will remain on the coast in the meantime for the protection of British interests.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FACTORIES AND WORKSHOPS BILL.

(No. 206.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(4.30.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill, I do not think it will be necessary to detain the House at any length—firstly, because the subject has been discussed already on the Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James); and, secondly, because the changes made by the Bill are changes of detail, and do not need lengthy Second Reading discussion. I will deal, in the first place, with the question of the sanitary provisions of this Bill. It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of provisions of this kind. There are three leading factors in the workman's life—his work, his wages, and his health. Unhappily, legislation can do but little with regard to the first two. It cannot alter or improve the quantity or the quality of the work, and it cannot otherwise than mischievously interfere with the question of wages. We have done much on the question of health, and we can do more. The question as to the sanitation of factories and workshops rests in a peculiar position. There have been for years provisions applicable, not merely to workshops and workplaces, but to houses and dwellings of every kind, and these are contained in the Public Health Act; and with the gradual improvement in that Act those provisions have been brought up to a higher level and improved from time to time. I think it is fair to say now that every house, whether workshop or not, factory or not, is tolerably secure from what I may call nuisances. There have been special provisions with regard to sanitation introduced in factories and workshops. Those provisions applied mainly to ventilation, to overcrowding, to cleanliness, to lime-washing, or the painting of the walls. The design and object of the Bill is to bring all workshops and all factories up to the same sanitary level, and to require the same conditions as to ventilation, overcrowding, lime-washing, and cleanliness to be applied to all kinds of workshops in which men alone, or women, children, and young persons, are employed, and with regard to which some, but not all, of what I may call the sanitary provisions apply. The Bill does not deal with what is commonly called domestic workshops. That is a point which does not, I know, satisfy some hon. members who take an interest in this subject; but there will be opportunity for discussion later. The President of the Local Government Board will before long lay before the House a Bill in which the public health provisions will be brought to a still higher level of improvement, and it occurs to me that the House may rest content with leaving what is called the domestic workshop—that is to say, the working man's home in which he works with the members of his family—subject to the provisions of the law of public health alone. It is obvious that in the domestic workshop you have not got the presence of the employer and the employé. You have the members of the same family, and, of course, it is possible that some ill-treatment may arise from a father to his child; but, I repeat, as far as the sanitary provisions are concerned, now that we are improving the law of public health, it seems to me that we may allow him and his family to work in a place which is sufficiently good, so far as sanitary conditions are concerned, for him and his family to live in. But that is a point which will be discussed in Committee. It is intended, therefore, to bring the law of public health as to workshops up to the level of the factory legislation. This is done by Clause 4, which enacts that every workshop, as defined by the principal Act (including any workshop conducted on the system of not employing any child, young person, or woman therein), shall be kept free from effluvia or other nuisance, and the Sanitary Authority is empowered, if it considers lime-washing, cleansing, or purifying necessary for the health of the persons employed, to give notice in writing to the owner or occupier to do it. If there is any failure on the part of the owner or occupier, he shall be liable to a fine not exceeding 10s. for every day of default, and the Sanitary Authority may cause the workshop to be lime-washed, cleansed, or purified, and may recover the expenses incurred. The only other subject with regard to the sanitary provisions of the Act is the authority who has to enforce them. At the present time the factories and certain workshops are under the sanitary inspection, to some extent, of the Factory Inspector. On the other hand, the Factory Inspector is obliged to call in the Local Authority in order to remedy anything that savours of a nuisance.

By this Bill I propose to leave the factories as they are, entirely under the existing Inspectors. The system works well, and it has been found that the inspection of Factory Inspectors, although they are not skilled officers of health, has been on the whole satisfactory, and agreeable to public opinion. Now that we are extending the sanitary provisions of the Factory Act to all workshops throughout the country, of whatever kind they may be, except the domestic workshop, so that every cobbler's shop, every blacksmith's shop, every tailor's shop in towns in the country will come under the provisions of the Sanitary Law, it seems to me to be foolish not to take advantage of the existing machinery provided by the Local Authorities; and the enforcement of the sanitary provisions, so far as workshops are concerned, is by this Bill given to the Local Authorities. The Local Authorities are already abundantly equipped. They have an officer of health, an Inspector of Nuisances, under the surveillance of the Local Government Board, which has large powers of control. The Bill of the President of the Local Government Board would still further strengthen those powers of control; and in the event of its turning out, in spite of those precautions, that the Local Authorities fell short of what they ought to do, I have by the 1st and 2nd clauses of this Bill taken what I may call dictatorial power—that is, power to send to any workshops, or class of workshops, in a particular part of the country where the conditions of the law of public health and the provisions of the Sanitary Act have not been enforced, a Factory Inspector, or any number of Inspectors, in order that they may visit those workshops and, as it were, sweep the Augean stable clean, and do so swiftly, without power of appeal, and without interfering with the ordinary jurisdiction of the Local Authorities. Those powers are intended to be used in such districts as came before the notice of the Sweating Committee. There are some minor matters in which we have adopted the recommendations of the Sweating Committee of the House of Lords. The Bill requires that notice of the opening of workshops—of men's workshops as well as of others—shall be given; and that a list of out-workers in any factory shall be kept, so that it may be seen where the work of that factory is prepared, and care may be taken that the sanitary conditions are enforced in the places where the out-workers perform their duties. But these provisions do not exhaust the whole matter. Gases, vapour, and impurities in workshops are already provided for; but the condition of temperature in workshops, which may be dangerous to health, is not provided for. It was suggested that it might be left to the Factory Inspectors to determine arbitrarily and finally what course should be adopted to remedy defective ventilation. I think that that is too arbitrary and despotic a power to give to the Factory Inspectors, who, though well-qualified men, are not men of science, and have not sufficient authority to determine such difficult questions as this. The machinery adopted by this Bill is contained in Clause 8, under which the Inspector has power, with regard to questions of ventilation, to suggest what he deems to be the proper requirements. But an appeal is given to a tribunal of arbitrators who are selected as specially competent to deal with the subject. This plan is not entirely new; but I have in Clause 8 considerably enlarged the scope of this scheme of arbitration with regard to sanitary requirements in a workshop. With regard to certain specific subjects, such as the proper fastening of grindstones and the fencing of vats in which hot liquids are contained, this system is adopted in the existing Factory Act; I think that an extension of this system is the most convenient course. The system is introduced on a large scale in the existing Coal Mine Regulations Act, where the most difficult questions of ventilation arise, and my experience at the Home Office teaches me that, on the whole, it works well. I have accordingly extended the provisions of Clause 8 not only to questions of ventilation, but also to any machinery or process used in a factory, and to the means of escape in case of fire. This is opening out a very large and considerable responsibility for the Executive in regard to the control of manufacturing and trade operations. I am not prepared to say myself that I am altogether in sympathy with legislation of that sort, though it has become of late more and more agreeable to this House. Such interference might possibly turn out mischievous, unless great discretion were used; but, on the other hand, in experience it has not been found to work unsatisfactorily in the very complicated industry of mining; and it may also be said that it is a far more convenient mode than that of constantly coming to Parliament for regulations in regard to a particular trade. Last year, or the year before, a very useful Act was passed with regard to steam-weaving in Lancashire, and to that Act a Schedule was appended laying down the temperature to be maintained in workshops. It may turn out that the provisions of that Schedule are unsatisfactory, and, if so, they can be set right by Clause 8 of this Bill, without any necessity for asking Parliament to pass a repealing Statute. I embark, however, upon this kind of legislation with some degree of hesitation and doubt; but I have introduced these provisions in the hope that they may be useful, and I hope that I have been frank with the House in stating the difficulties which I apprehend. I now pass to the very different subject of hours of employment. I make one change only to which I need draw the attention of the House. The House is aware that, at the present moment, in a workshop in which women only are employed, or in which women and men only are employed, the hours of labour for the women are 15, with 4½ hours taken out for meals, but with no other limitation. The effect of this provision is that it is impossible for the Inspector to tell whether or not the hours of employment for women are being enforced; and the change I introduce, though it seems simple, is practically a most effective one. It requires a specified period of 12 hours to be fixed by the employer, within which a specified hour and a half are to be allowed for meals; so that the hours of employment for women can at once be checked. But I have thought it better to allow the 12 hours to be taken in the same extended period as at present, because there are a great many women working in workshops of this sort, whose manner of life compels them to attend to their homes and families in the morning and to go to the workshop later in the day.

Mr. Matthews

I have thought it convenient, therefore, that they should be able to take their 12 hours at any time between 6 o'clock in the morning and 10 o'clock in the evening. Then as to the age at which employment may take place. I have observed allusions in connection with this Bill to the recommendations of the Berlin Conference. No doubt the recommendation of the bulk of the delegates at Berlin was in favour of raising the age at which employment should begin to 12 years, instead of leaving it at 10 as now. But anyone who looks at the deliberations of that Conference will see that what the delegates had in their minds was full employment in a factory such as exists in foreign countries. The only foreign country where our half-time system is known is, I believe, Denmark; and I find that the representative of Denmark, while this matter was under discussion at the Conference, pointed out the excellence of that system, and said that the age of full employment in Denmark did not arrive until 13 or 14 years. The law at present in this country is that a child can work only as a half-timer until he is 14, as a rule; but he can work full time at 13 if he obtains a certificate of proficiency under Section 26 of the existing Factory Acts. The hours of work a week in textile factories are for children 28 and for women 56; and in non-textile factories, for children 30 and for women 60. In the intervening years between leaving school and working as a full-timer the half-time is spent in the school. I am told—and it is the unanimous opinion of the Inspectors—that the health of the children on the half-time system is as good as, if not better than, that of those who spend their whole time in school; and it is also found that the education of the children is better. They are sharper and more intelligent, and they make equal progress in school with the full-timers. This system is, in fact, a combination of the technical education, which so many people desire nowadays, with the scholastic or literary education, and the mixture of the two sharpens the child's wits. In the judgment of the Education Department the half-time system is for the benefit of the children themselves. My hon. Friend (Sir W. Hart Dyke) approves of it, and the parents are vehemently in favour of it. A large number of parents whose children are at this moment employed in the factories of the North are of opinion that it would be in every way a loss if this system were done away with. I would ask the House to observe that while there is nothing further from my desire than to fall short of even an implied undertaking which we may be supposed to have given at Berlin, our proposition is better than that put forward at Berlin, which was that full employment should begin at the age of 12, and the work to which children were to be admitted at the établissements industriels would be of greater length than our full length of work in this country. For instance, in Belgium the number of hours of employment is 72 in the week; in Denmark, where the half-time system does prevail, the full period is 63 hours; in the Netherlands it is 66, and in Italy and Hungary 48. Therefore, if the recommendations of the Berlin delegates were followed to the letter, the consequence would be that a child of 12 might be employed in England to that number of hours without departing from the letter or the spirit of the recommendations of the delegates, whereas under our system he is at work a fewer number of hours up to the age of 13 or even 14. I may add that our delegates expressly reserved the half-time system. Mr. Scott said, when the proposal to fix 12 as the age for admission to industrial establishments was under discussion, that—

“In the actual state of English legislation, which allows, under certain restrictions, the work of children between 10 and 12 years of age, he gives his approval to the proposal ad referendum”— that is, subject to a reference to the Home Government. Sir, I have come very nearly to the end of that with which I need trouble the House. There is a small matter connected with holidays to which I may call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James). He proposes that notice of the occasional or extra half-holiday should be given on the 1st of January. I suggest that that is not necessary to the convenience of the workpeople, and would be inconvenient to carry out in practice; all that is required is that the notice shall be given sufficiently long beforehand, so as to allow the workmen to enjoy that holiday completely. I have, therefore, suggested that a fortnight's notice should be given, or, if necessary, it might be made three weeks. There is one other subject about which I should like to say a word, and that is the question of the initial certificate of fitness for employment. I notice that pressure is being brought to bear upon the House by the ordinary means, and what may be described as an agitation is being initiated on the subject; but I have not come to the decision at which I have arrived without considerable reflection and inquiry. I have received deputations on the subject, and have listened to the representations made to me both from employers and operatives. Nothing is clearer to my mind than that the provisions requiring a certificate of fitness on the entry of a child into a manufactory—not at any subsequent period nor during the continuance of the work, but on entering into it for the first time—have become a purely unmeaning form. Since the establishment of the Education Act a species of inquisition has been held into the age of every child and the ages are set forth, so that the certificate of the surgeon is unnecessary. I propose, however, that the certificates of birth of children shall be obtained for a nominal sum—a sum lower than the fee now charged. Both employers and operatives have told me that such a thing as a child being rejected as unfit for employment has not been known for years, the certificate being an initial step, only guarding against initial incapacity and not supervening incapacity. During the course of his employment the child may get ill, and yet no certificate is required, while the present practice gives considerable annoyance to the parents, and is an expense to the employers which, if it is unnecessary, they ought to be spared, the fees amounting to from £20 to £30 or £40 a year in connection with these certificates. This certificate I hold to be unnecessary, and I will tell the House why I have come to this conclusion. I do not say that you may trust to parental affection, though that is one safeguard not to be left out of sight. The next safeguard is the interest of the employer himself, who is not likely to pay wages to a child who is unable to do his work. The third safeguard is that no one of these children can be employed unless he is daily going to school, and in this way we have a constant check, as the child would not be able to attend work unless he was well enough to go through his school attendance. Lastly, I propose to keep the check contained in Section 29 of the existing Act, which gives a valuable safeguard in that it empowers the Inspector at any moment to call in a surgeon to say whether a child whose fitness for work is doubtful is or not fit for work. I do not complain of the action of the certifying surgeons in this matter. On the contrary, I fully sympathise with their complaints against this proposal; and if they have any claim to compensation I would recognise it cheerfully, but I trust that we shall continue their services in the matter of accidents, and in other matters as to which they can be of use, and I hope to be able by an adjustment of the fees in these respects to make the proposed changes, which they seem to view in a serious light, of less consequence to them than they think they will be. There are some minor Amendments in the Bill to which I need hardly refer.

Mr. Matthews

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): The right hon. Gentleman has not dealt with the question of fire escape.

*MR. MATTHEWS: The Act comes into operation on the 1st of January, 1892. With regard to existing factory buildings, I propose to deal with them under Clause 8, and the question of what the means of escape from fire should be will have to be decided by arrangement or arbitration. In future buildings a second staircase, independent of the ordinary entrance, is required. The point as to whether the clauses dealing with these matters should be imperative must be decided in Committee. I do not know that there is anything more with which I need trouble the House. This is essentially a Bill of details, but I believe I have now mentioned all the changes of any importance, and I ask the House, if it is pleased to read the Bill a second time, to refer it to the Committee on Trade. I have no doubt that the Committee of Selection will take care that it shall be considered by persons who are cognisant of all the great industries affected by it, and also by persons who are in touch with the operative class and understand their wishes and desires. I again repeat the suggestion I made to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bury, when his Bill was under consideration. I have not put into this Bill the clauses which he suggests and which we discussed the other day, because it was too late for me to do so, and I would much rather that he himself undertook the task of proposing in the way he may consider best the clauses with regard to particulars of work for the purpose of ascertaining wages and a clause with regard to a half-hour for cleaning. It seems to me that the safest course is to leave these matters to be decided by the Standing Committee. I would also appeal to the hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Sydney Buxton) to excuse me if I have not referred to his Bill in detail. I am conscious that he goes further than I do, but I would venture again to suggest that, though it is easy to devise clauses which are plausible and take the mind when you read them, and though the House is bound to extend its protection to the widest degree that real necessity demands when the health and welfare of children is in question, nothing can be more mischievous than to harass and hamper trade with minute regulations that are not imperatively necessary, and I have endeavoured to avoid that in this Bill. I beg now to move the Second Reading, and to express the hope that the measure may afterwards be referred to the Standing Committee on Trade.

Motion made, and Question proposed. "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Matthews.)

*(5.15.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I think I may say with regard to the Bill introduced the other day by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury, it was of a very limited scope, and dealt only with the aristocracy of labour, and entirely left out in the cold a large section of unskilled labour, which is less protected and less capable of protecting itself than any other labour. Now the Home Secretary presents a Bill which, although good as far as it goes, is guilty of many serious omissions, and I think, therefore, I am justified in rising to say a few words by way of criticism, though it is not my desire to unnecessarily prolong the Debate. The House will agree that the time is ripe for taking the whole question of the protection of the workers in hand, and a good job ought to be made of it, so that Parliament may not be called upon to tinker at this great question again in a few years. I am not going to delay the House by arguing the question as to whether a considerable reform such as that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman and proposed by other Members is necessary in the Factory and Workshops Act. I think the Report we had on Sweating, and the practical experience and knowledge of every Member of the House, will suffice to enable us to decide that the time has arrived when this question ought to be dealt with. We have seen in the past the great advantages that have sprung from the Factory Acts. It has raised the condition and improved the position of a vast number of workers in the Kingdom, and what we desire chiefly in regard to any Amendment of that Act is this: not only further to improve the position of those persons, but by further legislation to bring under registration, inspection, and regulation a vast amount of labour which at present is outside the law and practically unregulated and uninspected. I think that one very good reason exists for a great extension of the Factory Acts to workshops and home work. It was proved before the Royal Commission that the result of carrying factory and workshop regulation down to a certain point, and no further, has been, that, to a large extent, work has been driven out of the regulated establishments and into places unregulated and uninspected. Therefore, the fair employer, the regulated and inspected employer, is placed at a disadvantage as compared with the unfair employer, who escapes observation, and is, therefore, able in many cases unduly to compete. This should not be so. The other day the House by Resolution declared that in its opinion, in reference to the question of Government contracts, the fair employer ought to be placed on an equal footing with the unfair employer, and what I ask in reference to this question of the regulation of workshops is, that those employers who desire to act well by them in their employ should be placed on a fair footing with those who, at present, being unregulated, are able to a large extent to carry on their work under conditions of economical insanitation. We desire to enlarge the net and to make the meshes smaller, so that all these employers may be brought under the eye of the law. I have heard this Bill described as a milk-and-water Bill, and certainly in some parts I do think the milk is rather thin; nevertheless, I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman in having introduced the Bill as far as it goes. I hope that when it is discussed in the Grand Committee he may be able to insert some provisions which are necessary to render it more complete, and that the Home Secretary may receive in a friendly spirit the proposals made on this side of the House. With regard to the sanitary provisions of the Bill, I think the measure will be most satisfactory in working. In the first place, it brings under the provisions of the Sanitary Act those places where men alone work; and, moreover, it brings within the purview of the law those workshops where women, or women and men work, and where children and young persons are not employed. With reference to matters of cleanliness, ventilation, over-crowding, and so on, it is, to my mind, a scandal that for all these years such places should have been exempt from the provisions of the Factory Acts. I congratulate the Home Secretary on his proposal to strengthen the provisions of the law with regard to Local Authorities, by giving summary powers to the Home Office Inspectors to take action where the Local Authorities neglect their duties. I wish I could think with the Home Secretary that it is only in a few cases that duties in regard to sanitary matters have been neglected. I am afraid the Local Authorities neglect their duties in very many cases; and I think they will be more likely to perform their duties when they know that, if they neglect them, the Home Office will have powers to enforce the regulations of the Act. I am pleased to see the improvements the right hon. Gentleman has introduced with regard to the employment of women, and which he has explained, but I regret that he should have thought it necessary to extend the limit of time up to 10 o'clock at night. I should have thought it would have been wise to have simplified the provisions of the law by making the hours in these workshops where women work the same as those now obtaining in non-textile factories; that is to say, the 12 hours to be either from 6 in the morning until 6 at night, or from 7 in the morning until 7 at night. There is another good point in the Bill to which the Home Secretary did not refer, namely, that for a period of four weeks after child-birth a woman should not be allowed to be employed in a factory. I am glad the Bill provides for the registration of workshops, although I do not think the provision in that respect is adequate, and I doubt whether the clause on the subject, unless amended, will have a very great effect. Finally, the Government propose a system of registration of outworkers. A proposal most excellent in itself, but falling far short in execution. And this is the first of those sins of omission that mark the Bill. The evidence given before the Lords' Committee on Sweating shows that domestic workshops and home work are at the bottom of the evils of the sweating system. The reason being that there is no responsible employer and no responsible owner of the premises; the work being done through a middleman, who has the unfortunate workmen entirely under his control without being responsible for the work they do. Now we do not desire to prohibit this home work; prohibition is not possible. But every one would desire, if possible, to restrict, to regulate, and to discourage it, for we believe it to be at the bottom of the sweating system. What we want chiefly is publicity, common knowledge as to where the work takes place, and who gives it out, and responsibility placed on the original employer. We want to trace out where the work goes to, and to make the employer a sort of sign-post in the matter, though he may be an unwilling sign-post. The only way to do this is by an effective system of registration of the names and addresses of all persons to whom work is given out. The Government admit in principle that that is the right way of dealing with the matter, but I do not think the details of their proposal are sufficiently thorough or sufficiently stringent. As I understand the Bill a register is to be kept by the employer who gives out the work to be done in domestic workshops or at home, but this register is to be open only to the Inspectors or the Sanitary Authorities. Now it does seem to me that in order to have a check on the accuracy of this Return, that the workers themselves, at all events, ought to have access to this register; for if they do not, I do not see how anyone is to say whether the register is correct or not. I think also that the accredited representatives of the workpeople—the Trades Union officials and others—ought to have access to the register. The Home Secretary will agree that it will be impossible for Inspectors, overworked and undermanned as they are and will be, even though their number is increased, to look out the addresses and inspect all the places where this work is carried on. If you are to attain success by this system of keeping a register, then undoubtedly you can best attain it by the aid of those vigilant watch dogs who represent the interests of the workers through the Trades Unions. The workmen themselves would make the best Inspectors to ascertain whether the premises are in a sanitary condition, whether there is any contagious disease in the district where the work is carried on, and whether there is compliance with the law. It seems to me no inconvenience would be caused, there would be no undue satisfying of curiosity simply, but information obtained that cannot be obtained in any other way. By throwing open the register to the workers and to their accredited representatives you would obtain the publicity you desire, and would be enabled to force employers if they would not do so on their own initiative, to have some regard to the conditions under which home work is carried on. But I understand the Home Secretary to say that he does not see his way, through the means of this register, to insist, so far as the Home Office is concerned, on these places being kept in a sanitary condition. I confess I should like to see the Bill go further, and declare that responsibility attaches to the employer who habitually gives out work, for the sanitary condition of the premises where the work is carried on, and provide a penalty against sending work to a place known to the employer to be in an insanitary condition. More important still. The employer should be prohibited, under penalty, from sending work to a place where a contagious disease—such as scarlet fever, for instance—is known to be raging. Nothing is more clear from the evidence given before the Lords' Committee than that the community, putting aside the risk to the individual workers, run the greatest risk from the spread of a contagious disease by means of home work being done in a place where disease is raging, the work going back to the factory, and thence to the consumer—the germs of disease with it. Without attaching responsibility to the employer, and with it a penalty, I do not see how this register will become of practical value; and I fear it will become a dead letter, and this important provision become inoperative. There is a further serious omission from the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman entirely excludes domestic workshops from the provision of his Bill; but I am glad to hear he thinks that is a matter which may be discussed in Grand Committee, and that he is open to the friendly reception of arguments for bringing these workshops within the scope of the Bill. We believe that these domestic workshops where members of a family, or nominally members of a family, work together, should be brought under some sort of inspection and regulation; but, so far as I can judge, the Bill does not deal with these matters at all, but leaves them entirely to the Sanitary Authorities. I would have these matters included in the duties of the Home Office Inspectors. We are, I suppose, all in favour of decentralisation in regard to these matters, but unfortunately in London—and I am afraid I am speaking almost entirely from a London point of view—in London our Sanitary Authorities are unreformed, and in many cases uninterested, and unintelligent; while the areas are so small that they are often unable to afford to engage sufficient or efficient sanitary officers. We know, from experience how local sanitary matters are neglected. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that the President of the Local Government Board is going to introduce reforms into this part of our local government; but we have waited long for District Councils in London, and I do not think that we should delay dealing with the evils of the sweating system until we get these District Boards. The suggestion on this point that I venture to throw out is one I put in the Bill which I have introduced, a Bill to which, of course, I must not now refer. Taking into account the vast number of small workshops in the East of London, would it not be possible to appoint a Special Commission to deal with this special part of the subject, which should undertake the office of searching into these matters and obtaining the registration of these domestic workshops and other places; and, having thus placed this matter on a proper basis, hand it over to the Home Office to be subsequently transferred to the Local Authority when reformed? Another point. I am very much surprised that the Home Secretary has not, in his Bill, dealt with the question of overcrowding. We could have wished that the Bill had contained some such provision as that to be found in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James), for securing a minimum amount of cubical space for each individual worker in a factory or workshop. I know he said in the Debate upon the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman last week, that it is impossible to fix a hard and fast line to fit all circumstances, and nobody asks him to attempt to do that. But we have a minimum of cubical space fixed in relation to our elementary schools, for instance, and there is every reason why there should be a minimum in the case of factories and workshops. I believe there is already a non-official limit, recognised by the Home Office, of 250 cubic feet for each person with deductions for gas burners; why not have that inserted in an Act? I have, in reference to this Bill, endeavoured to show that, while the Bill does go a considerable way, there are considerable sins of omission. I have referred to the question of registration and inspection of home work and domestic workshops, overcrowding, and would add that there should be provision for greater publicity for those notices which are to be put in workshops. But there are two still more serious omissions, as to which I will only say a few words. I regret to find that the Home Secretary has not dealt in any way with the question of overtime. I refer not so much to the overtime in large factories, but to the overtime work in small factories and workshops. I think we all agree that it was not intended that this overtime was given in order to be so much work which the employer could take out of his workpeople; but it was given in order to render somewhat elastic the limit of the fixed hours of work. But it appears from the evidence before the Lords' Committee, that in too many cases this overtime looked upon simply as so much additional time to be got out of the workers; and that is worked off day by day until the time allowed is expended, and is not used in the ordinary sense of overtime. I could have wished that the Home Secretary had seen his way to introduce some restriction, some regulation, so that the overtime should be used for a legitimate purpose, and not be simply so many hours added to the number of hours that may be worked in the year. But the final omission from the Bill is very astonishing, and the right hon. Gentleman himself alluded to it in an apologetic tone. He has not proposed anything to improve the conditions of the employment of children in factories and workshops. We certainly understood, not only from what happened at the Berlin Conference, but from the unanimous Report of the Royal Commission on Education, from the majority and the minority Reports, that the minimum age below which children may not be employed would be raised from 10 to 12, or at least from 10 to 11 years. The Home Secretary went into considerable detail upon this matter in his speech and endeavoured to prove two things: first, that the Berlin Conference did not know what they were talking about; and, secondly, that the system of sending children to work half time at 10 years of age was the very best possible thing for the children themselves. As to the last point, I rather wonder that, if he has satisfied himself of the enormous advantage of half time to the children, he did not propose to lower the limit of age to 8 or 9; for surely, if there is such a great advantage in 10 over 12, the advantage would be greater of 9 over 12.

Mr. Sydney Buxton

Mr. Sydney Buxton

With regard to the proceedings at the Berlin Conference, I confess I could not follow the argument of the right hon. Gentleman. We certainly understood that at the Conference, the Representatives of this country supported the proposition that 12 years should be the minimum limit for employment. The Resolution arrived at by the Conference in relation to the regulation of child labour is clear in its terms that every child of either sex should be excluded from employment in factory or workshop until the age of 12, except in certain Southern countries, where the limit was placed at 10 years; and I find among the signatures the names of John E. Gorst, Charles Scott, and W. H. Houldsworth. We naturally expected to see this Resolution given effect to when factory legislation was proposed, and are greatly disappointed to find no reference to the matter in the Government Bill. The Government are pledged by this Resolution of the Berlin Conference, but they have ignored this as they have ignored the unanimous recommendation of the Royal Commission on Education. I must apologise for having carried my remarks to such length, but many details are necessarily included in the Bill. The Home Secretary says he is prepared to accept practical proposals, but he does not wish to harass the trade of the country, and in that view we all agree. In any proposal we may have to make for improving the position of the working classes, especially those in certain parts of London, we shall be influenced by no intention to harass trade, but with the intention rather of fostering trade and improving production by elevating the condition of the people; by getting industry out of the rut of home work and domestic workshops, and transferring it to large workshops and factories where it can be carried on, as we believe, under conditions more healthy, as well as more economical, better for trade generally, and certainly better for the workers.

(5.50.) MR. FIELDEN (Lancashire, S.E., Middleton): Since this Bill was introduced I have had the advantage of a visit to Lancashire, where I have heard the views of those engaged in the Lancashire cotton trade in reference to the measure before us. I may congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon the manner in which it is received. It is declared to be a good Bill, though there are one or two objections entertained, and it may not be out of place if I just refer to these. Clause 1 deals with the same subject-matter as Clause 5 in the Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James), and I am advised that the latter clause is preferred as being more "understood of the people" than Clause 1 in the Government Bill. This, I presume, is a matter of phraseology, pertinent to discussion in Committee. In reference to Clause 17—cessation from work—I am advised rightly or wrongly, I am myself unable to say—that one day is more than sufficient. Upon Clause 18—that a woman shall not be allowed to work at a factory within a month of giving birth to a child—I am strongly urged to support an Amendment making the period six weeks. There are other suggestions which have been made to me on points of detail, suggestions which no doubt are valuable as coming from practical men in the Lancashire cotton industry, and which may more properly be brought forward in Committee; but I may say that the feeling among both operatives and owners in my constituency is in favour of the Government measure.

(5.55.) EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): In the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar (Mr. Buxton) most of the omissions from the Bill have been mentioned, and I agree with my hon. Friend in almost all that he said, except that I cannot join in congratulations to the Government upon their Bill. We had, in the evidence given before the Sweating Committee, a disclosure of some of the greatest evils that could exist in many branches of industry, and we had strong recommendations from that Committee. We waited many months—I do not say there was undue delay on the part of the Government, naturally they had to take some time for consideration—to find remedies proposed for the evils disclosed, and now we have in this Bill what I suppose, in the view of the Government, are the remedies to be provided by legislation. I am aware that the intention is that the Bill is to be submitted to a Standing Committee, and then the subject is to be threshed out; but again I assert that the Bill, as we have it before us, contains the view of Her Majesty's Government with regard to alterations in the Factory Act, to meet the evils brought before the Committee on "sweating." We have had from the Home Secretary a willingness expressed to look into any matter brought before the Standing Committee, and we shall have in the Bill, introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury a means at hand to strengthen the Bill of the Government; and we shall have, I hope, on that Committee men who will be prepared to proceed on the lines laid down by the hon. Member for Poplar, and still further strengthen this milk-and-water measure, upon which I cannot offer the Government any congratulations. The chief omission brought forward by my hon. Friend had reference to home work and domestic workshops, and as he spoke of the evils to be remedied I understand that some of our friends seemed to think that it would be unwise to attempt legislation affecting domestic workshops. But have they read the evidence given before the Committee? I will just mention three instances which scarcely need comment. In one room, 9ft. by 15ft., a man, his wife, and six children slept, and in the same room ten men worked; in another room ten men worked and a family of eight slept; in a third six people, men and women, slept and worked. Such cases as these will be left untouched by the right hon. Gentleman's Bill. We shall have, no doubt, a better system of inspection under the Bill. We shall have, I suppose, a large number of Inspectors appointed to look into the state of factories and workshops. I understand from the Home Secretary that we are to have a system of registration so that Inspectors may trace the work to the places where it is sent. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that Inspectors will be able to follow up the work given out by employers; but when they do thus follow it up, when they arrive at these unhealthy places where men, women, and children live, and sleep, and work, what will the Inspectors be able to do? So far as I can see they will not be able to do more than they have done in the past. At all events, I understand the Home Secretary has excluded altogether from his Bill domestic workshops and home work, therefore I cannot see that Inspectors can do much in the matter. There will never be an adequate system of inspection until sub-Inspectors are appointed with trade training and knowledge. I believe that under Section 67 of the Act of 1878 the Secretary of State has power to appoint "clerks and servants" for the assistance of Inspectors. I do not know what "clerks and servants" means; I believe it refers to officials under the Inspector. I believe the Home Secretary has power to appoint, as well as Inspectors, men who have a practical knowledge of the trade to be inspected, and I had hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would tell us that he intended to take some such course. The Sweating Committee doubted whether it was practicable to have a division of responsibility, but as long as you have Inspectors with a knowledge of the trade, the sub-Inspectors should be distinctly under the Inspectors. Personally, I think the best system would be that the Trades Unions should select two or three for the office, and that the Secretary of State should then make the selection. I had hoped, also, to hear something about women Inspectors, who are most necessary. I do not believe we shall have justice done to women workers who have been overworked to a horrible degree, particularly in London and other big towns, until we have women inspectors who are able to ferret out the true conditions under which they work. As to the horrible evils which exist in our large towns, I think the Home Secretary would do well to consider the suggestion of the hon. Member for Poplar. London and Glasgow and perhaps one or two other centres should be taken separately, and dealt with in a more drastic way; and I believe that a large body of the working classes of this country would acknowledge that to be a just way. We know that in a great many of our large towns the employers have done all they possibly can to ensure that their employés shall work under sanitary conditions. Then I had hoped that we were going to have from the Secretary of State a hint as regards "the dictatorial authority," I think he calls it. One of the recommendations of the Sweating Committee was that the various Departments of the Government which had in one way or another to deal with labour questions should be brought into closer relation with each other. I was hoping that the right hon. Gentleman, in introducing this Bill, would say that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to have a Minister to look after the labour question. I read the other day that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Gorst) recommended at a political meeting that working men should insist upon the Government having a separate Minister to look after labour questions. I thought that perhaps a hint would be thrown out as to the intention of the Government in this direction. Perhaps another occasion will be embraced, though I should have thought that this was a proper one. With the hon. Member for Poplar, I regret that the question of the age of children has been omitted, that the question of overtime has been omitted, and that other essentials have been omitted from the Bill. I confess that if there were no prospect of amending it in Committee, or of its being strengthened in the Standing Committee by the Bill of the right hon. Member for Bury, I should have been impelled to move its rejection. I hope the Home Secretary will give way on a good many points in Committee, and I hope also that by the time the Bill comes back to the House of Commons it will, instead of being a miserable and inadequate measure to meet the evils under which people have suffered for so long a time, be strong as well as fair for both employer and employed.

Mr. Fielden

*(6.20.) Mr. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): Sir, as I drafted a Bill and introduced it to this House last year, containing several clauses which the Home Secretary has embodied without acknowledgment, and probably without consciousness, I hope I may be allowed to congratulate him upon the construction of this Bill, which will prevent some of the worst evils of the sweating system. It is, I think, a splendid Bill, reflecting great credit upon the Department from which it emanates, and it cannot fail to add to the reputation which the Home Secretary earned some years ago in connection with the Mines Regulation Act. Considering the complicated character of the principal Act, I think the drafters of this Bill deserve to be congratulated on the simplicity of its arrangement. It is divided into two branches—the sanitary provisions, and the periods of employment. The sanitary provisions are excellent. The infamous Clause 61 in the principal Act disappears, and is repealed by this Bill, which provides that all workshops, whether they employ young persons and children or not, must be kept clean, sweet, and wholesome. As by another clause, notice of occupation of a workshop must be given to the Inspector. I am not without hope that all workshops will be brought under some kind of control. But I was sorry to hear that the domestic workshops are to be excluded from the purview of the Inspector. Some of the worst cases of sweating have been found among the domestic workshops. I cannot for the life of me see why, if a man chooses to employ in a workshop his sisters and his cousins and his aunts, he is to be allowed to poison them with bad air and foul drains.

MR. MATTHEWS: The Public Health Act can be applied to these shops.

MR. BAUMANN: I shall be glad to learn that the Public Health Act will be sufficient, or that domestic workshops can be included in the operation of Clause 4. Then we come to the periods of employment and the hours of labour. I rejoice that under this Bill women are to be protected as women, and if it becomes law women employed in all workshops, except domestic workshops, will receive the protection of the 12 hours day, and I hope that will have the coincident effect of reducing the labour of men to 12 hours a day also. With regard to the employment of children, I am sorry that the Home Secretary has not given the coup de grâce to the alternate day system, which still lingers in some parts of the country. The alternate day system is not a good system even with the amount of rest that is allowed. For children to be at the disposal of their employers for 12 hours is too severe a strain on their young and tender frames, and moreover it must operate in such a way as to seriously intercept the course of their education. I, for one, should like to see all children made half-timers. But there is one other important branch of the subject with which I wish to deal. I allude to the question of overtime, which has already been touched upon by two hon. Gentlemen opposite. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has not dealt with that subject in a manner which we should all have been glad to have seen. It is true that he has introduced a very important clause by which the employer is bound to post a notice that he intends to work overtime before 8 o'clock on the evening on which the overtime is to be worked. That I regard as a most important clause, because according to the evidence before the Lords Sweating Committee what used to happen was this: the Inspector would catch the workpeople working overtime, and would say to the employer, "Have you posted your notice that overtime is to be worked?" The answer was always, "No; I have not posted it yet: I was just going to do so when you came in;" the fact being that if the Inspector had not looked in no notice of overtime would have been posted at all. But there is a much larger question of overtime dealt with in the principal Act than this. As the House is probably aware, the employers in certain trades are allowed to work their hands overtime for a period of 14 hours for so many days in the year. These trades were such as dealt with articles liable to be spoilt by the weather, and those which are subject to a sudden press of orders arising from what is called the season pressure. Those which were liable to season pressure were allowed to work overtime 48 days in the year, while those which dealt with perishable articles were allowed to work overtime 96 days a year. But in addition to the trades specified in the Schedule of the Act of 1878 as entitled to this indulgence in regard to overtime, it is provided that the Home Secretary may, at his discretion, grant an order of overtime to any trade or firm in either category. Now, Sir, I know, as a matter of fact, that the law as regards overtime is greatly abused and systematically violated in London. There is an enormous amount of overtime worked in London—not only in the sweating dens of the East End, but also in the fashionable shops at the West End—not only in Whitechapel, but in Bond Street. An important safeguard which was introduced into that Act provides that before issuing his order the Home Secretary shall satisfy himself that overtime is necessary, and also that it will not be injurious to the employés. Now, I want to know by what process of proof the right hon. Gentleman satisfies himself that overtime is necessary, and that it will not injure the employés, before he grants an overtime order? A well-known upholsterer in London told me that he always worked 96 days overtime in the year. I presume on the score that the chairs and other articles of furniture in his establishment are perishable articles. But I want to know by what process the Home Secretary satisfies himself that that upholsterer's chairs and tables are perishable articles, or that overtime would not be injurious to the employés in that establishment? I do not suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should endeavour to abolish overtime altogether, although I am not one of those who believe in its necessity. Indeed, I believe that if people would only be a little more humane and considerate in giving their orders to the shopkeepers, and, if instead of rushing into a shop and saying "I want a frock," or "I want a coat within three days" they would only order in the Autumn and Spring what they want for the Winter and Summer, what is called the season pressure might be avoided, and the work might be spread over a much larger portion of the year. What I want to impress on the Home Secretary, and what I intend, if necessary, to propose as an Amendment to the Bill, is that an annual Return should be laid on the Table of the House embodying the number and nature of the cases of overtime orders granted or current during the year, so that the House may see how many of them there are, and for what reason these overtime indulgences have been granted, and in order that my friend the upholsterer may not in future claim a privilege which I am sure the law never intended him to have. I should have been glad if the right hon. Gentleman had extended the operation of the Bill to domestic workshops; but I am sure that if he will accept my suggestion with regard to an annual Return of the overtime orders, the Bill will thereby be greatly improved and rendered much more effective. In that case

Mr. Baumann

I believe it would be one of the greatest and most beneficial of the long list of measures dealing with the health and labour of the working classes which the Conservative Party has, during the last 40 years, engrafted on the legislation of the county.

(6.20.) SIR H. JAMES: While this Bill is before the House it may be convenient if I state what is the course which I and those who are interested in the promotion of the Bill on this subject, which was discussed last week, propose to ask the House to adopt. When our Bill was before the House last Wednesday there had been no sufficient opportunity for hon. Members to read, or, at any rate, to consider fully, the Bill of Her Majesty's Government. But while that Bill was before the House those who had taken part in its promotion, and the operatives who had displayed the greatest interest in its preparation, suggested that the course to be taken should be left in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), the hon. Baronet the Member for Manchester (Sir W. Houldsworth), and myself. It was thought right that we should lose no opportunity of having the Bill of the Government considered by the representatives of the operatives, and they have accordingly taken it into their consideration. I think I may say that there is an agreement on the part of my hon. Friends and myself and the representatives of the operatives that it would be much better if these attempts to legislate on this subject should result in the passing of one Act instead of two. It is thought that in the interests of those workpeople who are to be protected by the proposed legislation, as well as in the interests of the manufacturers who will also be brought under its provisions, it would be very undesirable to have two Acts of Parliament in the same Session dealing, to some extent at least, with the same subject-matter; and, therefore, what I propose to do is this. While I shall maintain for the present the position of the Bill which the House thought right to read a second time last Wednesday, and shall move, in pursuance of the notice I have given, to refer it to the Grand Committee on Trade—for I do not intend to part with it entirely—I shall, in the first instance, endeavour to amend the Government Bill, and shall accept the invitation of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and attempt to introduce the clauses of the Bill of last week into the Government measure. I cannot say that I quite agree in the term applied to the Government Bill by the hon. Member who has just sat down, when he characterised it as a "splendid" Bill, and I think that even the Home Secretary himself would not go so far as that. In fact, I feel some diffidence in expressing any opinion on the measure. I may, however, say that the Bill I submitted to the House last week was framed mainly in the interest of those who are employed in the manufacture of textile fabrics, and does not touch other workshops nor various matters included in the Government Bill. As far as the operatives have considered the Government measure, they do not call it a splendid Bill. They deem it a good Bill, and they wish to throw no opposition in the way of considering its details, which they think are worthy of the attention of this House. That being the case, I accept the invitation of the Home Secretary, and I will say, in regard to the much mooted matter as to the quantity of air to be admitted into the workrooms, that now the 600 feet proposal contained in Clause 8 of my Bill has been abandoned there is a fair opportunity of arriving at a satisfactory settlement on the subject of ventilation. There is, however, one subject on which I wish to say a word. I allude to the question of dust, which is one of some importance in the manufacture of textile fabrics. I am sorry that there is no proposal to deal with it in the Government measure. My desire is merely to extend to the textile factories a clause in regard to this important matter, without which it is impossible to deal satisfactorily with the question of ventilation. The Government Bill is, unfortunately, silent on this point; and I must say that I shall press upon the Grand Committee when dealing with my Bill the necessity of some provision in relation to this important subject. I do not take the same view as the right hon. Gentleman with regard to fire-escapes and I hope we may hereafter be able to deal with that matter in a more satisfactory manner than is proposed by the Government Bill. As to the time the machinery is to stand idle for cleaning, I do not think we need trouble much about that, as in the worsted and woollen trades, but little time is required for the cleaning of machinery; but I am delighted at the invitation of the Home Secretary to introduce clauses from the Bill of last week into the Government Bill, and I trust the right hon. Gentleman will favourably consider the clause contained in the Bill of last week with regard to the cotton manufactures. As to the matter of certifying surgeons, I must ask the Government to keep an open mind, for this is a very grave question. Employer and employed may each, from his own point of view, think the certificate unnecessary; but this House must remember that it has to deal with another interest—the interest of children, who are not quite satisfactorily represented even by their own parents. There are many other minor matters, such as the subject of minimum penalties, and the interference of a Central Body instead of the Local Sanitary Authority, which are essentially questions for the Standing Committee, and I should not be wise in now expending the time of the House in dealing with them. I thank the Government for the way in which they have met my Bill. I accept, to a certain extent, the invitation given by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to draft the clauses of that Bill into the Bill of the Government; but, for the present, I shall retain my Bill for the purpose of pressing it if necessary.

Sir H. James

Mr. BROOKE ROBINSON (Dudley): We have heard from hon. Members something of the operation of this Bill in the case of Lancashire and the East End of London, and I should like to say something, therefore, as to what its effect will be in Staffordshire, more especially in connection with those engaged in the nail and chain trades—persons who occupied a very considerable portion of time of the Parliamentary Committee presided over by Lord Dunraven, and in connection with whom there are several exceptional provisions in the Bills brought in by Lord Dunraven and Lord Thring dealing with this subject. It will be also difficult, I fear, to apply to these trades some of the provisions of this Bill; whilst, on the other hand, some of the provisions would fail to achieve the object they have in view. The nail trade in this district has existed for more than 400 years; and in the reign of Elizabeth the nailers employed in it were so poor that a Bill at that period was introduced into Parliament with the object of remedying their condition; and that this was the state of things at this period, we have the corroborate testimony of the eminent Nonconformist divine, Richard Baxter, who in his early youth was a schoolmaster in the town of Dudley, and records in his diary the poverty of the nailers. Such as the nailers were then, such they are to-day; and the attempts to bring the old customs of the trade into line with modern commercial life has brought about such a conglomeration of customs that no one can understand these industries who has not lived in the district, and certainly no one can do so by simply going there by a morning train and scampering back in the afternoon. These people are, however, all looking forward that some factory legislation may do something for them. But when you come to apply this legislation you have two difficulties to deal with. There is, first, the poverty of these people. Hon. Members have heard about the chain makers, but if the chain makers are badly off the nailers are still worse off. I believe myself there are no class of men, I was going to say upon God's earth, but certainly in this country, so badly off as the nailers, for I am not using the language of exaggeration when I say that let these people work as they do work, from the earliest hour of dawn to the latest hour of night, and they cannot earn more than from 8s. to 10s. a week. They are far worse off than the agricultural labourer, because not only have they more rent to pay, but the agricultural labourer has also gardens and allotments, whilst these people have to pay for everything they require. There is also the difficulty that these people are for the most part but poorly educated. At the last election my borough gained rather an unenviable position, from the fact that out of a poll of about 12,000 more than 1,000 voted as illiterates; and it is therefore extremely difficult to bring men before Magistrates for not having given written technical notices if they plead that they lived in the days when education was not general, and are unable either to read or to write, and have no money to pay anyone to read or write for them. You must remember also that in these industries the employer lives not in the workshop, but in the warehouse, and that the workmen themselves are the owners of their workshops, carrying on their business as a domestic industry; but in a workshop which is a workshop without the word domestic. There must be three conditions laid down in any factory legislation dealing with these people. That all sanitary work must devolve upon the owner; that no unnecessarily harassing technical provisions must be applied to them, nor anything that will take one farthing out of their pockets; and, that they require protection quite as much against the employer in the warehouse as against the employer in the workshop. These are, however, matters for consideration in detail before the Grand Committee; and looking at the unfortunate position of these people, perhaps it is not too much to suggest that some Representative of Staffordshire or Worcestershire may be placed on this Committee, so that the condition of the nailers and chainmakers may be properly considered.

(6.40.) MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): This Bill appears to me to be incomplete in several particulars. At present there is difficulty experienced in obtaining certificates for children between the ages of 13 and 14, arising in consequence of the Education Code of 1891. Formerly, children were examined separately, but now a class passes or fails en bloc. When children pass from Standard IV. to V. an employer of labour has great difficulty in obtaining from the education authorities the certificates of proficiency for labour. A schoolmaster is very anxious to retain grant-earning boys at school; and, therefore, he is not likely to offer facilities in giving certificates. He very naturally says, "I am not in a position to say whether a particular boy or a particular girl has passed the standard, because the class is passed en bloc." It is said the only way to get over the difficulty is for the child to make application to the inspector to be examined separately; but what child will willingly undergo such a trying ordeal?

The point is an important one, and deserves the attention of the Home Secretary. As to the question of ventilation, I am very pleased the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury has abandoned his clause, because if his clause had stood as drawn, there would have been in the smaller factories more fan than factory. In regard to special rules as to fencing machinery, I think the Bill ought to go very much further; it should include steam locomotion, because in some districts, notably in South Wales—and I think, perhaps, too much attention has been paid to textile factories and too little to non-textile factories—the percentage of fatal accidents on railways and sidings which intersect many of the large non-textile factories is abnormally great. In 1889 one-third of the fatal accidents in South Wales occurred on railways and sidings; and I am informed that the percentage will be higher in the next Report. I hope special rules will also be framed, with a view to reduce the number of accidents due to explosions and burns in large steel factories. I cannot help regarding the proposal of the Government with respect to certifying surgeons as retrogressive. I certainly am of opinion that the existence of the certifying surgeons' certificates of fitness is a safeguard. I do not mention the matter in the interest of the certifying surgeons. No doubt they have been irritating and annoying to the Home Department. ["Oh, oh!"] Perhaps I have used too harsh a term, but at any rate they have made complaints. Again, at present the fee for the certificate of birth of young persons and children is far too high, it is 3s. 7d. I have brought in a Bill which reduces the fee to 6d. in the case of young persons between 14 and 16 years of age. That Bill is down for Second Reading to night and in view of the proposals of the Bill under discussion I trust it will be assented to. I think the Government might even reduce the fee to 3d., and offer greater facilities for obtaining the certificate. At present in many districts a working man has to walk many miles to a Superintendent Registrar's office to obtain the certificate. Such difficulty ought to be removed, and I suggest that certificates might be obtained at the Post Office of the district in which the child was born. Such an arrangement might easily be made and it would save many thousands of pounds to the working classes. As to the publication of the special rules I hope the Home Secretary will pay some respect to the wishes of the Welsh people. It is desired that an abstract of the Act, and also the Special Rules, should be published throughout the Principality in the Welsh language. Personally, I am of opinion that in factories where foreigners are employed the abstract of the Act, if not the rules, should be published in their language. Respecting the appointment of additional Inspectors, I trust that, as far as Wales is concerned, other considerations being equal, preference will be given to men who speak Welsh. I do not suppose my views upon the question of the limitation of the hours of labour will obtain much approval in the House, but I am satisfied they will gain considerable approval outside. This Bill proposes to deal with the period of the employment of women. I hope at a future stage, possibly on Report, to raise a far more important issue, namely, the limitation of the hours of labour of adult male workers. Having regard to the disturbed feeling in the country, to the conflicts between capital and labour, to the expressions of opinion on the part of the working classes, and to the resolution of the Liverpool Trades Congress, it is high time for an opportunity to be afforded for the discussion of this much- vexed question which has needlessly caused alarm to many employers. It is a great misfortune that the English representatives at the Berlin Conference were not permitted to discuss the question of the statutory limitation of hours, especially when it is remembered that the argument used against a statutory day is that of foreign competition. There is really no insuperable objection to the principle of State regulation of labour. A statutory enactment if it ever does come, and I believe it will come before many years are over, will not, as alleged, necessarily be an arbitrary measure which cannot be relaxed according to the exigences of the case or the pressure of emergency.

Mr. Randell

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is rather departing from the subject of the Bill.

*MR. RANDELL: I was, Sir, dealing with the clause in the Bill limiting the working hours of women, and I thought I might be permitted to extend my remarks to male adult workers, but I accept your ruling, and I will pass on to the question of protection. I hope that the rules as to fencing will not be confined to driving gear, but extended to the operative part of machinery. If this were so, no hardships would be inflicted upon employers, for I find that now on laying down new plant and machinery manufacturers stipulate that machine makers shall provide safeguards or shields according to the requirements of the Inspectors of Factories. Lastly, I will refer shortly to the question of the administration of the Department. The supervision at the present time is very inadequate, for I believe there are only four or five superintending Inspectors, and they have to go over a very large area. What I think is needed is an increased staff of Sub-Inspectors. It is impossible for the present staff to do their duty. Take the case of South Wales: one gentleman has to cover six counties and a part of Monmouthshire. When we remember the enormous development of industry in that part of the country it must occur to us that it is impossible for one Inspector to do his duty thoroughly and satisfactorily. I think it would be well to appoint a new grade of Inspectors, men taken from the ranks, and who thoroughly understand machinery. By a careful re-organisation of the Department the increase may be made without any additional expense. I have made these remarks in no hostile spirit, and I press them on the attention of the House in the mutual interest of employer and employed.

*(6.55.) MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): As one of the representatives of the most important manufacturing centre in Ireland, I venture to offer a few observations principally in respect of Clause 19, which relates to certifying surgeons. Little has been said on the subject, and I do not think it is fair to a deserving body of men that the House should labour under the misapprehension that they are actuated by self-interested motives in performing their duties. It is right the House should bear in mind that the children who are most largely affected by the action of the certifying surgeons have few persons to speak for them. When hon. Members look back upon the history of the past, and remember all that has been done by Lord Ashley and others to emancipate children from cruelty and to mitigate their position in factories, I hope I shall be excused for intervening in the Debate. Of certifying surgeons, Inspector Cameron, concerning whose opinion I put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary at Question time, stated before the Royal Commission that—

“An able and willing certifying surgeon is of the greatest assistance to the inspector of his district, and can and does render most important aid in the carrying out of the Factory Act.”

This gentleman was for 15 years inspector of factories in Belfast. He worked most harmoniously with the employers of labour, and I think this testimony borne by him to the usefulness of certifying surgeons ought to have influence with the House. A letter has been written by Dr. F. H. Walmsley, in which he says—

“I had to visit one of the finest and best-appointed factories in England, and there was presented to me a child 10 years old to be passed as a half-timer. I observed that he limped as he walked, and asked the cause. He replied that his foot had been scalded. ‘How long ago?’ ‘A tidy time,’ was the reply. On examining the foot I found two deep inflamed painful ulcers, which must have existed for some weeks. I refused to pass the boy.”

I hold in my hand a return by Dr. Charles F. Moore, an eminent Dublin certifying surgeon, concerning the Dublin factories for 1889 and 1890. The total number of certificates of fitness refused in the two years was 198, and I will not enter into the reasons for such refusals. Some were for general disease, some for diseases of the eye, and some for other forms of disease. A distinguished surgeon in Belfast states that at the beginning of an outbreak of small-pox in that City, he is fully occupied in watching that no one is employed who is suffering from that complaint. Often he says he has got delicate children put from one room to another place which is more healthy. I am glad this Bill has been introduced, but I trust the House will pause before it does away with certifying surgeons.

*(7.2.) SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): I thought the right hon. Gentleman was about to sit down without explaining to us the reason for the withdrawal of the skilled protection of the young persons about to enter factory employment. But he did give us a few words of explanation. He based the withdrawal of that protection on these grounds: he thought, that parental affection in itself is to be very much trusted, and that the interest of the employers will deter them from taking improper persons. Surely he knows perfectly well what the history of factory legislation has been. These two reasons of his were advanced against factory legislation in 1802; but it was then found that neither parental affection nor the interests of the employer was sufficient to prevent improper and disqualified persons from being exposed to the danger of labour for which they were unfitted. In 1833 you introduced a measure by which all persons who were too young, who were too diseased, who had infectious diseases, who were deformed, should not be allowed to go into factories until they had their fitness certified by a medical man. In 1878 you passed the existing Act, but before doing so the whole question was submitted to a Royal Commission, which inquired—first, as to whether an initial medical examination was necessary or not; and, secondly, as to the way in which the certifying surgeons had discharged their duty. That Royal Commission expressed its belief that the important share taken in the administration of the Factory Acts by the members of a profession distinguished by its scientific knowledge and intelligence, had contributed to the general acceptance of those Acts. A previous Home Secretary (Lord Cross), on the same political side as the right hon. Gentleman, has also spoken plainly enough, declaring his unwillingness to pass a law to abolish the certifying surgeons, and adding that they would do in the future as they had done in the past—namely, afford the greatest aid in carrying out the Factory Acts. With these facts against him, the Home Secretary ought to have told us why he is making such a great change in the administration of the Factory Acts. But, that I am afraid of wearying the House, I could cite quotation after quotation from the opinions of Factory Inspectors against the present proposal. When the right hon. Gentleman sweeps away all the certifying surgeons, how is he going to replace them? He proposes to put practically nothing in their room. The Inspectors will in future be expected to do the work now performed by the certifying surgeons, the proposal being to abolish the latter at one fell swoop so far as initial entry is concerned. The surgeon is only retained in cases of accidents, the duty in respect of which though important in itself is quite insignificant when compared with the other duties at present performed. A look at the figures shows that accidents at present constitute only one twenty-fifth part of the work performed by the certifying surgeons. I consider the proposal of the Government altogether retrogressive in factory legislation. The object of the Factory Acts is to protect those persons who cannot help themselves, and let us see how the certifying surgeons act. Their primary duty is to see that any young person going into a factory is of full age and physically fitted for the work. The certifying surgeon has to see if a child is physically fit to go to work; to see also that he does not convey contagious disease into the factory. Take the celebrated case at Accrington, where a child suffering from scarlet fever was admitted into a mill, with the result that there was a serious epidemic, which in a week or two resulted in large loss. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary said—and I was surprised to hear it—that refusals were seldom or never given by certifying surgeons. I had expected to hear from him statistics on this subject. In the year 1888-9, in the Dublin district, there were 66 refusals on account of age, 84 on account of infectious disease and debility, 35 for diseases of the eye, and 13 on account of disease of the heart. The right hon. Gentleman may be right in saying the refusals are few; but I do not think he was right in bringing before the House such a sweeping change without producing proof that the certifying surgeons do not do their duty. Has he any Return to show that the refusals were either few or many? We have no official statement whatever on the subject. There is one reason why the refusals may be few in number, and that is that the system prevents cruel parents and factory owners who do care much about the health of those they take into their employment from bringing unfit children forward. Now, what does the Home

Sir Lyon Playfair

Secretary propose to substitute for the system which has been in operation since 1883? The right hon. Gentleman says, in the first place, there is no necessity for the certificate of a surgeon with reference to age, because that can now be ascertained in other ways. That was perfectly true, for we now have compulsory certificates of birth, which we had not at the time the present system was started. But the opposition to the certificates which has induced him to propose this change is certainly not general throughout the country. It exists in Lancashire pretty strongly, but there is special reason for protecting the young in that county, seeing that 70 per cent. of the employes in factories are women and children. In Yorkshire opposition comes from Keighley, but from Leeds and other centres, as well as in Scotland, the proposal to abandon the certificates is strongly disapproved. I can understand the objection to paying for these certificates. I think their unpopularity is partly due to the fact that the fee for obtaining a certificate of birth for children between 14 and 16 was 3s. 7d. It is now to be 6d. There are other matters for which protection is required. This change will by no means be an economical one, for a much larger number of ordinary Inspectors will be required. The certificates of birth and education are to be lodged at the factory, so that the Inspector may see them from time to time. But there are 134,000 factories and workshops registered, and the number of visits paid by the Inspectors is 114,000, or on an average less than one visit each per year. But even if the Inspectors pay a visit every three months, what real use will that be? How can they in their few visits in the course of the year find out the deformed or the diseased children who have been admitted to the factory? One of two things must happen—either the whole system of initial protection must be abandoned; or you must increase the number of Inspectors so largely that the cost upon general taxation will become very heavy. The fact is you are giving up altogether the protection enjoyed by the young under existing factory legislation; you will, under your new system, have no medical security, and until the right hon. Gentleman give us some proof that the present work of certifying is done badly, I think he would be well advised to make no change.

(7.20) SIR F. MILNER (Notts, Bassetlaw): I can assure the Home Secretary that this proposal in Clause 19, which has been dealt with by several hon. Members already has not only raised the opposition of all surgeons but also the indignation of the friends of that excellent organisation, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and of all interested in the welfare of the young. I have collected some statistics which I will produce in the Committee, and I think they will startle the House, for they show the working of the system which it is now proposed to abolish. I hope and trust that the Home Secretary will re-consider his decision and not insist on this provision. When we consider that something like 70 per cent. of those employed in our textile factories are women and children, it does seem to me a retrograde movement to do away with one of the most important provisions of existing Factory Acts. Hon. Members on both sides desire to see the young protected, and it is useless to educate them unless you at the same time look to their bodily health. This proposal, if carried, will mar an otherwise excellent Bill, and I trust that when the right hon. Gentleman in charge sees the statistics I shall have to produce he will consider the advisability of withdrawing it.

(7.22.) DR. R. McDONALD (Ross and Cromarty): As a factory surgeon of 10 years' standing, I may be able to to give the House a little insight into the working of the Factory Acts. I join in thinking that it would be a retrograde step to abolish the certifying surgeon. There is considerable difficulty in preventing employment of children under the legal age in our factories. Many such cases of employment are reported to the Home Office, and no action is taken on them. When an Inspector goes into a factory he finds sometimes that those whom he is called upon to certify have been at work for months, although they are instructed to say only a few days, in order that the breach of the law (which fixes the time in which a certificate must be obtained at seven days) may not be discovered; again, in the ship-building industry a rivetter will often employ a young boy three or four days a week to assist him, and these lads are not presented for certificates simply because they have not been seven days continuously at work. I am glad to see it is proposed that no child shall in the future be allowed to commence work until the birth certificate has been produced. Even these certificates have proved to be open to abuse in the past. In my own experience I have known one certificate to do duty for three different boys. One wants to be constantly watching to prevent the employment of boys under age. But what will be the use of an Inspector merely visiting a factory twice a year. There may be hundreds of children under age working there and he be none the wiser, for he may be told they have been so employed a day or two. If the Home Secretary does not retain these certifying surgeons he will find the expenditure under the Act increase enormously. The surgeon is now paid sixpence for every child he certifies, and of that sum the employer can recover one half from the boy certified. The State pays for nothing but attending to the injuries of people in the factories. Another reason why the certifying surgeon should not be abolished is that he is always on the spot and can see the condition of the machinery, whereas if his services be not retained it may happen in the future that after an accident a proper guard is put to the machinery before the arrival of the Factory Inspector. I can assure the House that this is an important point, for it is very difficult indeed to arrive at the real facts as to the condition of the machinery at the time of an accident. I think the certifying surgeons should have more powers vested in them, especially in regard to sanitary matters. Age, after all, is not a criterion of the fitness of a child for work, and a Factory Inspector certainly could not decide so well as a surgeon as to whether a boy should be admitted to work. Again, an employer often cannot tell whether or not a boy has been rejected. Many of the boys I have had to examine have come to me at my private surgery, and in cases I have refused certificates, but it does not follow that the employer was made acquainted with that refusal. He only knows of the rejections made when the examination takes place at his own factory. Supposing factory surgeons abolished, there still must be some means provided for inspecting factories once a month at least, and as this work of inspection must be paid for by the State, I do not see that it can be done at less expense than under the present system.

Dr. R. McDonald

(7.30.) MR. ELLIOTT LEES (Oldham): The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair), has made a strong appeal in favour of the retention of certifying surgeons, and he asks if you abolish these what will be set up in their place. I may say that something has been set up in their place—the standard under the Education Act has been set up in their place. I understand that since the Education Act has come into operation the occupation of the certifying surgeon has practically become obsolete. So I am informed by those well qualified by experience to form a judgment, and this cannot be called a retrograde step if you abolish an office which in process of time has become of no value. My hon. Friend (Sir F. Milner) tells us that this particular provision is condemned on grounds of humanity, and that the Society for Preventing Cruelty to Children have taken up the question; but I would say to him and to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds, if they can show that the certifying surgeon has been of value in preventing unfit children being set to work in factories they will make out their case for the retention of the office. But I do say that this clause in the Bill gives expression to a general wish in Lancashire, and that the opinion is that there is no longer occupation for the certifying surgeon. None of us, of course, would wish to inflict any hardship upon children working in factories; and if it can be shown that the occupation of certifying surgeons still survives, and that there are still a large number of children who are prevented from undertaking work injurious to their health by the intervention of the certifying surgeon, I should certainly favour the retention of that officer. But, as I have said, it is believed in Lancashire that there is now nothing for the certifying surgeon to do.

*(7.34.) MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): The redeeming part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was that in which he expressed his willingness to consider amendment, and I sympathise with the desire that in Committee the Bill may be strengthened in many of its details. If the right hon. Gentleman remains true to the opinions he has thus expressed, I think the Bill may be made a very useful measure, but as it now stands it is very empty, and requires a great deal of furnishing. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has not seen his way to increase the age for half-time employment of children, and on this point I think the general opinion is as strong as is that condemning the abolition of the certifying surgeon. I should like to say, in regard to Clause 8, which refers many new subjects to arbitration that are at present under the control of Factory Inspectors—I think I read the Bill aright in this—

MR. MATTHEWS: A large class of subjects are submitted to arbitration under Clause 8, but I do not think that any subjects now under the direction of Inspectors are withdrawn.

*MR. BROADHURST: As I read the Bill, the subjects include the safety to women and children, protection from injury by machinery, the state of ventilation, and other matters are included. The safety of workpeople from machinery under the present Act, is now a matter for the Inspector, he can make an order which the employer is bound to obey.

*MR. MATTHEWS: If the hon. Member will look at Section 6 of the existing Act, he will find there arbitration applied to the fencing of machinery, and practically the proposal in the Bill is the same thing as exists now.

MR. BROADHURST: It would be interesting if the right hon. Gentleman would give us a return showing the effect of this arbitration power in the Act of 1878. I think he will find it has been practically worthless and useless. At any rate, common sense will tell us that if an increased number of subjects are referred to arbitration, the Factory Inspector's influence will diminish greatly with proprietors, and if the power of the Inspector is diminished the welfare of the factory people will be seriously affected. Coming to the subject of the certifying surgeon, I admit that it is true that the Home Secretary has been assured by large numbers of workmen and employers that they would not oppose the abolition of that officer; but they have only consented to agree to the abolition on the condition that the number of Factory Inspectors should be largely increased. I remember when this subject was first discussed by the representatives of trades in Congress and by the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Congress, there was an agreement come to—rightly or wrongly I am not capable of saying for I have not had practical experience—but it was the opinion of a large number of workpeople that the certifying surgeon might be abolished, but on the condition that the number of Factory Inspectors should be largely increased. This was a condition always attached to the proposal, and there can be no mistake about this. The visits of certifying surgeons of factories for the purpose of granting certificates have been of the utmost value, for they have kept factory proprietors on the alert. The certifying surgeon's visit to a factory or workshop has to some extent the effect of the Inspector's visit. Therefore if we abolish the certifying surgeon we ought to increase the number of factory and workshop Inspectors. We have heard that some factories are only visited by the Inspector once a year; but there are many that are only visited once in three years, and still more that are visited only once in two years. The fact is, it is impossible for the present Staff of Inspectors to do more. We have been often promised that the Staff of Inspectors should be increased, and the predecessor of the right hon. Gentleman expressed the willingness of the Home Office to make the increase if the Treasury would find the means. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman is equally willing to agree to the increase if the Treasury sanctions it. The right hon. Gentleman gives no indication of assent or dissent. I do not think he will find very considerable objection to the increase at the Home Office. This has been a matter for which the trades concerned have contended for years past, and yet we find that while the proposal is made for the abolition of certifying surgeons, whose duties are analogous to Inspectors, neither the Bill nor the speech of the right hon. Gentleman gives any indication of an intention to put anything in the place of the office to be abolished. I wish to know the intentions of the Government with reference to the strength of the Inspector's Staff, and unless the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to promise some increase in that Staff his legislation will probably be met with considerable opposition in quarters where otherwise it would meet with a friendly reception. I think those who have interested themselves in the welfare of our workpeople must be well pleased with the general expression of opinion on both sides of the House to-night and the desire for the protection of young children in factories and workshops. This proposition of the right hon. Gentleman to abolish certifying surgeons, if it has done no other service, has called forth this universal expression of opinion which should be a guidance to the Government and an encouragement to Ministers not to hesitate, when bringing forward Bills connected with the subject, to largely extend the legal protection to the children of our working population. The expression of opinion we have had here will, I am sure, find a response in all parts of the country, and I trust the right hon. Gentleman will, in connection with his proposal to abolish certifying surgeons, give us an assurance that the Staff of Inspectors shall be largely increased.

(7.45.)* MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): My remarks will be limited to the question of the employment of children in factories. I am much disappointed that the Government have failed to make use of this excellent opportunity for embodying in legislation the resolutions arrived at by the Berlin Conference, and I cannot help thinking it is somewhat of a discredit to this country, which took a leading part in that Conference, which excited the attention of all Europe. It was the factory legislation of this country which formed the basis of the discussions which took place at the Berlin Conference last year. I am glad to see in his place my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for India (Sir John Gorst), who took such a prominent part in that Conference. His interest in all labour questions is well known, and I appeal to him—was it not the case that there was practical unanimity at the Conference as to the necessity of raising the age of half-timers from 10 to 12, and some went so far as to advocate 13? I have gone over the Report of the proceedings at the Conference, and I must say that in my judgment it does not bear the construction put upon it by the Home Secretary. There was practical unanimity in insisting that the age should not be fixed lower than 12 years. In Switzerland I am told the age is fixed at 14, and in Germany the age is 14, though exceptions are made in some cases, and 12 is the lowest limit. It is highly discreditable to this country now that we have an opportunity, in a legitimate way, of reforming our factory legislation, that we do not give effect to the recommendations of our own delegates at Berlin. What will be the effect of our action in Europe? I understand that in most European Legislatures Bills are being introduced to give effect to the decisions of the Berlin Conference. What will be thought of England, the originator of this factory legislation, standing still and refusing to walk abreast with other nations? It is going counter to popular feeling which will in a short time force us to take up this subject afresh. But why defer it to a later period now that we have a fitting opportunity while we are revising the general factory legislation of the country? The recommendation of the Berlin Conference is most reasonable. All who have taken an interest in the subject will agree that 10 years is too early an age for children to enter the hot unhealthy atmosphere of a factory; their growth is thereby stunted, their physical development prevented, and the standard of the national physique is lowered. They are deprived of that fresh air and exercise essential to their age; and while being prematurely forced into labour the burden of education is at the same time doubled. I quite disagree with the Home Secretary in the idea that the half-time children make better progress in education, and a short time since Mr. Heller, one of the ablest members of the Teachers' Association, told me that it was the unanimous opinion among teachers that 10 is much too early an age for children to undertake factory work, and that their education is thereby much impeded. I say that children of 10 having been at work from 6 a.m. to 12 cannot go through the afternoon at school with advantage; the fatigue is too much for their tender frames, they are often worn out and can scarcely resist sleep. It is cruelty to expect that a young child after six hours' labour can give another three or four hours more to intellectual exertion, and I am glad to see there is a strong feeling evinced in the House and outside against a continuance of so harsh a system. The Royal Commission on the Education Acts recommended that the age should be raised to 11, but since then public opinion has progressed and I feel sure that a Commission sitting now would raise the age to 12. I do not believe there is any general feeling against raising the age. I never heard in Lancashire any great importance attached to the work of a child before 12 years of age. The only part of England in which much importance is attached to putting children early into factories is in some parts of Yorkshire; but national progress ought not to be arrested on account of such places which I am afraid are in a somewhat benighted condition. It might be possible to lay down the principle that 12 ought to be the age as a general rule, but that some temporary exceptions should be made in the case of a few districts. It is a cruel thing to allow children to be put too early to labour. I hope the working class representatives will give expression to the wish of their constituents in this matter, that they do not desire their children to be prematurely forced into labour.

Mr. Broadhurst

(7.55.) SIR W. H. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I am not surprised that there are complaints that the Bill omits to provide for the raising of the age of children entering factories. I am not surprised that the proceedings of the Berlin Conference have been referred to; but I am not disposed to exclaim against the Government for not venturing on this occasion to make any proposal on the subject in question. It is no doubt true that the Berlin Conference came unanimously to the conclusion that the minimum age should be raised from 10 to 12, and that in that conclusion the English delegates concurred. I do not think that either the delegates or the Government will recede from that conclusion. But although the conclusions of the Berlin Conference ought to have great weight, and there is a moral obligation on the various Governments which joined in those conclusions to take steps gradually and, according to the circumstances of each country, to carry them out, it must be remembered that the delegates reserved to their Governments the discretion to determine for themselves when such steps should be taken, and admitted that local circumstances might make it impossible for all to follow in the same line. The raising of the minimum age is a question of principle, and I have no hesitation in saying that this country, along with other countries, should make a move in that direction. That being the case, the question is limited to the consideration whether this is the time to make that move, and whether the proposal ought to be embodied in the Bill of the Government. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last seemed to think that there was no difficulty whatever in adopting the proposal, though he admitted an exception might be necessary in certain places. Now, I venture to say, there is a very great difficulty indeed, but that difficulty will not come from the employers of labour, the real difficulty will come from the operatives themselves. Although the leaders of the operatives who joined in the delegation to Berlin supported, very much to their credit, the conclusion at which the Conference arrived, still they did very rightly impress upon their colleagues that very careful steps would have to be taken in this country to carry it out so that the hostility of the operatives would not be provoked, and they distinctly assured their colleagues that there would be a very large amount of opposition if that care were not taken. I think a little time would be well spent in allowing the subject to be discussed and considered by all classes of the community, especially those engaged in industries, whether employers or operatives. I do not think sufficient prominence has yet been given to the subject. No doubt the decisions of the Berlin Conference are known in the industrial centres, but I do not think those decisions have become a burning question, carefully considered by the classes most interested. And the suggestion I have heard made by those as earnest as the hon. Member for Flintshire or any other Member is that the question of minimum age should be thus dealt with. Let the question first of all be ventilated throughout the country, let the objections be heard and listened to. Then if a Bill is at any time brought in and passed to carry out this proposition, let a little time be allowed before it comes into operation, the object being that the industries affected shall be able to accommodate themselves to what will be an enormous change in the management of these large industries. Then I think another thing will be necessary, and that is that the change should be effected by steps. I do not indicate these changes, but I think it would be a mistake to raise the age from 10 to 12 by one Bill. I do not know whether the hon. Member who last spoke is aware of the proportions of the subject. We have 86,000 half-timers in this country. If we suddenly raised the age from 10 to 12 I do not know what proportion of that number would be affected, but I suspect it would be a very large one. We have also to remember that the parents of these children will be affected by the loss of weekly wages coming into their homes, and that the various industries will have to be regulated and managed in an entirely different way from the present; and, that being the case, it is quite evident that time must be given before any such operation as this can be taken in hand. I think it is an interesting fact, which can be taken as an argument for not hurrying this matter forward, that the number of half-timers has, without any legislation whatever, been gradually diminishing in this country. I find that it was 125,000 in 1875, and that now it is 86,000, so that there has been a reduction of 31 per cent., which I think we are all very pleased to see. If we compare it with the total number of workers, the half-timers, who in 1875 were 13 per cent. of the whole, are now only 8 per cent. by a gradual process of reduction. Every practical man knows that that has not been done without very great changes, indeed, in the means of doing work in the various industrial establishments, and how far the process can be carried on without diminishing the half-timers is a problem very difficult to gauge, but certainly it is a question of time and of ingenuity on the part of the managers in those establishments. I, therefore, think the House will do well not to press this subject too hurriedly on, for I am afraid that if we do we shall find a strong reaction on the part of the operative classes themselves against an interference which, though it may ultimately benefit them, will, in the first instance, affect them by reducing their weekly income. Perhaps I may be allowed, passing from that subject, to say a word as to the certifying surgeon, which seems to be the only other burning question in the Bill.

Sir W. H. Houldsworth

I think that some benefit arises from these surgeons passing children and examining into their fitness so far as they do it; but I am very sceptical indeed as to the extent to which it is done in this country. It is a remarkable thing that the only statement made by the certifying surgeons themselves about the number of children who are refused admittance into factories for other reasons than that of not being of the legal age has come from Ireland. No statement or Return has come from England or Scotland showing the number of refusals, although a certifying surgeon must know perfectly well how many he has refused. The absence of these statements confirms my own opinion that only to a very slight extent indeed have surgeons exercised their power of refusing children because of their unfitness. Probably one reason is that unfit children are not presented. The other day I inquired at one very large establishment, a typical one in every sense, and the statement made to me was that there had only been one case in the last 20 years in which the certifying surgeon had refused a child admission into a factory owing to unfitness. I am very glad to see that the Home Secretary has introduced minimum penalties into his Bill, because I believe them of very great importance, and I hope we shall be able to extend their area. Not only are insufficient penalties given, and fines enforced against manufacturers and employers who persistently and wilfully disregard the law, but there is a very great injustice done at the present moment by the want of anything like uniformity in the penalties that are imposed. Curiously enough that applies not only to England, where it may be supposed that the benches of Magistrates in some districts may possibly deal leniently with cases when themselves connected directly or indirectly with the trade involved, but also to Scotland where the decisions are given by the Sheriffs. I hope that the Home Secretary will allow the minimum penalties to be extended in order that, and we are strengthening the Factory Laws for the benefit of the operatives without injury to trade, we may, at the same time, have taken all the steps we can to see that these laws are enforced and carried out, so that the people will have the full benefit intended by Parliament. (8.13.)

(8.45.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): In dealing with this important question we must remember what it was that has led to the introduction of this measure, and the evidence that was taken before the Sweating Committee of the House of Lords, which induced the public to suppose that something like a drastic attempt to deal with the condition of things then displayed would at least be attempted by Her Majesty's Government. Those who take the trouble to read through the evidence adduced before that Committee, and who have also read the Report and recommendations of that body, must naturally have felt that those recommendations would have been embodied in the Government Bill. But not only have we had before us the evidence taken by the Sweating Committee as to the terrible state of things which exists in London and other large towns in this country, but there have also been the expectations that were aroused by what took place at the Berlin Conference. In view of these two events we cannot but express our regret that the Government have not tried to do more than they have endeavoured to do by means of this Bill. We hope, however, that when this measure goes before the Grand Committee we shall be enabled to materially alter and enlarge the scope of this measure. I do not think it possible that its scope can be reduced, as it is so small already, but it might be materially enlarged with very great advantage. Of course, I welcome the extension by this Bill of the existing sanitary provisions applicable to factories and workshops. That is the least the Government could have suggested. Over and over again the Factory Inspectors, and other witnesses whose evidence could be relied upon, endeavoured to press upon the Committee the necessity of an entire alteration of the sanitary arrangements hitherto enforced. But, as has already been pointed out, the endeavour to deal with the state of things which has been revealed as existing in the sweating dens of London is hardly attempted in this Bill by Her Majesty's Government. I admit that what is proposed with regard to the registration of the outdoor workers is likely to prove beneficial; but, at the same time, that part of the Bill might be strengthened by the Grand Committee, so that there would be the means of getting at the middlemen who have undertaken contracts, sometimes unfortunately Government contracts, and who send out their work in parcels to the East End sweaters. If the addresses of those men can be registered, so that they may be overhauled by more than one set of persons, we may then be enabled to find out what is going on in the whole of these sweating dens, so that the responsible employers may be dealt with. There is one point which has not been dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary upon which I think we ought to have from him a definite statement to-night, and that is as to the intention of the Government with regard to an increase in the number of Inspectors. In my opinion, if the best possible Bill had been introduced and passed into law, it would be of little value unless an adequate staff of Inspectors and sub-Inspectors was also set up. The want of such a staff was very strongly brought out in the evidence given before the Lords Committee. I will not weary the House by reading that evidence; but if any hon. Member desires to know what an Inspector tries to do at the present time—I use the word tries advisedly, because it is impossible for him to do all he is called upon to do—let him turn to the evidence of Mr. Lakeman, one of the London Inspectors, and it will there be seen what that gentleman had to accomplish with the assistance of only one junior. Within the area of his district, which extends on the north of the Thames into several adjacent counties, there are no less than 4,000 factories and 10,000 workshops. I ask the House to consider whether it is possible for one Inspector, however hard he may work, and however zealous and industrious he may be, to visit so large a number of workplaces and inspect them, so as to assert the necessary control over what goes on within them? Unless the Government are prepared to ask the House to empower them to create an adequate staff of Inspectors, so that they may deal thoroughly and efficiently with the work before them, all the Factory Bills they may introduce and have discussed in this House are not worth the paper on which they may be printed. I therefore insist most emphatically on what is one of the most important points to be dealt with, and I hope we shall have at least a statement from the Government in regard to it. Another point to be considered by the right hon. Gentleman in reference to the Sanitary Clauses of the Bill is how far it may be possible to make the owners of the sweating dens responsible for letting unsanitary buildings as workshops. In the evidence before the Sweating Committee you will find it stated over and over again that the men who take these places are men of no substance and not easily to be got at. We know, however, that an excessive amount of rent is obtained by letting these premises, and we know also that they are not capable of being used as dwelling houses even by the very poorest families. They can only be used as workshops, and even for that purpose they are altogether unfitted. I therefore put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether steps cannot be taken in Committee on this Bill to make the owner, who obtains an inordinate rent from these establishments, responsible for the unsanitary condition in which they may be found. I now come to the omission of provisions for raising the age at which children can be employed in factories. I do not think any sufficient reason has been given for that omission. The hon. Baronet the Member for North-west Manchester endeavoured to palliate, to some extent, the conduct of the Government in not carrying out what was really a recommendation of the Berlin Conference. I agree with the hon. Baronet that what we are asking Her Majesty's Government to do is somewhat difficult. No one wishes that it should be done in such a drastic manner that you will turn all the operatives against you who happen to have children working at the lower age, but that it should be done in such a way as to win over those who might be otherwise against you. The hon. Baronet admitted distinctly that the principle is a good one, and that an attempt should be made to level up the age to 12 years instead of keeping it at 10. The only difference between us is, that he is afraid that the time is not yet arrived, while we regard this as a fitting opportunity to carry out the changes. The hon. Baronet said there were 86,000 half-timers at the present time, but that the number had decreased 30 per cent. since 1875. I contend that this decrease shows that parents are not so anxious to get their children to work at an early age as formerly, and that the Government would not meet with so much opposition from the parents as they think if they attempted to raise the age at which children can be employed. I remember, before the Education Act was passed, that if you advertised in your window for an errand boy, your doors were besieged, and the proverbial widow, rarely a widow at all, made her appearance in favour of her son's application for employment. Immediately after the Education Act was passed, and the School Board officers had opportunity of doing their work, the children in search of work were not so numerous. And I hold, that if the Government were now to insist that the age of children beginning to work in factories should be 12 and not 10, benefit would result to our race in the development of its men and women. The Home Secretary says that the "half-timers" are smarter than the children who go through the daily routine of school. No doubt work in the factory does brighten those children; but what we are fighting for is not that they shall cease to be half-timers, but at what age shall they begin work. By raising the age, more adult labour will be admitted to the market; and whenever the Government deals with this question it will be surrounded with difficulties, and the sooner, therefore, they begin with it, the better it will be. I should like to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to Clause 18, Sub-section A, of this Bill, which, I think, wants a little amending. It says that women shall work 12 hours a day, and eight hours on Saturday. I do not think that carries out the intention of the draughtsman, because it is specific that the hours shall be 12 hours a day, and eight on Saturday. I think the clause is capable of modification. I regret that the Bill does not go further than it does, and that the intention of the Berlin Conference is not carried out. I hope that the measure will be amended in Committee, and that it will come back to this House strengthened and improved.

Mr. J. Rowlands

(9.0.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Representing as I do a constituency very largely interested in this question, I desire to express my sympathy with the objects of the Bill and to give the measure my support. I do not say that the Bill is a strong one—I do not know the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary himself would assert that—but with Amendments such as those suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury and by the hon. Member for Poplar, it may prove a very good one. As to its actual proposals, to all but one I give hearty support. That one exception I need hardly say is the abolition of the certifying surgeon. I confess I have objected to this from the first, but what has been said in to-night's Debate, especially by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds, has more than confirmed my view that these officers constitute an important link in the system by which protection is secured to young children under the existing Factory Act. I know that the late Lord Shaftesbury used to say that he regarded the institution of the medical officer as the most important feature of the policy which he carried out. He considered it more important in securing the protection of children than any other part of his policy. That being so, and in view of the prevailing tone of the Debate on this point, I would seriously suggest to the Home Secretary whether he will not do well to drop the proposal to abolish the certifying medical officer. I think it would be impossible to abolish that institution without providing some substitute for it. I do not, however, see any alternative plan proposed in the Bill. I think the only possible substitute would be a large increase in the number of Factory Inspectors. For my part, I am not strongly in favour of a large increase in the number of Inspectors, although to some extent, no doubt, an increase might be made with advantage. But the Home Office has already much to do in looking after the Inspectors, and if any material addition were made to their ranks, the question would be how to inspect the Inspectors. It is objected to the existing system that it is not fair that employers of labour should be made to contribute towards the cost of inspection. I should prefer that the Government should undertake whatever payment may be necessary in this direction rather than that we should do away with a protection which I believe to be of great value to the children of this country. I was very glad to hear the suggestion made by the Home Secretary to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury, that instead of proceeding with his Bill he should endeavour to engraft its provisions into the Government measure in Committee, and I was still more glad to hear my right hon. Friend assent to that suggestion. The right hon. Gentleman has made a very important concession to the woollen and worsted trades, which I think were not sufficiently considered in his Bill as first drafted, and by so doing he has got rid of a serious objection to his proposals, which now, I am happy to say, I shall be able to heartily support. My hon. Friend the Member for Poplar has made some important suggestions, which I hope will be favourably considered by the Government. He has very properly pointed out that the provisions dealing with overcrowding are very inadequate. I agree with him that they must be amended and strengthened. Further, I hold with him that something requires to be done in the direction of inspecting domestic workshops, so as to enable us to cope with the evils of the sweating system, which a Committee of the House of Lords found recently to prevail to such a fearful extent. To the general proposal for extending the inspection to workshops now excluded under the present Factory Acts I give my hearty support. It has long been a scandal that so hard and fast a line should be drawn between factories and workshops which are subject to inspection and those which are not, for I cannot but think it is in a great measure due to this fact that the evils of sweating have grown up to the extent they have. But these are subjects more fit for discussion in Committee. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill that our object should be not unduly to harass manufacturers, while securing greater protection for the life and health of the working classes.

*(9.10.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I am quite prepared to recognise the good intentions of the Bill and their fulfilment to a certain extent. For instance, I thoroughly approve of the excellent sanitary provisions which it contains, but I must also protest, in common with others, against Clause 19, withdrawing from young children who may be introduced into factories the protection hitherto given by the factory surgeons. The able and comprehensive statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds has most completely exposed the objection to this proposal, and I shall do no more than adopt a phrase already used pretty freely in this Debate, and say it is a highly retrograde proposal. Many of the improvements which have been effected by the Factory Acts have been due to the operation of the Medical Authorities under those Acts, and to the operations of those surgeons who are now, at one stroke of the pen, to be disestablished and disendowed and abolished out of existence. Not only do the surgeons stop directly unfit cases, but they do more; they have a deterrent influence which prevents parents from bringing up children whom they know to be unfit or who are, perhaps, suffering from disorders which might otherwise have caused great and serious detriment to the health of those by whom they might be surrounded. I cannot agree with the assertion that the examination by the factory surgeons has become an unmeaning form. Evidence on all hands can be cited testifying to the admirable way in which they have done their work. Something has been said about parental affection—no doubt a very high and ennobling characteristic, but I fear that self-interest occasionally prevails over it, and those who know human nature will agree as to the necessity of continuing to protect children against their parents. The whole current of the most recent legislation, such as the Cruelty to Children Acts, shows that strong though parental affection is, it is nevertheless necessary to protect children against the self-interest, the greed, the poverty, and frequently the ignorance of parents. I do not see that there is any less reason now to protect children from their parents than there was under the original Factory Acts 50 years ago. We are told employers will not employ children who are too weak to work. I should be sorry to say anything hard of employers; but they are not always able to detect physical infirmity—heart disease or incipient consumption, which are only patent to the skilled eye, but which certainly unfit a child for work. Even a parent might think a child fit for work when a medical man would detect in that child weakness or disease which rendered it quite unfit. It has been suggested that some of the doctors scamp their work. I do not believe it. Although there may, in some instances, be hurry owing to the numbers to be inspected, yet I believe that, on the whole, the factory doctors do their work fairly and well. It is said there are very few cases of rejection of children as physically unfit. The reason instances have not been forthcoming is that the surgeons have not had time to get up their case, owing to the Bill having been hurried forward. I will undertake, if a reasonable time is given, to show that the rejection of children as physically unfit is of frequent occurrence. I know of one surgeon in a large town in the North who rejects, on an average, two children a week. Instead of diminishing the powers of the medical men, I am in favour of largely increasing them. I think they should inspect the sanitary condition of the factories, and also from time to time see the children they have passed, to know whether the work is injuriously affecting them. I am bound to say that the remedy proposed by the Government is a very futile and ineffectual one. Age is a very inconclusive test of fitness, unless it is accompanied by a medical certificate that the person is of the development usual for that age. No doubt medical inspection is unpopular, but so are most other kinds of inspection which prevent a man from doing what he has a mind to. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to deprive a class of men of employment upon which many of them are entirely dependent for their livelihood, and I will ask the right hon. Gentleman what he proposes to do in the way of compensation for those men? It is hopeless for many of them to return to private practice, which they have entirely given up for many years. It is only right and proper that they should be compensated. Although I speak as a medical man for medical men, I believe I speak also in the interests of the poor and of the community at large. I am convinced that many ill-conditioned, weakly, and diseased children will pass Inspectors who, however worthy and conscientious, are not medical men. It is said the present system does not work well in Lancashire, but Lancashire is not the whole Kingdom; and, speaking best for that part which I know—Scotland—I believe the old system works extremely well, and the people there view with alarm the proposed change.

Dr. Farquharson

(9.25.) MR. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): I have not risen to find fault with the Bill as far as it goes, but I think it incomplete and disappointing. I am convinced that the vast majority of the working people of Wales are opposed to reducing the age of children for the purpose of getting employment. I have had good opportunities of learning their views on that point. With regard to the 19th clause, I may say I have received a letter from a factory doctor of 25 years' standing on this very subject. He thought that I, as a Labour Representative, would favour the idea of reducing the age, and he therefore wrote to me to give me certain information before I committed myself to that view. He says—

"I understand the Home Secretary has a Bill before the House, Clause 19 of which will abolish the medical certificate. After an experience of 25 years I am of opinion that this is a step backwards. I have rejected many young persons suffering from contagious and infectious disease, not omitting affections of the lung."

That is the testimony of a factory doctor of long experience. Medical Members of this House have given similar evidence, and I therefore ask the Home Secretary to re-consider his decision to abolish the practice now existing. If he adheres to the clause I fear it will have a disastrous effect upon the young in our manufacturing towns. I have a word to say upon the question of safety. The difference between the right hon. Gentleman and myself was simply a difference of degree. I am prepared to recognise to the full the right hon. Gentleman's intention to improve the condition of the working classes. The Bill is a step in the right direction; but as to safety, it does not go far enough. Protection to life and limb is the very essence of industrial legislation; and, therefore, such protection should be afforded in no halting or hesitating manner. Unreasonable provisions would harass the employers, and possibly hamper trade: but the House will agree with me that it is possible to go much further in placing obligations upon employers to fence and safeguard machinery than is done in this Bill, and yet not be guilty of imposing what may be termed unreasonable restrictions upon them. I suggest that the Home Secretary should include in Clause 30 every integral part of the machinery likely to prove dangerous to the attendants upon the machinery. I would like the Home Secretary to provide that all the operative parts of machinery should be fenced so as to make it almost impossible for accidents such as occur now to happen. Some may suppose that this fencing would cost a great deal. I, however, am informed upon very good authority that it would only entail a very trifling expense indeed. It is a well known fact that machine makers, when called upon to do so, send out machines fitted with shields and safeguards, and make no extra charge. I regret that there is no provision in the Bill in regard to the cleaning of machinery in motion. By the principal Act a young person is prohibited from oiling mill gearing in motion. Nothing can scarcely be a more prolific source of danger to life and limb than the oiling and cleaning of machinery when in motion. Therefore, I trust that in Committee the Government will be prepared to strengthen the Bill—this good Bill, I admit. I am anxious to see the Bill made better, and therefore I hope the Government will consent to strengthen it, in the interest of those whose daily duty involves constant attendance in close proximity to engines and machines, by prohibiting the cleaning of machinery when in motion. There is another omission, and it concerns administration. In view of what has been said by the Home Secretary and his predecessors, I am somewhat surprised to find that no reference is made in the measure to the means whereby a more effective administration of the Act can be secured. The South Wales district included 12 counties and a part of a 13th—Monmouthshire. Glamorgan-shire, which is one of the 12 counties, is the most populous county for its size in the United Kingdom. There is but one Factory Inspector, a good man, I admit. A better Inspector the Government never had; he works in season and out of season; does his duty to the Government and to the community at large to the very best of his ability. But it is ridiculous to have only one man for 12 counties in which there are 12,000 factories and workshops. Inspection has done wonders for the working people. Legislative interference has reduced the danger to life and limb to an extent which we can scarcely comprehend; still, if inspection in the South Wales district is to be thoroughly effectual the present Inspector must receive very material assistance. The Home Secretary can do nothing for which the people will be more grateful, than increase the number of Inspectors of factories and mines. There is another point I wish to press upon the right hon. Gentleman's attention, namely, to adopt in this Bill with respect to Wales, the same excellent principle as he applied in the Mines Act—to give the preference in the appointment of Inspectors to the man, all else being equal, who is conversant with the Welsh language. The right hon. Gentleman can scarcely comprehend the gratitude that is felt in the Principality at the concession he made on this point in the Mines Act, and I am sure the Welsh people will be grateful to him if he extends the principle a little further. I am glad to see the right hon. Gentleman nods his assent to that proposition. I would also ask the right hon. Gentleman to consent to the publication of the special rules as well as the abstract of the Act in Wales. No doubt on many occasions it has come under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman himself that the Inspectors sometimes obtain considerable assistance from the men when they are making their inspection. If the men do not understand the language he speaks, or even if some of them do, they may very well shelter themselves by saying: "I do not understand the English language, and therefore can give no evidence." If you appoint Inspectors who are conversant with the Welsh language, and if the rules are published in Welsh, it will be of material assistance to the officials in finding out true facts of the case. I may be allowed to say that from the West of Glamorganshire, through Carmarthenshire, and the Northern part of Pembrokeshire, and to Cardiganshire, the majority of the people, while they understand Welsh, are not able to read the English language. That at once proves the necessity of applying special rules to Wales, and if the right hon. Gentleman assents to my suggestions he will earn the thanks of a very grateful nation.

*(9.44.) Mr. J. A. CAMPBELL (Glasgow and Aberdeen University): I agree with the hon. Member who has just spoken, that this is a good Bill, but my main object in rising is to assure the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that the disapproval which has been expressed in regard to the 19th clause is shared by many Members on both sides of the House. My hon. Friend the Member for South Belfast has objected to the clause on behalf of Ireland, and I, also a supporter of the Government, must express my objection to it on behalf of Scotland. The objections to the existing system seem to have come exclusively from Lancashire and part of Yorkshire. I think it rather significant that no such objections have come from the rest of England or from Scotland or Ireland. Two years ago there was a demonstration in opposition to the present system on behalf of Lancashire factory owners, who stated that they represented the operatives as well. There has been no movement in Scotland or Ireland in support of that demonstration during the two years that have since elapsed. It is said there is a lack of evidence as to the amount of useful work done by certifying surgeons in refusing unfit applicants for employment. Well, it has been no part of the duty of the certifying surgeon to make a Report of the cases he deals with. The instance has, however, been quoted to-night of a Dublin certifying surgeon who, while he rejected in two years 66 children as being under age, rejected no fewer than 132, or exactly double the number, on account of physical unfitness. It has been justly said that the frequent visits of the certifying surgeons to the factory ensure the paying of greater attention to the general observance of the Factory Laws than would otherwise be paid, and that if he were to be dispensed with, we should be left without any sufficient security that the Factory Laws were regularly observed. The visits of Factory Inspectors are made at very rare intervals—once a year, if even once—and if we are to substitute for visits of the surgeons frequent visits from someone else, we shall require, not a few, but a whole army of additional Inspectors. For the whole of Scotland I find there are altogether only six Factory Inspectors, namely, one Superintending Inspector, no Inspector of the first-class, three of the second-class, and two junior Inspectors. That is the entire inspectorial staff for the whole of Scotland, while for the City of Glasgow alone there are seven certifying surgeons. I do not know how many surgeons there are for the whole of Scotland, but the number must be great; and if their visits to factories and workshops are to be discontinued, a very large staff of Inspectors will be required to take their place.

Mr. Abraham

*(9.50.) SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLE-WORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): As I represent a district of Lancashire which is more interested in factory legislation than almost any other part of the country, and in which a very large number of half-time children are employed, I think the House will grant me its indulgence whilst I say a few words on this subject. I think the House is fortunate in having three Factory Bills before it, namely, that which has been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, that brought forward by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bury (Sir H. James), and that which has been prepared by the hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. S. Buxton). I cannot but hope that if the best parts of each of these measures were woven together, a very important statute might become law during the present Session. The hon. Baronet the Member for Manchester (Sir W. Houldsworth) seemed to think that the Government do not deal with the question of the half-time age in any way in this Bill; but obviously, by removing the check of the certifying surgeons, they run the risk of lowering the age, and thus the question is dealt with practically if not directly. I regret that the hon. Baronet has not used his great influence to press on the Government that now is the time to take some steps with the view to carry out the decision of the Berlin Conference. It will be a thousand pities if this opportunity of taking a step in the direction of the recommendations of the Berlin Conference is lost. We in this country occupy a special and exceptional position on this question. We have taken the lead among the countries of the world in regard to factory legislation, thanks to the efforts of Lord Shaftesbury and others. I wish to ask whether we ought not to retain the lead? I think the Members who represented this country at the Berlin Conference are bound to impress on the Government the importance of dealing in reasonable time with the recommendations of the Conference. What is the good of sending a right hon. Member of the Government and other Members of this House to join in that Conference and its recommendations, if our Government is afterwards to introduce a Factory Bill which ignores them? There is no reason why too large a stride should be made in the first instance. When the half-time age was raised from 8 to 10, time was given before the Act came into operation. There can, I think, be no doubt that if we adopted the recommendations of the Berlin Conference we should take two bites at the cherry, first raising the age to 11, and afterwards further raising it to 12. I can assure my hon. Friend (Sir W. Houldsworth) that, so far as the part of Lancashire which I represent is concerned, I do not think there will be any great opposition on the part of the operatives to the raising of the age, if it is done, as the hon. Baronet himself suggested, with prudence, and if some little time is allowed before the Act is put into operation. In speaking of foreign competition, I think people are apt to overlook the fact that, unless we take every precaution that our working classes are as well instructed, and as well developed physically, as those in other parts of the world, we shall be heavily handicapped. We know that children are not allowed to go to work in Switzerland until they are 14 years of age, and in many other countries of Europe the age limit is higher than in England. The doctrine that half-timers are taught more than full-timers, was, I think, exploded long ago. My old friend Sir Edwin Chadwick was a great advocate of that doctrine, but I thought it was now entirely abandoned. I would invite the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Matthews) to visit the part of Lancashire in which I have lived all my life and make the acquaintance of the school teachers. If he does so, I venture to say he will not find a single teacher, who has experience in teaching half-time scholars, who will bear out the view he has expressed. Teachers can only pass half-timers through the standards by dint of great exertions, and those children who attend school full-time suffer from the attention which has to be bestowed on half-timers. The omission to alter the age is the more remarkable since the Royal Commission on Education, which was presided over by Lord Cross, a member of the present Cabinet, unanimously recommended that the half-time age should be raised to 11. I pass on to the question of certifying surgeons, and I must express my regret that a retrograde proposal on that subject has found its way into the Bill. I think it can be shown that certifying surgeons reject many children whom it is proposed to send to work, but who are not fit to enter the factory. My hon. Friend says that unfit children are not presented for employment in factories, but is not that because parents know that children will have to pass the examination of the certifying surgeon? Does not the existence of this official in itself provide an effective preventive, and check the employment of children who are unfit for the work to which parents might otherwise put them? My hon. Friends the Members for Nottingham and for Rhondda have both pressed upon the Home Secretary the importance of appointing an increased number of Inspectors. I believe that what is wanted is more Sub-Inspectors from that class from which the right hon. Gentleman told us the other day that he has lately been making appointments, from the ranks of the working classes—men familiar with the dangers of industrial occupations against which the system of inspection is to guard. In making their observations my hon. Friends represented not only the workmen with whom they are specially brought into contact, but also the opinion of the operatives in the district which I have the honour to represent. It is a strong conviction, founded on fact and personal experience, among these people, that it is absolutely necessary, if the Factory Acts are really to be carried out effectually, that the number of Sub-Inspectors must be considerably increased.

*(10.3.) MR. H. S. WRIGHT (Nottingham, S.): I desire to urge upon the Government to reconsider their decision in reference to the certifying surgeons. Medical evidence is entirely against it, and it seems to me to be a concession to employers at the expense of the children employed. I hope the Government will not insist upon retaining this Clause 19 in their otherwise excellent Bill. I have a letter from a very competent certifying surgeon doing duty in my own constituency, and he confirms my own opinion that the parents among the working classes generally are grateful for the protection afforded by the certifying surgeon, and the owners of factories are, perhaps, still more grateful when that gentleman points out any danger of infection running through a factory, doing incalculable damage. We have the alternative of ending or mending, and I cannot see why, if there are faults in the system, these faults cannot be amended and certifying surgeons everywhere made to discharge their duty as well as I know they do in my constituency. If you take away this official you take away a safeguard against the spread of an infectious disease from factory children through a whole town. I, therefore, respectfully urge the Government to consider the withdrawal of this clause.

Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth

*(10.5.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): The introduction and passing of a Bill on this subject requires the greatest care, for it touches a statute which is one of the greatest glories of Parliament. I am anxious that the high standard of the past should be maintained in future factory legislation. The protection of life and health in our industrial occupations has been the object in all our Factory Acts, but in this Bill I do not see, I am sorry to say, that the same spirit is sufficiently displayed. I had hoped that there would have been a more determined endeavour to do away with the pernicious system of "sweating" in our large towns. I should have been glad to have seen the Bill follow more the lines of the Bill of the hon. Member for Poplar, but there is no indication of an adequate attempt to grapple with the evil. I hope we may yet persuade the right hon. Gentleman to accept Amendments which will give force to the Bill in the direction we desire. I am sorry that the sanitary aspect of the Factory Acts is not extended by this Bill. There is an opportunity in a measure of this kind for making the sanitary supervision of all places of industrial occupation much more effective than it is. We have an opportunity of taking care that all people shall be employed under the conditions least hurtful to health. It is the duty of the State to take the greatest care of the sanitary conditions under which Factory labour is carried on. Both employers and employed are insufficiently acquainted with this subject, and I doubt if the appointment of an increased number of Sub-Inspectors will meet the case. If the right hon. Gentleman were to appoint a large number of Inspectors from the ranks of the profession to which I have the honour to belong, he would obtain the kind of skill necessary for the sanitary improvements of workshops. I do not suppose that any such enlightened idea has entered the right hon. Gentleman's mind, and I am rather led to think so, because the factory surgeons seem to have incurred his displeasure in Clause 19. The question for the surgeon very often is not one of age, but of physical fitness for a particular occupation, and the medical officer alone, I maintain, has a sufficient insight into individual peculiarities to enable a right judgment to be arrived at on that matter. I hope from the general expression of opinion on both sides of the House that we shall have some alteration in the proposal to abolish certifying surgeons. The case of these surgeons has been stated again and again with considerable force, and I need not dwell upon it. I should be very sorry to see such a retrograde step taken in factory legislation as their abolition. I do not say that the present system cannot be improved, but I do say that we should not do away with the medical safeguards which the Factory Acts at present contain. The importance of this goes beyond particular trades, it is a matter of health and well-being to the population generally. Recently an hon. Friend of mine went down to Lancashire, on a sad occasion, to attend the funeral of Mr. John Bright. He had not had previous acquaintance with the physical aspect of the operatives in great Lancashire towns, and he told me on his return that he was painfully struck with the injurious effect of factory work upon the persons employed, and remarked upon the striking difference in physique between the men of the Lancashire manufacturing district and the men of the South and the Midlands. Well, his observation was just; and such a result can only be prevented in the future, by strengthening instead of weakening the check, by which certifying surgeons will keep out the young, who are unfit for labour.

*(10.14.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I wish to say a few words in reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Clitheroe (Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth). My constituency is in the same part of the county as his, and the occupation of the people similar in character; the conclusions at which I arrive, however, are not identical with those he has put before the House. I think the Government have done wisely not to introduce the recommendations of the Berlin Conference into this Bill, but have limited it to an Amendment of the Factory Acts. They could not, for example, raise the age for protection without dealing at the same time with the subject of education, because they would incur the risk of producing a condition in which the children would be no longer required to go to school, and yet would not be allowed to go to work. With reference to half-timers, I also have often conversed with the late Sir Edwin Chadwick, but I did not understand him to place the education of half-time children quite so high as the right hon. Gentleman supposes. I know he had a strong opinion in favour of the half-time system, but I do not believe he seriously maintained that half-timers learned more in their half days than other children with all their time at school. But if there was an "element of exaggeration" in Sir E. Chadwick's views as to the advantages of the half-time system, I believe that the right hon. Gentleman errs as much on the other side. The information I have received is that, though half-timers find it difficult quite to keep pace with the full-timers, they do very much more than half the proportion of work, but I believe it is generally understood that though they have only half-time at school, the children learn more than half as quickly. No doubt some extra exertion on the part of teachers is required to keep them abreast of their full-time schoolfellows, but if the standards were slightly eased in the case of half-timers, the teachers would say that they had no reason to complain. With regard to the question of certifying surgeons, there is no doubt that in my constituency opinion, both of employers and employed is strongly in favour of the Bill in its present form, and to the effect that the certifying surgeon's test is of very little good. Whether that opinion is well founded or not I do not know, but if it is so, I should regret it, because I think that the work of certifying surgeon ought to be so managed as to be of considerable use.

*(10.18.) MR. BURT (Morpeth): I have no intention of entering into the merits or demerits of the Bill. I have no doubt that some of the provisions relating to sanitary matters are improvements so far as they go, and I am very glad that the Factory Act is to be extended to workshops. I have risen, however, merely to express my deep disappointment that the Government have not raised the age at which children are to be employed. This country is in many respects in advance of nearly all other nations of the world, and some of our industrial legislation is, I think, the glory of our country and our Parliament. There is, however, one point in which we are behind Germany, Switzerland, and some nations in the North of Europe, and that is the age at which we allow our children to begin work. At the Berlin Conference there was a unanimous recommendation in favour of raising the age for work in mines to 14, and in all other employments to 12. The Home Secretary has said that the bulk of the delegates to that Conference agreed in that recommendation, but my belief is that the recommendation was unanimous; at all events, it was unanimous so far as the British representatives were concerned. I see in his place the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chatham, who was to a large extent the spokesman of this country, and put forward his views with great ability, and with the very great sympathy which he has always evinced so far as industrial legislation is concerned. I suppose it would be inconsistent with party discipline and Government etiquette, but I wish that the right hon. Gentleman could have risen and answered the Home Secretary. The Home Secretary has spoken of the difficulty of carrying out a change of this kind. No doubt there are always great difficulties in such a matter; there is the loss to the parents, and some of them may object. I do not say that we can view without consideration the feelings of parents, and, I believe that there are parents who, owing perhaps in a large measure to the necessities of their own circumstances, are not sufficiently considerate with regard to their children; but I think that it is the duty of Members of Parliament and of Governments in some cases to educate public opinion to the proper standard on matters of this kind. With regard to the Berlin Conference, I think that the cotton operatives of this country were very well represented; Mr. Birtwistle knows thoroughly what are their views and feelings. The Home Secretary has argued as if the half-time system relieves us of the necessity of carrying out that recommendation, but I do not think so. There may be educational advantages, I believe there are, in that system; but the recommendation is absolute not to allow any children to enter any employment before they are 12. The hon. Baronet the Member for Manchester says the delegates reserved to themselves the question of when this should be brought into operation, and he says it is a question of time and ingenuity and should be done by degrees. I entirely agree that it should be done by degrees; but what I complain of is that the Government are not taking a step in advance. The hon. Baronet says that parents, rather than employers, would object to the alteration. With regard to the parents, my opinion is that it will only be the less thrifty and careful of them that will object to a change of this kind, and I think that we should make such a change gradually. We had always done it in a very gradual way. When the law was altered as to the employment of boys in mines, those already employed were allowed to go on as before, and a year and ample time was allowed in order that the employers should adapt themselves to the change. Nobody will object to time being allowed, but the Government ought to have endeavoured to raise the standard of age, and thereby have effected a great improvement on the existing condition of things. No doubt Germany and some other countries on the Continent are influenced in the action they had taken very much by military consideration, but it is surely not less important for us as a great industrial country to care for the physical and mental development of our people. I should like to remind the Home Secretary of what took place two or three years ago with regard to the Mines Regulation Bill. As introduced it left the age at 10. I submitted an Amendment raising it to 12, and that Amendment was carried by an overwhelming majority. The question was again raised on Report, and it was again carried by a diminished majority, but still a very substantial one. But in the meantime we had representations from the employers and also from the men specially affected urging that we should maintain the age at 10. But I and my colleagues did not listen to those representations at all. We believed that they were dictated by narrow and selfish considerations. We believed the great mass of the miners would support us in our endeavour to raise the age of the half-timers; and for my part I quite believe that the same thing would happen with regard to the cotton trade, where the great majority of the operatives would also be in favour of raising the age. I am quite sure that the opinion of this House and the general opinion of the public outside will support Her Majesty's Government if they can only be induced to take a more courageous course in dealing with this matter. There is just one other point to which I should like to refer. I think that, considering that one of the difficulties we have to face in the foreign competition we are subjected to arises from the long hours and the low wages of the Continental workpeople, together with some other factors which I need not go into, we, having entered into the Berlin Conference, and having thereby become a party to the recommendation it made with regard to the limitation of age, are in honour bound to give effect to that recommendation. I ask Her Majesty's Government how they can expect other nations, who are behind us in regard to many other subjects, to come up to our standard in those matters if we refuse to take a step in advance in some of those questions in which we are far behind them?

Mr. Tomlinson

*(10.32.) COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince): In regard to the question of age, to which reference has been made by the hon. Member for Morpeth, I may state that I saw some of the deputations of miners which came up to London to request that the Secretary of State might still permit boys to work in the thin seams at 10 years old, and that I gathered from them that the fathers wished their boys to work with them in the mines, because if they did not do this they would have to go further away and work in the mills. I am certainly of opinion that there should be a uniform age established for all the great industries throughout the country, and that that should be 12 years rather than 10.

*(10.34.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): The tone in which this Bill has been received on both sides of the House is, I think, a matter of congratulation for the Government. Of Having myself been a manufacturer for a quarter of a century, I think I may say that we also should take credit in that there has been on this occasion nothing like the selfish opposition from employers which greeted the old Factory Acts when they were introduced. I have only three serious objections to advance against this Bill. The first is that it excludes the domestic workshops. That is a matter which I hope the Government will very carefully consider. It is a very grave and important matter, but it is one which only affects the large towns and cities, for which special arrangements might easily be made. I think it would be a thousand pities if this Bill were passed without something being done to put a stop to the abominable sweating which takes place in workshops outside the ken and control of the Factory Inspector. Secondly, I want to add my word of protest about the half-timers; and here I endorse every word which fell from my hon. Friend when he urged that we should not lose this golden opportunity of raising the standard of age at which the children are permitted to work as half-timers. In the West of England—in Gloucestershire and Wiltshire—there are practically no half-timers. We do not employ children there until they have reached the age of 13 or 14, and I do not think there would be any opposition worth talking about on the part of the working classes if we were to raise the age to 12, as recommended by the Berlin Conference. I do not believe it would in the result hurt my brother manufacturers in the North, for I believe that the rising generation of industrial hands would by a development of technical and evening continuation schools be enabled to grow up far more capable than they are at present of maintaining the manufacturing supremacy of this country. My third objection is to Clause 13. I certainly think that to insert a 12 hours clause in an Act of Parliament as the recognised period of daily labour for women is a monstrous thing at this time of day. Of course, we shall in the Grand Committee have an opportunity of ventilating all these questions one by one; but I should have liked to have heard more expression of opinion from both sides of the House in reference to Clause 13, to the effect that the maximum number of hours during which women should be employed away from their homes should be 10 instead of 12. I have a word also to say as to Clause 7, relating to fire escapes. Although this is only a matter of detail, I cannot help making this protest, that if the lives of the operatives are so endangered that we ought to provide a second escape in case of fire, that it is quite as necessary in existing factories as in those which are to be erected after the year 1892. Either this second escape is necessary or it is not. If it is not necessary do not impose the obligation; if it be necessary, put upon us—the manufacturers—the obligation of providing it. I will only add a word about the doctors. After what has been said the Government will be obliged to give in. No one will be more surprised than the doctors themselves when they see the love and affection they inspire in hon. Members on both sides of this House. With regard to clause 17, as to the half day's holiday, I think a fourteen days' notice is too long, and that it will be well to reduce it to seven. In country districts the people sometimes do not know 14 days beforehand the occasion on which they may desire a half-holiday, and it would be better to require only a week's notice. As to the other details of the Bill I will not detain the House; I congratulate the Government on having brought in the Bill; it is a small but useful measure, and I congratulate the House that it has met with so much approval on the part of the Representatives and employers of labour. I can only hope that when this and the other Bill proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) have been considered by the Grand Committee upstairs, the result will be the passage of a measure that will do at least something to make the lives of those who work in our factories and workshops more happy and more wholesome.

Mr. Winterbotham

*(10.40.) MR. HINCKES (Staffordshire, Leek): I only desire to call the attention of the House to one point which I think is deserving the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. I know from my own experience as an Inspector of private adventure schools that a large number of schools were started for the express purpose of enabling the certificates to be given by means of which the children are allowed to go to work. It has hitherto been found hardly possible to suppress these schools which practically serve no other purpose, because the Factory Inspectors have been in the habit of recognising the certificates obtained from them as sufficient authority for sending the children to work. I hope we shall be enabled to obtain some assurance from the Home Office, that in future the Inspectors will be instructed to inquire into the character of these schools, and to refuse to recognise the certificates obtained from really worthless sources.

*(10.42.) MR. LENG (Dundee): If the half-time system is a bad system, then I represent one of the worst cities in the Kingdom; but if it be a good system then I represent one of the best cities, because I believe that in proportion to its manufacturing operations we have a larger number of half-timers in Dundee than are to be found in almost any other manufacturing town. The reason why I have risen to speak on this subject is that, on account of this large proportion of half-timers in Dundee, this question is a very serious one for my constituency. My own sympathies are all in favour of raising the statutory age at which children may be employed, but at the same time, I cannot but recognise the fact that if a sudden change were made, it might cause a serious derangement in the conditions under which the factory system is at present carried on. While we have in Dundee so large a number of half-timers, the employers have been exceedingly liberal in the erection of half-time schools; these have been in existence for many years, and having been efficiently conducted have produced the best possible results. Therefore, I think the employers would object to any sudden change which would materially interfere with existing arrangements. I am aware, however, that outside the employers there is, especially among the Trades Union class, a general desire that the age should be raised. On the other hand, I am certain that if the parents generally were polled on the subject at the present moment, the majority would be found to object to this proposal. Therefore, I think, that in view of these varied interests it is desirable that while we should aim at raising the age, this should be done in the gradual manner which the hon. Member who represents one of the Manchester Divisions has recommended. I will only say one word upon the question of certifying surgeons. In connection with this half-time system, so eager are the parents, and so eager are the children to obtain employment at the earliest possible age, that there have been numerous cases in which the certificates have been transferred from those to whom they rightly belonged, to children of much younger years, who produced them, though really false certificates; and unless we have surgeons to check these certificates there is very little doubt that a very large number of children of much younger age than ought to be employed would be employed. I certainly agree that with these surgeons to attest the age of children there would be few children who would be employed at too young an age. I understood the Home Secretary in reply to my question to say that he has already the power to appoint women Inspectors, but that on grounds of inexpediency, economy, and practicability, he did not see his way to exercise it. These reasons are generally advanced at the earlier stages of a new proposal. I can only say that feeling among the female operatives of Dundee is strongly in favour of the appointment of Inspectors of their own sex. A deputation of these female operatives waited upon me and my hon. Colleague, and they stated that they seldom if ever saw an Inspector, or if they did see him they had no opportunity of speaking to him. They added that there were numerous sanitary matters on which they would like to speak to Inspectors of their own sex which they could not well bring under the attention of a man. Of more than a million operatives engaged in factories, 700,000 are women, and yet there is not a single female Inspector. I am quite certain that the right hon. Gentleman, who spoke of economy, could employ a large number of women as Inspectors at rates with which they would be perfectly satisfied—and lower than are paid to the male Inspectors. There is no doubt that if you are to have an efficient system of inspection, especially if you extend the Factory Act to workshops, you must add to the staff of Inspectors. A number of well educated and intelligent women could be employed as Inspectors. The deputation of female operatives said that frequently some of their number were injured by pieces of machinery, but they had no opportunity of gaining the attention of the Inspector, who was generally talked over by the mill foreman. I am sure this work of inspection would be appropriate for those ladies who are leaving our colleges and universities, and for whose abilities there is at present some difficulty in finding an outlet.

*(10.52.) MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to impress upon the Home Secretary the necessity of considering very seriously the position of the staff of Inspectors at the Home Office. It is at present wholly inadequate to perform the duties which devolve upon it, and I hope the Home Secretary will be able to give some assurance to the House that, in the event of this Bill emerging from Committee in a form which will justify his acceptance of it, he will secure a sufficient staff to carry its provisions into effect. Considerable dissatisfaction exists among the working classes with the system under which Inspectors are at present appointed. The candidate for an inspectorship is called upon to pass an examination such as makes it generally impossible for a working man to become an Inspector.

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not know whether my hon. Friend is aware that the scheme of examination has been revised with the very object of meeting the case of working men.

*MR. BYRON REED: I was not aware of that. Has it been placed before the House as a Parliamentary Paper?

MR. MATTHEWS: No.

*MR. BYRON REED: Then perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will lay it on the Table and let the House have an opportunity of examining it. I desire to give earnest support to this Bill, and I hope that its details will be threshed out upstairs, with the result that we shall speedily have an improvement in our system of factory inspection, and above all a definition of the duties and areas of Inspectors responsible to the Home Department.

(10.55.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The duties of Inspectors will be considerably increased by this Bill, and, seeing that the number of women employed in these factories exceeds the number of men, the right hon. Gentleman must no doubt be aware that there has been for a long time very much dissatisfaction among workwomen and among those interested in their condition, that there should not, among all the Inspectors, be one female Inspector. I can bear testimony to the interest which exists in this matter among a large number of workwomen. They feel that there are many matters connected with their well-being in workshops and factories which can only be inquired into by women. I believe frequent representations have been made on the subject by women's societies and trades' organisations, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will bear them in mind, and that if reasons exist in his mind against making this concession, he will state them to the House in order that we may be able to meet them. I certainly commend this matter of female Inspectors very earnestly to the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, assuring him that it will give us great satisfaction if he can see his way to make this amendment.

(10.58.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I am sure the Home Secretary must feel thoroughly satisfied with the discussion, and that it would have been a great mistake to have taken the Second Reading sub silentio. I congratulate him and the House on the tone and temper of the discussion, which has been free from any Party feeling. There has been no desire on either side to minimise the benefits of the measure or to deprecate the efforts of the Home Secretary, or to condemn severely any defects that the measure may exhibit. I am very glad in that respect that the House of Commons has not followed the example of some hon. and right hon.

Mr. Byron Reed

Gentlemen who sit on the Treasury Bench, and who, since this measure has been introduced, have made Party speeches, which I very much deplore, and which, if made in this House, would have set a very bad example. This question is above Party, concerning, as it does, our industries, and the physical, moral, and mental wellbeing of the great mass of the population. Now, Sir, while there are many features in the Bill which I am very glad to see, I hope when we get it upstairs we shall be able to amend it in certain others of its features. I confess to a feeling of disappointment, when I opened it, at its shortcomings. There are many shortcomings in the Bill. It does not, for instance, contain adequate provisions for dealing with the Report of the Sweating Committee and the dreadful disclosures which were made during the progress of the inquiry by that Committee. The proposals of the Bill in regard to this matter are extremely meagre. In the matter of the age of children the proceedings of the Conference of Berlin have been entirely ignored. The right hon. Gentleman, with a wave of his hand, disposed of everything done by that Conference. I congratulated Her Majesty's Government the first moment I heard that, at the invitation of the Emperor of Germany, they intended to go into the Conference. It was the first opportunity that England had ever had of going into an International Conference upon the labour question, and no country will gain so much by international co-operation on the labour question as England. It is our interest to bring other nations up to our level of factory legislation, and it is our interest, where they have gone beyond us in the protection and education of children, to follow their legislation and to try to come up to their level. I congratulate the Government, therefore, on what they did. But I must say, also, I congratulate them, and I did so from the first moment, on the persons they appointed to represent them at Berlin. I have read the Report of the Conference over and over again, and have saturated my mind with it, which I am afraid the Government have not done—the right hon. Gentleman has not got the whole of the facts. I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Chatham for the admirable manner in which he conducted his part of the proceedings, and to the hon. Member for Morpeth and the hon. Baronet the Member for Manchester for the way in which they supported him. There is no more useful record on the labour question in modern times than is to be found within the limits of the Blue Book on the subject, and I wish that every Member of Parliament and every Minister on the Government Bench would inform themselves thoroughly of its contents. According to the Home Secretary there is no moral obligation on the Government, from what happened at Berlin, to carry out the agreement signed by our representative. The right hon. Gentleman said that, so far from our being in any way bound, Mr. Scott only gave his consent to the proposal as to age ad referendum. But if the right hon. Gentleman had pursued the Report a little further he would have found that Mr. Scott only made that statement in Committee of the Conference. The Conference was divided up into sub-sections, and Mr. Scott was appointed member of that sub-committee which dealt with child labour, and when they came to the question of raising the age he said he could not agree to it except ad referendum, and it was referred to Lord Salisbury. Sir J. Gorst, writing on the 13th of March, said that the sub-committee discussed the age of the admission of children to work in factories, and passed a resolution for the absolute limit of 12 years. There were eight votes in favour of the resolution, namely, those of Germany, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, the Netherlands, Sweden and Switzerland, and no votes against it; but the representatives of England, Spain, and Italy abstained from voting. Sir John Gorst added—

"We are all, including our experts, in favour of the above resolution, and shall be glad to receive instructions as to whether we shall be supported in plenary conference."

Our Factory Inspector (Mr. Wimper) was in favour of it, as were also Mr. Birtwistle, who represented the operatives of Lancashire, the hon. Baronet the Member for Manchester, and Mr. Burnett, of the Board of Trade. Two days after, on the 15th of March, Lord Salisbury telegraphed that he approved the course proposed in the sub-committee. Sir J. Gorst wrote on the 25th of March that they understood they had his Lordship's authority to assent to three proposals which were in advance of our present law, namely, raising the minimum age of child labour to 12, raising the minimum age for underground labour to 14, and the cessation from labour for four weeks for a woman who had been confined. Lord Salisbury's answer was:—"Your attitude approved. You may consent to the proposals." Can anything be more explicit than that? There is no reservation about it. The right hon. Gentleman has adopted in the Bill one of the proposals. He has adopted that relating to women, but he has not adopted that relating to children. Children have no votes, but their parents have; and I know the grounds of the right hon. Gentleman's action and have some sympathy with him. Twenty years ago I brought forward a Factory Bill. At that time children were employed in factories at the age of eight years, and in North of England towns—in Lancashire and Yorkshire—the sound of their little clogs could be heard passing through the street at half-past 5 in the morning, in order that the factory gates might be reached when the bell rang, and work might be commenced at 6 o'clock. I brought in a Bill to lower the hours of labour for women, and to raise the age of children. Some workpeople came to me and said that they needed the children's labour; and the employers also objected to the restriction. I told those people that it was at their request I had brought forward the Bill, and that I had inserted the clause which had been objected to on my own resolution; and I told them that if they opposed the clause raising the age of the children I would drop the entire Bill. I said "Take which you please." They allowed me to persevere, and I carried the Bill. The Government took the matter up in 1874—it became a test question at the elections, and we carried the Bill. How was it done? Precisely as you might carry this Bill, with provisions further restricting child labour. We did not do it rashly, proposing that the new provisions should take effect in a day or a year. What the right hon. Gentleman might now do is what Mr. Cross did when he was Home Secretary. The legislation was not sudden in its effect or retrospective. The children who were in the mills were allowed to remain there. After a year the age was raised to nine, and after two years to 10; and from that time to this there has not been a word of dissent uttered against the change. In the Bill the House is now discussing, as I have said, only one of the recommendations of the Berlin Conference has been adopted, although we are pledged to carry out those I have enumerated. What were the resolutions of the Conference as to child labour? They were seven—

“Children of either sex not having reached a certain age not to work in factories, and the limit of age to be fixed at 12 years, except in southern countries, where the limit may be 10.”

All our representatives at the Conference objected to this limitation in the case of southern countries, and they fought the question persistently. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir J. Gorst) objected to anyone in southern countries employing children of 10 years of age—we shall see what you do in India by-and-by—

“Children below 14 years of age shall work neither at night nor on Sundays, and their work shall not exceed six hours a day, and shall be broken by a rest of at least half an hour; children shall be excluded from unhealthy and dangerous processes unless effective measures are taken for their protection.”

An hon. MEMBER: We are beyond them?

MR. MUNDELLA: How are we beyond them? We commence working children at 10 years of age; they recommend 12, and 14 in the cases I am referring to. There is nothing more discreditable than the low standards, the passing of which enable children to work half-time. It is not the fault of the Education Department. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council (Sir W. Hart Dyke) is not in the Cabinet, and does not control the decisions of the Cabinet. I observe that the Vice President has not said a word in support of the Home Secretary's statement that half-time education is as good as whole-time education. He is far too shrewd a man. Now, what was the conclusion of the Conference after all the agreements were signed? The right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Gorst) said—

“We can pledge ourselves for Great Britain. Our Government, faithful to its action in the past, will conform resolutely in the future, even if it does not go beyond them, to the benevolent resolutions of the Conference.”

I wish the Government were willing to conform to the benevolent resolutions of the Conference. As it is an unpopular duty, I am quite prepared to have as much responsibility as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Matthews) pleases placed on the Opposition. We have already been instrumental in raising the age for factory work, and we are quite willing to take the responsibility of further action of the same kind. I want to know what is to be said about the effect of Royal Commissions? There is going to be a Royal Commission on Labour. Is it going to do anything, or is it to prevent anything being done? I hold in my hand the Report made by the Royal Commission on Education appointed by the Government in 1885. Lord Cross presided over it, and the Report was unanimously agreed to by every member of the Commission. The majority of that Commission were in favour of raising the minimum age of half-timers to 11 years. The minority would have been willing to go further, but in order to secure unanimity they agreed to that. Three years ago, then, a Commission reported that the half-time age should be raised to 11. Why does not the right hon. Gentleman accept that? That is surely not too advanced a step for him. I hope he will allow that alteration to be made in Committee. I would like to give the right hon. Gentleman a little encouragement on the point. Some years ago I was the guest of the late Sir Titus Salt, who was one of the largest manufacturers of Bradford goods in the world, and he impressed on me that the time had come for raising the age to 12. Immediately after the Report of the Berlin Conference was circulated I met one of the largest employers in Lancashire, Mr. Thomas Ashton, of Manchester, and he said he was quite prepared to go to 12 for half-timers. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, need not be apprehensive of any great opposition if the alteration is made temperately and by steps. It was shown by the hon. Baronet opposite that the number of half-timers has decreased by nearly one-third during the last 10 or 12 years. That is because parents are now more in favour of education and are more considerate of their children. Surely the House ought to do what it can to educate public opinion, as was well said in the most manly and able speech of the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), and to encourage these temperate, wise, and thrifty parents by gradually raising the age at which children may be employed. The right hon. Gentleman said to-night that his desire was to bring all factories and workshops up to the same sanitary level. I wish that was likely to be the effect of the Bill, and I hope when the measure leaves the Committee that will be its effect. I should like the right hon. Gentleman to tell us whether he thinks that Clause 19 is likely to raise the standard. I hold no brief for the certifying surgeons. I have paid their fees for the greater part of my life, and I believe they have earned them well and done excellent service to the country. Lord Shaftesbury, when I spoke to him about certifying surgeons, was always strenuous in maintaining that their services should be continued. There is abundant evidence not only that they frequently reject children, but that their work has acted as a great deterrent against the employment of sickly, weakly, and diseased children. Parents know now that it would be useless to take such children to the certifying surgeons. In many cases evidence has been placed in my hands that children suffering from scarlet fever and other infectious diseases have been presented to and rejected by the doctor and sent home to be cured. Surely this is most important in the interests of the health of the country. I think the right hon. Gentleman has made a great mistake in this attempt to abolish the office of certifying surgeons. I do not say these gentlemen have done all they might have done, but I think that, instead of abolishing their office, the right hon. Gentleman might turn them to very much better account. They ought not to be retained merely for certifying the fitness of children for work. They ought also to occasionally walk through the factories and report to Her Majesty's Inspectors if they find any child in an insanitary condition or suffering from infectious diseases. I feel very strongly on these questions, because when I read the excellent addresses delivered at the Berlin Conference by men like M. Jules Simon, whose life has been devoted to improving the condition of the children of his country, and the admirably sympathetic response of my right hon. Friend opposite (Sir J. Gorst), I feel sure that if we are to make the people of this country a vigorous, happy, moral, and intellectual population we must begin by taking care of the children. The responsibility rests with this House. What we do in the present will decide the conditions of the future and the sort of population that will ultimately carry on the government of this country.

Mr. Mundella

*(11.36.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): I think that before this Debate closes the House ought to know what was resolved at the Berlin Conference before it accepts the strictures of the right hon. Gentleman. It would appear from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that it was resolved at that Conference that until the age of 14 all whole-time work should be prohibited; but that was not the case. It was simply resolved that no child should be employed by night or on a Sunday, but except in that connection the age of 14 was not mentioned as the minimum age at all. The resolutions contemplated that children of 12 should have their hours of labour limited to 36 in the week, which is beyond the limit at present fixed by the law in England. Therefore, as regards children between the ages of 12 and 13, our law is better than that laid down at Berlin. At the age of 13, if a child cannot pass a given standard it may not be employed more than 28 hours a week in a textile factory, or 30 hours in a non-textile factory. But under the resolutions of the Berlin Conference any child between the age of 12 and 14 could be employed for 36 hours a week in any industry except mines. What, then, becomes of the reckless and indiscriminate charge that not one of the very important resolutions of the Berlin Conference has been given effect to? It is true that the first resolution—to the effect that children of either sex shall be excluded below the age of 12—is only partially carried out by the Government's Bill; but that is the only instance where the recommendations of the Berlin Conference are not fully realised. That Conference required that the children should satisfy the Local Authorities as to their education, and that those under 14 should not be employed at night. The Berlin Conference, too, fixed a higher maximum period of employment than this Bill, and it also prohibited the engagement of children in unhealthy occupations, but so, too, does the existing Factory Act. The Government have simply carried out the understanding of the Berlin Delegates that, in giving effect to the resolutions of the Conference, the different countries shall be able to pay some regard to special difficulties and circumstances. Therefore, we are entitled to look at this Bill from that point of view. Side by side with the remedies proposed the mischiefs which call for those remedies ought to be considered; and before making a revolutionary change in the industries of the North of England, the English Government have a right to demand that, in the numerous other matters of health and danger dealt with at the Conference, foreign legislation shall be more nearly brought up to English standards. It ought to be remembered that in most of these matters foreign laws do not come up to our standard. The Government are ready to acknowledge the sympathetic spirit with which their sanitary provisions have been received, but it would have been fairer if hon. Members, when declaring the shortcomings of these resolutions, had specified what those shortcomings are. I venture to submit that they are very inconsiderable. The whole question of the sanitation of factories and workshops is almost inextricably complicated with the provisions of the health law. In the desire to get uniformity of administration the Government have been obliged to hand over the workshops entirely to the Local Authority, and in doing that they have revived and brought into operation a quantity of most important and valuable provisions which do not appear on the face of the Bill. It is only fair that this should be borne in mind. And now I come to matters of detail. With regard to the question of fire-escapes and the distinction between present buildings and future buildings, there is abundant precedent for it in the legislation of all times. Great structural alterations cannot be enforced in existing establishments without reasonable inquiry into the necessities of the case. No such consideration, however, will hinder action in the case of future buildings, all of which will have to conform to a fully sufficient minimum standard of provision against fire. The hon. Member for the Rhondda Division thinks there is not adequate provision for the fencing of machinery. But not only do we strengthen existing provisions in that respect, we also, by our Arbitration Clauses, deal with cases where for fencing purposes a great expenditure of capital may be necessary. As to overtime, it is only fair that the views of the public should be brought to our notice. It is undoubtedly necessary to provide against a standing increase in the hours of labour. The provision relating to certifying surgeons has not been put into the Bill by my right hon. Friend for his own amusement. It was urged upon his attention by the largest, most influential, most unanimous, and most widely representative deputation that I have ever seen—a deputation representing the employers and the employed in all the textile industries of the Kingdom. That deputation was introduced by the hon. Member for West Nottingham, and, remembering the speech delivered by the hon. Member this evening, I should like to know whether the hon. Member is still of opinion that these certificates are a meaningless form and a burden upon industry, and that they ought to be abolished.

Mr. Stuart Wortley

*MR. BROADHURST: I said nothing of the kind.

*MR. STUART WORTLEY: That, at any rate, was the view of the hon. Member when he introduced the deputation. Some hon. Members have talked as if the present use of the certificate system is an effective safeguard against disease and infection; but that is scarcely ever the case. I submit that the conduct of the Government in waiting until public opinion has unmistakably manifested itself with regard to the minimum age of employment is not unreasonable. But there is no doubt the question is one which the Government are willing shall be considered fairly in Committee. But we desire that the decision come to shall be such as public opinion in this country will support and the necessities of our competition with foreign industries will justify.

(11.44.) MR. KESSELMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I should like to make a suggestion with regard to the 19th clause. Could not the medical certificate be retained, and the charge for it be defrayed out of public funds? I think that would get rid of much of the objection to it. Also, I should like to know whether it would be in the purview of the Bill to move an Amendment bringing within its scope all engaged in sale shops. Such an extension would do away with the necessity for the Bill of the right hon. Baronet the Member for the London University.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Trade, &c."

*(11.46.) MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): May I venture to suggest that it would be better to refer this Bill to a Select Committee? It deals largely with questions connected with the textile factories, and I have found that on the Standing Committee on Trade there are scarcely any representatives connected with those trades. I make these observations for the purpose of calling attention to this matter, in the hope that the Government will see their way to strengthening the representation of the textile trades on the Committee.

(11.47.) MR. MATTHEWS: My hon. Friend may perhaps remember that the Committee of Selection have full powers to add members to the Grand Committee, and they will, no doubt, bear in mind the matter to which the hon. Member has referred.

(11.48.) MR. ESSLEMONT: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer my question as to extending the provisions of the Bill to persons employed in sale shops?

MR. MATTHEWS: It would not be within the scope of the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY.

Order read for going into Committee of Supply.

*(11.50.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope the House will allow the first Vote to be taken to-night.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I am afraid I can hardly support that request of the right hon. Gentleman. I believe that on the previous occasion the Vote was under discussion for less than an hour, and, anxious as I am to assist in passing the Army Estimates, I do not think we are justified in hastily agreeing to a Vote involving an expenditure of £5,500,000.

Committee deferred till to-morrow.

ELECTORAL DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.—(No. 182.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

ARCHDEACONRY OF CORNWALL BILL [LORDS.].—(No. 177.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

(11.53.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

*MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I hope the Government will proceed with this Bill. The arguments were fully developed when it was last before us.

(11.54.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): The hon. Gentleman seems to think that when he has spoken the arguments are fully developed. I can assure him there are many more arguments on this Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

ASSESSMENT OF TAXES (REGULATION OF REMUNERATION) BILL.—(No. 221.)

Read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

CUSTODY OF CHILDREN BILL [LORDS]. (No. 216.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(11.56.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I hope the House will permit this Bill to be read a second time. It consists of three clauses, and removes difficulties which ought to be got rid of in the interest of all sects and creeds. At the request of the hon. Member for North Belfast the Bill stood over from last Session, and he was good enough to intimate to me that during the interval it should be carefully considered to ascertain if there was any objection to it. I therefore hope the House will read the Bill a second time.

(11.57.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think most of the objections to the Bill have disappeared, but the present is not a very favourable time for consultation between my colleagues and myself, and I therefore hope the Attorney General will allow the matter to stand over, on the understanding that there will be no factious opposition to the Bill.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Certainly.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday next.

FACTORIES (CERTIFICATES OF BIRTH) FEES) (BILL.—(No. 188.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. D. Randell.)

*MR. STUART WORTLEY: As the hon. Member knows, the subject of this Bill has been embodied in the Bill discussed to-night. I understand that if the Second Reading is agreed to he will not proceed with the future stages of the measure.

*MR. D. RANDELL: I agree.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION BILL.—(No. 40.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir H. Roscoe.)

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I hope the hon. Gentleman will postpone the Motion for two or three days, when I hope to be in possession of information which it is essential to have in considering the measure.

MR. C. T. D. ACLAND (Cornwall, Launceston): Would it not be possible to take this stage to-night? The County Councils are anxiously awaiting the Bill.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I object.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

Sir R. Webster

FACTORY AND WORKSHOPS ACT (1878) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 2.)

Order for Committee read, and discharged.

Bill committed to the Committee on the Factories and Workshops Bill.

SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON (SUPER-ANNUATION) BILL.—(No. 49.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [10th February], "That Mr. Bartley be a Member of the Select Committee on the School Board for London (Superannuation) Bill."

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. Causton, Sir John Colomb, Mr. Duncan, Sir Julian Goldsmid, Mr. Howell, Colonel Hughes, Mr. John Kelly, Mr. Lawson, Mr. Francis Powell, Mr. James Rowlands, Mr. Tuite, and Sir Richard Temple nominated other Members of the Committee.

Ordered, that the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Sir Richard Temple.)

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee to consider the whole question of the Superannuation of Elementary School Teachers in England and Wales.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of Eighteen Members.

Ordered, That Mr. Talbot, Mr. Arthur Acland, Sir Richard Paget, Mr. Mather, and Mr. W. F. Lawrence be added to the Committee.—(Sir William Hart Dyke.)

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (SCOTLAND) LOANS BILL.—(No. 57.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday, 3rd June.

PUBLIC HEALTH (LONDON) LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Ritchie, Bill to amend the laws relating to Public Health in London, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Secretary Matthews, and Mr. Long.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 231.]

PUBLIC HEALTH (LONDON) LAW CONSOLIDATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Ritchie, Bill to consolidate the laws relating to Public Health in London, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Secretary Matthews, and Mr. Long.

Bill presented and read first time. [Bill 232.]

House adjourned at ten minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 27th February, 1891.

FISHERY BOARD (SCOTLAND) BILL.

[H.L.]—(No. 17).

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of LOTHIAN): My Lords, this Bill has been for some time before your Lordships' House, and I have now to ask you to give it a Second Reading. The object of the Bill is to alter and amend the constitution of the Fishery Board for Scotland. That Board as it at present exists was constituted under the Act of 1882, and it consists of nine members. Those members were, all directly appointed by Her Majesty; three of them were bound to be sheriffs and one was nominated by Her Majesty to be Chairman of the Board. The alteration which I propose to make in the constitution of the Board is with the object of giving a more popular interest in its work. In order to show your Lordships the importance of the work which is undertaken by this Board, I should like to give very shortly some statistics showing the value of the fisheries as at present existing in Scotland. In 1889 the total value of the fish landed was £1,454,000, and the weight was 5,589,000 cwt., exclusive of the shell-fish, the value of which was £63,000, making a gross total with the other fish of £1,517,000. The number of boats employed off the coast of Scotland in fishing was 14,714, and their tonnage was 279,000 odd, representing capital to the amount of £1,603,000. The number of persons employed in connection with sea fishing on the Scottish coasts, exclusive of foreigners, was 109,757. Not only is the value of this fishing very great at this moment, but the importance of the sea fisheries is growing year by year, as will be seen by reference to the statistics of the herring fisheries. The number of barrels of herrings cured in 1889 was 7·63 per cent. above the average yearly number during the last ten years, 41·88 per cent. above the yearly average of the last 25 years, and 78·11 per cent. above the yearly average of the last 50 years. Furthermore, the growth of the herring fisheries has been advancing at an increasingly rapid rate. The increase of the yearly average for 1849-58 above that for 1839-48 was 15 per cent; for 1859-68, over 1849-58, 5·22 per cent.; for 1869-78 over 1859-68, 29·34 per cent.; and for 1879-88 over 1869-78, 55·63 per cent. I think those statistics will show your Lordships the very great value of the work which is superintended by the Fishery Board for Scotland. But not only are the direct interests of the fishery industry entrusted to them in Scotland, but they have also other indirect interests which they have wholly to superintend. Besides the carrying out of the numerous Acts regulating the Scotch Sea Fisheries, the Board has also the general superintendence of the District Boards created under the Salmon Fishery Acts. The entire herring-branding interest is under their control; and not only that, but they have funds under their control for the construction of harbours in Scotland and also for providing guarantees for the extension of telegraphs for the benefit of the fisheries, under the regulations of the General Post Office. As the work of the Fishery Board in Scotland is so very important it has now been thought desirable to give the Board a more representative and popular character than it has hitherto possessed. As I have already told your Lordships, under the Act of 1882 all the members of this Board were directly appointed by Her Majesty. What the Government propose to do under this Bill is still to keep the same number of members as formed the Board under the Act of 1882, but that out of that number only five shall be directly appointed by Her Majesty. The remaining four it is proposed shall be nominated and elected by the Committees for the four different districts of Scotland into which it is proposed that the Secretary for Scotland shall divide the whole country. The manner in which it is proposed to do this under the Bill is as follows: On the passing of this Bill the Secretary for Scotland shall, as soon as possible, divide the whole of Scotland into four separate fishery districts; in each of those districts a local Sea-fishery Board or Committee shall be appointed, the constitution of which will be as follows: the County Councils in the different districts will appoint members, and the Royal and Parliamentary Burghs will also appoint members to act upon those local Sea-fishery Committees. The conditions under which these appointments are made and the number representing each body will be defined and decided by the Secretary for Scotland, in an Order which he will issue for the purpose. But in addition to those members of the Fishery Committees who will represent the County Councils and the Royal and Parliamentary Burghs, it is proposed that representatives nominated by the County Councils and by the Royal and Parliamentary Burghs shall be appointed representing directly the fishery interests. The proportions between the numbers of members representing the County Councils, those representing the Royal and Parliamentary Burghs, and those directly representing what may be called the fishery interest, and who may therefore be described as the "fishery members," will be settled by the Order of the Secretary for Scotland. When the Fishery Committees are appointed for each of the four districts into which Scotland is divided for the purpose of this Bill, each Committee will elect one member, who is to be their representative on the Fishery Board. Therefore, counting the five members who are to be appointed by Her Majesty and the four members, one representing each district, to be appointed by election in each of those districts, the total number on the Fishery Board will be nine, as at present. I think your Lordships will see that it is very desirable this change should take place in the constitution of the Fishery Board. Your Lordships may remember that four years ago I endeavoured to give a more popular and direct representation on the Fishery Board to different parts of Scotland, by appointing members from each district in Scotland, who should represent the interests of that district, and I am bound to say that the value of the work done by the Fishery Board has been very much increased by the arduous and self-sacrificing labours of the gentleman thus appointed; but although that has done a great deal to meet the necessities of the fishery interests in Scotland, I think the time has now arrived when it is possible to give them a more direct and adequate representation on that Board. The mere fact of the passing of the Local Government Act for Scotland in 1889 has made it possible to institute a better state of matters altogether. Before the passing of that Act there were no local bodies in Scotland to whom could be entrusted the election of members to represent them on the Fishery Board; but now the whole circumstances have changed and you have a popular and representative body to whom this duty can, with great advantage, be confided. In proposing this alteration to your Lordships in the constitution of the Fishery Board, I should like to say one word in recognition of its services. In making this proposal I have not a single word to say against the work which has been done by the Fishery Board, as now existing, as constituted under the Act of 1882. The enormous amount of work they have done, the great number of very often conflicting interests which they have had to supervise, the extremely important duties they have had to undertake, the very large sums of money they have had to distribute to the satisfaction of those who are interested all over Scotland, and the generally satisfactory way in which they have performed all those duties show that they are deserving of high praise. I do not desire in any sense to be understood as meaning that I am not satisfied with the work they have performed; and it must be remembered that, with the exception of the Chairman of the Board and the Secretary, every one of those gentlemen have served their country without any remuneration. I do not think I need detain your Lordships with any further observations on the constitution of the Fishery Board. I think I have made it clear to your Lordships that Her Majesty's Government do not intend to alter the duties and responsibilities of the Board, the primary object of this Bill being as I have explained as far as possible and within proper safeguards to give a more popular representation on the Board to the different fishery interests in Scotland. There are a few additional powers and duties which I propose to impose on the Fishery Board, and they are powers which I think have become necessary in consequence of the Report issued by the Commission of which Mr. Marjoribanks, a Member of the other House, was Chairman. The duty with which it is proposed to invest them is the more careful protection of the mussel-beds in Scotland. I will not trouble your Lordships with statistics on the subject, beyond saying that the figures furnished from one herring fishery station show that for every 11b. of fish caught, there is very nearly 11b. of mussels used as bait, though the value of the fish is, of course, enormously in excess of the value of the bait. Now that Report brought out very clearly this fact, that there is a great want of proper bait for fishing purposes on the East Coast of Scotland. The bait has to be brought from a great distance, some from the South, some from the West, and some from abroad. Not only that, but the mussel-beds now in existence are being destroyed for want of proper supervision. There is no authority to control the use of them at present, and they are being absolutely destroyed for want of proper supervision over their use by those engaged in the sea-fisheries. Under this Bill it is proposed to give the Fishery Board power to protect and take care of the mussel-beds which are now in existence, and so to increase and cheapen the supply of bait. Your Lordships will understand from the enormous amount of fish caught that there is considerable waste and destruction of mussel-beds. It will make a great difference to the fisheries if those engaged in them are unable to get their supplies of bait at a reasonable cost, and at present the cost of those means for carrying on the fisheries seems to become greater as time goes on. There is now no public authority charged with any responsibility in the matter, and in the public interest it is very desirable that some means of control should be given for the protection of the mussel-beds. For that purpose there can be no better authority than the Fishery Board. There is only one other matter to which I need refer, and that is with regard to the powers of the Fishery Board for branding herrings caught off the Coast of Northumberland.

The Marquess of Lothian

Some years ago the Fishery Board were in the habit of branding herrings caught on the English Coast, but, owing to recent legislation, they came to the conclusion that they had no power to continue that practice any longer, and that they had been acting in excess of their powers. The result has been a considerable loss to the herring fishery off the Coast of Northumberland, because the fact of their being branded by the Fishery Board gave them greater value in the foreign markets. The object of the additional powers conferred by this Bill is to enable them to continue that practice which they have abandoned for some years past. This clause has, I may state, been introduced at the special request of those interested in the herring fisheries off the Northumbrian Coast, and with the entire concurrence of the Board of Trade, who are primarily interested. I think I have now gone through the main proposals of this Bill, and I believe it to be a measure which will very greatly increase the power for work and usefulness of the Fishery Board for Scotland. It will also, I think, have a very good effect generally in improving the fishing interests and increasing their value in that country, especially in view of the endeavours which Her Majesty's Government are prepared to make to foster and develop the fishing interests of the West Coast of Scotland. For all these reasons I think your Lordships will not decline to give a Second Reading to this Bill.

Bill read 2^a (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Ordered, That the evening sitting of the House on Tuesday next and on all subsequent Tuesdays during the present Session do commence at half-past five o'clock, unless the House shall otherwise order.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Five o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 27th February, 1891.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (GENERAL POWERS) BILL. (by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir J. Lubbock.)

*(3.10.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): On a former occasion I opposed the Second Reading of this Bill.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): Perhaps if I may be allowed to interpose I can say a word or two upon the subject of the Second Reading of this Bill, which I think may probably save the time of the House. The fact of the case is that the London County Council have consented to omit the clause which proposes to take part of Clapham Common for building purposes. Although it is called Clapham Common the proposal was to take a piece of land which forms no part of the main Common, but is simply a piece of out-lying ground of a triangular shape. At the present moment we have a Fire Brigade Station on that piece of ground, which is large enough for the fire-engines, but it is not adequate for the accommodation of the men and horses, and it is obviously desirable that the men and horses should be in the same place as the fire-engines, so that in case of fire they may reach the spot as soon as possible. The Council are, however, always anxious to meet the views of the Local Authorities and the residents, and they have been given to understand that there is a general feeling against taking any more of what may be termed the Common. The omission of the clause will, to some extent, increase the danger of fire; but as the Local Authority wish it omitted, we do not propose to insist upon it, but will withdraw it in Committee. I therefore trust that the hon. Member will not press the Instruction of which he has given notice.

*(3.12.) MR. MORTON: If it is understood that the London County Council assent to the Instruction which I had intended to move later on for the omission of Sub-section B of Clause 6 I have nothing further to say. But I do not understand from the promoters of the Bill, in the Paper which they have circulated to-day, that that is so. All they say is that they will withdraw it in Committee, but we who oppose the clause have no wish to incur the expense of going before a Committee at all. Let me explain what my position is in regard to this matter.

(3.13.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): May I be allowed to interpose for a moment. If an arrangement is made in this House by which the promoters undertake to withdraw a particular clause, it is just as binding as an Instruction to the Committee to omit the clause.

*MR. MORTON: I am not quite satisfied, and I hope that I may be allowed to make a statement. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University (Sir J. Lubbock) has said that the action we are taking in this matter may interfere with the work of the Fire Brigade. That is not so. The right hon. Baronet says that this piece of land is not a portion of the Common. I think there is no doubt that it is. It is shown on the plans in the office of the London County Council as being part of Clapham Common, and it is not quite so small as the right hon. Baronet has suggested. The piece scheduled by the London County Council is 1,400ft., or nearly one-third of an acre. I am aware that it is not intended to use the whole of it, but the Council propose to take the whole.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: I merely pointed out that it was an outlying piece of land on the verge of the Common, and, speaking on behalf of the London County Council, I have already given the hon. Member an assurance that this part of the clause will be left out.

*MR. MORTON: I am quite prepared to accept that offer, but I was desirous of showing that in 1878 the then Metropolitan Board of Works, who always took great care of this Common, actually gave us notice that we must give up our temporary occupation of this very piece of land. At that time we did what the London County Council ought to do now on their part—we removed a stone yard from that site, and purchased a piece of land for a stone yard in another part of the parish. Another complaint I have to make against the London County Council is this: They never recognised us as the Local Authorities until we gave notice in this House of opposition to the present Bill. A letter sent by the Local Authorities last year was not even replied to, and it was only when it was found that we intended to oppose the Bill upon the Second Reading that we received a recognition; and yet we now find that our views are to be assented to. As I have now an assurance that it will not be necessary for the Local Authorities to go to any expense in appearing before the Committee upstairs I shall be quite satisfied to withdraw the Instruction which was put down in the interests of the Local Authorities and of the people who reside in the vicinity of Clapham Common.

(3.15.) MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.): I think that the Instruction may now be withdrawn after the explanation of my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the London County Council that nothing will be done to interfere with Clapham Common. I may say that this morning I received an intimation from the Local Board stating that, in view of the concession which the promoters of the Bill are prepared to make, they intend to withdraw their Petition against the Bill.

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): May I ask whether any decision has been come to in regard to the notice which stands on the Paper in my name to omit Clauses 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63 and 64 from the Bill?

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: I am afraid that on behalf of the London County Council I must resist that Instruction.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

*(3.20.) MR. BARTLEY: I have now to move—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee to omit Clauses 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63 and 64 from the Bill.”

These clauses propose to enable the London County Council to provide a superannuation and provident fund for the provision and payment of other allowances on death, superannuation, resignation, retirement and discharge to persons who have been taken into the employment of the Council since the 21st of March, 1889. I object entirely to the way in which this scheme has been introduced into the Bill. It is an Omnibus Bill, which proposes to give the London County Council a number of powers of various kinds, and it involves a very comprehensive scheme of pension and superannuation allowances to the officers of the Council. In the past we have had various schemes for this object introduced into Parliament—for instance, in the case of the London Police, when the subject was introduced in a Government Bill and in a scheme which was proposed by the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple) for the officers of the London School Board. But this scheme for the superannuation of the officers of the London County Council instead of being brought in as a public measure is tacked on to a Private Bill with various other proposals in connection with the Council. It will be referred in due course to a Committee upstairs and it will be there fought out; but the scheme will not be necessarily examined in any way as to the basis of the actuarial valuation, or upon the lines upon which such a scheme of superannuation ought to be considered. I have referred to the scheme of pensions and superannuation allowances for the officers of the School Board, and I cannot see why the two schemes should be treated in a wholly different manner. As a matter of fact, this scheme is a very large one. The number of persons employed by the London County Council is, I am told, something like 4,000. Therefore the scheme is a very large and important one. It is not like the ordinary superannuation scheme of a Railway Company or of a bank where the whole cost is paid by the company themselves; but in this case we are asked to sanction a scheme mixed up with certain other proposals which is to throw one half of the cost upon the local rates of London. So far as the Bill itself is concerned, I find that it contains no real scheme at all. I have been informed privately that the London County Council have a scheme before them, but it has not been scheduled in the Bill, and no information is given to us as to the basis on which that scheme is founded. All that we know is that unlimited power is given to the London County Council to do exactly what it likes. I know that I shall be accused by the hon. Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) of attacking the London County Council. But I do not think it is attacking the County Council to say that it is only reasonable they should show us, some way or other, what the scheme is and how it is to be worked. Is it to be a scheme like that which was put into the London School Board Bill, in which an actuarial valuation was made an incident of the scheme without having undergone a sound examination. I object to any scheme being propounded until we know what that scheme is to be, and can have it laid upon the Table of the House, so that we may give an opinion upon it. Some of the clauses contained in the Bill are of a very startling character. The London County Council are to have power to frame this superannuation scheme, and they are to have the power of contributing one-half of the superannuation fund from the rates. Individually, I do not object to that proposal, but I find that the London County Council is to have, of its own ipse dixit, the right to say which of its officers shall belong to the fund, and which shall not. The Council is to be able to disqualify any person from going upon the fund, or to allow others to belong to it, just as it likes. I do not think that Parliament would be justified in handing over to the London County Council the right of saying to its employés that one shall be allowed to join, but that another shall not; and in that way to have a discretionary power to prescribe who may join and who may not. One of the clauses of the Bill says that there are to be a set of rules laying down who are to contribute and be benefitted by the fund, and who are to be disqualified from becoming contributors and participators in the benefits. I think it is only right to know whether it is to be a compulsory or a voluntary scheme. Indeed, it is a matter of essential importance that we should know that fact. Then, again, the London County Council is to have a discretionary power, dismissing any person from the benefits of the scheme whenever it may think proper; also to divide the fund into different classes, and to remove any contributor from one class to another. I would ask the House to remember what the fund is that we are going to ask the employés of the London County Council to contribute to. It is a fund for the superannuation of officers, and we are asked to give the County Council a discretionary power, when they dismiss an officer, whether for a fraudulent cause or not, to decide whether any part of the money he has contributed shall be returned to him. I maintain that the essence of a fund of this nature is that the money taken from a man's salary belongs to him whatever may afterwards occur. It is quite clear that the Council ought to have no discretion in the matter at all, but that a fund deducted from the salaries of individuals should go absolutely to the persons from whom the money has been taken. Although I know there is a difference of opinion as to the allocation of that part of the fund which is contributed from the local rates, I hold that you have no right to take a benefit away, paid for at one period of a man's life, because that person subsequently has done something wrong. There are a great number of points concerning this fund which I think ought to be threshed out by a Select Committee on the basis of some tangible and distinct plan. The right hon. Baronet opposite says that it has been considered undesirable in a scheme of this kind to go into details; but in Clause 60 the Bill descends to the smallest detail, and prescribes that copies of any scheme in force under the Act shall be supplied at a price not exceeding 6d. to any person in the employ of the Council interested in the fund. I propose that it shall be an Instruction to the Select Committee to omit all the clauses relating to the superannuation scheme. I think that they ought to be embodied in a separate Bill. It is said that a separate Bill would increase the cost; but the scheme of the County Council, in reference to sky advertisements, has been introduced as a separate measure, although it might reasonably have formed the subject of clauses in an Omnibus Bill. The question of pension and superannuation allowances, following former precedents, ought to form the subject of a separate and distinct measure. I am afraid, unless I have satisfactory assurances, that I shall be compelled to press this Instruction to a Division.

Mr. Bartley

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That it be an Instruction to the Committee to omit Clauses 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, and 64 from the Bill."—(Mr. Bartley.)

*(3.25.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I can make no complaint of the manner in which my hon. Friend opposite has brought forward this Instruction. At the same time I hope the House will not consent to it, but will allow these clauses to go to a Committee upstairs, by whom they can be thoroughly investigated. When the London County Council came into existence they found that there was already a scheme for pensions and superannuation which had been going on for some time under the auspices of the Metropolitan Board of Works. There were certain difficulties in connection with that scheme, and the County Council felt that without interfering with any of the servants already employed, it would be wise to place the matter upon a more satisfactory footing. They therefore made inquiries into the system adopted by other municipalities, by the great Railway Companies, and other large bodies, and having obtained the necessary information, they prepared the scheme which they now ask Parliament to sanction in order to enable them to put it into operation. The hon. Gentleman opposite says that the House ought to have an opportunity of considering whether, from an actuarial point of view, the scheme is satisfactory. But the scheme is one that does not require any actuarial calculation; practically, what it comes to is this: the employés of the London County Council make contributions out of their own salaries to a fund, and the County Council supply an amount equal to that contributed by the officers themselves. There is no need, therefore, for any actuarial valuation in the matter.

MR. BARTLEY: Is that in the Bill?

SIR J. LUBBOCK: No; but I make the statement by way of explanation. Then, my hon. Friend says that the scheme may lead to an increase of the rates. That cannot be the case, because under the system in force, when the County Council was established the whole amount of the pensions was paid out of the rates, whereas if this Bill is passed practically one-half only will be paid out of the rates, while the other half will be contributed by the officers. The hon. Member wishes the rules and regulations to be laid down in the Bill. This is not usual, and, moreover, we have found under the old system considerable difficulty in determining what the real meaning of the Acts of Parliament was. We have been put to much legal expense in endeavouring to ascertain this, and we therefore propose to leave the County Council to decide what are the classes of servants who are to be brought under the operation of the scheme. Surely, if London is to have a County Council at all, that is a detail of administration which the House may well entrust to them. As to the return of the contributions of those who have ceased to contribute to the fund or to be in the service of the County Council it is proposed that when an officer leaves voluntarily he should receive back the whole of his contribution with compound interest. But in the case of a person who has been discharged for fraud, we thought that the amount standing to his credit in the fund should be utilised for the purpose of making good his defalcation as far as possible.

MR. BARTLEY: What clause is that?

SIR J. LUBBOCK: It is not in the clauses of the Bill, but it is part of the scheme. If we were to put all these provisions into the Bill it would make it a very complex measure, and would involve the London County Council in a serious expenditure besides occupying the valuable time of the House in an unnecessary discussion. The terms of the Bill have been very carefully considered, and it is for that reason and not from a desire to keep any details back from the knowledge of the House, that I think it is not advisable to put them in the Bill. Of course all this information will be completely open to the Select Committee upstairs, from whom there is no desire on the part of the London

County Council to keep anything back. All that I ask the House to do now is to allow the Bill to go to a Select Committee for its consideration. If the Instruction were carried the County Council would be precluded, for some time to come, from awarding any pension at all; and all those who have been in the habit of dealing with large organisations will agree with me that unless there is some system of superannuation allowances and pensions the result is the adoption of the undesirable and expensive system of keeping on employés long after they have ceased to be fit for work. All these matters have been carefully and thoroughly considered, and when the Bill comes back from the Select Committee, if it is not satisfactory my hon. Friend will have an opportunity of bringing the subject forward again. I hope that after this explanation the hon. Member will not press the Instruction.

(3.30.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I certainly sympathise to some extent with the remarks which have fallen from my hon. Friend the Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley). At the same time I hope that he will not press the Instruction he has moved, but will allow the Bill to be considered by a Select Committee upstairs. So far as the alterations proposed by the Bill in connection with superannuation are concerned I think they will commend themselves to the approval of the House. The London County Council inherited from the Metropolitan Board of Works a definite system of superannuation, so that they can give superannuation now, but the whole of it is provided out of the rates. The County Council are bound by a scale which is very much like that of the Civil Service.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): It is the Civil Service scale.

MR. RITCHIE: It is proposed by the present Bill that some provision shall be made for contributions towards the fund from the servants themselves. That is a principle which the general tendency of public opinion favours, and it is one which I think will commend itself to hon. Members in most parts of the House. Therefore, so far as that alteration is concerned, I am disposed to regard it as a distinct improvement upon the existing state of things. What I think is not an improvement is this: at present there is a distinct scheme upon which the London County Council are bound to give their superannuation and pension. There is no definite scheme whatever in this Bill.

Sir J. Lubbock

MR. LAWSON: That will have to go before the Committee upstairs.

MR. RITCHIE: It ought not only to be put before the Committee, but I think it ought to be included in the Bill with all its main features. At the same time, I would ask my hon. Friend not to press the Instruction, because I believe the Select Committee will regard the matter from very much the same standpoint, and that in dealing with the question they will consider it desirable that some of the main features of the scheme ought to be included in the Bill itself. If the Instruction is not agreed to and the Amendment is not proposed, the Bill will come back to the House in a more satisfactory shape than that in which it will leave the House. There is another matter upon which I desire to say a word, namely, the exclusion of the Government Auditor from any control or supervision over these superannuation allowances. Parliament has given to the Auditor of the Local Government Board the power of auditing the accounts of the London County Council, and I think it would be an unfortunate thing if we were to exclude this particular item from his audit. I trust that the Committee upstairs will direct its attention to that point.

(3.36.) MR. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): Before the Bill is disposed of I desire to say a few words. I want to know what the position of the ratepayers is. I do not agree altogether with the Bill as it has been submitted to Parliament by the London County Council, and I think that Clause 51, which repeals the Act for the acquisition of Raleigh Park in Brixton, ought to be omitted. So far as the superannuation of the officers of the London County Council is concerned, I fail to see upon what principle the ratepayers of London should be called upon to contribute one-half of the fund. If the London County Council wish to deal with the matter and will bring in a specific Bill, I do not see why they should not do so; but surely the ratepayers are entitled to be considered and to have a voice in the matter. I certainly cannot see any analogy between the servants of the London School Board and those of the County Council, and I want to know what real objection there is to dealing with the question by a separate Bill. Why is this Bill to be chucked at the head of a Committee without any details whatever? The right hon. Baronet opposite objects to an actuarial calculation.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: What I said was that in this case an actuarial calculation was absolutely unnecessary.

MR. J. R. KELLY: I understood the right hon. Baronet to object to the observations made by the Mover of the Instruction, as to the absence of an actuarial calculation. The ratepayers of London will have to make good any deficiency that may arise in any actuarial calculation. Are the London County Council to be treated differently from any other body of employers? Are the ratepayers to be represented or not? They are represented in the Council, and some of their representatives have seats in this House, but in no other way are they represented here. But if the County Council suppress all the details of their measure, the ratepayers will have no representation here at all. I fail to see why they should not be represented generally, in addition to their representation on the Council. In the absence of a complete scheme the ratepayers will have no voice in the matter, and I hope the hon. Member below me will press the Instruction he has moved.

*(3.40.) MR. COURTNEY: I should like to say a word or two in consequence of what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. He thinks that a scheme of superannuation ought to have been included in the Bill. Now I have had to deal with several Private Bills brought in by the great Railway Companies in which the question of superannuation has been introduced, and it has always been an important point for consideration whether schemes of superannuation ought or ought not to be incorporated in such Bills. Personally I have always found myself incompetent to judge or express an opinion as to the actuarial accuracy of the scheme submitted to me. The Committee to which this Bill will be referred, may have precedents to guide them and larger powers, but I confess that I entertain some doubt whether their opinion will be of much value. I have often felt that something ought to be done in the matter, and that safeguards should be inserted in Private Bills dealing with cases where servants retire in consequence of a reduction of staff, or from being dismissed for misconduct, or when they retire of their own free will, so that they may not be deprived of the entire benefit of a fund to which they have largely contributed. I have no doubt that the London County Council will provide safeguards to prevent abuse, and conditions might be inserted in the Bill that such safeguards shall be provided, but I cannot think that their full scheme ought to have been inserted in the Bill. Hitherto, in the case of London, the rates have supplied the fund, and the proposed alteration does not constitute a reason why the entire scheme of the County Council ought to have been presented. I have thought it right to utter a word of caution in consequence of the great weight attached to the words of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, especially when I heard him say that, in his opinion, it might be expedient after all to incorporate the scheme in the Bill.

*MR. BARTLEY: On the undertaking which has been given that an outline of the scheme will be submitted to the Committee, and time will be allowed to consider it, I beg to withdraw the Instruction.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

LONDON OVERHEAD WIRES BILL

(by Order).

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Sir J. Lubbock,)—put, and agreed to.

(3.45.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to move that it be an Instruction to the Committee to which the Bill is referred to consider the advisability of amending the Bill so that its provisions may be in accordance with Part II. of the Public Health Acts

Amendment Act, 1890. It will be in the recollection of the House that when this Bill was presented in another form I, as a Metropolitan Member, took a strong objection to it. It then contained a clause which enabled overhead wires to be forced on the occupiers of houses whether they liked it or not. In the Bill as it has now passed the Second Reading, that objectionable clause has disappeared, and as I was the Member who moved the rejection of the Bill at the former period, I have put this Instruction on the Paper partly to mark the fact that those Metropolitan Members who formerly objected to the Bill now consider—and I think I may speak for most of them—that the Bill in its present form, if not entirely unobjectionable, is much less objectionable than the former measure. I find that the most objectionable clause, namely, that which allowed overhead wires to be put up whether people liked it or not, has disappeared from the Bill, and I am free to admit that that fact has taken out the whole of the sting of our objections to the measure. As the Bill in its present form is admitted to be a compromise, it has been represented by various interests concerned that, on the whole, the compromise would be more satisfactory and a more complete and fair one all round if the Committee upstairs were to be instructed to assimilate the provisions of the Bill, as it affects the Metropolis, to the provisions of the law which affect the provinces generally. The Public Health Acts Amendment Act of last year was passed after a great deal of careful consideration of the interests involved in the measure, and I believe it has been found to work satisfactorily in the various great cities of the provinces where its provisions are needed. It seems to me that, as these provisions have now been satisfactorily tried elsewhere, they may fairly be extended to London. I do not wish, on behalf of the Metropolitan Members, to lay very great stress on the difference in the Bill as it stands and as it would be amended if this Instruction to the Committee is carried out. The Instruction only directs the Committee to consider the advisability of making certain changes in the Bill. It will be seen that it gives the fullest and freest discretion to the Committee to leave the Bill as it stands, simply indicating the advisability of their considering the provisions of the general law as they affect the provinces. For these reasons I venture to move the Instruction, in the belief that it is one which will commend itself to all the interests concerned in the Bill.

Sir Roper Lethbridge

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to which the Bill is referred, to consider the advisability of amending the Bill so that its provisions may be in accordance with Part II. of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890."—(Sir Roper Lethbridge.)

(348.) GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): I felt it my duty to object to the former Bill; but I should not object to the present Bill if the Instruction moved by the hon. Member were adopted. I believe that the Telephone Company would themselves welcome such an Instruction. My objection to the original measure was that I am opposed to any proposal to give to the London County Council or the Telephone Company power to place overhead wires on the houses of people who object to them.

*(349.) SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): There are one or two points of the Bill which it strikes me will require careful consideration. I myself should object to the Telephone Company or any other company placing standards on my houses in order to carry on the means of public communication either in the shape of electric lighting or telephones, if they are to be constantly subject to inspection. I know from experience and to my cost what is meant by this interference and inspection. It is of no use to say that notice is given of the visits of the Inspectors; I should certainly order all standards to be removed from my property if they are liable to constant inspection. Clause 8 provides that—

"The Local Authority may charge every company and person owning any wire, placed or retained overhead, after the passing of this Act, such reasonable fees in respect of the identification, and such reasonable annual charges in respect of supervision of wires as shall be fixed by the bye-laws hereinafter provided."

It seems to me that this is something like adding insult to injury. The company is not to be asked whether the wires require inspection but the County Council is to claim the right of numbering them and of charging persons who do not want the inspection a fee for carrying it out. I certainly think that such a provision is not warranted by the circumstances of the case. In other cases of inspection the public employs the officer who makes the inspection and pays him, and there is no ground whatever for charging a fee. Clause 10 provides by-laws for regulating the position of the wires, the manner in which repairs and alterations are to be made, and other matters which certainly deserve the careful attention of this House. I was in America two years ago and I found that telephonic communication was much more general there than it is in London ; and I was told that the reason was that the facilities given to the Telephone Companies and others are far greater than in England, and especially in London. I think that the officers of public bodies should not have power to check improvements in the Metropolis, or so prevent the necessary increase of a system which has become so useful. I do not say that it would be so ; all I say is that it might be so, and in that case the question of bye-laws is one that is likely to be of much interest to this House and to the public. We certainly ought to know what the powers are which we are placing in the hands of the London County Council. I do not say this from any feeling of distrust of the County Council. I agree that in many things they ought to exercise supervision on behalf of the ratepayers ; but I do not think it is advisable to give them powers which may interfere with the extension and development of telephonic communication.

*(3.53.) MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) : The hon. Member for South St. Pancras (Sir J. Goldsmid) objects to the 10th clause of the Bill. I may inform him that it has been modelled on the recommendation of a Committee of this House in 1889. Here there is no system of inspection of overhead wires whatever, and it was the fear that we might have in this country as lax a system as that which prevails in America which has induced the County Council to insert this clause in the Bill.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) : I rise to order. It appears to me that the speeches we are listening to are Second Reading speeches, and are not directed to the Instruction before the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Bill can only be discussed as far as it is affected by the Instruction.

*MR. LAWSON: As I have already stated, the provisions of this Bill are in exact conformity with the recommendation of a Select Committee, and therefore its principle has already received the approval of the House. I trust that it will be allowed to go to a Committee without this Instruction.

*(3.55.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: My hon. Friend the Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) is quite correct that the clause which has been condemned is a clause which was inserted in the Bill in deference to the opinion of a Committee of this House. As to the complaint made by the hon. Member for South St. Pancras in regard to the charge of a fee for inspection, I may explain that the fee is charged to the owner of the wire, and I think it is only right that the owner should pay for the inspection. It is perfectly true, as is stated in a circular issued by the Telephone Company, that there have been no instances of fatal accidents in the Metropolis from overhead wires, and that is very creditable to the company ; but I believe there are a large number of derelict wires which do not belong to the company, and it is in regard to them that some inspection is required. I am not clear that the Instruction which has been proposed is really required. I think the Committee would be fully able to do all that is desired without any Instruction being passed ; but, at the same time, the County Council do not object to the Instruction if it is understood that the hands of the Committee are not to be tied and that they may decide as they deem proper, after hearing the evidence. As to the advisability of introducing into London the provisions which are carried out in the provinces, I must remind the House that in many respects the circumstances of the provinces are altogether different from those of London.

(4.0.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) : The House will remember that some time ago I ventured to move an Instruction to the Police and Sanitary Committee on Private Bills that they should sanction no provision which would interfere with the general law, and at that time I called attention to the provisions of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act which was passed last year. The provisions of that Act were considered by a large and strong Select Committee, and among other things they deal with overhead wires; but the law which is considered proper for the rest of England does not apply to the Metropolis. Although it may, to some extent, impose a limit on the power of the London County Council, I think that where the general law of the land has been clearly laid down by this House, and is in operation in Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow, Birmingham, and other great cities, London ought to submit to the same provisions. The only objection I have to the Instruction moved by the hon. Member for North Kensington (Sir Roper Lethbridge) is that it only asks the Committee to consider the advisability of amending the Bill, whereas I think it ought to be made mandatory. Of course, as the right hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir J. Lubbock) has pointed out, the Committee can consider the advisability of amending the Bill without any Instruction at all. I therefore propose to amend the Instruction by striking out the words "consider the advisability of amending" in order to substitute the word "amend," making it a mandatory Instruction to the Committee to carry out the provisions of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890. I do not see why this Committee should have more power than the Police and Sanitary Committee.

Amendment proposed, to omit the words "consider the advisability of amending," in order to insert the word "amend."—(Mr. H. H. Fowler.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*(4.3.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): The House may remember that in conjunction with the right hon. Gentleman opposite I took part in conducting through this House the Public Health Bill of last year. The new law has been adopted in most important districts in the country; and in making the application of Part II. general in London we are only acting upon the principle which Parliament has largely adopted, of having one universal law. Since the Public Health Acts Amendment Act was passed last year it has been adopted, according to the information which has reached me, in no less than 180 towns, some of them the largest in the country, including Manchester and Salford. I think that this House ought to feel confidence in the provisions of this Part, as they last year received the approval of the Board of Trade and the Post Office. May I add that many of the objections which have been urged to-day were raised before the Committee upstairs, but did not prevail.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

(4.5.) MR. COURTNEY: When the proposal of my right hon. Friend (Mr. H. H. Fowler) was made the other day to pass a cast-iron Instruction absolutely forbidding the Police and Sanitary Committee from considering any matter which interfered with the Act of last Session, I ventured to express a doubt as to the expediency of adopting that Instruction. I was satisfied from the experience I had gained that it might prove extremely inconvenient, and that it might hamper the progress of improvements in provincial towns in matters of this kind. My right hon. Friend now wants, in a most stringent way, to take the Code of Regulations in respect of overhead wires as adapted to provincial towns and impose it en masse on the London County Council, without allowing that body to go before the Committee and represent in what particulars, if any, it is undesirable to adopt it. If the House agrees to accept this proposal, and decides that the Committee shall under no circumstance make a variation, I venture to think that it will fetter the Committee in a very unwise way. I think that the Amendment which my right hon. Friend has proposed is open to a very serious question as to its advisability as a matter of Order. We require strict notice of an Instruction, and no Instruction has been put on the Paper more than an empowering Instruction telling the Committee that it is to have power to do that which it has power to do already. Without any kind of notice my right hon. Friend springs upon the House a mandatory Instruction. If that is not out of order it is certainly against the principles upon which our Rules of Order are founded. At any rate, if for the v, I think the Debate should be adjourned. What is now proposed is that we shall say to the London County Council, "If you desire to deal with overhead wires you must adopt, without the slightest variation, the Code which we have laid down for provincial towns." I deprecate the adoption of the Instruction, either in its original or amended form. I think that the Committee, while approaching the question with a knowledge of what has happened in the House, should be unfettered.

(4.8.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): After what has fallen from the Chairman of Committees I should like to point out to the House that the Instruction was purposely worded so as to indicate that the Bill in its present form, as amended by the Instruction, would be a compromise fairly agreeable to the whole of the House; and, secondly, it was purposely worded in such a way as to indicate that the Committee upstairs ought to have power to hear what the London County Council has to say in defence of its position. To impose a mandate upon the Committee in the way the right hon. Gentleman opposite has proposed would be quite contrary to the view I had in placing this Instruction on the Paper. I am, therefore, sorry to say that I cannot in any way accept the Amendment, but after what has been said by the Chairman of Committees, I think the simplest plan will be for me to withdraw the Instruction and to allow the issue to stand simply as between the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton and the Bill.

MR. SPEAKER: The Instruction moved by the hon. Member for North Kensington is to empower the Committee to consider the advisability of amending the Bill. The Amendment is a mandatory Instruction to the Committee to amend the Bill. I am of opinion that that is an alteration which would not be in order.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I quite see, Sir, the force of what you have said, and I at once bow to your decision in the matter. I shall withdraw the Amendment, but I cannot consent to the withdrawal of the Instruction as it stands. I think it would be an undesirable course to send the Bill to a Select Committee without any Instruction at all.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question again proposed.

*(4.10.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I may remind the House that London was expressly excluded from the Act of last Session, and under these circumstances the County Council did not take as much interest in it as they would have done otherwise. Under these circumstances, it is desirable that they should have an opportunity of suggesting to the Committee the reasons which, in their judgment, render some modifications desirable in the case of London.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member for North Kensington propose to withdraw the Instruction?

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: Yes, Sir. [Cries of "No!"]

(4.12.) The House divided:—Ayes 99; Noes 83.—(Div. List, No. 69.)

Ordered "That it be an Instruction to the Committee to which the Bill is referred to consider the advisability of amending the Bill so that its provisions may be in accordance with Part 2 of 'The Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890.'"

QUESTIONS.

LABOUR STATISTICS.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is preparing any fresh Return similar to "Labour Statistics, Returns of Expenditure by Working Men," presented in 1889; and, if not, whether, considering the probability that information will be more readily obtained since the former Return has made clear the objects of the inquiry, and considering the importance of the information which would be given by such a Return if including a sufficient number of instances, he will give orders for the preparation of such a Return?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The subject to which the hon. Member refers has not been lost sight of, and I hope that a continuation in a more complete form of the Return in question may be prepared at no distant date. But the Department is so pressed with work at the present time that I do not feel able at the moment to give any distinct pledge in the matter.

LETTER DELIVERY IN UPPER HOLLOWAY.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that letters from Ireland reaching Euston at 6.15 a.m. are not delivered in Upper Holloway till between 12 and 1 p.m.; and whether he will take steps to secure their delivery by the early morning delivery?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES, Cambridge University): It is the case that in Upper Holloway, as in all the more remote London suburbs, the letters reaching Euston Station by the Irish Mail at 6.15 a.m. are not received in time to be included in the first delivery commencing at about 7.30 a.m. The letters are not sufficiently numerous to warrant a separate delivery, but I will inquire whether it may not be practicable to make the second delivery take place earlier than it does at present.

THE VACCINATION COMMISSION.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if the Royal Commission upon the working of the compulsory Vaccination Acts have come to any definite conclusions; and whether there is any hope that their Report will be submitted to the consideration of Parliament during the present Session?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have been in communication with the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the working of these Acts, but there is no hope that their Report will be presented to Parliament this Session.

THE ADMIRALTY DEPARTMENT.

MR. SEAGER HUNT (Marylebone, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether there are in the Admiralty Department any vacancies in the higher grade of the Second Division of clerks to which, under the Order in Council of 21st March, 1890, promotion should be made; and, if so, why the vacancies have not been filled?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (LORD G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): There is a vacancy in the higher grade caused by the non-promotion of a Second Division clerk who has reached the £250 limit. The question of filling that vacancy is now under consideration, and the fittest man will be selected.

PRESS AND PRIVATE TELEGRAMS.

MR. JAMES MACLEAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to a statement in the Journalist newspaper, in which attention is called to the inconvenience of the present practice of the Postal Telegraph Department in using one system of counting messages for the Press, and another for private messages; for instance, "thirty four" is charged as one word, and 34 as two, although the transmission of the one word involves the use of 28 telegraphic signs, and of the two figures only 10 signs; "1890" is charged as four words, but "eighteen ninety" as two, although 27 telegraphic signs are required for the two words, and only 20 for the figures; whether his attention has been called to the saving of official time which would result from an abolition of the higher charges for telegraphing figures as compared with words; and whether he will consider the advisability of doing away with a regulation of which Press correspondents complain, and causes some loss to the State?

*MR. RAIKES: Before the introduction of the rate of a halfpenny a word for ordinary telegrams, the regulations governing the charge for figures in those telegrams and in Press telegrams were the same, every figure being counted and charged for as a separate word. At the same time, all addresses were sent free. When the halfpenny rate came into operation, the addresses of ordinary telegrams were no longer sent free; and, chiefly as a concession to those who had to send telegrams to houses bearing numbers composed of several figures, it was decided to charge for five figures as a single word. But in the case of Press telegrams the addresses were still sent free, and as many as 75 words of text during the day and 100 words during the night could still be sent for a shilling, whilst a copy of a telegram of the same number of words was telegraphed to any separate town for a charge of 2d. No change, then, having here been made, there appeared to be no ground for a concession in the case of Press telegrams, which were already the subject of such enormous privileges.

THE PLATTERS ROCKS.

MR. THOMAS LEWIS (Anglesey): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Government has yet decided as to the removal of the Platters Rocks, at Holyhead Harbour, which, according to the answer given last Spring, was then under consideration; if so, what conclusion have they come to; and, if not, when are they likely to decide the matters finally?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The matter to which the hon. Member refers is still under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, but there are considerable difficulties in the way which have not yet been overcome.

THE ARCHBISHOP'S THRONE.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that the Archbishop's Throne which was presented to Canterbury Cathedral by Archbishop Tenison, and which was supposed to have been lost, has been found, and set up in the Library of the Cathedral, instead of being restored to its original position; and whether he will, on behalf of the Department of Science and Art, apply to the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury for the loan of this beautiful and interesting work, in order that it may be preserved in the Kensington Museum, and placed in a position where it can be seen by the public?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am much obliged to my right hon. Friend for recurring to this subject, and will make inquiries at once as to how far it may be possible to act upon his suggestion.

THE STRIKE AT CARDIFF.

SIR EDWARD REED: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a resolution passed by the workmen on strike at Cardiff, complaining of the conduct of the Stipendiary Magistrate in cases arising out of the labour dispute; whether he is aware that the Stipendiary Magistrate of Cardiff is the brother of Sir William Thomas Lewis, with whom the Cardiff workmen are chiefly at strife; and whether it would be possible to make some temporary arrangement by which another Magistrate might be appointed to whom the administration of justice as between the workmen and their antagonists could be entrusted? I also beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he can inform the House how many cases arising out of the Cardiff strike have been heard by the Stipendiary Magistrate at Cardiff since the 30th of January, stating the number of acquittals, convictions, and committals for trial respectively that have resulted therefrom?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Stipendiary that the only knowledge he has of the resolution is derived from a local newspaper, from which it appears that a man who had been committed for trial that day presided at a meeting of men on strike, and passed a resolution condemning the Magistrate in terms too vague to admit of a definite reply. The Stipendiary is the brother of Sir William Lewis, but he is not aware that the workmen are chiefly at strife with the latter, most of the cases tried by him having arisen from labour disputes in which the Dock Company, of which Sir W. Lewis is manager, is not directly concerned. I have no reason to believe that the conduct of the Stipendiary has been otherwise than strictly impartial and in accordance with the rules of law. His decisions are subject to review by superior tribunals, and the administration of justice can be safely left in his hands. Since January 30, 37 cases arising out of the strikes have been heard by the Stipendiary; 19 persons have been committed for trial, 17 of whom have been allowed bail; 10 have been convicted, one of whom has appealed; three have been bound over to be of good behaviour, and five have been acquitted.

ARMENIA.

MR. LEVESON GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there are at the present time a large number of Armenians imprisoned in various parts of Turkey as political suspects; and whether, if this be the case, they are aware of the nature of the specific charges, if any, upon which these men are respectively imprisoned?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): In January 1,876 prisoners were set free at Constantinople. They were mostly individuals whose trial had not been completed. In the same month a number of Armenians were arrested at Erzeroum on charges of sedition. In February information was received of arrests of Armenians in the Adana Vilayet suspected of belonging to a Revolutionary Committee. There are also reports of arrests of Armenians at Marash, Hadjin, and Koyan. Her Majesty's Government are not aware of the specific charges on which the several individuals are imprisoned.

MR. LEVESON GOWER: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether Her Majesty's Government are in possession of any information throwing light upon the statement in the Constantinople correspondence of the Daily News of February 24th, to the effect that the Turkish Government is forming with great celerity in Armenia six regiments, composed of Kurds and Circassians, and that the military commander of Van has issued a large supply of Martini rifles to the Kurds of that Province, who are said to be patrolling the country; and whether, having regard to the serious nature of such a statement if correct, the Government will, if without recent information upon these points, take steps to obtain it with as little delay as possible?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: No such information has been received, but inquiry will be made as to whether there is any foundation for the report.

THE CALAIS-BRINDISI MAILS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has any record of the number of bags of mails sent from this country across France and Italy, from Calais to Brindisi, and of the number of bags of mails received in this country by the Calais-Brindisi route in the year 1880; and whether he has any record of the number of bags of mails so sent from and received in this country in the year 1890; and, if not, whether he will app'y to the Railway Companies for information on the subject?

Mr. Leveson Gower

*MR. RAIKES: According to the records of my Department, the number of bags of mails of the description referred to in the hon. Member's question was as follows:—Mails despatched—1880, 23,567; 1890, 45,725. Mails received—1880, 8,722; 1890, 18,431.

POSTAGE TO THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, now that the postage on letters sent from the United Kingdom to Australasia has been reduced from 5d. to 2½d. per half-ounce, it is intended to maintain the charge of 2d. for a postcard (only one halfpenny less than a letter) sent from this country to the Australasian Colonies?

*MR. RAIKES: The 2d. rate was fixed for postcards from Australasia to the United Kingdom at the Postal Conference, which was held at Adelaide last year, and it would have been inconvenient to adopt a different rate in the opposite direction. The postage, therefore, remains for the present at 2d. in both directions.

INDIAN POSTCARDS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether now that the postage on letters sent from the United Kingdom to India has been reduced from 5d. to 2½d. per half-ounce, it is intended to maintain the charge of 2d. for a postcard sent from this country to India and Ceylon; and whether he is aware that the Ceylon Post Office charges 1d. for a postcard, which can be sent to the United Kingdom or to any other part of the world, and that the charge for a postcard from France to India or Ceylon is also 1d.?

MR. RAIKES: In view of the circumstances adverted to in my previous answer, I think it will be the better course not to deal separately with the Indian postcards. I do not, however, deny that the facts mentioned by the hon. Member appear to constitute some valid reason for effecting a change in the present rate when a favourable occasion occurs.

POTTERY WORKMEN IN GLASGOW.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the case of the proprietors of Campbellfield Pottery, Glasgow, who some 11 weeks ago intimated a reduction of wages, and, the same not being acquiesced in by the workmen, gave notice to quit not only to these workmen, but to such members of their family as were employed in the pottery; whether he is aware that the day the workmen received their notice to quit the foreman of the pottery stated that, if the workmen did not agree to the masters' terms, they would not get work in any other pottery in Glasgow; whether the places of these workmen have been filled up by the employment of other workmen; whether the workmen so dismissed applied at other potteries requiring workmen, but were informed that no employment would be given to any workman who had been dismissed from Campbellfield Pottery; whether it is lawful for masters to conspire or to combine together not to employ certain workmen who have been dismissed from employment, and whose places have been filled up by the employment of other workmen, and with whom no trade dispute can be said to exist; and whether he will take steps to enforce the Criminal Law on the subject?

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Sir C. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): No, Sir; the Lord Advocate's attention has not been called to this case. If any one conceives that a criminal offence has been committed and desires the Lord Advocate's consideration of it, his proper course is to lodge information with the authorities in the usual way.

MIDNIGHT INTERMENT.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, North-wick): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Manchester Guardian, of the 21st instant, headed "Disgraceful Scene at a Midnight Interment," which states, that on the occasion of the funeral, at midnight, of the late Colonel Richard Dyott, some time a Member of this House, the public houses in the district had been granted an extra hour's extension; that during the ceremony there was a scene of wild excitement; that there was a rush of some thousands to gain admission to the church; that 40 members of the county police force were present; that the doors of the edifice were closed to prevent the place from being stormed; and that in the mêlée a Police Inspector had one of his fingers nearly bitten off; whether he will ask for a Report from the Chairman of the Local Bench upon the circumstances; and whether he will instruct the Magistrates as to the impropriety of extending the hours for the sale of intoxicating liquors on such an occasion?

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme) had the following question on the Paper: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention had been called to the following paragraph in the Globe newspaper, of Saturday, 21st February, under the heading "Midnight Funeral of an ex-M.P.:"

"The public houses in the district (Lichfield) had been granted an extra hour's extension for the occasion, and the vast assembly viewed the affair as some fête day. Directly the coffin was conveyed into the church there was a rush by some thousands to gain admittance. Some members of the county police force made an endeavour to keep back the crowd, and for some time intense excitement prevailed. Eventually the doors of the edifice were closed in order to prevent the place being stormed. In the mêlée one of the Police Inspectors had a finger nearly bitten off. It was long after midnight ere the crowd dispersed, but no further disorder occurred;"

and whether he will communicate with the Magistrates of Lichfield as to the impropriety of granting an extra hour's extension to the public houses on that occasion?

MR. MATTHEWS: I will answer this question and that of the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme at the same time. It is not the fact that the public-houses of the district had all been granted an extension. One hotel only, opposite the church, was allowed an hour's extension for the accommodation of persons coming from a distance to see a very unusual ceremony. Everything was quiet and orderly at this hotel. The Chief Constable informs me that the accounts of what took place have been much exaggerated. There was a rush of persons to gain admittance when the procession passed into the church, and it was necessary to close the doors. Beyond this there was no disorder, and all passed off quietly. The Magistrates inform me that in granting the extension to one house they considered the convenience of the public, and that they were justified in so doing. I see no reason to doubt the propriety of the way in which they used their discretion on this occasion.

WOOLWICH AND SANDHURST EXAMINATIONS.

SIR H. ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that it has been stated that, in the competitive examinations for admission to Woolwich and Sandhurst conducted by the Civil Service Commissioners, the maximum number of marks allotted to the various subjects are, in effect, not adhered to; whether he is aware that public attention has recently been drawn to this by the conference of head masters, in regard to Woolwich, in the following terms:—

“The mark assigned as the maximum for subjects nominally of equal value is very illusory. It is not the maximum assigned but the average mark attainable that decides the choice of subjects, and at present the proportional weight assigned to different subjects is very unequal. For example, it will be found that during the last five or six years the average percentages of the maximum obtained by successful candidates are 34·06 in Latin, 29·15 in Greek, 38·7 in French, 35·8 in German, 28·65 in Experimental Science;”

and whether, if these statements are correct, he will undertake that in future the highest mark attainable in each subject shall be raised to the allotted maximum of that subject, as is usual in other examinations, so that the relative value of the several subjects shall remain that indicated in the regulations?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODBICK, Surrey, Guildford): The Civil Service Commissioners, who conduct the examinations for Woolwich and Sandhurst, inform me that the highest number of marks allotted to any subject is, and always has been, attainable by the candidates. Every care is taken by the examiners to mark answers on all subjects in the same ratio to absolute accuracy, though the process presents great difficulty. It has been found, however, that the average knowledge of some subjects exceeds that of others; and, without expressing any opinion as to the accuracy of the figures quoted from the head masters, it may be admitted that Greek and physical science have been at the bottom of the list as regards proficiency. The percentage of the maximum obtained in experimental science is, nevertheless, gradually advancing. During the last five years its average has equalled that for Latin, and last year the percentage exceeded it.

Mr. Matthews

THE CONSTRUCTION OF LIGHT RAILWAYS IN IRELAND.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that great disappointment and discontent have arisen in connection with the construction of light railways in Ireland, owing to the fact that employment is given entirely at the discretion of engineers and gangers, who are strangers to the localities in which the works are proceeding, and who have not the local knowledge requisite to enable them to distribute employment so as to effect the purpose of alleviating distress; whether any provision has been made by which contractors are bound, in employing men, to give the preference to those most in need; whether any such provision will be made in future contracts; and whether, in order to secure the employment of the poor by system, instead of, as at present, by mere chance only, the Government would arrange that employment should be given upon lists made up by local officials who have knowledge of the condition of the poor, such lists to be revised by the local clergy?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not think the hon. Member has been rightly informed as to the feelings with which the light railway construction has been received in Ireland. It would be impossible, and, in my judgment, most inexpedient even if possible, to limit the control of the engineers and contractors over the men they are employing. Neither should I think of interfering with their choice of gangers. My own belief is that gangers not connected with the locality and having no local ties and interests are much more likely to be impartial than residents in the district from which the workmen are drawn. The advice of local officials, based as it is upon their own observation and upon information obtained from local clergy and others, has been largely acted upon, I am glad to think, by the contractors. But it would be unwise to bind them to take lists made up by local officials who have knowledge of the condition of the poor. In several of the contracts the contractors have bound themselves to execute works involving as much unskilled labour as possible, and to employ, as far as practicable, able-bodied persons living in the district in which the works are being constructed. The Reports I have received from the various lines indicate that the persons employed are in the main drawn from the class requiring relief.

GOLD MINING ROYALTIES.

MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the names of the five mines which have paid royalties on gold obtained in Wales since 1885, and what are the respective amounts of royalties which have been paid by them; which of such mines are on private lands, and which are on Crown lands; what amount of money has been paid to the Woods and Forests Office since 1885, for dead rents and for solicitors' fees and charges respectively, for the 447 leases and licences to work for gold and silver in Wales since 1885; what is the minimum and what the maximum charge for dead rent on Crown lands and private lands respectively; and what is the minimum and what the maximum charge of the solicitor to the Woods and Forests for a lease to work for gold or silver on Crown lands and private lands respectively?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): I will give the hon. Member the names of the mines so far as I am able to pronounce them. The names of the five mines and the royalties paid by them since 1885 are as follows:—Morgan Gold Mine, £1,574 4s. 3d.; Tynllwyn Gold Mine, 9s. 6d.; Castell Carn-dochan Gold Mine, £3 9s. 7d.; Geselcwm-Bach (parish of Llanelltyd), 2s. 10d.; Moel Ispri (parish of Llanelltyd), 4s. 4d. The first, third, and fifth of these mines are on private lands. As regards the third paragraph of the hon. Member's question, the payments for dead rents amount to £1,626, and those for solicitors' fees and charges to £1,528. The charge for dead rent depends upon circumstances, and the Commissioner of Woods does not bind himself to either a minimum or a maximum charge. The minimum charge for leases is £4; the maximum charge depends upon circumstances, but does not exceed that authorised under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881.

MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I should like to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the Woods and Forests Commissioners charge as high as £25 or £30 for a nominal lease granted to a man to work gold on his own land?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am not able to give the information without notice. The hon. Member has not moved for the correspondence about the Morgan Mine; but if he moves I will lay it on the Table as I proposed on the 5th instant.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): Would not more mines be worked but for the excessive royalties charged by the Crown?

*MR. GOSCHEN: That is a very interesting question. It is quite probable that if a less royalty were charged the persons who would otherwise pay the royalty would be able to sell their rights for a higher price to a company to work the mine. The result would be that the taxpayers would lose, while the particular person to whom the lease was given would be able to gain something better out of it. That has been the case in one or two instances.

MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I should like to know whether, out of the 447 leases granted by the Crown, only these five have been worked at all?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I have given the hon. Member all the information with which I have been supplied.

MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Chancellor of the Exchequer charges a royalty of 5 per cent. on gold obtained in Ireland; and whether he is prepared to recommend a reduction of such royalties, in conformity with the expressed desire of Her Majesty's Government to foster and encourage industries in Ireland, and in order to encourage those desirous of developing the mineral resources of Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This is not a matter which has engaged my attention; but if the hon. Member will give me such information as will lead me to believe that there are gold mines in Ireland, I will undertake to look into the matter.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, in comparison with its area, there has been a larger quantity of gold found in Ireland than in any other country in Europe; that from the discovery of gold in Wicklow in 1796 down to the destruction of the mines in 1798 the amount of gold produced equalled £10,000, and that during the first half of this century £100,000—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is entering into an historical statement.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman deems it necessary to still maintain the royalties if he really doubts the existence of gold in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A question as to royalty should be addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but what I am doubtful about is whether there are any gold mines in Ireland which would be worked if the royalty were abolished.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Let me ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will bring this matter, say, before the Lord Lieutenant, with a view to reducing the royalties?

MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the hon. Member for Cork has lately expended many thousands of pounds for the purpose of opening gold mines in Ireland, and is it not the fact that other persons have obtained leases from the Crown?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know to which of the hon. Members for Cork the hon. Member refers. I have not heard that any of the hon. Members for Cork have spent thousands of pounds in order to seek for gold.

Mr. W. Pritchard Morgan

EMIGRATION TO BRAZIL.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Loughborough): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have received reports of the prospects of British subjects emigrating to Brazil, and have they taken any steps to make known to the public the true state of the case?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government are informed that inducements are being held out to people in this country to emigrate to Brazil, and 333 are reported to have sailed between the 1st of January and the 21st inst. I am informed by the Emigration Information Office that constant inquiries are being made about free emigration to the southern districts of Brazil. We are not in possession of trustworthy information as to the prospects of British immigrants in those provinces. Last month Her Majesty's Minister was directed to report upon the subject, and some days ago a telegram was sent to hasten his reply. As regards the districts north of Rio, we are informed that they are very unsuitable for British immigrants, whether agricultural labourers or artisans, who would probably experience disappointment and endless sufferings. A few domestic servants might find employment with European families, but their number must be inconsiderable. It should be understood that the British Consuls cannot give relief in money to distressed immigrants, and that in cases of dispute with their employers they will be dealt with according to local laws, which will be very different to those to which they have been accustomed. All the information possessed by the Foreign Office has been sent to the Board of Trade and Emigrants' Inquiry Office, by whom cautionary notices have been inserted in the newspapers; but I shall be glad if my hon. Friend's question may be the means of inducing all persons to make full inquiry before emigrating to Brazil, whether as farmers or labourers.

MAGISTRATES' CLERKS AND SOLICITORS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the statement made recently at the Liverpool Assizes by Mr. Justice Willa, to the effect that the practice of Magistrates' Clerks acting as prosecuting solicitors in cases where they have a direct interest in the number of convictions, is an "abominable system;" and whether he will consider the advisability of legislating to prohibit this practice, and to provide for Justices' Clerks salaries not having any definite proportion to the number of convictions in their Courts?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir. I have seen the statement of the learned Judge. The practice condemned by him is that of Clerks to the Justices acting as prosecuting solicitors in the cases of persons as to whose committal they have at an earlier stage advised the Justices. If they afterwards prosecute at Sessions or Assizes, and thereby earn the allowance for costs, it may be alleged that they have an interest in obtaining as many committals as possible. But their salaries as Clerks to the Justices are not affected by the number of convictions. The practice is, no doubt, theoretically indefensible, and I will consult the Attorney General on the question whether it produces any practical evils calling for legislation.

PRISON STOREKEEPERS AND CLERKS.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received through the Prison Commissioners the Petition of the Storekeepers and Clerks in prisons; and, if so, whether he will assent to their request to include such officers in the Second Division Scheme?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I have received such Petitions. There are strong reasons against including these officers in the Second Division Scheme, and their inclusion was not contemplated by the Treasury Minute referred to in their Petitions. The whole question of the pay and status of the clerical establishment of the prisons have recently been the subject of a careful and exhaustive inquiry, and I am not disposed to re-open the settlement which was arrived at after much consideration at the end of last year, and under which substantial advantages are given to this branch of the Service.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION AT SAWTRY.

MR. FELLOWES (Hunts, Ramsey): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has again been called to the very serious loss and inconvenience experienced by the inhabitants of Sawtry (Hunts), and the adjoining parishes of Glatton, Connington, and the Giddings, owing to the absence of telegraphic communication; whether he is aware that the inhabitants of these parishes, about 2,300 in number, have to send three miles, and in some cases four miles, to the telegraph office at Stilton; and whether, taking into consideration that the main wires run along the North Road, within a quarter of a mile of Sawtry, he will now consent to the establishment of a telegraph office in that parish?

*MR. RAIKES: Since my hon. Friend wrote to me in July last my attention has not again been called to the question of the extension of the telegraphs to Sawtry. In answer to a question which he put to me in this House about 18 months ago, I explained that the main wires could not be made available for serving a telegraph office at Sawtry. I shall be very glad to have further inquiry made, but I fear that, unless the circumstances have altogether changed, it will only be possible to establish a telegraph office at Sawtry if the residents are prepared to enter into a guarantee. Perhaps I may take this opportunity of explaining to my hon. Friend and the House that in cases of telegraphic extension the Postmaster General has no option or alternative as to the course which he is bound by Treasury regulations to follow, and this is only one of many purely administrative matters in which his discretion is absolutely superseded by the control of the Treasury.

MR. FELLOWES: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will bring before the Treasury the question of the great difficulty experienced in finding in poor country parishes a sufficient guarantee; and whether he will allow the receipts from telegrams coming in to go towards the guarantee fund, in the same way as the receipts from telegrams going out are allowed?

*MR. RAIKES: I shall be very happy to make the representation to the Treasury; but I do not know with what success it will meet.

SPHERES OF INFLUENCE IN AFRICA.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Commissioners charged by the British and French Governments with the delimitation of the boundaries of the British and French spheres of influence in Africa under the Anglo-French Agreement have begun their work, and what progress they have made?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Commissioners have met, and are making progress.

IRISH CONSTABULARY FORCE FUND.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin, Co., S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the money subscribed to the Constabulary Force Fund by a Constabulary pensioner, on retirement as a pensioner, is lost to him; whether pensioners are compelled to subscribe as long as they live; whether compensation is based upon actual time of service; and whether any Resident Magistrates have been compensated, or have received money, from this Fund; and, if so, to what amount?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hardly understand the inquiry in the first paragraph of the question. I may say, however, that it is altogether optional with a pensioner from the Royal Irish Constabulary whether he will continue a subscriber to the Constabulary Force Fund. A married man continuing a subscriber secures for his family the same claim as they had against the Fund while he was actively serving. Pensioners are not compelled to subscribe. Married pensioners, however, almost invariably do so. On the other hand, men retiring from the force unmarried, or without families surviving, do not subscribe, as they have no family to be benefited. The scale regulating gratuities from the Fund is based upon the total amount of salary and pension received, and consequently upon the contribution paid to the Fund by the subscriber. My answer is, of course, confined to the base of persons appointed to the Royal Irish Constabulary prior to the Act of 1883. As regards the last paragraph, I understand that prior to 1836 there existed a small body of Police Magistrates who belonged to the Force and subscribed to the Fund, which they continued to do after the title and status of their appointment was changed to Resident Magistrates. In such cases their families received the usual regulation gratuities from the Fund. But no Resident Magistrate appointed for the first time under the Act of 1836 has received any compensation or money from this Fund.

RELIEF WORKS AT GARRICK.

SIR T. ESMONDE, in the absence of Mr. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the relief works to which he recently referred as instituted for the benefit of the inhabitants of the parish of Ardara county Donegal, are seven miles distant from that parish; whether he is aware that an engineer named Gahan, who is employed in the Government relief works at Garrick, visited the parish of Ardara about a fortnight ago with a view to the making of the roads by the Government in the neighbourhood for the purpose of relief, but that hitherto no step in this direction has been taken; and whether, having regard to the fact that the fulfilment of his promise made at Ardara, that the Government would cut a road through the hill of Glengrish, would give employment to between 200 and 300 people in the neighbourhood of Ardara, and, to the destitute condition of the people of this neighbourhood, any measures are to be taken for their immediate sustenance and relief?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps the hon. Member will give me further notice of the question.

KENSINGTON AND PADDINGTON SUBWAY.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he is aware that certain persons, on behalf of the promoters of the Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill, have already begun to peg out portions of Kensington Gardens; whether this has been done with his authority; and whether, in view of the fact that the Bill has not yet passed either the Committee stage or the Third Reading in this House, he will order the promoters to suspend all further operations, and to cease interfering with the public enjoyment of the gardens?

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I should like to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the plans and sections show that the proposed railway will cross Kensington Gardens in an open cutting, which will afterwards be covered over?

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill has passed a Second Reading in this House, and it will now be for a Select Committee to examine in detail the arguments for and against the measures. As to those general questions, I do not desire to express any opinion one way or the other. But I must be prepared to inform the Committee, should it otherwise approve of the scheme, to what extent the construction of the line would involve any interference with the amenities of the park. With that view I called upon the promoters to indicate the line which they intended to take by the usual method of placing a few temporary pegs here and there in the ground. I may say that to their first proposal I objected, and I am now about to consider an alternative route. I do not believe that the placing of these pegs in the ground has in any degree interfered with the enjoyment of the gardens by the public. The case stands thus: The promoters must, if they can, satisfy the Committee in order to get their Bill; and they must, I suppose, satisfy the public in order to get their money; and my hon. Friend may rest assured that, until they have achieved these two purposes, they will not be allowed to begin operations in Kensington Gardens. I may add that, if all objections were overcome, and the Bill were passed by the Committee and afterwards by the House, the assent of the Crown would still be required. In answer to the supplementary question, I have to say that the course that it is proposed to take is to construct the railway in sections, so that only a small part of the gardens at a time would be interfered with. Of course, the whole question is one of the balance of conveniences for the public.

SIR H. ROSCOE: May I ask whether arrangements have been made for working the line by electricity or by cable, or whether it is merely intended to construct a subway for foot passengers as far as the Albert Hall?

*MR. PLUNKET: Objections were raised by the Science and Art Department to the proposal that it should be an electrical railway passing under their premises; and so the promoters have agreed to work by cable instead of by electricity. So far, that difficulty has been overcome. The idea is that there should be a subway connecting the South Kensington Railway Station with the Albert Hall and Paddington by way of the Kensington Gardens. Through the Gardens the subway would consist of two tubes, and nothing of it would be visible. The most serious permanent alteration that would be involved would be the destruction of a certain number of trees.

SIR H. ROSCOE: Has the right hon. Gentleman been informed that the running of cars in the subway will materially interfere with the scientific instruction given in the Normal School of Science and in the large school connected with the City and Guilds of London Institute? Does he know that arrangements have been made by which the construction can be carried on without interfering with the work in the schools?

*MR. PLUNKET: My impression is that all these objections have been overcome by the promoters.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): When the right hon. Gentleman stated that the assent of the Crown would be necessary, did he mean anything more than the Royal assent which must be given to every Bill?

*MR. PLUNKET: Yes, Sir; Kensington Gardens are Crown property.

INFLAMMABLE LIQUIDS BILL.

SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the very strong feeling expressed by shopkeepers and dealers in petroleum lamp oil in country towns and villages against the proposals contained in the Inflammable Liquids Bill; and whether he will agree to exempt small towns and villages from coming under the provisions of the Bill as far as petroleum lamp oil is concerned?

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): May I further ask whether it is not a fact that petroleum oil affords the light principally used in rural districts by the poorer classes?

MR. MATTHEWS: The oil is, I believe, largely used by the poorer classes. I have seen a large number of printed circulars directed against this Bill; but these representations seem to proceed upon a considerable misapprehension as to the provisions and effect of the measure and wholly ignore the appeals made to the Government by public and local bodies of great importance, protesting against the danger arising from the existing state of the law. As to the exemption suggested by my hon. Friend I am unable to say at present whether it could be safely permitted; but I think that such a question might properly engage the attention of a Select Committee when the Bill reaches that stage. I venture, however, to remind my hon. Friend of the disastrous fire at Sutton in 1886 when five lives were lost.

ISSUE OF BANK NOTES.

MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state his intentions in respect to changes as to existing issues of bank notes this Session?

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member will have observed that in my recent utterances with regard to banking matters I made no special reference to the existing issues of bank notes by banks other than the Bank of England, but I can make no reply to my hon. Friend which will in any way fetter the freedom of action of the Government or of the House.

MINING ROYALTIES.

MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether the same prerogative pertains to the Crown with reference to the gold and silver contained in Her Majesty's possessions outside as in Great Britain; if the prerogative does exist, is it the intention of the Government to insist upon the payment of royalties outside as in Great Britain; and if the prerogative does not exist, how and by what statute or law has the prerogative outside Great Britain been abrogated or modified?

Sir E. Birkbeck

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The Prerogative of the Crown is the same in all parts of Her Majesty's dominions. The exercise of it as gold and silver is modified as regards New South Wales and Queensland by the Act 18 & 19 Vic., c. 54 sec. 2; as to Victoria by the Act 18 and 19 Vic., c. 55, sec. 2; and as to Western Australia by the Act of last year, 53 & 54 Vic., c. 26, sec. 3. These sections vest in the Legislatures of the several colonies named, the entire management and control of the waste lands of the Crown and the proceeds thereof, including all royalties, mines, and minerals. I trust that this information, as showing the course that has been taken in Australia, will satisfy the hon. Member.

MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN: No, Sir; quite the contrary. What I desire to know is whether the general words in the Acts of Parliament referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman have vested in the Colonial Legislature and in the Colonial Governments the gold and silver in the colonies?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I do not think the hon. Gentleman really followed my answer. I mentioned the statutes where the rights of the Crown have been interfered with. In cases in which no Statutes have been passed the rights will still remain with the Crown.

THE MINES (EIGHT HOURS) BILL.

MR. PICKARD (York, W.R., Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now arrange a day for the Debate on the Second Reading of the Mines (Eight Hours) Bill?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The consideration of that Order cannot be taken until after the 18th of March, nor can I advance it. Under these circumstances, and as there is a reasonable probability that the Order may be reached by that time, I cannot say that I am yet in a position to give a day for the discussion.

MR. PICKARD: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to say if he would be able to fix a day should the Order not be reached on the 18th of March?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid that to enter into such an engagement would merely be an invitation to prolong the Debate on the previous Order. It would be better for the hon. Gentleman to use his influence with other hon. Members to secure an opportunity.

OVERCHARGES ON INDIAN STORES.

MR. BURT (Morpeth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will state the decision of the arbitrator to whom the matter was referred, re the dispute between the War Office and the India Office as to alleged overcharges, extending through a series of years on stores supplied to the Government of India; and whether he will lay upon the Table a memorandum giving particulars of the arbitration?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I can assure the hon. Member that the matter has not been lost sight of, but it involves greater difficulties than at first sight appeared. The arbitrator (Lord Cranbrook) has not yet been able to come to a decision.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS BETWEEN ENGLAND AND IRELAND.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he is in a position to state when the Committee of Inquiry into the Financial Relations between Ireland and Great Britain will commence its investigations?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am anxious to push this matter forward with Irish Members. I do not know whether they are yet prepared to resume the discussion, and I did not like to ask them whether they were. If I am to take this question as an indication that there now exists a desire to go forward with this Committee, I will immediately take measures to have it reappointed, with such changes in the constitution of the Committee as circumstances may demand. I would propose, as March was by far the busiest month with me, and I should be unable to give continued attendance, that the Committee should be appointed, and that one meeting should be held, and that there should be placed before the Committee the information we have collected. I would then propose to postpone for a month the meeting of the Committee, when we should be able to give further information—in fact, the results of the second year, 1890-91, to compare with the year 1889-90. If that course commends itself to hon. Members I shall be glad to follow it.

MR. SEXTON: I thank the right hon. Gentleman, and concur in the general view of the circumstances he has expressed. May I suggest to him that it would make the proceedings of the Committee more useful if he would allow an interval between the circulation of the Return and the first meeting of the Committee?

MR. GOSCHEN: Certainly, it will be convenient that some time should elapse, but, of course, I cannot have the Papers circulated until I know who are to be the members of the Committee. Though to a great extent the composition of the Committee may be the same, it does not follow that the members will be the same.

SIR J. M'KENNA (Monaghan, S.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he would be prepared to add some additional Irish Members to the Committee?

MR. GOSCHEN: The composition of the Committee was very carefully considered at the time it was nominated and agreed to on both sides, and I do not think I could assent to making such a change.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to have the names submitted to the House without delay?

MR. GOSCHEN: So far as it lies in my hands, yes.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON LABOUR.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he will be in a position to state what arrangements he intends to make for the representation of Irish interests on the Royal Commission to inquire into the labour question?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it would be more convenient that I should make a complete statement when I communicate to the House the terms of reference and the names of the Commissioners.

MR. SEXTON: Do we understand that the terms of reference will be communicated before the Commission is appointed?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: As to that I cannot give an absolute answer.

FACTORY INSPECTORS.

MR. H. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for the Home Department a question of which I have given him private notice: whether he will lay on the Table the new regulations as to the examination and appointment of Factory Inspectors referred to in Debate last night?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): The fullest publicity has been and continues to be given to these regulations, which of necessity are communicated to all applicants for Inspectorships. If my hon. Friend wishes to give them even further publicity, and to obtain it at the expense of presentation to Parliament, his Motion for that purpose would not be opposed by the Government.

ARRANGEMENT OF BUSINESS.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury when it is the intention of the Government to introduce the Small Holdings Bill mentioned in the Queen's Speech?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I think the right hon. Gentleman has misunderstood my question. I asked when, and not whether, the Bill would be introduced.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Well, I think the House has quite sufficient work on its hands just now, and I do not see any advantage in mentioning a possible date.

SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): Will my right hon. Friend say what business will be taken on Monday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not without hope of being allowed to take the Money Vote for the Army to-night. The time now is exceedingly short before Easter, which falls much earlier this year. Therefore, we shall have to devote increasing attention to the Estimates. At any rate, the Navy Estimates must stand first for Monday.

Mr. Sexton

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): And after Monday what is the intention? What Estimates will be taken on Thursday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We must take the necessary Votes as rapidly as possible, the right hon. Gentleman is aware of the necessity. After the Navy Vote and the necessary Vote for the Army we shall proceed with the Supplementary Estimates. Supply, not Bills, will be the business next week.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): May I ask whether it is intended to adjourn for the Easter holidays on the 24th March?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not able to say. We must discharge the necessary business before the adjournment.

MR. SEXTON: I suppose we may conclude that the Irish Land Purchase Bill will not be taken before Easter?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not say that it will not be possible, but the hon. Gentleman may rest assured that it will not be taken until the Supply necessary before Easter is taken.

MR. SEXTON: Reasonable notice will be given as to when it is to be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly, Sir.

PAUPERS, INDOOR (MEMBERS OF BENEFIT SOCIETIES).

Return ordered—

"Of the Paupers in the Workhouses of England and Wales, on the 31st day of March, 1891, who, having been members of a Benefit Society, had then from any cause ceased to be members (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 444, of Session 1881)." — (Viscount Lympington.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

TAXATION OF LAND.

RESOLUTION.

(5.14.) MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars, &c.): I rise to bring before the House the subject upon which I have given notice, and to move the Motion which stands in my name on the Paper. This Motion deals with a question of continual Parliamentary interest. Taxation is the one subject that is sure to come up for consideration every year; indeed, I may go a little further, and say that although many taxation questions will in time be discussed and disposed of, that of the taxation of land is the one question which is certain to remain to be dealt with in every Parliament throughout a very long future. The Motion sets out that land pays at present too little taxation. The owner should be liable to be taxed on what the land is worth, and not merely on what it rents for, and for this purpose it would require to be assessed separately when it is in any way occupied. This change would largely increase the taxation paid by land, and this increase would form a fund by means of which other taxes which press on food, industry, and commerce could be repealed. Therefore the Motion, if carried, would involve a considerable re-adjustment of the incidence of taxation. As land is taxed both for local and Imperial purposes, I must take the sum of Imperial and local taxation together, and begin by showing in round figures the principal amounts of our present taxation and the sources from which we obtain it. Taken together our local and Imperial taxation amounts to about £105,000,000 per annum, and the following are the chief sources from which this was collected in 1889, which is the last year for which the figures have been published. Food was taxed to the extent of nearly £5,500,000, intoxicants £30,000,000, stamps £13,000,000, Income Tax £13,000,000, House Duty £2,000,000, Land Tax £1,000,000, and tobacco £9,000,000, and the local taxation may be taken as £30,000,000, making, with some smaller sums, in round figures a total of about £105,000,000. The reduction in the Tea and Currant Duties made last year will reduce the taxation on food for this year to between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000, but the other sources of taxation will not be much altered except on intoxicants, which will show an increase, I am sorry to say, over last year. Now, the first question is—How much of this gigantic total of £105,000,000 is paid by the landowners? They contribute in six different ways—by Land Tax, by Rates, by Stamps on Deeds, by the Estate Duty, by Succession Duty, and by Income Tax under Schedule A, but all these sources taken together do not contribute probably more than £5,000,000 to the total taxation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): And the rates?

MR. PROVAND: In England rates are paid by the occupiers; in Ireland and Scotland they are paid half by occupiers, half by owners. Therefore, leaving out the £30,000,000 derived from drink, as being an article on which there is no intention of decreasing the duty, and the £9,000,000 paid by tobacco, the rest of our taxation during the present year will be derived, say, from food about £3,500,000; from landowners about 5,000,000, leaving nearly £60,000,000 to be paid by occupiers of farms and houses, and by the community in many ways and forms, making altogether an enormous direct or indirect taxation falling on industry. I am now stating these sums in round figures. It is impossible that I can go into the details in the time at my command; and besides that, the exact proportions could not be worked out except by a person having access to figures, which, so far as I know, are not made public. But even if there were discrepancies in the figures I give, this would not affect the principles for which I am contending. Whether one set of figures given is slightly over or under what someone else may say they are, or even prove them to be, will not affect the case. Everyone knows how easy it is to manipulate figures to practically misrepresent an issue. Now, I have shown how little of our taxation falls on the landowners, and indeed the Chancellor of the Exchequer has repeatedly admitted that there are great inequalities to be rectified between the taxation which falls on land and on personalty, but he has said in recent times that rates for local purposes should not be paid by landowners, nor should the Death Duties be made the same on realty as on personality unless and until the assessment of land to Income Tax was put on the same footing as on other property. I invite him to do so; but I do not expect this invitation will be accepted, as landowners know that any alteration that could legitimately be made in the way land is assessed to the Income Tax would be a very small sum indeed compared with what they would in such case require to pay in local rates and Death Duties. So much, therefore, for my first point—that land pays too small a share of our taxation, and that the burden ought to be increased. Let me now deal with part of the £60,000,000 or so of taxation which is paid by or falls, either directly or indirectly, on food and industry. Even if national necessities, such as a time of war, required any tax to be placed on food, the percentage which is now charged would be out of all reason. The articles which pay duty are tea, coffee, dried fruits, and some other things which, taken all round, are increased in price to the consumer by at least 50 per cent. on account of the duties. But there is another unanswerable reason against any tax whatever being placed on food; and that is, that food is raw material, and it is indispensable that we should obtain it at the least possible cost. The last thing on which there should be any tax is food, and no reasonable defence can be offered for taxing it while we have vast amounts of other property which escapes taxation almost altogether. Something like £30,000,000 a year out of the total of £60,000,000 is collected by rates, which, except in Ireland and Scotland, are paid by occupiers, and the whole of this is paid out of their wages, or out of the businesses which they carry on, and is, therefore, a direct tax upon their industry. Income Tax brings in £13,000,000, and the profits of industry pay the whole amount except what is charged to landowners under Schedule A; and out of £13,000,000 realised from stamps, landowners contribute only a little for deeds used in the sale or purchase of land and for Succession Duties. Except in these cases the whole of the Stamp Duties are charges on trade and commerce. An example of a direct tax on our commerce is the stamp charged on marine insurance policies. This forms an addition to the cost of the merchandise we export and import. Every merchant's invoice for goods contains the charge for marine insurance, and includes this tax, and £140,000 a year is by this means brought into the Exchequer, and everything shipped for sale abroad or imported for sale at home is made dearer by the amount of this duty. £45,000 is collected by the tax on life insurance policies; that is to say, those persons who are thrifty and prudent are taxed because they are so. The question of cheaper railway fares has been repeatedly before this House of late, yet we charge the Railway Companies £330,000 a year for passenger duty. If this were remitted it would enable the companies to do something towards providing the cheaper suburban rates which it is admitted on all hands must be brought about if the workers in large cities are to be able to get backwards and forwards from their homes to their employment. The Carriage Tax which brings in nearly £500,000 a year is another indefensible charge upon industry, although, perhaps a municipal impost on carriages for police purposes might be conceded. Even the briefest examination of the sources of our taxation must convey to the mind of anybody that they have been carefully sought out by successive Chancellors of the Exchequer, moved by the determination that whoever was taxed landowners at least, to a large extent, should go free. There are many taxes which ought at once to be taken off the Statute Book for the sufficient reason that they are unjust. They bring very little money into the National Exchequer and must require a small army of clerks to look after the collection of them. Many kinds of businesses are still taxed, for which there is neither reason nor justification. Why, for example, should a house agent be charged a licence to carry on his business? Why should a solicitor have to pay from £3 to £9 per annum to be permitted to practise his profession? The State does nothing whatever for these men; their businesses are not monopolies. Any person may be a solicitor who will take the trouble to pass the required examinations. These taxes are what remain of a great many of the same kind that were formerly in existence. Calico printers, starch makers, wire drawers, tanners, glass makers, and numerous other trades and businesses could not at one time be carried on unless permission was first purchased from the State by payment of a tax. It is impossible to defend such charges, and we still keep on the Statute Book a number of small charges from which we can get no adequate return. But perhaps the high-water mark of injustice as well as meanness is reached on the part of the Government in the profit of something like £90,000 a year which they make out of the Patent Office. It is notorious that, as a rule, inventors are poor men; indeed, in innumerable instances they make and keep themselves poor by struggling to invent, yet this class which does a great deal for us in the extreme competition in which we are engaged with all foreign countries, hampered as we are by their fiscal arrangements—this very class, which should be exempt, at least, from paying a profit to the State, are required to contribute to our Revenue about £90,000 per annum. We have quite recently in this House voted large sums for technical education in order that our youth may be adequately trained to design and to invent, as it is continually brought before us that on many of these points our continental neighbours are better prepared than we are; but as soon as they are old enough to utilise the training provided for them, and to design or invent, we only permit them to do so provided they contribute to the Revenue a profit, after the expenses are paid, of about £90,000 a year. I do not think it would be possible to discover any tax more unreasonable, more likely to discourage skill and industry, or which would be more profitable to give up. I have now given a sufficient number of illustrations of how a large proportion of our national income falls upon food and industry, and it would be wiser to discontinue such taxes, which have the direct effect of hampering our commerce. Land should be assessed on its value, and the assessment should be separate from that of any buildings that may be on it. I recognise the great differences between rural and urban land. The former has a creative power which requires the continual application of labour and capital, while urban land has only an earning power which is entirely derived from the presence of population in its neighbourhood, without the application of either labour or capital on the part of the owner. Rural land is, in fact, in many places, to a large extent, a manufactured article. The methods of valuation for purposes of taxation would, therefore, no doubt be different, and the allowances for improvements in the case of rural land would have to be dealt with; but in the case of urban land there is no such difficulty, and the separate valuation of it, apart from buildings, would be easy. This matter has already been dealt with by a Committee of the London County Council, which took evidence—

Mr. Provand

“(a) As to the practicability of separating and recording the value of London land apart from that of buildings or improvements.

(b) As to the method of affecting such separation; and

(c) As to the steps necessary to be taken in order to ensure the adoption and practical operation of such method, and they found that the separate assessment and record of the separate value of the land was easy and practicable.”

The subject has also been dealt with by two Municipal Committees in the City of Glasgow, who have both found it will be a simple matter to value and assess land, apart from buildings, and a Special Committee in Glasgow, to which this question was referred, recommended that a copy of their findings should be sent to all Assessing Bodies in Scotland with a request that they will co-operate in petitioning Parliament in favour of legislation on the lines indicated in their Report. The House will therefore see that this point has already been dealt with in London and Glasgow, and there is not the smallest doubt that it will be rapidly taken up by other cities. To carry out this separate assessment of land, and to make the tax payable by the owner, no change in our law is necessary. A new Land Tax, if an increase of taxation took this form, would be on the same footing as the existing one, the law respecting which I quote from the 28th Report of the Inland Revenue Department, in which it says—

“Land Tax is payable whether the property be occupied or not. The law applicable to Land Tax makes no provision for voids or loss of rent; it is a charge upon the owner, and if the occupier pays it in the first instance he is entitled to deduct it on payment of his rent.”

*SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset Wells): Will the hon. Member quote from the same Report the origin of that tax?

*MR. PROVAND: I should be delighted to do so if I had the time to spare. The next point is who should be assessed, and authorities are all agreed that the occupier should be charged in the first instance, and the way in which he would recover the part for which he was not liable is stated with admirable clearness by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer in his book on Local Taxation, published in 1872, and from which I take the liberty to quote. He said—

“Power being given to the occupier to deduct from his rent the proportion of the rates to which the owner may be made liable, and provision being made to render persons having superior or intermediate interests liable to proportionate deductions from the amount received by them, as in the case of the Income Tax with a like prohibition against agreement in contravention of the law.”

That is what the right hon. Gentleman wrote in 1872, and, of course, it is quite as applicable now as then. That the landowner should be prohibited from contracting himself out of the tax will be necessary, otherwise we should find ourselves in our present position; that is to say, it would be paid by the occupiers, and in effect be an increase of rent. Now, Sir, in advocating an increase in the taxation of land, I am not proposing anything which is new. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, introduced the Succession Duty, and the present Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1888, and again in 1889, increased the charges on land by raising the Succession Duty in the former year, and by creating what is called the Estate Duty in the latter year. The points to which public attention have been mainly directed are that land, when vacant, pays no rates, and when occupied the rates are paid in England by the occupier. This is an old standing injustice, and, in 1871, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was then President of the Local Government Board, introduced a Local Government Bill, and, in doing so, he said—

“Justice and public policy require that the owner shall pay a certain portion of the taxes.”

And further on he said—

“The Government have decided that such an anomalous state of things shall no longer exist, and a provision rendering void any engagements by which owners contract themselves out of the payment of local taxation is made in this Bill.”

But that Bill did not pass, and the injustice continues to this time. Now, Sir, justice and public policy are as powerful reasons to-day as they were 20 years ago in favour of the landowner being required to pay more taxes and also against his being permitted to contract himself out of their payment.

I may mention that, with the exception of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, the Government of that day—that is, in 1871—now occupy the Front Bench below me. A landowner could not contract himself out of an Imperial tax, nor should he be allowed to do so in the case of a local tax. Landowners have been enriched enormously by the expenditure of rates paid by the occupiers; and although the case against the country landowner is not so strong, because not so general, on this point as against the town landowner, nevertheless the evil exists to a very large extent. I have said that there would be some differences in the methods applicable to increasing or imposing fresh taxation on rural land from urban land, and although land in towns is that which most stands in need of attention, nevertheless the fact of land being enormously increased in value by the expenditure of the occupier's money is in many cases as noticeable in the country as in the towns. Time will not permit me to give more than one example of how this injustice is worked in a country place. In the North of England there is a manor of about 2,800 acres, the lord of which has paid throughout the last 20 years less than £4 in rates. In the meantime, the Local Authorities have spent, or are spending, £40,000 in draining, roading, and lighting the neighbourhood, the whole of which forms a tax upon the occupiers and their successors. The value of the land has been enormously increased by this expenditure without the owner having contributed anything whatever except less than the sum of £4 on rates. When we come to the towns the cases are numerous and notorious. Every city furnishes examples of the whole community being taxed, their industry mortgaged, probably for generations to come, largely for the benefit of those who own the land. We have an example within a short distance of this House in the land lying to the east of Victoria Railway Station. It is not so long since this was a marsh. It is now closely covered with houses which have become the property of the owner of the land without any outlay on his part whatever of either money or industry. Some idea may be formed of the rate at which value is being created in this way when I mention that the Local Authorities expended more than £67,000,000 sterling during the last year, and they are building up a local debt secured on the rates which now amounts to £230,000,000. Most of this money has been, and is now being, expended on such objects as to directly increase the value of land, and yet the landowners, except in Ireland and Scotland, do not contribute one farthing in towns, and only sometimes in rural parts, towards this expenditure. It is laid out in making roads and streets, in lighting, paving, draining, and sanitary improvements of every kind, all of which add to the value of the land, and yet towards this landowners, who appropriate the value, pay only partially. In the work on Local Taxation, published in 1872 by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, he says on this point—

“The result of the present state of things has been that many great improvements in the Metropolis, in Liverpool, Manchester, and other large towns, have been made during the last 10 years exclusively at the cost of the occupiers without the landlords contributing a single shilling towards the expense.”

Still more unjust to the community even than not separately taxing occupied land is allowing vacant land to be untaxed. Land can, therefore, be held by the owner without outlay of any kind. Meantime the improvements are going on round about, and increasing the value of his property until, finally, he lets it on building lease perhaps to secure a still greater value to himself in the future, or sells it at a price far beyond what it would have been worth if he had not been able to hold it while the community were taxing themselves to add to its value. There are many reasons which could be urged against vacant land being untaxed. It is a direct premium to its being kept out of use, and it is also, in effect, making the community find the capital without interest for the owner to hold it from sale. This great public injustice has been repeatedly noticed and reported against by Local Bodies, and in 1885 the Royal Commission which sat on the Housing of the Working Classes reported in favour of land available for building being taxed at, say, 4 per cent. on its selling value. This was done on account of the notorious examples brought before them of landowners deliberately keeping their land out of the market and parting with it only in small quantities so as to raise the value beyond even the natural price which land would command by its advantages of position. They also notice in this Report that this increased value to the land was not a recompense for any industry or expenditure on the part of the landlords, but was the natural result of the industry and activity of the townspeople themselves. Many other Reports might be quoted in a similar sense, but these would be merely cumulative testimony in reference to an evil which I am sure no Member of this House will venture to defend. In the Report of the Land Valuation Committee of the London County Council, they mention that in Kensington the value of vacant land is about £1,700,000 sterling, which is practically not rated at all, the rates not being worth considering; and land in parts of Kensington is now worth from 7 to 8 times more than it was 25 years ago. In some of the central, and also in all the outlying districts of London, land is kept vacant while it is annually increasing in value without in most cases contributing a farthing to the local requirements. This part of the case against land is unanswerable. Every reason which can be adduced is in favour of it being taxed on its value and not being exempt from taxation which, when imposed for local purposes, is directly the means by which its value is increased in the market. I have now dealt with the several points in the Motion. Firstly, that land is taxed too little, and this was stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself in his speech made in 1871, when he also showed how much more land pays in other countries than in ours. I quote his words and figures—

“The amount paid by land alone in England is 5½ per cent.; in Holland land alone pays 9 per cent., in Austria 17¼ per cent., in France 18½ per cent., in Belgium 20½ per cent., and in Hungary 32½ per cent. What do these facts prove? They prove that, as regards Imperial taxation, land in this country is in an infinitely better position than land in any other European State.”

Also that there will be no difficulty in imposing fresh taxation, as any new tax might follow the law which regulates the existing Land Tax. Nor would there be any difficulty in assessing and collecting a separate tax, as the Reports of the Committees of the London County Council and of the Glasgow Municipal Council say that an assessment on the value of land separate from that of the houses covering it is practically easy. The method of collecting the tax would be that recommended by the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself in his Draft Report on Local Taxation which I have read to the House. And now, Sir, I submit that I have made a perfectly sound case for an increase of the taxation to be paid by landowners and also for that which is implied by the Motion, an equivalent reduction of taxes which are now charged on food and industry. The Government have recently taken up the labour question. After all, this is a branch of the labour question, and perhaps the most important branch which is at present under consideration. There is a popular idea that a working man pays no taxes unless he drinks or smokes. This is a delusion. He not only pays on his food; but leaving that entirely aside, he pays a larger percentage of his income on local taxation than any other class of the community. Workmen's houses are rated at about 20 to 25 per cent. of their annual value, and a workman usually pays 20 to 25 per cent. of his wages in rent. Taking him, therefore, at an average of 25s. per week, which is a high average, his rent would be about 5s., on which he would pay from 1s. to 1s. 3d. for rates, either through his landlord in rent or direct himself, and this represents from 4 per cent. to 5 per cent. on his income, which is a larger percentage than is paid by any other class; and, besides this, it must not be forgotten that it is a much greater strain to pay 4 per cent. or 5 per cent. on a very small income than it would be to pay the same proportion on a very large one. It is the working classes on whom local taxation falls heaviest, and when local burdens are largely shared by the landowner, as they ought to be, the working classes will get the benefit in lower rents. I have repeatedly mentioned and quoted the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and my reason for doing so is because there is no man in this House who knows so much about this subject as he does, and also because he is the only person to whom we can look for assistance. He has the stewardship of our national finances, and the local finances are controlled by this House under his initiative. And I desire to enforce my appeal by the statement that while he has been in power for four years, during three of which he has had large surpluses, he has discriminated in favour of the land and added to land taxation only about £200,000, while he has added more than four times that amount to personality by the new Estate Duty alone, which he brought in two years ago. We have yet to see what he has added to the taxation of land by the Estate Duty. Twenty years ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us in this House that justice and public policy required that landowners should pay more taxes than they did then; and as almost nothing has been done since to make them pay more the case is now infinitely stronger, and justice and public policy call louder than ever for an equitable readjustment of taxation. On the one hand, landowners pay a mere trifling increase of taxes; while, on the other hand, hundreds of millions of pounds have meantime been raised from rates or borrowed by Local Authorities, nearly the whole of which have been spent in improvements, which have largely gone to enrich landowners.

Mr. Provand

This is no exaggeration. In 1871 it was intended to divide the rates between the occupier and landlord in England and Wales in the same way as they are divided in Ireland and Scotland. That was not done. What has happened since then? During the intervening 20 years nearly £500,000,000 sterling have been raised by rates in England and Wales; and if the law had been changed in 1871, one-half of this would have fallen upon the landowners. They are, therefore, now this amount in pocket, besides having become possessed of all the increment of the land which has resulted from the local expenditure of the most of this enormous sum of money. But even this does not express all the advantage which has been given to them since 1871, for, besides the rates that have been raised and expended, the Local Authorities in England and Wales have borrowed in the meantime something like £100,000,000 of money, which has also been expended in local enterprises and improvements which have added to the value of land. If, therefore, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was right when he said that the state of things then existing was unjust and against public policy, there are far stronger reasons in existence now in favour of this opinion than there were when he expressed it. I think, therefore, I may confidently appeal to him to give his early and earnest consideration to the great injustice which is being done to the community by permitting the landowners to escape their share of the public burdens. We are sure to hear more on this subject in the early future, both in this House and in the constituencies, and it is certain to be brought prominently before their notice in view of the coming General Election. As the Government is setting its house in order against that possibly evil day, I hope it will take this question into consideration, and deal with it at least on as fair a basis as was intended by the Government of 1871. If they will not do so, they may be assured the country will take notice of their refusal to remedy this notorious injustice, and will deal with them accordingly when the General Election gives the people an opportunity of doing so. I beg to move the Resolution down to the word "increased" in the third line.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the proportion of taxation which falls upon and is payable by land and its rentals is insufficient and ought to be increased,"—(Mr. Provand.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(5.55.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I rise to second the Resolution, and I shall do so very shortly indeed. I must express my gratification that my hon. Friend has omitted the latter portion of his Resolution, and has therefore enabled the House to vote upon a clear issue, instead of an issue complicated by a variety of subjects not necessarily involved the one in the other. I will not endeavour to follow the complicated line of reasoning so ably pursued by my hon. Friend, because I only intend to deal with a few large lines of argument. I take it that it is admitted on all sides of the House, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as well as by gentlemen on this side, that, so far as Imperial taxation is concerned, land in this country pays considerably less than land in any other countries, and that the percentage paid by land in this country towards Imperial purposes is less than the percentage paid by any other class of property. I think it is admitted on all hands that the amount paid by houses and land in England towards Imperial taxation is very different from what is the case in other countries. In England it is 10½ per cent., as stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, while in France it is 29 per cent., and in Hungary 38 per cent. To form any proper conception of the burden borne by land we must take into consideration what is paid to local as well as to Imperial purposes. In this connection land is divided into two categories—land in towns, and arable or cultivable land. The cases of these two differ considerably, and what I want to urge on the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the House is that there is no doubt what-upon the occupier alone, and were in no way paid by the land. The occupier pays a certain sum for the use of the land, and in that sum are included rates as well as taxes. The effect on the owner is that if the rates are high he gets less rent; and if they are low he gets more rent, and I maintain that it would not be difficult to show that ultimately the whole burden of the rates falls upon the owner of the land and on nobody else. In that contention I am to some extent supported by the Seconder of the Resolution, who appears to differ very considerably from my hon. Friend the Mover. The hon. Member who seconded the Motion appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to introduce legislation for the purpose of dividing the rates between owner and occupier. That was a reform which was recommended many years ago by a Commission, presided over by the Duke of Richmond, of which I was a member, and it is a reform Her Majesty's Government are perfectly ready to give, provided a fitting representation is given to owners of land as well as occupiers. I admit it is true, as stated by the hon. Member, that land in foreign countries pays more taxes than land in this country, but he cannot omit from his consideration the question of local taxation. The Motion which has been read over from the Chair, has been wisely, I think, curtailed. The House will observe that although it deals with the question of taxation on land, the hon. Member dealt with the question of urban as well as rural land, and I think it will simplify matters greatly if I deal with the question of urban and rural land separately. Take urban land to begin with. What is the grievance of the hon. Gentleman? He based his case, as I understood him to say, on the Report of the Committee for the Housing of the Working Classes, and he also directed his arguments to the question of taxation of vacant land. I am quite prepared to make this admission, that the case of urban land differs very widely from that of rural land, yet I think it is one with regard to which the hon. Member entirely failed to make out his case. I should require very much more conclusive arguments than those which the hon. Member has adduced before I could accept his views. I will content myself by opposing the Motion on three grounds. In the first place the grievance, whatever it is, whether it be great or whether it be small, is limited, I think the hon. Member said, to £1,700,000, and in its very nature it must be more or less temporary in its character. In the second place, the whole of this subject, unless I am mistaken, is now under the consideration of a Committee sitting at this moment on Town Holdings. But there is a much more serious ground, I think, than either of these, on which the Motion might be opposed, and that is that, if the land were to be taxed—as the hon. Gentleman, I think, pointed out was his intention—upon its capital value, instead of upon the income, it would be an entire departure from the principles of taxation upon property which have been accepted in this country up to the present time. It would be manifestly unfair and undesirable to apply this principle to one-third of property only, and we should require very much more conclusive arguments and complete evidence than has been laid before us before we could accept a proposal of that kind. I come now, Sir, to the question of rural land, and here I must say that I think the case is conclusive against the views of the hon. Gentleman. He says the taxation of the land and of its rentals is insufficient, and, therefore, ought to be increased. I confess, to begin with, that I have some difficulty in understanding precisely what it is that the hon. Gentleman means. Insufficient compared with what? Does he mean it is insufficient as compared with the taxation levied upon other kinds of property, or with the taxation upon land in foreign countries? He argued the question at considerable length, and, if he will permit me, I will reply to those observations. In the first place, although he pointed out that in countries which he named, and in others which he did not name, land is much more heavily taxed than in this country, and in which I agree with him; yet he failed to point out one very good reason for this, namely, that in some of those countries there is probably little, if anything, else but land which can be taxed. Again, I would point out that in nearly all of those countries there is a system of heavy protective duties, and whatever may be the effect of a protective system upon the position of a country as a whole—a subject I am not concerned to argue now—it undoubtedly has the effect of very materially enhancing the price of the produce of the land, and, therefore, upon that ground the landowners in those countries may justly and equitably be called upon to pay more taxation in respect of their land than is the case in England. But there is another reply to the argument of the hon. Member on that point, which I venture to think is infinitely more telling than either of those I have adduced. How much of our taxation in this country is needed for purposes which are not required in the countries to which I have referred; or, if they are needed, only in a comparatively minor degree? How much of our taxation is required for the purposes of our trade and commerce, and for the maintenance of our Empire in all parts of the world? What country in these respects can compare with us for a moment, and why should the land for all these great purposes be exceptionally taxed? The mere statement of the question carries with it its own answer, and supplies a complete refutation of the hon. Member's argument, which is based on the difference of taxation on land as between this and foreign countries. Well, Sir, can a more favourable comparison be made on any other ground—say as compared with taxation upon other kinds of property—in this country. Both hon. Gentlemen have pointed to the Death Duties, and complained of the inequalities as regards personal property. While I admit that concessions have been made of late years in local taxation, I can point, in reply, to the incidence of the Income Tax and the unfairness with which, according to our view, it falls upon land. I could quote, if it were necessary for me to do so, the opinions of most distinguished authorities on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, in 1853, after a most elaborate argument and dissection of the whole of this question, proved to demonstration the case which I support in respect of land, so far at all events as this, that he maintained that an Income Tax of 7d. on other kinds of property in reality was equal to a tax of 9d. upon land. That is a grievance which has remained unremoved until this day; what was true then is absolutely true at the present moment. Then, again, the Land Tax in its earliest inception was undoubtedly a tax on personalty as well; it was a tax on all kinds of property. Very much like local rates, after many years it became gradually disused, as far as regards other kinds of property, and ultimately fell wholly upon the land. As far as the history of the Land Tax is concerned it will not bear investigation for a moment, and coupling it with the grievance justly felt with regard to Income Tax, I maintain, if there be any question of altering the taxation on land at present, we claim, and claim, I think, with full justice, and we could adduce arguments to make good our claims, that we are entitled to a decrease rather than an increase of taxation on land. Well, Sir, if our present taxation is not sufficient as compared either with foreign countries or with taxation on other kinds of property in this, in what other way can the hon. Member make good this proposition? "Taxation," said the hon. Member, "upon land is insufficient, and ought to be increased." Well, that is the view of another person, Mr. Henry George, of whom we have heard a good deal lately. I do not know how far hon. Members share the views of that very distinguished individual, but all I know is this, that no amount of taxation of land in the world would ever be sufficient or satisfactory in the eyes of Mr. George, if any taxation was raised in any other way whatever. This is not a matter to be settled off hand by Motion on a Friday afternoon in the House of Commons. Authorities of the highest position, and differing entirely in their political views, have expressed opinions on this subject varying in toto from those expressed by both hon. Members. In the year 1872 my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made this statement—

Mr. Chaplin

"There can be no more difficult or complicated question than that which is mentioned in determining the equitable proportion of taxation which real property ought to bear as compared either with land or with the consuming classes. It is not a question of statistics only; it is a political question."

upon the occupier alone, and were in no way paid by the land. The occupier pays a certain sum for the use of the land, and in that sum are included rates as well as taxes. The effect on the owner is that if the rates are high he gets less rent; and if they are low he gets more rent, and I maintain that it would not be difficult to show that ultimately the whole burden of the rates falls upon the owner of the land and on nobody else. In that contention I am to some extent supported by the Seconder of the Resolution, who appears to differ very considerably from my hon. Friend the Mover. The hon. Member who seconded the Motion appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to introduce legislation for the purpose of dividing the rates between owner and occupier. That was a reform which was recommended many years ago by a Commission, presided over by the Duke of Richmond, of which I was a member, and it is a reform Her Majesty's Government are perfectly ready to give, provided a fitting representation is given to owners of land as well as occupiers. I admit it is true, as stated by the hon. Member, that land in foreign countries pays more taxes than land in this country, but he cannot omit from his consideration the question of local taxation. The Motion which has been read over from the Chair, has been wisely, I think, curtailed. The House will observe that although it deals with the question of taxation on land, the hon. Member dealt with the question of urban as well as rural land, and I think it will simplify matters greatly if I deal with the question of urban and rural land separately. Take urban land to begin with. What is the grievance of the hon. Gentleman? He based his case, as I understood him to say, on the Report of the Committee for the Housing of the Working Classes, and he also directed his arguments to the question of taxation of vacant land. I am quite prepared to make this admission, that the case of urban land differs very widely from that of rural land, yet I think it is one with regard to which the hon. Member entirely failed to make out his case. I should require very much more conclusive arguments than those which the hon. Member has adduced before I could accept his views. I will content myself by opposing the Motion on three grounds. In the first place the grievance, whatever it is, whether it be great or whether it be small, is limited, I think the hon. Member said, to £1,700,000, and in its very nature it must be more or less temporary in its character. In the second place, the whole of this subject, unless I am mistaken, is now under the consideration of a Committee sitting at this moment on Town Holdings. But there is a much more serious ground, I think, than either of these, on which the Motion might be opposed, and that is that, if the land were to be taxed—as the hon. Gentleman, I think, pointed out was his intention—upon its capital value, instead of upon the income, it would be an entire departure from the principles of taxation upon property which have been accepted in this country up to the present time. It would be manifestly unfair and undesirable to apply this principle to one-third of property only, and we should require very much more conclusive arguments and complete evidence than has been laid before us before we could accept a proposal of that kind. I come now, Sir, to the question of rural land, and here I must say that I think the case is conclusive against the views of the hon. Gentleman. He says the taxation of the land and of its rentals is insufficient, and, therefore, ought to be increased. I confess, to begin with, that I have some difficulty in understanding precisely what it is that the hon. Gentleman means. Insufficient compared with what? Does he mean it is insufficient as compared with the taxation levied upon other kinds of property, or with the taxation upon land in foreign countries? He argued the question at considerable length, and, if he will permit me, I will reply to those observations. In the first place, although he pointed out that in countries which he named, and in others which he did not name, land is much more heavily taxed than in this country, and in which I agree with him; yet he failed to point out one very good reason for this, namely, that in some of those countries there is probably little, if anything, else but land which can be taxed. Again, I would point out that in nearly all of those countries there is a system of heavy protective duties, and whatever may be the effect of a protective system upon the position of a country as a whole—a subject I am not concerned to argue now—it undoubtedly has the effect of very materially enhancing the price of the produce of the land, and, therefore, upon that ground the landowners in those countries may justly and equitably be called upon to pay more taxation in respect of their land than is the case in England. But there is another reply to the argument of the hon. Member on that point, which I venture to think is infinitely more telling than either of those I have adduced. How much of our taxation in this country is needed for purposes which are not required in the countries to which I have referred; or, if they are needed, only in a comparatively minor degree? How much of our taxation is required for the purposes of our trade and commerce, and for the maintenance of our Empire in all parts of the world? What country in these respects can compare with us for a moment, and why should the land for all these great purposes be exceptionally taxed? The mere statement of the question carries with it its own answer, and supplies a complete refutation of the hon. Member's argument, which is based on the difference of taxation on land as between this and foreign countries. Well, Sir, can a more favourable comparison be made on any other ground—say as compared with taxation upon other kinds of property—in this country. Both hon. Gentlemen have pointed to the Death Duties, and complained of the inequalities as regards personal property. While I admit that concessions have been made of late years in local taxation, I can point, in reply, to the incidence of the Income Tax and the unfairness with which, according to our view, it falls upon land. I could quote, if it were necessary for me to do so, the opinions of most distinguished authorities on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, in 1853, after a most elaborate argument and dissection of the whole of this question, proved to demonstration the case which I support in respect of land, so far at all events as this, that he maintained that an Income Tax of 7d. on other kinds of property in reality was equal to a tax of 9d. upon land. That is a grievance which has remained unremoved until this day; what was true then is absolutely true at the present moment. Then, again, the Land Tax in its earliest inception was undoubtedly a tax on personalty as well; it was a tax on all kinds of property. Very much like local rates, after many years it became gradually disused, as far as regards other kinds of property, and ultimately fell wholly upon the land. As far as the history of the Land Tax is concerned it will not bear investigation for a moment, and coupling it with the grievance justly felt with regard to Income Tax, I maintain, if there be any question of altering the taxation on land at present, we claim, and claim, I think, with full justice, and we could adduce arguments to make good our claims, that we are entitled to a decrease rather than an increase of taxation on land. Well, Sir, if our present taxation is not sufficient as compared either with foreign countries or with taxation on other kinds of property in this, in what other way can the hon. Member make good this proposition? "Taxation," said the hon. Member, "upon land is insufficient, and ought to be increased." Well, that is the view of another person, Mr. Henry George, of whom we have heard a good deal lately. I do not know how far hon. Members share the views of that very distinguished individual, but all I know is this, that no amount of taxation of land in the world would ever be sufficient or satisfactory in the eyes of Mr. George, if any taxation was raised in any other way whatever. This is not a matter to be settled off hand by Motion on a Friday afternoon in the House of Commons. Authorities of the highest position, and differing entirely in their political views, have expressed opinions on this subject varying in toto from those expressed by both hon. Members. In the year 1872 my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made this statement—

Mr. Chaplin

"There can be no more difficult or complicated question than that which is mentioned in determining the equitable proportion of taxation which real property ought to bear as compared either with land or with the consuming classes. It is not a question of statistics only; it is a political question."

I recollect well the late Professor Thorold Rogers wrote on this subject, and I ask permission to quote his work, because he was a man of advanced and even of extreme opinions. Yet his views are diametrically opposed to those of hon. Members opposite. In his work on taxation he says—

"Now, I am ready enough to admit that there are some local taxes which should not fall on real estate. The only special taxes which are justly levied on landowners, and in justice should be directly levied upon them, are those which are essential to beneficial ownership on the employment of real estate."

I think the hon. Member would find it hard to have an addition to the Land Tax at the present moment for beneficial ownership.

*MR. PROVAND: May I be permitted to explain? I did not propose any new Land Tax.

*MR. CHAPLIN: In that case I mistook the hon. Member.

*MR. PROVAND: I only spoke in favour of increasing the taxes on land. I did not go into the particular way in which it should be done; but, I recommended towards the conclusion of my remarks that the Government should do that which was proposed by the Government of 1871—divide the rates between the landowner and the occupier.

*MR. CHAPLIN: I regret that I should have misunderstood the hon. Member. I have already intimated that the Government do not object to the proposal to divide the rates between the owners and occupiers; but, certainly I understood the hon. Gentleman in his speech, to intimate the opinion that a new Land Tax should be proposed, and I thought that all the more remarkable because I knew the hon. Member must know perfectly well that nearly half the old Land Tax has been redeemed already. In the latter half of the hon. Member's Motion, as it appears upon the Paper, he proposes that an amount of taxation corresponding to that with which he wishes further to burden the land shall be taken off food, commerce, and industry. I have often observed that the taxation of food was a very favourite topic with hon. Members on that side of the House; but, as a matter of fact, during the last decade the only taxes which have been left upon food are the duties on tea, coffee, cocoa, chicory, and dried fruit. These amounted in 1879-80 to 5·5 per cent. of our gross revenue receipts; in 1884-85 they reached 6·1 per cent.; but in the current year, taking the receipts for 1889-90 as a basis for calculation, they have fallen under the beneficent reign of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen), to 3·8. per cent. Hon. Members opposite, then, have no ground whatever to complain of the present Government in connection with taxes upon food. The great bulk of our indirect taxation at the present moment is raised from intoxicants. Except with regard to them, I know not where any reductions can be made. Is it seriously proposed by the hon. Member that the taxes on intoxicants shall be reduced, and that an amount of taxation corresponding with the reduction shall be put on the landed estate? I think I have said enough with regard to food, but I must be permitted to say a word with regard to the question of industry dealt with by the hon. Member. He says we are to reduce taxation falling upon industry. Are we to understand that the hon. Member alleges seriously that agriculture is not an industry of this country? It is not only that, but it is an industry in one branch of which, at all events, many of the gentlemen sitting around the hon. Member are constantly professing their great interest. In these days we are all, I believe, unanimous in our desire to encourage and to increase the number of that class which Mr. Bright once described as men who "till the land and own the land they till." There is actually a Bill before the House, introduced by the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division (Mr. Jesse Collings), having for its object the increase of that class, and my right hon. Friend the leader of the House has only this evening given the assurance that the Government are going to deal with the subject if time should permit. For my part, I should rejoice if it were possible to carry a Bill for this purpose during the present Session. But what encouragement are the Mover of this Resolution and his supporters giving to the people to invest their hard-earned savings in the purchase of land for small holdings? Will they be encouraged to purchase with threats of this kind hanging over their heads? I declare I can conceive no proposal more calculated to defeat, to render useless, and absolutely inoperative every measure that may be passed, and every effort that may be made in this House to advance the interests of the class of small agriculturists. Agriculture is something more than one of the industries of this country; it is its chief, its greatest and its foremost industry. Of late years, unhappily, we have fallen upon evil times, we have passed through a cycle of agricultural trouble and depression such as probably no man living has ever known before; but now, thank God, there is reason to hope that we have seen the worst; and I must say it speaks well for the pluck, the courage, and the mettle of our agriculturists and farmers that on the appearance of the first glimmer of sunshine they have thrown themselves heart and soul into their work, and are doing their utmost to recover and, if possible, to repair the past. What that past has been, and what the difficulties through which the agricultural industry, which some hon. Members now seek to tax afresh, has gone, the House can judge for itself when I remind them that the decline in the annual value of land, as assessed for Income Tax, during the last decade has been no less than £400,000. And this is the moment which the hon. Member selects. This is the moment which he considers to be appropriate and auspicious for putting forward his doctrinaire schemes, in order I suppose, to assist and encourage agriculturists in the work they are endeavouring to perform, and the only possible result of which can be to bring ruin on thousands of individuals, and to add largely to that amount of land in this country which unhappily has gone out of cultivation and has ceased to be useful and profitable already. I think I have said enough in reply to the hon. Gentleman, and I do not wish to detain the House longer. On the part of the Government, I have to say we will have none of his proposals. Parliament, I am persuaded, will not sanction them, I am satisfied the country does not desire them, and I hope the House of Commons will reject what, under all the circumstances, appears to me to be a most singularly ill-timed and injurious proposal.

Mr. Chaplin

(6.40.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I shall endeavour to imitate the right hon. Gentleman in keeping the remarks which I have to make within a very moderate compass, and, to begin with, I shall express my concurrence with the right hon. Gentleman upon two points. In the first place, I am prepared without pity or scruple to deliver over Mr. Henry George to the right hon. Gentleman's tender mercies. There are persons who view the proposals of Mr. George as proposals of a very enlightened character, and who very much resent the use of hard words respecting him. I shall carefully eschew hard words; but I will say that, so far as my examination or knowledge of his proposals goes, I find it extremely difficult, and, indeed, for myself altogether impossible, to exclude them or extricate them from the category of those plans to which hard words no doubt are commonly applied. In the second place, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that those connected with the agriculture of this country have behaved well in the crisis through which they have been called upon to pass. I think that the farmers of this country—though they are accused of occasional grumbling, which, however, is the privilege of every Englishman—I think that they have borne what they have had to bear with very great firmness and courage, and that they have applied themselves with remarkable energy and spirit upon the first revival of hope in connection with the condition of agriculture to make the best of their great and noble pursuit. I am bound also to say—although I think sometimes that the landlords of this country are a great deal too much given to complain—that during these times of reduction of rent—a fact established by the Income Tax Returns—they have, on the whole, borne that reduction with patience and resignation and in a spirit which befits a great class of Englishmen. At this point I am afraid my concurrence with the right hon. Gentleman ceases, and I fear that my view of his speech is one that he will be very far indeed from approving. But it is an important speech, because we must bear in mind not only that the right hon. Gentleman represents the Department of Agriculture, but that he has been chosen on this occasion as the 'organ of the Government to express the views of the Government. I thank my hon. Friend for having simplified the issue, but I wish to take particular notice of certain declarations made by the right hon. Gentleman. In the first place, I notice one declaration—that the effect of protection is undoubtedly very largely to increase the prices of agricultural produce. That is an important declaration coming from the Government when applied to the history of this country.

*MR. CHAPLIN: I said in many of the countries in which it has been tried.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that Protection in one country tends to increase the prices of agricultural produce, but that in another country it does not? Why, Sir, if it has increased the price of agricultural produce in foreign countries, I think I am justified in saying that would have been the case in this country; and I am sorry to say that it stands upon record that for many generations, when the landed class was in almost exclusive and absolute possession of the two Houses of Parliament, they maintained a rigid system of Protection to raise the prices of commodities in which they dealt themselves, and when finally the proposal was made to abolish that system of Protection they offered to it the most desperate resistance, and they drove from their ranks that most illustrious man whose name will ever remain honourably associated with the emancipation of trade and commerce in this country. Now, that is an awkward admission on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, but when he came to criticise the speech of the Mover of this Motion with respect to rates he made a declaration, which I carefully recorded by the aid of my pencil, and which I think ought to be engraved not only upon a fly sheet of paper that will find its way to the waste-paper basket or the fire, but which ought to be recorded upon the living tablets of the hearts of the House of Commons and of the people of this country. The right hon. Gentleman contests, with a great deal of truth, the doctrine of my hon. Friend that the rates are paid entirely by the occupier of the land in this country. No doubt they are paid immediately by the occupier of the land, and the immediate benefit of a reduction of the rate goes to the occupier, as the burden of an increase goes to the occupier also. But the right hon. Gentleman' evidently referred to the ultimate incidence of the rate, and he stated in terms, quite unreservedly, that if the rates were so much more the rent was so much less, and that the whole rate in the last resort was paid, not by the occupier, but by the owner. That is a very important declaration, and one that ought to be borne in mind not only in the present Debate, but in future Debates which will infallibly arise on this question; because now we have it on record from the speech of the Minister who has been selected to declare the deliberate voice of the Government that the rates are paid by the owner of the land in the last resort. Consequently, there stare us in the face these facts—that about three years ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a present of £5,000,000 from the Consolidated Fund to the rates. He also added last year another £1,000,000 out of the abundance of his riches, and when he did not know what to do with that plethora of wealth with which he was oppressed. That £6,000,000 was given by one who is not the youngest Member of this House, and who had not been just sent up by his constituents, but by one who had had great experience, and who, with that experience, made this present to the land at the expense of the Consolidated Fund—which is made up by the labour quite as much as by the property of the country. He made that present to the landowners.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

MR. GOSCHEN: I beg my right hon. Friend's pardon. When my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) spoke of the land, he pointedly distinguished between the urban case and the agricultural case. He did not state that the owner in towns stood in the same position as the owner in the country. The right hon. Gentleman also errs in his memory. It was £3,000,000, not £5,000,000.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Oh, yes, I beg pardon; I admit that correction. I spoke of the whole, but it was not all given by my right hon. Friend, for a portion was given by his predecessor. I quite admit that that explanation is one which it becomes the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give. I am not quite certain, however, why it was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer found it necessary to explain the speech of his right hon. Friend. It is an unusual incident of Parliamentary discussion, and I do not know whether it is part of the principles of the present Government or whether it has any connection with the maintenance of the Union. I am quite aware that there is a distinction to be drawn between urban and rural land in respect of the incidence of the rates, and that in the case of urban land it is very much more difficult to lay down an absolute and positive doctrine. I did not hear the President of the Board of Agriculture draw that distinction.

*MR. CHAPLIN: Pardon me; I stated that the two were absolutely separate from each other. I dealt first with the question of urban land, and then, in the later part of the speech, I spoke of rural land.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: That is quite true; but I did not hear him draw a distinction between them with respect to the incidence of the rates. I quite admit that the distinction ought to be drawn, though I am prepared to admit, in the case of the urban land—although the process may be much more difficult to trace, and though it may not be absolutely clear as to its ultimate form—that in that case also the landlord obtains in the long run the bulk of the remission. But when I spoke of those £6,000,000 I did not intend to convey that the whole of those £6,000,000 were given to the owners of the land. They were given to the whole of the rates in the three countries, and not in England alone. But this fact stands—that as to all that portion of the £6,000,000 which went to the relief of rates falling upon rural land, it is in the long run a sheer, unmixed, undiluted gift to the landlord. That is the statement which I wish to place on record, and a most important statement it is. There is a point I want to notice in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, because he did me the honour to refer to a speech made by me in 1853 on the subject of the Income Tax, and he has founded upon that reference to my speech a case of grievance for the land. He says that there is a grievance for the land under the Income Tax, and that I proved it by showing that, according to the best computation I could make, the 7d. in the £1 in Schedule A, taking the case of householders or rural land, was equal really to 9d. in the £1 under any other Schedule. It is perfectly true that I used that argument, and though it is not capable of being stated in a precise or mathematical form, I believe the substance of it is sound. But what was the purpose of that argument, and in what circumstances was it made? It was made in a Debate when the House of Commons was very largely set upon constituting a difference of taxation between the different Schedules of the Income Tax. The Liberal Party was very largely of opinion that if realty were charged at 7d., income proceeding from such sources as those of Schedule D ought to be charged at a lower rate; and not only so, but a Conservative Government adopted that doctrine. The Government of Lord Derby, by the mouth of Mr. Disraeli, had had immediately before a proposal submitted to Parliament to reduce the tax under Schedule D to 5d., while the tax under Schedule A was to remain at 7d. It was in answer to that proposal, it was to induce the House of Commons to give up that plan, which opened the door to a large and complicated subject, that I pointed out to the House what was the truth—that as far as Schedule A is concerned, in comparison with Schedule D, the land undoubtedly pays more, especially in England, than 7d. in the £1. In Scotland it is not less than 7d. in the £1, but still it is less than in England, because in Scotland the landowner does not execute the repairs to the same extent, and likewise because there is an allowance made to the Scotch landlord on account of the public burdens. In Ireland the landlord enjoys a happy exemption indeed, for he falls back on the Poor Law valuation, and, as he has nothing to do with repairs and improvements, he really pays less than 7d. Those were the circumstances in which I endeavoured to show that the land under Schedule A pays more than 7d. in the £1, and that the burden is greater than it is commonly supposed to be. My right hon. Friend (Sir W. Harcourt) reminds me that it might be urged that that has been redressed by the contribution. If we are to speak of that I would say that, in my opinion, it has been a great deal more than redressed by the contribution. But I was about to refer for a few moments to what was done by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in respect to the remission of rates. In respect to that remission of rates he made a change in the Succession Duties, and that change in the Succession Duties was supposed to redress and equalise the balance in the interests of personalty as against realty, after the great gift made from the rates. The £5,000,000—now £6,000,000—having been given from the rates, what my right hon. Friend then proposed by way of an equivalent was to lay a tax which, so far as all personalty was concerned, would have been comparatively of a very insignificant character, reckoned in hundreds of thousands and not in millions at all; and, so far as land was concerned, was even less than insignificant, if possible. I believe my right hon. Friend raised the rates on lineal succession to $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. from 1 per cent., and made a very considerable increase on successions not lineal. But it is always to be borne in mind in dealing with Succession Duty that in the case of land the great bulk of successions are lineal, and the consanguinity scale operates in a totally different manner in the case of landed property from that in which it operates in the case of personal property. The fact is this, that—I am not now speaking of rural land alone—while realty has received an enormous boon at the expense of the Consolidated Fund, a boon of which the whole, in the case of rural land, goes to the landlord, and of which a large part, if not the whole, in the case of land not rural goes to the landlord—while that boon has been given to the landlords of the country, rural and urban, at the charge of the Consolidated Fund, a compensation has been administered to the Consolidated Fund in return, which is, I believe I am right in saying, an affair of a few hundreds of thousands of pounds. In these circumstances, what is the position of the Government? Are we permitted to hope that the Government will do something more to redress the balance, something which will bring the change in the Succession Duties to a point, if not equal, yet, at all events, more nearly approaching to the enormous boon that the owners of property have received? No, Sir; the Chancellor of the Exchequer long ago told us that he had nothing more to offer, that he could hold out no further expectation; and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture has to-night not only given emphasis to that doctrine, but has told us, and told us on behalf of the Government, that it is the rural landlords who have a grievance, that they already pay too much, that they, if they chose, might make out a case for relief from the House of Commons, and come before Parliament as a claimant. That, we are to understand, is the position taken up by Her Majesty's Government in the face of the industry and labour of this country. These, I think, are very important declarations and deserve to be recorded and carefully borne in mind. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have to restrain himself a little, perhaps, in order to keep fully abreast of his right hon. Colleague. On a great variety of subjects he has shown a wonderful suppleness and elasticity, of which in former years he was not at all suspected, when rigid doctrines and very liberal doctrines had possession of his breast. How that may be I know not, but this I know: that the question between the rates and the Consolidated Fund is not a settled question, that no proper equivalent, no fair and proper consideration, has been given to the Consolidated Fund by a readjustment of taxation in respect of that enormous boon which has been handed over to the rates, and that a further and larger change than has yet been made in the Death Duties is, in my opinion, a matter of absolute necessity, on the plainest ground of justice, before Parliament will have fully vindicated its character as the just distributor of benefit and burden among the several classes of the community. It is not necessary for me now to enter at large into that question. I will only say there is one other question, in which, perhaps, the Consolidated Fund has a less interest, but which appears to me to be embraced within the scope of the Motion as it now stands—it is that which is commonly known under the phrase of the taxation of ground-rents. It appears to me beyond all doubt that under our present system ground-rents enjoy undue exemption; and in the Metropolis, in particular, the owner of property has long enjoyed, at the expense of the ratepayers, privileges which are really unjust. I do not now speak of the manner in which these difficulties should be dealt with, but, undoubtedly, this is a matter as to which the people of London do look to Parliament to effect a material change and improvement in their condition, and as to which I think, on grounds of justice and high policy, it will be important to make a change. I will not trouble the House further on these enormously important points. I think the speech of my hon. Friend the Mover of the Resolution contained a great deal of important elucidation which will be of value in the country. The House will see that this, after all, is the only way of keeping alive a protest which it is the duty of the Liberal Party to make upon the subject of the present distribution of the taxation of the country. Depend upon it the time will come when these efforts will bear their fruit, and when, after due and fair consideration of all claims on all sides, an endeavour will be made to bring the taxation of the country, as between property and labour and as between real and other property, into a state as near exact justice as human infirmity will permit.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

*(7.10.) SIR R. PAGET: The remedy suggested by the Mover of the Resolution is that there should be a large extension of the Land Tax as at present levied. I wish to call the attention of the hon. Gentleman to one sentence in the same Report of the Inland Revenue Commissioners from which he quoted, which deals with the question of the Land Tax. I will give one paragraph of the Report showing what was the early inception of the tax, which is as follows:—

“Nothing can be more certain though it is but little known, than that the so-called Land Tax was in effect a Property and Income Tax, and moreover that personal estate was quite as much the object of the charge as land.”

There we have the historical statement of the original imposition of the Land Tax; it was a tax upon property and personal estate. How is it that it now touches land alone? Personalty has, it seems, escaped by some of those mysterious means by which owners of personal property do occasionally contrive to evade their responsibilities. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has made merry at the expense of the President of the Board of Agriculture, and has pinned him down to the statement that the ultimate burden of rates in rural districts falls on the owner and not on the occupier. But I thought that that was one of the things long since settled, and about which there can now be no dispute. If that statement requires any qualification whatever it is this—that every occupier has to bear the additional burden of increased rates that occurs during the time of his tenancy. Still, on the other hand, the occupier gets the advantage if the rates are diminished during his tenancy. Subject to that very small qualification it is plain that the ultimate burden of the rates in rural districts does fall on the owner, and is a burden upon his property. Any relief to that burden is I admit distinctly ultimately a relief to the owner, but the whole burden of the argument that has been adduced in this House time after time is this—that if the figures of taxation were calmly summed up they could only lead to the one conclusion that readjustment of taxation was necessary in order to establish an equilibrium.

Of the points which have been touched on I wish specially to mention one—that every step taken, either by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or those who have preceded him in that office, has been based on figures which cannot be confuted—figures by which we are distinctly told that one class of property—personal property—is increasing in value in England by leaps and bounds, while another great class of property—that in land, especially in rural land—is steadily diminishing. Those are facts which cannot be denied, and the circumstances of the case clearly show that a re-adjustment is both right and reasonable. We are sometimes told that all these things are to be explained away by what is called the doctrine of hereditary burdens. It is claimed that those taxes are hereditary burdens, and are, therefore, no burdens at all; but that argument seems to me to be disposed of by the reductio ad absurdum. How long is it necessary that a burden should rest on the land before it becomes hereditary? Is it possible to contend that the burdens connected with expenditure on elementary education are in any respect hereditary burdens? Or will anyone urge that the burden of police maintenance is an hereditary one? For the imposition of compulsory education and the institution of the Police Force have taken place within the memory of all of us here. It is to be regretted that the Mover of the Resolution has spoken throughout under the influence of a complete fallacy as to the ultimate burden of rates, which has not been shared by the Seconder or by any other Member of the House—indeed, one half of the argument of the Mover of the Resolution has been admirably met by the Seconder. I regard it also as a misfortune that we have been brought down here to debate a great number of separate issues which have been presented to us at considerable length. I should like to hear one clear Debate on one point alone, namely, as to the comparative burdens of personal estate and land and house property. I repeat, it is capable of absolute proof that if houses and land are compared with personal property the burdens upon them would be found to be infinitely greater. I will go further and say that if we split up real property into the two great divisions of land and houses and compare them, it will be found that in respect of State subventions houses have very largely the advantage. In the recent adjustments of taxation made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer it is clear that houses have benefitted more than land. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby shakes his head, but I think it might be proved by figures. I quite grant that in the Metropolis the amount of the subvention has not been to the same extent as it has been in the case of boroughs or rural districts, but there is another point to be considered—the Metropolis it must be remembered has £150,000 towards the expenses of the superannuation of the police; and that sum was largely in excess of any share which would have accrued to it if the whole £300,000 given for that object had been divided equally among all the districts. The question is an intricate one, but I again maintain it is capable of absolute proof that the contention of the land-owners is a reasonable one. On their behalf I ask for and court a most complete inquiry. They only want equality of taxation; they want no kind of favour from any Member or any Party in the House; they want nothing more than an absolute re-adjustment on the basis of equality and justice.

Sir R. Paget

(7.27.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): The argument which has been put forward is that the present Land Tax was, in its origin, a tax upon both real and personal property, and those who represent agriculture are asking that the Land Tax shall be reduced. But may I point out that there is, from an historical standpoint, still stronger reason for increasing it. Why was the Land Tax of William and Mary passed? Because the first Parliament, after the Restoration, abolished all other burdens on land, such as scutage and socage, and in place thereof placed the burdens on industry. Until that time the bulk of the cost of keeping up the Crown had been on land, but the Restoration Parliament placed the tax equally on personal and real property.

But it is forgotten sometimes that the Land Tax was stereotyped at the then value of the land—that is to say, on a valuation made 200 years ago. If the Land Tax were paid at the present value of the land, instead of giving the owners a subvention of £2,000,000 a year, the taxpayers would be receiving £40,000,000 a year from the land. I hold what probably in this House are unpopular views on this matter. I am one of a small minority here, and possibly a minority also in the country, but still a growing party, who wish to put taxation not upon rental but upon land value. We do not mean by that merely the agricultural value of land, but the value increased by the buildings upon the land. In towns or on agricultural land near towns you could place millions upon the taxation of land values, and by the time you have placed upon land round about London some 16,000,000, I believe you will be only reducing the value of the land to the position in which owners of agricultural land are at present. I repudiate the idea that landlords represent the agricultural interest. They might as well claim to be miners as agriculturists. They might claim to be miners because they let the mines to people who work them and make money out of them. I do not want to prolong the Debate, because I know there is an understanding that we shall take a Division before dinner time. The argument advanced by the Minister for Agriculture and the hon. Baronet the Member for the Wells Division simply proves that a series of rights accompanied the possession of land, and were given on condition of the performance of certain duties, but owners have practically repudiated these duties upon which the tenure of the land was given while they retain the land. The present system tends to place the heavier burden on the land least able to bear it. It has been suggested that small owners under the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) if they think there is going to be an increase of land taxation will not buy; but I think there is every indication to those who follow the progress of opinion among the Liberal Party, and may desire to purchase allotments and small holdings, that they need not be deterred from doing so by the suggestion that their burdens as landholders will be increased, because the taxation that is aimed at, as the Minister for Agriculture well knows, is not the taxation of agricultural values, but the taxation of land values in and near towns, which present a splendid field for a future Radical Chancellor of the Exchequer.

(7.35.) The House divided:—Ayes 128; Noes 77.—(Div. List, No. 70.)

Main Question again proposed.

BOARDS OF ARBITRATION FOR TRADE DISPUTES.

*(7.46.) MR. MORTON (Peter borough): I am aware that I cannot take a Division upon the Motion of which I have given notice, and which is in the following terms:

“That it is desirable to appoint Boards of Arbitration for the settlement of trade disputes throughout the United Kingdom, which for that purpose shall be divided into such districts as Parliament may determine; the Arbitration Boards to be composed equally of the representatives of capital and labour, and to be presided over by a Chairman who shall be appointed by the Crown, and shall have no vote except a casting vote; the reference to such Arbitration to be with the consent of both the disputing parties; and the award to be final and binding on both parties.”

Under the circumstances, it may be thought just as well that I should not move this. We shall be told, of course, that there is to be a Royal Commission to consider among other things the question which I have made the subject of my Resolution; and, therefore, it may be thought by some hon. Members that it is not necessary or right to discuss the matter now; but, so far as I can see and understand the position, that affords an additional reason why we should discuss the question at the present time. I do not say that the Government or the Tory party wish to shelve this question until after the next General Election; but certainly the effect of their proposal of a Royal Commission will, to a large extent, lead to the shelving of a question which, in my opinion, ought to be considered by the House of Commons at the present time. For my part, I do not see much use in an Inquiry by Royal Commission; for practically all the questions we wish to have considered are, with one exception, ripe for discussion in the House now. The one exception is the question of an eight hours day for all trades throughout the country. That question is not in a position to be settled now. In regard to the mining industry the miners have quite made up their minds, and I do not see that the question at all need be entrusted to a Royal Commission. Then in regard to the settlement of labour disputes generally, surely matters are quite ripe for legislation on this question if they are ever going to be. As to this Royal Commission, of course I cannot say how it is going to be constituted, but I do not think it will be of any use at all unless at least half of its members are working men or the representatives of working men. If the Government do as they did the other day in the appointment of the Committee on the railway hours and nominate only one working-men's representative in proportion to 23 others then the Commission will not be much good so far as the assent of the working-men to its proposals is concerned, and without such assent I do not see that the proposals can with advantage be carried into legislative effect. To attempt to force a settlement upon the working classes against their wish is bound to be unsuccessful now that they are able to exercise a powerful influence by their votes at elections. My Resolution is intended particularly to deal with strikes, the most important of the matters in relation to labour questions with which we have to deal. Nearly every strike is caused by the insufficiency of the wages paid, and the refusal of employers to consider the dispute with the representatives of the workmen. A most important strike occurred among the dock labourers in the Metropolis in 1889, and I will endeavour to show what the effect of that strike has been, and if I can show that the effect has been bad on the general interest of the country, I shall have gone a long way to prove my case.

Mr. Morton

(7.49.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*MR. MORTON: I was proceeded about to consider the cost in connection with the dock labourers strike in London. We are told in that very excellent Board of Trade Report on the strikes and lockouts of 1889, that the cost was two millions of money directly, and probably there was a loss of another million indirectly. Then a little later we had the dispute between the South Metropolitan Gas Company and their men which cost the Gas Company £75,000 and, of course, it also cost the working classes a very large sum. Then, we are told in this Report, that during 1889 there were 1,145 strikes, more than half of which were caused by disputes as to wages. Then in 1890 we come to the matter which especially induced me to put my notice down—the strike of the railway men in Scotland at the close of last year. Trade was so much disturbed by this strike that it is almost impossible to calculate what the loss was. I think we might mention millions, but certainly to the companies and to the men the loss was very large indeed. Then there is another strike now going on, and which we hope may be satisfactorily settled, but still it means great loss to the parties concerned. There can be no question that the loss to trade and to workmen by these strikes is very great indeed. The noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), speaking last Saturday, said “a strike may be more disastrous than a civil war,” and he went on to observe that there was no endeavour on the part of employers to settle these disputes without a strike. He said:—

“We observe that a certain section of the Tory Press, representing, I fear, a certain section of the Tory Party, thinks it necessary whenever a strike occurs to take the side of the employer to immediately denounce the labourers for resorting to extreme measures; to egg on the employers to resort to extreme measures against the men.”

Well, I suppose the noble Lord sitting on the other side of the House probably knows the opinion among the Tory Party. But the question is, how can these labour disputes, when they arise, be settled without having recourse to strikes?

I am aware that my proposal is not a new one, that it has been considered by many before I put the Motion down, and there has been a certain amount of success attending it. My proposal is to appoint Boards of Arbitration for the settlement of these disputes, composed equally of representatives of capital and labour. Now, the first difficulty we meet with is that, although a great many workmen are in favour of settling these disputes before they come to strikes, still there is a difficulty in some people's minds about Parliament having anything to do with these matters. I find in the Report of the Trades Congress held at Dundee in 1889 that the members of the Congress were in favour of—

“Joint Boards of employers and workmen as being well calculated to result in a better understanding between them, and to effect the settlement of important questions affecting the interests of both.”

And the Resolution went on to urge Trade Councils and other representatives of workmen to put this matter before the Chambers of Commerce and other bodies of employers with a view to the formation of such Boards, and they indicate the advantage of such boards by reference to the result of the dockers' strike. Now, I gather from the Report of the proceedings that, while the Congress were in favour of questions being submitted to Joint Boards composed equally of employers and workmen, the difficulty that occurred to them and the objection they felt to Parliamentary action was that they thought that reference to arbitration might be made compulsory. My Resolution does not carry compulsion, and, in fact, at the end the Resolution reads—

“The reference to such arbitration to be with the consent of both the disputing parties.”

So there would be no compulsion to submit the matter to arbitration. Why I urge Parliamentary action is not so much on account of the workmen, for I believe they are quite prepared to do something of this kind, but because, having the Scotch railway dispute in my mind, I think employers do not seem willing, if they can possibly avoid it, to adopt any sort of arbitration whatever. It, therefore, may be necessary before we can get anything done in the matter that there should be Parliamentary action, not for the purpose of compelling either party to go before these Boards, but there being Boards of this sort composed fairly of the representatives of each party there would be immense responsibility attaching to either party refusing to accept this means of arriving at a fair settlement of the dispute. The noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill), in that speech to which I have already referred, made a suggestion which somewhat resembles mine, that there should be—

“State Boards of Arbitration, to which both parties can refer their differences, and which, even if they have no other sanction behind them, will, if properly composed, have behind them the powerful sanction of public opinion.”

Well, although under my proposal the parties to the Scotch Railway dispute would not have been compelled to submit to arbitration, the party refusing such reference would be made responsible by public opinion for what might follow.

(8.0.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*MR. MORTON: If you wish to get these things settled it can only be done by dealing fairly with both parties. If you could have Boards of Conciliation or other Boards before whom disputants would be willing to go, so much the better. But, as a matter of fact, it appears that disputants do not go before the Courts of Arbitration or Conciliation provided for under existing legislation. No doubt there are a great many disputes which ought to be settled without having recourse to strikes. This Return on Strikes and Lock-outs shows that more than 50 per cent. of the strikes have been settled in favour of the working men, especially in those cases where an increase of wages has been asked for, thus showing that the men have not been wrong in asking an increase. Something has been done in this direction, but, to my mind, not enough. In connection with the 1,145 strikes which occurred in the year 1889, 714 were settled by arbitration, or a good deal more than half. Another important reason, to my mind, why there should be some attempt made by the Government and the Unions and Parliament to settle this question is that so many men are concerned. We are told that the number of men concerned in the strikes in 1889 was 334,484, and it is obvious that such an enormous number of men being thrown out of work must have caused a terrible amount of misery; therefore, there is good reason for asking Parliament not to wait for two or three years, but to endeavour to do something at once. I am not all alone in my idea that the question of wages should be considered by these Boards. I find that only the other day the Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst), speaking at Chatham, said the workmen were entitled to

"Shorter hours, better wages, and more leisure to cultivate their souls and their intellects."

We, therefore, have another opinion from the other side of the House, that there is some reason why working men should ask for an increase of wages, a reduction of hours, and various other ameliorations. Of course, in connection with this question, I am aware that some employers think that they can put down combinations and unions altogether, or that they can put such restrictions upon them as to render it impossible for them to exist. Well, I think these people are wrong. Such efforts certainly have not been attended with very much success in the past. I do not think it is possible to put down combinations, nor do I think it would be wise for us to attempt to do so. I find that the Under Secretary for India on the occasion I have referred to said "any attempt to place restrictions on combination would be swept away." He is quite right. He took care on that occasion to say he was not speaking for the Government, and, therefore, I do not put him forward as speaking for the Government, but his, at any rate, is a Tory or Conservative opinion. He went on to say—

"A great improvement had been effected in the condition of the working classes during the last 60 years by the Trade Unions, who had been instrumental beyond any other institutions in preventing strikes."

Mr. Morton

I mention that because, as I have said before, I believe the difficulty we have to deal with is not with the working men nor with the combinations, but with the employers, backed up by the Government and Parliament, and other influences for putting down the workmen and keeping them down. So strongly did the Under Secretary for India feel on this subject that

"He urged the creation of a Ministry of Industry and some Government Department to look after the interests of the working classes."

It may be necessary, or it may not be necessary, to have such a Ministry; but this shows there is a strong feeling amongst some hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House that the time has arrived for doing something in this matter. Even the Corporation of the City of London has been attempting to do something, though not specially in connection with disputes between masters and workmen. I am glad to think that the Corporation of the City are trying to do something. Whatever opinion some people may entertain of the Corporation there is no doubt that in the great dockers' strike the Lord Mayor—Sir James Whitehead—did noble work, together with Cardinal Manning and other gentlemen, in trying to bring about a settlement. Finally, a settlement was arrived at. For hundreds of years there have been attempts—and successful attempts—to settle commercial disputes and disputes between masters and men by Courts of Arbitration or Conciliation. In France, according to statistics prepared by the French Government in 1841, there were 62 Courts, and in 1880 132 for the settlement of disputes between masters and men. These Courts settled 39,429 disputes which occurred during the year 1880, and I find that 59 per cent. of these disputes related to wages. When we find that so many of such cases are settled satisfactorily to both parties by Courts of Arbitration which, I believe, are composed partly of workmen and of employers, it is a proof that we might anticipate success if we had similar Courts in this country. I am told, though I have no actual data, that in at least one of the States of the United States they have compulsory Courts of Arbitration. {I have already said I do not think we are far enough advanced in this country at present to have compulsory Courts, but, of course, the time may come when we may get as far as that. In the meantime, the greatest difficulty is that the men themselves are against compulsion in any way whatever. In the words of a learned Recorder—

“The only remedy for these strikes would be the appointment of some tribunal, say, on the lines of the Railway Commission, to arbitrate as to hours between master and man.”

These, again, would seem to require the assistance of some representative body or Committee, as well of employers as of employed. I will not take up further time by endeavouring to show that it is possible to have Courts of Arbitration that might be of some use. Strikes are bad for everybody, and it is our duty as far as we can to get rid of them and put an end to them in a manner that shall be satisfactory to both parties. I suggest in my Resolution that we should have Arbitration Boards composed equally of representatives of labour and capital. There would be some difficulty in defining the limits of the districts, and in deciding upon the constituency which should appoint the Boards both for the men and employers; but if we got so far as to decide on having these Boards, I have no doubt that the men, through their unions and combinations, would easily be able to appoint representatives. There would be no difficulty in appointing people to represent them, or in getting together a Board of Arbitration, who would fairly and honestly represent both parties in the dispute. There is another difficulty. I have suggested that the Chairman of this body should be appointed by the Crown. There would be difficulties raised as to who should be Chairman to preside over the sittings, and as, after all, someone would have to be appointed, I do not know that my suggestion is not as good as any other. I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would make a very good Chairman for a Board of this sort. I have no doubt both masters and men could depend on his acting honestly and fairly in their interests, and hearing everything that was to be said on both sides. I know he could not always do the work, and that, therefore, other gentlemen would have to be found. I have no doubt that if we made up our minds that something of this sort was to be done there would be no difficulty in finding gentlemen of independent means who would be trusted by both parties to act as Chairmen of these Boards. I do not propose that the Chairman should have a vote, except a casting vote: but I am satisfied, from my experience amongst working men, that the occasions on which he would have to use such a vote would be very rare indeed. If a dozen representatives, six on each side, sat down to consider a dispute previous to a strike, and before there was much bad feeling among the parties, they would, as a rule, come to some agreement without calling on the Chairman to exercise his casting vote. You could not very well compel men to go into an arbitration unless they were consenting parties. If you did your Court would not last very long, and, instead of settling labour disputes, you would go very near to bringing about a revolution. The award, however, when given, should be binding on both parties. Appeals are allowed in some places; but it would not be easy to say to whom an appeal should be allowed. I have no doubt it would be considered by some people a harsh thing to make the award of arbitrators binding; but I do not think much weight should be attached to that view. We have Courts of Arbitration now, and there is not much difficulty in carrying out their decisions, because, after all, the parties know that somebody has to give way in the end. If either party, however, objected to the award being final, there might be found a Court which would consider, if not all the points of the reference to the arbitrators, at all events certain practical questions. I am sorry I have detained the House so long, but I do think this is a most important matter, and I do not think the Government have acted wisely in sending the question to a Royal Commission. Unfortunately, as far as I can gather, it generally takes two or three years before a Royal Commission reports, and then you frequently have a Majority Report and a Minority Report, so that, except for the information you have gathered, you are very much where you began. Therefore, I should have been better satisfied if the Government had attempted to deal with this question of strikes at once. The railway hours question has been referred to a Committee; but if that question is ripe for consideration by a Committee, and is likely to be dealt with during the present Session, it appears to me that the question of strikes is still more ripe. It may be said that, as a Royal Commission is going to be appointed, it is unnecessary or unwise of me to say anything on the subject at present. That is not my view of the matter at all. I think the question ought to be considered by this House, even only for the sake of discussing it and giving the Royal Commissioners more information regarding it than they have at present. In conclusion, I may say I shall be very glad indeed, as far as I am personally concerned, if in my humble way I can do anything at all to settle these disputes amongst workmen and masters. I shall be only too pleased to do all I can. I am personally aware, on account of my profession, of the difficulties which arise on the question; but I can say that, as far as the men are concerned, there is, as a rule, very little difficulty in getting them to settle matters, the difficulty being more generally with the masters. I should like the Government to appoint on the Royal Commission a large number of what are called working men's representatives—not necessarily Members of this House—and I would press very strongly upon Her Majesty's Ministers the necessity of considering this part of the question.

Mr. Morton

(7.28.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.):* I fully admit the importance of the question to which the hon. Member's remarks have been directed, and no one can more strongly desire than I do an increase in any way of the means for a peaceful solution of questions between employers and employed. But I am surprised that an hon. Member who has occupied something like three-quarters of an hour in explaining his opinions on the subject and asking for legislation should be entirely ignorant of the fact that Parliament has passed several Statutes to carry out the object he has in view. I think it would be better if the hon. Member would attempt to inform himself on the question before he makes any further attempt to inform others. I am surprised also that the hon. Member has not felt, in view of the almost empty state of the House, that he was wrong in bringing this subject forward now. When my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury announced the other day that the Government would appoint a Royal Commission the hon. Member for Whitby (Mr. E. W. Beckett), who had a Motion on the Paper similar to that of the hon. Member, saw at once that it was not desirable to press it. It is perfectly obvious that the House of Commons does not desire to discuss this question now, but is content to leave it to be dealt with by the Royal Commission.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House was adjourned at half after Eight o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 2nd March, 1891.

SALE OF GOODS BILL [H.L.].

A Bill for codifying the law relating to the sale of goods—Was presented by the Lord Herschell; read 1st; and to be printed (No. 48).

SMOKE NUISANCE ABATEMENT
(METROPOLIS) BILL [H.L.]—(No. 22.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My Lords, I rise to move the Second Reading of a Bill for abating smoke in the Metropolis, and I shall not detain the House by any formal or extended statement on the subject. I happen to be myself a victim to the fogs, for the abatement of which the Bill proposes to operate; and, having been unable to attend the House at all last week, am still incapable of speaking for more than a few minutes. Let me mention here that I have to-day received a communication from the noble Duke who owns so much of London, and whose interest in and zeal on the subject are so well known, that he is unable to attend this evening to support the Bill on account of a similar impediment. In any case, it might not have been necessary, or even desirable, to enter into any train of reasoning to-night upon the question. In substance, this Bill has been read a second time on four occasions by your Lordships—the first time after a Debate and a Division; the second time without any opposition; the third time unanimously, with an intimation that it should be referred to a Select Committee; the fourth time unanimously also. Another ground for avoiding a lengthened explanation at this moment is that should the Bill be read a second time and passed through Committee, of which, at last, this year there is some prospect, its opponents—and it has one or two opponents—may, on the Third Reading, think it proper to come forward and resist it. At that time argument will be required which now would be superfluous and wasted. There is only one point which I am bound to mention to your Lordships. It is that this Bill differs so far from the former ones that the interference or action of the Home Office is not in any way entailed in it; and as it stands, the Vestries will at once be armed with the power to act against the evil now so generally recognised and so widely felt. By that slight alteration it meets an objection which was uttered by that noble and learned Lord who, in 1886, for a short time occupied the Woolsack. Its substance is unaltered; it is directed, as before, against the emission of smoke from private houses, which it is ascertained by experts forms four-fifths of all the smoke in the Metropolis. There is only one further point that I am particularly anxious to press upon the House—it is that every year the case, as one may term it, in favour of the Second Reading is spontaneously increasing. Every year adds to the number of mechanical inventions and facilities for grappling with the smoke nuisance. Many might be mentioned now which could not have been even suggested when I last brought forward the subject before the House two years ago. Each year more mechanical inventions are brought out, and every year it will be easier for householders to act upon the provisions of the Bill when it is carried. But again, every year the evil to be resisted or mitigated is in itself advancing in extent, because every year (to understate it) 20,000 houses are known to be added to the number in the Capital. I shall urge nothing more because I am particularly anxious that those two facts should be remembered by your Lordships, and I therefore simply move that the Bill be read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I do not know whether any one else will call attention to this Bill, but I think your Lordships ought not to give it a Second Reading without well examining the nature of it. I suppose there will be no difference of opinion that the smoke of London is an intolerable nuisance—everybody agrees in that; and that when combined with fogs the nuisance is still more grievous; but it does not therefore follow that your Lordships should assent to the Second Reading of this Bill when, as I think, I can show your Lordships the effect of it would not be to establish a state of things which could be worked, and would not remove the grievance. First of all I wish to say in answer to what the noble Lord said about the Bill having passed—that is Bills for abating smoke nuisance—four times, a few words in regard to what took place last year. What took place was this: The noble Lord brought in a Bill on this subject, and it was referred to one of the Standing Committees of which I had the honour to be a member. The noble Lord, in spite of our having given him full notice of the time for the Bill being taken into consideration, did not do us the honour of attending the Committee. The Committee was then adjourned, thinking that possibly the noble Lord might not have known the hour of meeting; but, notwithstanding the opportunity thus given him, the noble Lord never appeared to explain to us the wording of his own Bill. The Committee, notwithstanding it was under the disadvantage of not having the advice and assistance of the noble Lord, went at considerable length into the subject, and produced a Bill which might or might not have been approved by the House, but which had, at all events, received very careful examination. Even then, however, the noble Lord did not take the necessary steps to prevent the whole matter falling through, the consequence being that the work of the Standing Committee was rendered entirely useless, and the Bill was abandoned. Now the noble Lord wishes to bring in a different Bill, and I will, with your Lordships' permission, briefly call attention to its provisions. The gist of it is contained in a few words. In future, if this Bill passes, there is to be a penalty imposed in the case of all dwelling-houses—I suppose hotels, clubs and eating-houses might be called dwelling-houses—from which opaque smoke is allowed to issue from chimneys. Of course the question arises immediately, "What is opaque smoke"? I suppose all smoke is more or less opaque. But we are not left entirely to conjecture. There is a definition given of "opaque smoke," and it states that that expression is to mean "Smoke of such volume or density as unnecessarily to impair the atmosphere." I am afraid I must confess I am not skilled in legal knowledge, but I should be exceedingly amused to see a Court in this country engaged in the task of endeavouring to determine exactly what "volume of smoke" would "unnecessarily impair the atmosphere." Surely that is not a definition sufficiently accurate to enable a penalty to be imposed upon a man for allowing such smoke to issue from a chimney. Then there is a provision which apparently is intended to guard against unnecessary hardship. In the 6th clause, which provides for the infliction of penalties, there is this further proviso—

The Earl of Kimberley

"That where any person is summoned before any Court in respect of an offence against this Act the Court shall dismiss the complaint if it is satisfied that the person so summoned has adopted all reasonable measures, regard being had to his means and condition in life, and has used due diligence and care to prevent as far as possible the emission of opaque smoke."

It seems to me that it would be very difficult to determine exactly the means and condition in life of every person who might be summoned under this Bill, and his power or use of due diligence in stopping smoke. Then there is a provision in the last clause which unfortunately seems to be rather premature. It says that—

"The London County Council may from time to time make, and when made, alter and repeal bye-laws for requiring any fireplace or furnace intended to be used in any building to be constructed after the passing of this Act, to be so constructed as to consume, burn, or otherwise prevent as far as possible all smoke arising therefrom."

Now, I apprehend the difficulty is that unfortunately hitherto no fireplace has been invented for a private house which will consume its own smoke; therefore, the London County Council is not in a position to make these contemplated bye-laws. I will only add that I have not made these remarks from a desire to discourage anyone in a laudable endeavour to prevent, if possible, this smoke nuisance which we all concur is grievous, but because I do not think it is of much use to pass legislation which has not been sufficiently considered. Whether your Lordships may think it desirable to give it a Second Reading or not I do not know, but if a Second Reading is given to it, I do hope that when the Bill goes into

t o
o y,
to in ld ic om are ing oes
the
the sed be ions atly re-that the s of ars, I ships es by
The
is we jocut, coms into hatever alous or s should expense.
smoke are that gislation to the atter, as Palmer-ed those actories rue that not been e been.
v is not enforced,
o doubt e noble e many brought re which s, asking m private moke from impossible.
suggested by Lord who occupied time in 1886.

hism means and condition in life, and has used due diligence and care to prevent as far as possible the emission of opaque smoke. But my great objection to the Bill is that it attacks the small offenders and lets the great offenders pass. No doubt the private dwelling houses are great sinners in this respect, but they are not nearly so great sinners as the manufactories. The title of the Bill and the preamble refer to "furnaces and fireplaces within the Metropolis," but there is not a word about furnaces in the body of the Bill. It is quite true that during the last 30 years Parliament has been legislating against smoke from manufactories, and I imagine the result of the Parliamentary efforts made has been very much to leave matters as they were when Parliament began legislating, and that it has been found impossible to offer any serious check to the practice of producing smoke. At all events, if that is not so it is very difficult to explain the blackened and dirty condition of our manufacturing towns. Unless legislation of this kind can be enforced as against manufactories, I do not see how there is any hope of its being carried out as against private houses. Public opinion would support the sending of Inspectors to factories, because there is a general feeling that we are bound to carry out the requirements of the Local Authorities in matters affecting the public health; but if you take to sending Inspectors to private houses it is probable that before an Inspector could go through two streets he would have his head broken. There does not appear to be the least chance that in the present state of public opinion such a law could be carried out. I believe it is the intention of the Home Office to allow the Bill to be read a second time, but I hope the House will consider very carefully before it allows these extraordinary provisions to pass into law.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I would venture to submit one or two considerations to the noble Lord who introduced this Bill. Everybody, of course, sympathises with the object in view, and everybody who has suffered from the fogs which have prevailed lately must feel a very special sympathy with it, indeed, under the circumstances. On the other hand never probably has a Bill been introduced into this House which so directly affects so many of Her Majesty's subjects, because this Bill will create an obligation upon every freeholder as soon as it passes. Unless, therefore, the householders sympathise with the object of the measure, it is calculated to arouse an enormous amount of opposition; and what I would submit for the consideration of the noble Lord is this: whether, seeing that it is a Bill which directly affects every householder, it would not be better to leave the initiation of such a measure to the other House in which those householders are directly represented rather than that such legislation should be initiated here. No doubt if in the other House where householders are directly represented any measure for dealing with this nuisance were carried and sent to your Lordships' House, it would receive most favourable consideration, and there would be every desire to pass it into law; but I would venture to ask the noble Lord to consider whether it is likely that any measure initiated here, and which has not obtained a strong backing from the householders of the country, would have a chance of passing in the other House? I would, therefore, suggest that he should allow a measure with this object to be brought forward in the other House where the people affected are directly represented, unless he can ascertain that it will receive a very large share of support from the general public.

LORD STRATHEDEN and CAMPBELL: I regret exceedingly that the turn which the discussion has taken should impose upon me the necessity of answering when, as I have stated to the House, I am not very well qualified to address your Lordships. But I will just say a word—indeed, I am bound to do so—in reference to what took place in the Standing Committee. I avoided that topic purely because in this House I wish as far as possible to avoid all acrimonious discussions as regards the Standing Committees. In that regard I am wholly irreproachable, and if I allude to it at all I should do so in the tone of an accuser. The noble Earl who first spoke is utterly inaccurate in his statement of what took place, and he would, I think, have shown greater wisdom if he had avoided the topic altogether. In the first place, it was not last year at all. That will give your Lordships a measure of the noble Earl's precision; it was the year before last.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: So it was; the noble Lord is quite right.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: I appeared in obedience to the summons, and a late Member of your Lordships' House who is much lamented, Lord Carnarvon, requested me to allow the consideration of the Bill to stand over for another week, and as the tribunal was then entirely new I was not disposed to face at once that new organisation, my friends and supporters being absent also. Then the next week no summons to attend reached me, with the accustomed irregularity of those most extraordinary bodies which your Lordships have now had the wisdom to put an end to. In my absence—a proceeding which I think was most unjustifiable—the opponents of the Bill were allowed to discuss and mutilate it; to withdraw the proposition which formed its essence and its principle; and to abrogate entirely the Second Reading which your Lordships had repeatedly acceded to. The principle of the Bill has always been to operate against smoke being emitted from private houses, and the course pursued by the Standing Committee was to withdraw everything by which private houses would be affected. Then, let me go on to state the reason for the apparent delay on the Third Reading, the only occasion on which I could appear. I did my utmost to defend the remnant and wreck of the Bill, and I was present when this statement from some one who represented the Opposition to the measure was made, that “the Bill could only be endorsed by the Standing Committee if” (the expression was utterly ridiculous) “every thing would be eliminated which related to the smoke from private houses.” The conduct of the Standing Committee, therefore, ruined the measure, and I have always thought that if I were called upon to take part in the re-arrangement of the Orders as to Standing Committees I could not do better than simply report to your Lordships what took place on that occasion as a final condemnation of those bodies. The Standing Committee literally took upon itself to repeal the Second Reading; and as the Standing Committee, who were empowered and instructed merely to amend the clauses of a Bill of which your Lordships had thought proper to pass the Second Reading two weeks before, took upon itself to eliminate its essence and its principle, I was no longer concerned in the fate of the Bill. I cannot but say again that I think the noble Earl would have been wise in avoiding that topic altogether. Then what else fell from the noble Earl? He said that there are no mechanical inventions for consuming smoke in private houses. What does that establish? It only establishes the utter ignorance of the noble Earl upon the subject. He is, no doubt, well-versed in many topics, and is not bound to be conversant with the later inventions upon this subject, which has greatly occupied me. It is, therefore, no reproach for him to be unaware that mechanical inventions abound on the subject. At the different stages of these Bills during the last few years, I have enumerated before your Lordships no less than a dozen contrivances by which smoke might be restricted. The noble Marquess, able master as we know he is of gibes, witticisms, jocularities, and sarcasms, is, no doubt, competent to turn any definitions into ridicule; and it is no proof whatever that these definitions are ridiculous or imperfect that the noble Marquess should be able to draw a laugh at my expense. But he went on to speak about smoke in factories. Is he really unaware that for 20 years past we have had legislation on the subject? He alluded to the action of Parliament in this matter, as if he was unaware that Lord Palmerston in 1853 and 1856 introduced those Acts by which the smoke of factories may be restrained. It is quite true that the smoke from factories has not been restrained as it ought to have been. That shows merely that the law is not enforced. If the law had been enforced, and that had been the result, no doubt everybody would agree with the noble Marquess; but it is one of the many arguments which have been brought forward in favour of this measure which I bring before your Lordships, asking you to restrain the smoke from private houses—that to restrain the smoke from factories has been found impossible. Now I come to what was suggested by the noble and learned Lord who occupied the Woolsack for a short time in 1886.

What was his main remark? It was that a Bill of this sort is not likely to reach the Statute Book unless it were supported by a great wave of popular opinion. I perfectly agree with him, and I say this measure is supported by a strong tide of popular opinion. I will merely mention one fact to justify that statement: during the last five years not one London journal has opposed this proposition, but, on the contrary, in great variety they have favoured it. Let me put this point to the House: suppose this Bill, which is altogether Metropolitan and urban, had reference to some other town, say Bristol—that it was to restrain smoke being emitted from buildings within the limits of that town, and that all the local public journals supported the measure, would not your Lordships think it a matter for very grave consideration before you would throw out a Bill upon Second Reading under those circumstances? But those are exactly the circumstances which confront us here. You can only learn what is the state of local or of the Metropolitan opinion to which the noble Earl alluded, through the journals of the given city, and though I am far from saying that all the journals of the Metropolis have thought it worth their while to utter an opinion upon this measure, all those who have done so have given an opinion in its favour. The noble and learned Lord went on to tell us that we had better wait until a Bill comes up from the other House of Parliament. Will the noble and learned Lord give us any guarantee that such a measure is likely to come to us from that House?—

"Rusticus expectat dum defuat amnis."

We have at the present moment a Bill in our possession, we have a Bill here to send down to the other House. I am perfectly aware that it is open to the Select Committee to amend it, or to the Standing Committee, and that it is open on Third Reading for the House to amend it; but I do entreat, as the opinion of your Lordships is not, I think, antagonistic to it, at this stage to avoid a course which would bring considerable obloquy upon your House, at the same time that it would prolong the fogs and add to the smoke nuisance which now afflict this Metropolis.

Lord Stratheden and Campbell

VISCOUNT MIDLETON: My Lords, I cannot be at all surprised that the question with which the Bill of the noble Lord deals, should have been brought by him before your Lordships; indeed, I had expected that at an earlier period of the Session than this some Member of the Government would have risen in his place to announce that Her Majesty's Administration intended to take some steps to deal with this most important subject. We are still passing—or rather I trust have passed—through a winter not only of exceptional severity but of exceptional gloom and darkness, the full effect of which upon the public health and upon trade, we are not, perhaps, yet able entirely to realise. Nobody who has given any attention to this subject can have failed to remark the gradual increase of fog which has been going on for many years past, not only in the Metropolis but in our most important centres of industry. Some very interesting experiments have been made during the present year by the Meteorological branch of the Board of Trade who have stations in London for making observations, in the East in Bunhill Row and in the West somewhere in the neighbourhood of Victoria Street. The result of their investigations has been, I understand, to prove that the greater part of the darkness from which we have suffered during the last four months has been caused not by smoke emanating from the large manufactories but by the smoke emanating from house-fires. That of course, as far as the factories are concerned, is as it should be, because there is no doubt that the larger manufactories ought to, and many of them do, consume the greater portion of their own coal smoke; but it is impossible at the rate at which London is increasing that the enormous volume of coal smoke poured forth into the air from domestic fires should not produce the most dangerous effects. Now I happen to have acquired on this subject some little experience because I had the honour for two years to sit on a Royal Commission presided over by Lord Aberdare (Lord Percy and Lord Egerton were also members of it), to inquire into the presence of noxious acids and gases emitted into the atmosphere, and as to the best mode of preventing their emission. We were stopped by the terms of the reference from going directly into the effect of coal smoke and how it might be prevented from escaping into the atmosphere; but incidentally a very large amount of evidence came before us on that point also. One thing was perfectly clear throughout, and that was that the increase of works or the increase of population added enormously to the amount of smoke emitted into the air, and that in consequence such smoke or gases, as the case might be, were carried much farther afield than they had been in previous years. We had evidence with regard to districts in Lancashire, places in which five or six years before the effects of acids, gases, or coal smoke had not been felt at all, but which now suffer terribly. We had distinct evidence that so much had the volume of smoke increased, and so much had the volume of gases increased at the same time, that, whereas the effects of smoke were perceptible previously only five, six, or seven miles from the centres of population whence they emanated, they are now carried in certain states of the wind 10, 11, or 12 miles. I find that the state of things as regards the Metropolis now stands on all fours with the evidence which was presented to us then. I may say that I am a constant traveller on the South Western Railway, and my own experience is that in coming up to town we now meet the fog four or five miles further from London than we did previously; and not only that, but I am in a position to state from a series of chemical analyses which have been entered upon by a neighbour of mine, residing 35 miles from London, that even at that distance and with a range of hills intervening between that district and the Metropolis you can, in certain states of the wind, trace coal smoke, acids, and gases distinctly from the mist which is scraped from the surface of a window. Not only so but every year it becomes more difficult to grow certain flowers and plants within any reasonable distance of the Metropolis. Taking Wimbledon, the centre of a district which I once had the honour to represent in another place 20 years ago, there were several plants and several kinds of flowers which there was no difficulty whatever in growing and bringing to perfection there, which now cannot be grown at all, or if they can be grown to some extent they are stunted in growth and deficient in colour. Those are palpable distinct facts; and now comes the question, if this is the state of things existing, what is the remedy? That, of course, is a much more difficult question to answer. But here, again, I was fortunate enough, 35 years ago, in company with a partner in one of the largest breweries established in the East End of London, to go over the premises, and he showed me at that time the furnace in actual work consuming the whole of its own smoke, and at the same time saving the firm considerable cost in fuel, long before legislation had interfered to compel them to adopt means for doing so. A sum of £2,000 a year was mentioned to me as the amount of the saving in the works, partly by the more perfect combustion afforded by the process adopted, and partly by the cheaper description of fuel which it was possible to use with the furnace which had been adopted. I asked one of the partners in that same concern a year ago whether he found the effect was still the same, and he said, as regards the process of consuming the smoke, decidedly so; but that, as regards the price of fuel, other people have found out how beneficial a process it is, and the consequence is that the demand for that particular kind of fuel has been to a considerable extent increased, and they are not able now to economise on that account as we were then; but there is still a substantial economy, in addition to the fact that they were now complying with the law, though they had carried out what the law now enjoins long before the law was passed. However, I do not mean to say for a moment that it is equally easy to apply to the domestic hearth a process which we can carry out with comparative ease and cheapness in a large factory; but this I do mean to say, that there are ways and means by which it is possible to diminish the amount of coal smoke poured into the air by an ordinary hearth, if not to prevent it altogether. I know there are ways and means by which this may be done without entailing any very serious expense. If this matter had been taken in hand 25 or 30 years ago, and some such obligatory measure as that now proposed by the noble Lord opposite had been passed prohibiting the construction of hearths in future in large centres of population and industry which would not consume their own smoke, the whole question would now be in a fair way of solution; but as it is, matters are now going on from bad to worse, for the nuisance is one which has enormously increased, and is increasing, and one which I believe, in the opinion of your Lordships' House, ought to be avoided. But, my Lords, I am not very sanguine as to the possibility of dealing with it by any Bill which may be introduced by a private Member. Still I am very glad indeed that the noble Lord opposite has made the attempt, and I do hope that Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to tell the House that even if they do not feel themselves to be in a position at the present moment to propose any legislation on this difficult question, they are willing to assent to the appointment of a Royal Commission which may, within a comparatively short period, make recommendations which will tend to check this growing evil. One thing did come out of the Commission to which I have already alluded, and that is that wherever legislation has been passed judiciously and in accordance with public opinion to stimulate better means of manufacture being employed, science has invariably responded to the call and a way has been found out of the difficulty, the existence of which had often been previously little anticipated. There is one special reason why I would press upon your Lordships the importance of legislation in this direction, and that is that it is the poorest class of the community who are principally affected by this terrible evil. The richer portion of the community have the opportunity of escape under the worst circumstances from the evil effects of coal smoke, and even where that is not the case they are not the persons to whom this particular evil comes home most closely. Many of the working classes are prevented from following their daily occupations when a dense fog comes on; many more of them have to carry on their work under circumstances which are not only difficult but absolutely dangerous to themselves; and many more, again, who have not the advantage of medical treatment and proper nourishment, suffer terribly from the after effects of being exposed for days and weeks together during such weather as we have had lately to a tainted atmosphere which undermines their health and prevents them altogether from earning their living. In appealing, therefore, for an early consideration of this subject, I am speaking not so much for those who are able to take care of themselves, but on behalf of those who have nobody but Parliament to look to—who, if Parliament does not take them under its wing, have no other quarter to look to for that protection which they so much need, and to which they are entitled.

Viscount Middleton

LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, I do not know that I should have troubled the House after the remarks of the noble Marquess, had it not been for an observation or two made by the noble Lord who has just spoken, in which he rather inferred that this matter has been lost sight of to some extent by the Departments whose duty it is to watch over the public health. But that is by no means the case. I would remind your Lordships that a Select Committee sat in 1887. There were only five witnesses called before that Committee, and there was no Report made by it; but since that time the matter has been considered again and again. Of course, there can be no doubt that, owing to the dense fogs which we have had this winter, public opinion has been very much exercised in this matter. The Government, as the noble Marquess has informed your Lordships, propose to refer the Bill now before us to a Select Committee, and although the noble Lord who has just spoken has talked about a Royal Commission, it is to be hoped that on consideration he will consider the proposal made by the noble Marquess more expedient than the appointment of a Royal Commission. The Government have had under their consideration the question of the administration of the existing Acts, and their proposals on this head will be known as soon as the Public Health Acts Amendment Bill which has been read a first time is printed. There are various defects in this Bill which the noble Lord has moved. I cannot conceive that it is at all likely that any Government would allow these inquisitorial powers in regard to private dwellings which he has rather suggested, to pass, but these are all matters which, if the House approves of the course proposed, will be dealt with by the Committee. I hope the noble Lord who spoke last will by no means think this most important subject has escaped attention, or that he has any monopoly in the wish for measures to be passed for the benefit of those whose interests he has advocated.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I should like to call the attention of the noble Lord to the substance of what he is proposing, with the view of suggesting to him, if he has any plan in his mind by which the object in which we are all interested can be carried out, that he should give the Select Committee an opportunity of knowing what it is they are to deliberate upon. I cannot help thinking that the Bill is merely a skeleton measure as it stands. If it only involved provisions in reference to fog and smoke I believe he would have the unanimous consent of everybody, but he purports to do something new by legislation. I must say that I do appeal to your Lordships, as an act of common humanity to Her Majesty's Judges, not to pass a Bill—a document—of this sort into law. I do not know what the noble Lord means, and I listened with great attention to his reply, to see if he would throw any light upon what is the real difficulty in my mind. The language of the Bill is very general. I want to know what is the meaning in this connection of the words "necessary" or "unnecessary?" Necessity is a relative term. Necessary in respect to what? Is it necessary in respect to whether a man has a large or a small dinner to cook? If it is a large one, it may require more fire, and therefore more smoke will be produced. If it means a minimum of opaque smoke, to use the language which he has used himself in the Bill in regard to it, is it with reference to some scientific possibility of reducing it to a minimum? Is that what the noble Lord means? I do not know in the least. There is no guide whatever given by the noble Lord on the face of his Bill. I do not want to go into a scientific discussion as to what is "necessary" or "unnecessary" to impair the atmosphere. No one, I suppose, could say what is the standard of necessity. What is it as to which a Judge is to direct a jury or himself upon the question whether or not there has been an "unnecessary impairing of the atmosphere?" The impairing of the atmosphere is in itself a relative term. I suppose no atmosphere is absolutely pure. I will not discuss scientifically what gases the atmosphere contains, but, I would ask the noble Lord, is this "impairing" to be more than chemists would consider to be the normal proportion of the constituent element in the atmosphere, or, if a larger proportion than some chemists would fix, how much should it be? The whole of this is left at large in the Bill—the mode in which this is to be ascertained is left entirely at large. But assume that we have got over that initial difficulty. I confess I do not know what the noble Lord means by the London County Council making bye-laws for requiring any fireplace or furnace intended to be used in any building, to be constructed in future, "to be so constructed as to consume, burn, or otherwise prevent as far as possible, all smoke arising therefrom." There, again, is another term which requires exposition. I gather from what the noble Lord said that he thinks invention has so far proceeded at present that there are means by which it is quite possible to make fireplaces consume their own smoke; but if so, that is not what he enacts—it is only "as far as possible." And there, again, what guide is there to anybody? If it means as far as possible in a literal sense—that is, as far as a skilled chemist by his own processes is able to consume it—what reasonable prospect is there of that being ever attained in ordinary cases? What I object to is a skeleton Bill propounding questions of abstruse chemistry, which are left by it to be solved as they may be, leaving words which are so ambiguous and of application so uncertain that really no definite line or guide is to be found by anybody for the administration of the Act. The reason I have risen to make these few remarks was that I thought it advisable to suggest that the noble Lord, if he has any plan in his mind, might think it right to withdraw his Bill for the present, so that he may have the opportunity of putting into it such machinery as would be appropriate; in which case the Select Committee might be able to take evidence and consider whether the plan he proposes is one which is capable of being put into operation. But at present, if this Bill is referred to any Committee, I should like to know how they would begin to try to find out what the meaning of the noble Lord is, and whether they should begin by calling chemists, or witnesses of any other description, to point out the legal machinery which he desires to put into operation.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My Lords, I have no right to again address the House, but I would ask permission to say a few words. I cannot answer the technical objections which have been put by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, but at the next stage of going into Committee I shall be quite prepared to do so. Perhaps, he will permit me to remind him that all he has said to-night might have been said on the four previous occasions when he assented to the measure. I may also be allowed to say, with regard to the remarks which have fallen from the noble Lord who has previously spoken, that the Bill does not provide for inquisitorial or domiciliary visits. There is no such power proposed to be given. If your Lordships will now read the Bill a second time, I will, before it goes into Committee, try to the best of my poor endeavour to meet the objections of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack.

On Question agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly.

LORD HERSCHELL: I understand that the proposal is to send the Bill to a Select Committee, but I would suggest that there should be a general reference of the matter to the Committee to which the Bill may be referred—not merely referring this Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I think the proposal of the noble Lord is that we should have a general reference to the Select Committee of the whole subject—that it be referred to them for consideration.

Lord Halsbury

FLASHING SIGNALS—ADMIRAL COLOMB'S INVENTION.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD SUDELEY, in rising—

“To ask Her Majesty's Government how it is that since the 9th February, when they stated, ‘that the return ordered to be printed on the 5th August on Admiral Colomb's flashing signals, had been delayed owing to a letter of Admiral Colomb's not having been received before the 12th October, but was in the hands of the printers and would at once be distributed,’ other letters have been written included in the return, one by the Treasury on the 13th February and one by the Admiralty on the 21st February, which traverse the whole question, and necessarily caused further delay of three weeks in the issue of the papers,” said: My Lords, since I gave notice of this question I find that the Return to which it relates has been distributed; it will, therefore, be necessary for me to somewhat alter the question, and I would ask how it is that certain letters have been included in this Return notwithstanding the answer I received on the 9th February? This question, although it may seem a somewhat simple one, is, I apprehend, a serious matter, because it involves to a great extent the privileges of your Lordships' House. You will remember that on the 5th August last a Return was moved for and at the time, owing to certain causes to be alluded to, a letter which was expected from Admiral Colomb was asked to be included in the Return. Perhaps I may explain that the reason of that was simply this: that although the discussion on the question took place in May it was the 26th June before Lord Elphinstone stated in this House that the Admiralty proposed to offer Admiral Colomb £2,000. Unfortunately, there was a delay at the Admiralty, and that offer was not made until the 29th July. It was, therefore, mutually agreed between us that the Return moved for on the 5th August should include that letter. When the House met at the beginning of this Session, I made particular inquiries, and I was assured it would be issued at once. On the 9th February I asked the noble Lord, Lord Elphinstone, as representative of the Admiralty, whether he could tell me how soon it would be issued. He then informed me there had been some little difficulty owing to Admiral Colomb's letter not having been received at the Admiralty until the 12th October (but as of course there had been four months' interval that was no excuse), and he went on to say that the Papers should be issued forthwith. Now, a very serious thing has happened. I found out about a fortnight afterwards that this statement of my noble Friend was hardly the case. I do not wish to use unpleasant language, and I am sure my noble Friend had not the slightest idea that when he gave your Lordships that reason for the delay in making this Return, it was a statement which could hardly be said to be a true statement. What actually happened was this: I found that subsequent to that answer—four days afterwards—a letter was written by the Treasury traversing the whole question, and putting an entirely new aspect upon the whole matter, and not only was that done, but a further letter was written on the 21st February—a fortnight afterwards—from the Admiralty. Therefore the real answer would have been that the Return was being kept back in order that certain further letters should be delivered, and that, therefore, there would be further delay. That answer of Lord Elphinstone's was given me three weeks ago, and the Return has only been issued to-day. But, my Lords, is there not here a question of the privileges of your Lordships' House? I understand that when a Return is moved for in this House, in order to be printed, it is stated definitely up to what date those letters or those papers should go. It is not only unusual and unprecedented, but it is absolutely wrong, that other letters of a far later date should be included. Many of your Lordships have been in this House a great deal longer than I have. So far as I remember, the proceedings in the other House, it certainly would never have been allowed—that seven months should have been permitted to elapse before such a simple Return as this should have been distributed to the House. This question of privilege is, I think, a somewhat serious matter, because it is quite evident that, however simple this particular case may be, if your Lordships pass it over on this occasion, how are you to be certain that other Returns which your Lordships may order to be printed will not be kept back for further impotant terms to be added to it? But, apart from the question of privilege, there is a personal aspect of the matter as regards myself which I should like to mention. When I moved for this Return I did so at the instigation of several Gentlemen in the other House, who explained that they were anxious to bring forward the question respecting the treatment which Admiral Colomb has received, and that if I would move for this Return that Motion in the other House should be made directly the House met this Session. When the House met there was no Return. My noble Friend Lord Elphinstone gave a certain answer which turned out to be most erroneous, and here we are, now close to Easter, and the Return is only just issued; so that practically the whole matter is put off until Easter. I would also say this—that I think the course taken by the Admiralty is somewhat uncourteous. It is now nearly two years since a Deputation of Members of this and the other House waited upon Lord George Hamilton. We went thoroughly into the question, and we were told to move, in July, 1889, that the Admiralty would at once deal with this question, which, I may say, had been delayed over and over again. But last Session, in May, 1890, finding that nothing had been done, the question was brought forward in your Lordships' House. His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh and every one of the Admirals who held commands in the Fleet, or nearly all, stated their view very strongly that it was a matter which ought at once to be dealt with, and that practically it was unfair to the Navy not to bring the matter to a settlement. Since that date the Treasury have offered the paltry sum of £2,000. I will not go now into the merits of the question, but what I wish to point out to your Lordships is this: that although I have endeavoured to meet the Admiralty in every possible way, I have been met by every possible effort to avoid the question being thoroughly dealt with. The whole matter has been treated in so paltry a manner, although it is one which in the interests of the Navy ought to have been dealt with in a large way, that it is very unfortunate it has not been so dealt with. There has been delay after delay, and now the question is being dealt with in a manner which is utterly without precedent. I am sorry the noble Lord (Lord Elphinstone) is unable to be in the House to-night, but as he has informed me that another noble Lord will answer the question, he will not think it discourteous of me that I have not further postponed it.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK: My Lords, I regret very much that the noble Lord (Lord Elphinstone) who I had hoped until this morning would be able to be present to-night to answer the question of the noble Lord, has been unable to leave his house, having been unwell for several days. I think, under the circumstances, that possibly the noble Lord, knowing that anybody else to whom the question might be put must be very imperfectly aware of the facts, would have done better in putting it not to have brought a charge of incorrectness as he has done against Lord Elphinstone, in his absence, and also to have made a rather vehement attack upon the Admiralty. All I am able to say now, not anticipating from the notice of the noble Lord's question that he intended to go into this matter, is that on the 1st December Admiral Colomb addressed a letter to the Admiralty to be forwarded to the Treasury. That letter was forwarded on the 5th December. On the 14th February the Treasury's reply was received, and forwarded to Admiral Colomb, that the Papers were complete, and were on the point of being circulated. There is no doubt that those letters have been included, in addition, in the Return which is now on your Lordships' Table. The noble Lord says it was a great irregularity to present those letters in addition to those which were moved for on the 1st July; but he will remember that he himself expressed a hope that the Return would, if necessary, be delayed for the purpose of including Admiral Colomb's reply. Well, Admiral Colomb's reply to the letter of the 29th July was not written until the 11th October last. The noble Lord complains of delay on the part of the Admiralty, but it appears to me there was a very considerable delay on Admiral Colomb's own part in not answering the letter of the 29th July until the 11th October; and, therefore, I do not think it can be said that all the delay has been on one side. All that I can say is that the Papers are now before your Lordships' House, and they include all the correspondence which has taken place up to the present date. It was no doubt, I imagine, considered that as the noble Lord had in one instance asked that the Return should be delayed for the purpose of including a letter of Admiral Colomb's, which was not received for more than two months after the date of the letter to which it was an answer, it would be desirable to make some further delay in order that the Return should be as complete as possible. I regret that it should have fallen to me, in the place of my noble Friend, to answer this question. I had not anticipated the statement which the noble Lord was going to make, and I have not been prepared with any official information regarding it. I am only sorry he has not been answered, on account of ill-health, by my noble Friend himself, who I am quite sure will, at the earliest opportunity, answer the statement the noble Lord has made—that on the 9th February he made a statement to this House which was incorrect.

Lord Sudeley

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I will say nothing as to Lord Elphinstone, except that I am very sorry he has not been able to be present; but with regard to the Return itself, it is certainly an inconvenient practice that after a Return has been moved for, its presentation to the House should not have been made for some months in order that further letters should be presented with it. It seems to me that it would have been far better if the Return had been presented at an earlier period and then the two other letters could have been presented afterwards whenever it was thought desirable. I do not in the least bring any accusation against the Admiralty in a matter which I am not acquainted with, but I thought it right to say this in reference to the statement that a Return has been delayed for the purpose of introducing a further correspondence, and I think that is not a desirable course.

*LORD SUDELEY: I hope your Lordships will allow me to explain one matter. The noble Lord stated just now inadvertently, no doubt, that I have been discourteous to Lord Elphinstone and himself in not giving notice of the statement I have made, and in not postponing the question; but I think he will not say so when I remind him of the facts. I put down this question last Friday, but I put it off owing to the fact that Lord Elphinstone was ill. I went to see Lord Elphinstone yesterday, and told him exactly how the matter stood, and he promised to write fully on the subject to Lord George Hamilton, so that no question might arise as to what I was going to bring forward. I told him that I was perfectly prepared to put the matter off as long as he desired, but he did not desire it, and I have since got a message from him: "Have written to Limerick to arrange reply." I can only make that answer to the noble Lord's statement.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 2nd March, 1891.

QUESTIONS.

SENTRY DUTY AT METROPOLITAN PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state for the information of the House what was the average number of nights a week in bed, during the months of May and June, 1890, for soldiers of the Brigade of Foot Guards stationed in London (exclusive of those at the Tower) and who were on the roster of their battalions for sentry duty; and how many soldiers of the Brigade of Foot Guards, who were stationed in London during the year 1890, were invalided out of the Army on account of pulmonary disease?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): During May and June, 1890, privates of the Foot Guards stationed in London (exclusive of those at the Tower) averaged 5·8 nights a week in bed. At this time one battalion was at Pirbright, so that sentry duty fell entirely on three battalions. I may be allowed to explain that the military expression "nights in bed" does not mean so many nights a week, but that the men sleeps in barracks for that number consecutively before being out for one night on sentry duty. The figures given by the General commanding for May and June are thus—4·94 and 4·87 respectively. Since the months named by the noble Lord, the number of sentries has, as I have already stated, been reduced, and the proportion of nights in bed has, of course, been correspondingly increased. Twenty-four soldiers of the Foot Guards stationed in London were invalided during 1890 for pulmonary disease.

ADULTERATED MANURES AND FEEDING STUFFS.

SIR EDWARD BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been drawn to the resolution passed at the Central Chamber of Agriculture, on 10th December last, in which it is stated that legislation to prevent the sale of adulterated manures and feeding stuffs is urgently needed; that the extension of the principle and the improvement of the administration of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, or legislation on similar lines, appear to afford a convenient method of effecting the desired reform; and that the Board of Agriculture be requested to take steps to protect the British farmer in this matter; and whether he will introduce a Bill dealing with the matter during the present Session, or appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the subject?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Yes, Sir; my attention has been directed to the resolution passed by the Central Chamber of Agriculture on the 10th of December last. I concur in the opinion that legislation is desirable, and I am engaged in preparing a Bill on this subject at present. The hon. Member is aware of the business which the Government have before them already, but I hope it may be possible for me to introduce it during the Session.

MARKET RIGHTS AND TOLLS.

SIR EDWARD BIRKBECK: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been called to the recommendations, Nos. 23 and 26 of the Royal Commission on Market Rights and Tolls, in which they recommend—

“That markets which are now required to be provided with machines for weighing cattle should be furnished with sufficient and suitable accommodation for the same”;

and—

“That statistics of the market prices of meat, and in particular of the prices of cattle at per stone live weight, should be collected”; and whether he will take the necessary steps to give effect to the same?

MR. CHAPLIN: My attention has been called to the matters referred to in the question of my hon. Friend. With regard to the first part of the question, I have no doubt that the provision of adequate accommodation for weighing live cattle at markets is a great advantage to farmers and others when they make use of it, although I am bound to say, from all the information which reaches me, that in the majority of cases they appear to have been somewhat slow to avail themselves of it. I am, however, making careful inquiry into the subject, with a view to giving effect to the recommendations of the Royal Commission. Upon the matters contained in the second part of the question, namely, the market price of meat, and the prices of cattle by live weight, I am now in communication with the Board of Trade with the same object.

THE EASTER REVIEW.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if, having regard to the fact that Civil servants of the higher divisions who also serve Her Majesty in the Volunteer Force, are allowed to be absent with their several corps on the Saturday before Easter, without trenching on their annual leave, the same privilege cannot be extended to copyists who have only 12 days' leave, bearing in mind that otherwise their regiments will be wholly deprived of their services at Easter, while the Saturday office work is practically limited to three hours?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I think the hon. Member is under a misapprehension if he supposes that there is a general rule authorising Civil servants who are Volunteers to be absent with their several corps on the Saturday before Easter without trenching on their annual leave. The Treasury has promulgated no such rule, and there is no provision of the kind in the Orders in Council relating to the Civil Service. Nor has the Treasury received any representations on the subject, and I am, therefore, unable to take action in the sense indicated by the hon. Member.

THE INCOME TAX.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Income Tax collectors have received special orders this year to press forward its collection; and whether the statement made by some of them that the latest time to be allowed will be the middle of March is correct?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): No, Sir; no such orders have been issued. But I may remind the hon. Member that the Easter holidays fall within the current financial year, and that the collectors have very properly appreciated the desirability, in the general interest, of allowing for the shorter time at their disposal in getting in a tax which is payable on the 1st of January, and ought, in any case, to be paid within the financial year. Any statement which has been made that the latest time for payment is the middle of March is incorrect, and has certainly not been made on the responsibility of the Board of Inland Revenue.

In reply to a further question by Mr. DIXON-HARTLAND,

MR. GOSCHEN said: The tax must be collected within the financial year, and my hon. Friend should remember that it is really payable on the 1st of January. Every leniency is shown, provided the tax is collected within the financial year.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will announce through the Surveyors of Income Tax to owners of labourers' cottages his decision to exempt from Income Tax the amounts received from cottages built by the Oldcastle Board of Guardians, on account of the various annual charges exceeding the rents received; and whether he will instruct the local collectors and assessors of Income Tax to exempt all owners of cottages from Income Tax on account of cottages where the owners can show, as they did at Oldcastle, that the various annual outgoings exceed the amount received as rent?

MR. GOSCHEN: No general instructions, such as are suggested, can be legally issued. The case of the Oldcastle Board of Guardians is a peculiar one, because the interest of the money borrowed from a Public Department equalled the total of the rents, and, therefore, there was practically nothing to tax.

INDEX TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Index to Members of Parliament, ordered to be prepared and printed some years ago, but still undelivered, is likely to be completed?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): The Paper in question is in the hands of the printers, and it will not be long before it is distributed.

SAVINGS BANK DEPARTMENT.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what was the average day's work in the Savings Bank Department during the months of January, 1890, and 1891 for the male sorters, and also for boy messengers (aged 13 to 17); whether some of the male sorters have been kept at work for 13, 14, and 15 hours out of the 24; whether boy messengers have been kept at work for 16 hours out of the 24; and whether any boy messenger averaged $12\frac{3}{4}$ hours work a day during the month of January?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The average day's work of a male sorter in the Savings Bank in one particular month, namely, January, 1890, was 11 hours 40 minutes. In the corresponding month of 1891 the average was 12 hours 36 minutes. The average day's work for boy messengers in January, 1890, was 11 hours 18 minutes. In the corresponding month of 1891 it was 11 hours 20 minutes. In the early part of January in each year some of the male sorters have volunteered to work between 12 and 15 hours, but the practice is objectionable. I am not aware of any boy messengers having been kept at work for 16 hours. Some of the elder boys have averaged $12\frac{3}{4}$ hours work a day during the month of January. I entirely deprecate the continuance of such a state of public business, and, although no complaints have been made by the staff of excessive hours, I have, in order to stop it, directed steps to be taken to add about 50 officers to the minor staff.

THE SEWERS IN WESTMINSTER.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the basements of many valuable properties along the line of certain of the principal sewers in Westminster have for the past five or six years been frequently flooded with sewage, owing to the insufficient capacity of such sewers for the increasing requirements; whether the alterations to the system of drainage of the Houses of Parliament, which cost some £30,000 in 1887, were occasioned by the imperfect local sewerage system; and whether he will call upon the Local Authority of Westminster to inform him of the steps taken to protect the district from a recurrence of the evil?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): My attention had not been drawn to the matter to which the question of my hon. Friend refers prior to the notice which was given by him. I have communicated with the Vestry of St. Margaret and St. John, Westminster, and I am informed that the basements of many valuable properties along the line of certain of the principal streets in Westminster have for the past six years been frequently flooded with sewage, owing to the insufficient capacity of the sewers for the increased requirements. As regards the alterations in the system of drainage of the Houses of Parliament, I learn from the Chief Commissioner of Her Majesty's Works that these alterations were not occasioned by the imperfect local sewerage system, but were undertaken in order to improve the mode of connecting the main drains of the building with the Metropolitan main low level sewer, and to enable them to be freed from sewage at all times, and that the cost of that portion of the work did not exceed £12,000. The Vestry of St. Margaret and St. John, Westminster, attribute the flooding to the fact that when heavy rains occur at or near the time of high water in the Thames, the main lines of the sewers become so fully charged as to be unable to afford an outlet for the surface water from the local sewers, and they state that as the water accumulates from the higher land it flows back from the main line sewers through the local service into the areas and basements of many of the houses and buildings in the low-lying parts of the parish. The Vestry, it appears, were for a long time in communication with the Metropolitan Board of Works, and subsequently have been in communication with the London County Council with a view to their providing additional means of discharging storm water. The Vestry, it appears, were informed by the Chief Engineer to the County Council in September last that a scheme for the prevention of flooding was then being prepared. The matter is not one in which the Local Government Board have any jurisdiction.

ARMY RECRUITS.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, having regard to the existing difficulty in obtaining recruits, he will take into favourable consideration a proposal to form a battalion essentially composed of Army candidates who, having failed in scoring sufficient marks for commissions, can pass the medical examination; and whether he will give, by Return or otherwise, information as to the number of such candidates who have entered the ranks, and with what results, especially with regard to promotion?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The proposal to form a corps of gentlemen has been very carefully considered on previous occasions, but for various reasons the Military Authorities have not thought themselves able to recommend its adoption. It is not one that I have myself personally considered, and I will look into it. There are no records at the War Office of the after career of candidates for commissions who have failed to obtain them.

Mr. Ritchie

INVESTMENT OF TRUST FUNDS.

SIR GEORGE BADEN - POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can now state what action Her Majesty's Government propose to take in relation to the Report of the Departmental Committee appointed to consider the question of the Investment of Trust Funds in Colonial Inscribed Stocks?

MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir; I am not able to make a statement on the subject at present.

THOROUGHBRED STALLIONS.

MR. STEPHENS (Middlesex, Hornsey): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether thoroughbred stallions receiving the Queen's Prizes are examined so that their soundness can be relied upon by breeders; and whether the examination for soundness in wind is made by lunging; and, if not, by what other means the soundness in wind of horses receiving a Queen's Prize is ascertained?

*MR. CHAPLIN: All the stallions, before receiving the Queen's premiums, are strictly examined by three veterinary surgeons, and they are disqualified if they are found to be affected with either of the following diseases, which the commissions consider are of a hereditary nature. The diseases are roaring, including whistling, ringbone, unsound feet, navicular disease, spavin, and cataract. The rule observed by the veterinary surgeons in examining the horses for their wind is this—that in all cases, where possible, they are lunged. If, however, for any reason lunging is found to be undesirable, other means are adopted; but this is only in very exceptional cases.

STREET ACCIDENTS IN LONDON.

MR. HULSE (Salisbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he would obtain from the Coroners of the London District the number of inquests held over persons who have met their death by street accidents in the Metropolis during the years 1889 and 1890?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): If my hon. Friend's object is to ascertain the number of persons killed by all descriptions of vehicles in the streets, he will find the figures for 1889 in the Report of the Commissioner of Police for that year, page 39. The figures for 1890 will be given in the same Report for that year. It seems, therefore, unnecessary to obtain a Coroner's Return. If I have misunderstood the object of my hon. Friend, perhaps he will specify more exactly what information he requires, and I will then consider whether it can be given.

PARISH ASSESSMENTS.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he is aware that a great deal of unpleasantness is being caused by the action of the London County Council, who, not satisfied with the parish assessments even when appealed against, are insisting upon re-raising the assessments; and whether they have the power to thus revise what has already been properly investigated and settled?

MR. RITCHIE: I have not received any communication with reference to the action of the London County Council in the matter referred to. By the Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act, 1869, any body of persons authorised by law to levy rates or to require contributions payable out of rates in the Metropolis may appeal to the Court of Quarter Sessions if they feel aggrieved by reason of the total gross value or rateable value of any parish being too high or too low, or if there be no approved valuation list for the parish. I assume that the appeals referred to are made by the London County Council under this provision, and it appears to me that the valuation lists cannot properly be considered as settled unless there has been an opportunity of appealing to the Quarter Sessions and such appeals have been decided.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: The question I ask has no reference to the gross and total assessment, but I wish to know whether the separate assessments in parishes have not been attempted to be raised?

MR. RITCHIE: I understand that the appeal affects certain properties which had not been sufficiently rated. That being so, the appeal applies also to the total assessment.

DOCKYARD EXPENDITURE.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what is the probable amount which will be available out of the unexpended balance of the Navy Estimates of 1890-91 for expenditure on ships building in the dockyards in the year 1891-2; and what is the amount which will be repayable out of the Estimates for 1891-2 for stores and armour plates bought and paid for in the year 1890-91, in accordance with Section 3 of the Naval Defence Act?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): At present it is not expected that there will be any unexpended balance on the Navy Estimates for 1890-91 as regards shipbuilding in the dockyards under the Naval Defence Act, but there is an estimated balance on armaments of £162,300. There is nothing repayable out of the Estimates 1891-92 for advances made for stores and armour-plates bought and paid for in 1890-91. The estimated expenditure under the Naval Defence Act for the coming year is:—For hulls and machinery of ships building by contract, £3,140,733; armaments, £280,000.

SALIH PASHA.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Armenian inhabitants of Zeitoun have forwarded to Sir William Whitę a Petition in which they set forth a series of grievances against Salih Pasha, the Governor of the Province of Marash; whether this Salih Pasha is the same Salih Pasha who was implicated in the notorious massacres of Christians at Damascus; whether it is the fact, as stated in the Petition, that Salih Pasha has arrested and thrown into prison a number of peaceable Armenian travellers, and has practically left the Province at the mercy of bands of Circassian and other brigands who have received carte blanche to do as they please; and whether any inquiry has been or will be made into the truth or falsehood of the allegations contained in this Petition?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): Sir William White has not reported his having received a Petition from the inhabitants of Zeitoun, but he has instructions to take such steps as he may deem advisable to ascertain the facts with regard to the disturbances at Zeitoun, respecting which the reports are very contradictory. We have no information as to the antecedents of Salih Pasha.

SOLDIERS ON THE MARCH.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will take steps to secure that soldiers on the march shall have some breakfast given them before starting in the morning, and that they shall not be dependent on the generosity of innkeepers for this meal for which at present the innkeepers receive no remuneration?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: When a soldier is in barracks the ration he receives from the public has to be supplemented at his own expense in order that he should be provided with breakfast and tea. When on the march he is allowed a hot meal, which is more than equivalent to the ration in barracks; and, consequently, he has less difficulty in providing the supplementary meals. The soldiers do not depend on the generosity of the innkeeper for their breakfast, that meal being provided, as in barracks, under regimental arrangements. Billets are, however, much scattered—often over two or three miles—and it would be impossible for an officer to see that all the men had morning meals and marched at the proper time. All that can be done is to give general directions.

VOLUNTEER POSITION ARTILLERY.

MR. COGHILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will consider the desirability in garrison towns, such as Liverpool and Manchester, of allowing the use of the riding school of cavalry barracks for the purpose of giving equitation lessons to the non-commissioned officers and drivers of Volunteer Position Artillery stationed in such towns; and whether he is aware that the present arrangements entail a cost of from £50 to £60 a year on Volunteer Artillery Corps?

Mr. Summers

*MR. E. STANHOPE: If definite applications on the subject should be made by officers commanding batteries of Volunteer Artillery, endeavours will be made to meet their wishes as far as possible. I have no information as to the cost entailed on Volunteer Artillery Corps by the present arrangements.

TORPEDO GUNBOATS.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether any of the seven torpedo gunboats of the Salamander class have yet succeeded in doing their trial speed of 21 knots; and whether the 18 torpedo gunboats, described as sister ships of the Salamander, and also stated to have a speed of 21 knots, are expected to realise that speed?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: None of these vessels have developed on trial more than 3,500 to 4,000-horse power, as against 4,500-horse power specified. I have fully explained the reasons for this falling off in a Memorandum on the Estimates for 1891-92. The speeds attained have been from 19½ to 20 knots, as against 21 knots estimated under maximum forced draught trial. Of the 18 vessels mentioned two have boilers of the same size as, although differing in details from, those in the Salamander. The remaining five, which are already begun, have larger boilers. With the larger boilers a higher speed may, I hope, be obtained. Eleven other vessels have yet to be ordered.

BRITISH HONDURAS.

MR. BRODIE HOARE (Hampstead): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will lay upon the Table of the House Baron Siccama's Report on the sanitary works in progress in Belize, British Honduras, and the Correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Governor on the subject of the recent outbreak of yellow fever in that town?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Papers on the subject will be laid in which will be found a Report by Baron Siccama.

THE SOUDAN.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government recognise the right of sovereignty of Egypt over the Soudan; and, if so, whether he will define the frontiers of the territory over which this sovereignty is claimed by Egypt; and whether it is intended to increase the Egyptian Army, in view of the contemplated military occupation by Egypt of that part of the Soudan called Tokar?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The term Soudan is applied to extensive regions in Africa, all of which certainly do not belong to Egypt. Her Majesty's Government have not assumed the duty of defining the limits of Egyptian rights in this territory. The second question must be answered in the negative.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Is it in the recollection of the right hon. Gentleman that the following telegram was sent on January 6, 1884:—

"Baring to Granville.—The Khedive says that he accepted policy of the gradual abandonment of the whole Soudan, which he believes, on mature reflection, to be best for the interests of the country."

I wish to know whether the policy of the abandonment of the Soudan is compatible with any effective assertion of sovereignty such as is being made now?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: In the opinion of Her Majesty's Government the withdrawal of the Egyptian troops from the Soudan did not constitute an abandonment of the sovereignty of that region.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I wish to know whether Her Majesty's Government now recognise the sovereignty of Egypt over the whole Soudan, Khartoum included?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not prepared to make a general statement on the subject. If the hon. Member desires an answer I must ask him to place a question on the Paper. I may remind the hon. Member that in 1883 and 1884 the Government bound themselves to protect the Egyptian Government in Egypt and also in the ports of the Red Sea. The Government do not consider that they have departed from that limitation in assenting to the occupation of Tokar.

*SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Are we, then, to understand that the Government do recognise the sovereignty of Egypt over that part of the Soudan?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I must ask for notice of further questions.

ATTENDANCE OF CHILDREN AT BOARD SCHOOLS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Mr. Montagu Williams is correctly reported in the Standard of the 10th instant as having stated, on the hearing of a School Board summons, that,

"In his opinion, it was for the parents to say whether a child should go on attending school after having passed the Fourth Standard"; and, if so, on what legal authority the opinion is based?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the learned Magistrate that he cannot remember his exact words, but the substance of what he said was that, in a case where a parent proves that the presence of a child is necessary at home on account of poverty, sickness, or other trouble, and where that child has passed the Fourth Standard, he thought it was rather for the parent to say whether he might retain the child at home. This opinion, the Magistrate informs me, is based on the decision in the case of "The School Board of London v. Duggan," which was tried in the High Court of Justice in 1884.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Arising out of that answer may I ask who is the proper authority to reprimand, or suspend, or dismiss a Stipendiary Magistrate who refuses absolutely to administer the law and encourages the parents to disobey the legal authorities?

*MR. MATTHEWS: The question of the right hon. Gentleman is based on an assertion which the learned Magistrate entirely repudiates.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when the Papers relating to the negotiations with France for the settlement of the Newfoundland Fisheries Question will be presented to the House; and when it is intended to present the Papers already promised relating to the attempts that were made, with the consent of Her Majesty's Government, by Mr. Bond, representing the Colony of Newfoundland, to effect commercial and fishery arrangements with the United States?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is hoped that both sets of Papers will be ready for presentation in about a week or 10 days.

BRAZIL AND UNITED STATES TREATY.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is prepared to make a statement as to the position of proposed Treaty between the Republics of Brazil and the United States of America; and whether the 1st of April next is the day on which it is proposed the Treaty shall come into force?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Ministers have been directed to telegraph the date at which it will come into force, and to state whether ratification or legislation is necessary, the general effect of the Treaty is that United States imports to Brazil will be placed on the free list which hitherto have amounted to about 18½ per cent. of the entire imports of those articles; and United States imports will pay a reduced rate of 25 per cent. which hitherto have been under 5 per cent. of similar imports. In return, Brazilian sugar, molasses, coffee, and hides will be admitted free into the United States.

FRANCHISE QUALIFICATION FOR SCHOOL BOARD ELECTIONS.

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcubright): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate what franchise qualification is necessary to enable an elector to record his vote at a School Board election?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The qualification necessary to entitle anyone to vote at a School Board election is that his name should appear on the latest valuation roll as owner or occupier of lands or heritages of not less than £4 annual value. In counties, as the valuation is now made up, under 52 & 53 Vic. c. 50, service franchise occupiers of premises of the prescribed value are entered as inhabitant occupiers; and, in my opinion, they are therefore entitled to vote at those School Board elections for which the county valuation rolls furnish the lists of voters.

Mr. Bryce

SWAZILAND.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the grant in aid of £5,000 for Swaziland, he will state the amount of revenue collected for the period for which the aid of £5,000 is asked; from what sources is the revenue obtained; whether it is derived from the taxes, &c. on white persons imposed by Section 6 of the Proclamation of 18th December, 1889, or whether it includes taxation from other sources; whether he is aware that Article 9 of the Convention provides that such deficiency has to be certified according to rules as to accounting and audit to be approved by the High Commissioner and the President of the Transvaal; whether these rules have been made and approved, and whether the deficiency has been certified accordingly; and whether the Transvaal Government is contributing a like sum of £5,000?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The amount of revenue expected to be collected by the Joint Government during the period in question is estimated at £1,347. The revenue is derived from the sources indicated in the third part of the hon. Member's question, and does not include taxation from other sources. As regards the 4th paragraph, I am, of course, aware of the provisions of the Swaziland Convention; but the rules of Accounts and Audit have not yet been received from South Africa; nor could the amount of the deficit be certified under them until the year is closed on the 31st instant. The sum of £5,000 is an estimate, and no more of it will be applied to the deficiency of the current year than is requisite to make good moiety of the certified deficit. The South African Republic has undertaken to supply a moiety of the deficit equal to that supplied by Her Majesty's Government.

LONDON FOGS.

VISCOUNT WOLMER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, considering the serious injury to health, the disturbance of business, and the hardships inflicted on many of the poorest wage earners of the Metropolis by the curtailment of their working hours, caused by the increasing prevalence of fogs, Her Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of appointing a Royal Commission to examine and report how far the evil is one which can be mitigated by legislation?

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will cause inquiry to be made as to the various descriptions of coal used in the Metropolis, and their relative capabilities for converting mist and white fog into the yellow and dark conditions of the atmosphere known as London fog; and also to the possibility of inducing persons residing in London to use coals comparatively smokeless by means of legislation, having the effect of placing taxes or duties on those coals which are most deleterious to the atmosphere?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Her Majesty's Government are, in common with other inhabitants of the Metropolis, extremely sensible of the serious injury, disturbance, and hardships inflicted by the increasing prevalence of fog. They are, however, sceptical as to the value of a Royal Commission for the investigation of the subject. It is notorious that the evil mainly arises from the smoke emitted by ordinary domestic fires, and the problem to be solved is whether it is possible by legislation to prohibit and prevent the production of smoke in this way. A Bill was introduced into the House of Lords in 1887 with this object, and was referred after a Second Reading to a Select Committee, which took evidence which went to show that smoke could be prevented by the use of non-bituminous coal, by the substitution of coke or gas for coal for heating purposes, and possibly by the adoption of an improved grate and great care in lighting and feeding fires with common coal. The Bill was not proceeded with beyond this stage in 1887. Another Bill with the same object has been introduced, and stands for Second Reading in the House of Lords this evening. If it should come down to the House, the noble Lord will have an opportunity of considering whether it is possible by penalty on occupiers of houses and tenements to secure the object he has in view.

VICE CHANCELLORS' COURTS AT OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will consider the advisability of introducing a Bill for the purpose of abolishing the Vice Chancellors' Courts at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and of making members of these Universities and inhabitants of the City of Oxford and Borough of Cambridge exclusively amenable to, and triable by, the ordinary law and the ordinary tribunals of the land?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: A meeting has, I understand, been arranged to take place between the Vice Chancellor of the University of Cambridge and the Mayor, as representing the Town Council of that place; and both parties have agreed to a Conference on the whole question of University authority over townsmen. As regards Oxford, proceedings are governed by Act of Parliament (6 Geo. IV., c. 97, sect. 3), and all cases are heard by the Vice Chancellor in open Court, another county magistrate in almost every case being present. Evidence is taken on oath unless the defendant pleads guilty, and she is entitled to be represented by a solicitor. Under the above circumstances, Her Majesty's Government do not consider that legislation is at present necessary.

ELECTORS REGISTRATION (ACCELERATION) BILL.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has prepared, with regard to this Bill, to accept the Amendments down on the Paper, striking out of it all interference with the Parliamentary register?

*MR. RITCHIE: I fear that we can hardly expect to make any progress with the Bill this evening. If we could settlement of the Newfoundland Fisheries Question will be presented to the House; and when it is intended to present the Papers already promised relating to the attempts that were made, with the consent of Her Majesty's Government, by Mr. Bond, representing the Colony of Newfoundland, to effect commercial and fishery arrangements with the United States?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is hoped that both sets of Papers will be ready for presentation in about a week or 10 days.

BRAZIL AND UNITED STATES TREATY.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is prepared to make a statement as to the position of proposed Treaty between the Republics of Brazil and the United States of America; and whether the 1st of April next is the day on which it is proposed the Treaty shall come into force?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Ministers have been directed to telegraph the date at which it will come into force, and to state whether ratification or legislation is necessary, the general effect of the Treaty is that United States imports to Brazil will be placed on the free list which hitherto have amounted to about 18½ per cent. of the entire imports of those articles; and United States imports will pay a reduced rate of 25 per cent. which hitherto have been under 5 per cent. of similar imports. In return, Brazilian sugar, molasses, coffee, and hides will be admitted free into the United States.

FRANCHISE QUALIFICATION FOR SCHOOL BOARD ELECTIONS.

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate what franchise qualification is necessary to enable an elector to record his vote at a School Board election?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The qualification necessary to entitle anyone to vote at a School Board election is that his name should appear on the latest valuation roll as owner or occupier of lands or heritages of not less than £4 annual value. In counties, as the valuation is now made up, under 52 & 53 Vic. c. 50, service franchise occupiers of premises of the prescribed value are entered as inhabitant occupiers; and, in my opinion, they are therefore entitled to vote at those School Board elections for which the county valuation rolls furnish the lists of voters.

Mr. Bryce

SWAZILAND.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the grant in aid of £5,000 for Swaziland, he will state the amount of revenue collected for the period for which the aid of £5,000 is asked; from what sources is the revenue obtained; whether it is derived from the taxes, &c. on white persons imposed by Section 6 of the Proclamation of 18th December, 1889, or whether it includes taxation from other sources; whether he is aware that Article 9 of the Convention provides that such deficiency has to be certified according to rules as to accounting and audit to be approved by the High Commissioner and the President of the Transvaal; whether these rules have been made and approved, and whether the deficiency has been certified accordingly; and whether the Transvaal Government is contributing a like sum of £5,000?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The amount of revenue expected to be collected by the Joint Government during the period in question is estimated at £1,347. This revenue is derived from the sources indicated in the third part of the hon. Member's question, and does not include taxation from other sources. As regards the 4th paragraph, I am, of course, aware of the provisions of the Swaziland Convention; but the rules of Account and Audit have not yet been received from South Africa; nor could the amount of the deficit be certified under them until the year is closed on the 31st instant. The sum of £5,000 is an estimate, and no more of it will be applied to the deficiency of the current year than is requisite to make good a moiety of the certified deficit. The South African Republic has undertaken to supply a moiety of the deficit equal to that supplied by Her Majesty's Government.

LONDON FOGS.

VISCOUNT WOLMER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, considering the serious injury to health, the disturbance of business, and the hardships inflicted on many of the poorest wage earners of the Metropolis by the curtailment of their working hours, caused by the increasing prevalence of fogs, Her Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of appointing a Royal Commission to examine and report how far the evil is one which can be mitigated by legislation?

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will cause inquiry to be made as to the various descriptions of coal used in the Metropolis, and their relative capabilities for converting mist and white fog into the yellow and dark conditions of the atmosphere known as London fog; and also to the possibility of inducing persons residing in London to use coals comparatively smokeless by means of legislation, having the effect of placing taxes or duties on those coals which are most deleterious to the atmosphere?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Her Majesty's Government are, in common with other inhabitants of the Metropolis, extremely sensible of the serious injury, disturbance, and hardships inflicted by the increasing prevalence of fog. They are, however, sceptical as to the value of a Royal Commission for the investigation of the subject. It is notorious that the evil mainly arises from the smoke emitted by ordinary domestic fires, and the problem to be solved is whether it is possible by legislation to prohibit and prevent the production of smoke in this way. A Bill was introduced into the House of Lords in 1887 with this object, and was referred after a Second Reading to a Select Committee, which took evidence which went to show that smoke could be prevented by the use of non-bituminous coal, by the substitution of coke or gas for coal for heating purposes, and possibly by the adoption of an improved grate and great care in lighting and feeding fires with common coal. The Bill was not proceeded with beyond this stage in 1887. Another Bill with the same object has been introduced, and stands for Second Reading in the House of Lords this evening. If it should come down to the House, the noble Lord will have an opportunity of considering whether it is possible by penalty on occupiers of houses and tenements to secure the object he has in view.

VICE CHANCELLORS' COURTS AT OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will consider the advisability of introducing a Bill for the purpose of abolishing the Vice Chancellors' Courts at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and of making members of these Universities and inhabitants of the City of Oxford and Borough of Cambridge exclusively amenable to, and triable by, the ordinary law and the ordinary tribunals of the land?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: A meeting has, I understand, been arranged to take place between the Vice Chancellor of the University of Cambridge and the Mayor, as representing the Town Council of that place; and both parties have agreed to a Conference on the whole question of University authority over townsmen. As regards Oxford, proceedings are governed by Act of Parliament (6 Geo. IV., c. 97, sect. 3), and all cases are heard by the Vice Chancellor in open Court, another county magistrate in almost every case being present. Evidence is taken on oath unless the defendant pleads guilty, and she is entitled to be represented by a solicitor. Under the above circumstances, Her Majesty's Government do not consider that legislation is at present necessary.

ELECTORS REGISTRATION (ACCELERATION) BILL.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is prepared, with regard to this Bill, to accept the Amendments down on the Paper, striking out of it all interference with the Parliamentary register?

*MR. RITCHIE: I fear that we can hardly expect to make any progress with the Bill this evening. If we could make progress with it I should be glad, as the Bill is urgent. After all, it simply deals with a question of machinery. So far, I have put down on the Paper all the Amendments to which the Government are prepared to agree.

*MR. COBB: Does the right hon. Gentleman know that the object we have in view is merely to assist him in making a simple change without making any alteration in the Parliamentary register?

*MR. RITCHIE: I do not know what the hon. Member means by simple change, but I know that the Amendments on the Paper raise a vast number of questions of great importance, dealing not only with registration but also with amendments of the Electoral Laws. They are questions which the Government could not undertake to consider in connection with this Bill.

*MR. COBB: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that all the Amendments that were put down by myself in regard to the Parliamentary register were simply put down because the Bill dealt not only with the County Council register, but with the Parliamentary register?

*MR. RITCHIE: The law as it stands at present says distinctly that the revision of the County Council register, and of the Parliamentary register must take place at the same time; there could be no separation in regard to them.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): Is it not the fact that so far as London is concerned the unanimous feeling is that the Bill should apply to the Parliamentary register? Does the hon. Member for the Rugby Division claim to represent the majority of the electors of the country?

*MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Isle of Thanet): May I ask if I understood my right hon. Friend to express an opinion that Amendments tending to extend the scope of the measure should be discouraged?

*MR. RITCHIE: I must have been misunderstood. This is a Bill simply to alter the machinery of registration, and the Government could not undertake to consider Amendments which would in any way affect the franchise, whether Parliamentary or County Council.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): Will the right hon. Gentleman be prepared to consider mere alterations in the dates mentioned in his Bill?

Mr. Ritchie

*MR. RITCHIE: Such an Amendment would mean a very material alteration in the law, and that is an alteration which I cannot entertain. The dates in the Bill have been settled after most careful inquiry, and I do not think any change in them would be likely to advance the object which hon. Gentlemen opposite have in view.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON LABOUR.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, in connection with the appointment of members of the Royal Commission on Labour, if he will be good enough to take into consideration whether anyone shall be appointed on that Commission who has some special knowledge of questions affecting the agricultural labourers, and who shall be someone in whom those labourers shall have complete confidence?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There is a question on the Paper for to-morrow on this subject, and I will then give an answer.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he proposes to go on with the Army Estimates?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the hon. Gentleman can inform me when the Navy Estimates will be completed, I will give him an answer.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Will the Army Estimates be taken after Navy Estimates?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes.

BELFAST PRISON.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what has been the result of the conference between the Irish Government and the Irish Prisons Board, concerning the unanimous protest of the Corporation of Belfast against the projected alterations of Her Majesty's Prison at Belfast, upon the several grounds that they would create an eyesore, destroy the frontage line, and deteriorate the value of property in the district?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am not able to answer the question, and must ask the hon. Member to defer it.

MR. SEXTON: I will defer it until Thursday.

TELEGRAPH STATION AT KNOCK.

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has seen the Report of Sir Andrew Reed, the Inspector General of Royal Irish Constabulary, strongly recommending the establishment of a telegraph station at Knock, County Down, in order to afford greater protection to the person and property of those living in that locality; is he aware that outrages perpetrated at this place were frequently not communicated to the police till the following day, thus affording facilities for the escape of criminals, owing to the want of telegraphic communication; and would he take early steps to remedy a condition of things so seriously affecting the interests of a community which is rapidly growing, and which embraces a population at present of close upon 4,000 persons?

*MR. RAIKES: The Report of Sir Andrew Reed, which I understand is addressed to the Irish Government, has not been referred to me; and I have no knowledge of the circumstances attending the outrages mentioned by the hon. Member. In May of last year I made an offer to establish a telegraph office at Knock under a guarantee of £22 a year. This does not appear to me to be a sum which it should be difficult to raise if any importance is attached by the residents to such communication.

THE FOUR COURTS, DUBLIN.

MR. DE COBAIN: I had intended to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that complaints have been made by suitors and the public generally in regard to the delay on the part of the officials of the different Courts connected with the Four Courts, Dublin, in making up the orders and decrees given by the different Judges, almost a month, and sometimes even two months, elapsing in getting out the order; whether the different Law Societies have repeatedly complained of such delays; and whether, in view of the fact that the hours of attendance at the Four Courts are from 11.30 to 3.30, whereas in London the Judges sit from 10.30 to 4.30, some steps will be taken at an early date to ensure the greater despatch of business at these Courts, in the interest of the professional gentlemen practising there and of the public at large? At the request of my right hon. Friend I beg to postpone the question.

BELFAST STREET TRAMWAYS.

MR. DE COBAIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Belfast Street Tramway Company had, on the construction of their lines through the City of Belfast, infringed the provisions of the Act of Parliament which provides for a space of nine feet six inches being left at either side of the tramway lines, and that, notwithstanding this infringement proved a serious inconvenience to vehicular and other traffic at Donegall Street and other important thoroughfares, the Belfast Corporation, which had charge of the streets, took no steps to enforce compliance by this company with the provisions of the Act; and would he call upon the Local Authority to have the law in this particular observed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The matter referred to is not one under the control of the Executive Government. I understand, however, that the Belfast Tramway Acts confer on the Corporation certain discretionary powers, and that in any case where there has been a departure from the nine feet six inches space mentioned, the Corporation have sanctioned it.

IRISH RELIEF WORKS.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the relief works, to which he recently referred as instituted for the benefit of the inhabitants of the parish of Ardara, County Donegal, are seven miles distant from that parish; whether he is aware that an engineer named Gahan, who is employed in the Government relief works at Garrick, visited the parish of Ardara about a fortnight ago with a view to the making of the roads by the Government in the neighbourhood for the purpose of relief, but that hitherto no step in this direction has been taken; and whether, having regard to the fact that the fulfilment of his promise made at Ardara, that the Government would cut a road through the hill of Glengesh, would give employment to between 200 and 300 people in the neighbourhood of Ardara, and to the destitute condition of the people of this neighbourhood, any measures are to be taken for their immediate sustenance and relief?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A relief road has already been ordered to be opened in the Electoral Divisions of Inishkeel and Glengesh. It is expected that it will be commenced to-day.

BELFAST POLICE STATION.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the entire site for the new Central Police Station at Belfast has now been taken over, and when the work of building will begin?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the site for the new Central Police Station at Belfast consists of two plots or divisions, on one of which the barrack is to be built, and on the other the stables and offices in connection with them. The division required for the barrack has been taken over, and the necessary steps taken for proceeding with the erection of the building, which, it is expected, will be commenced in a few days. The second division of the site, that required for the stables, has not yet been taken possession of, but arrangements have been made for doing so to admit of that building being proceeded with in sufficient time to secure its being completed at the same time as the barrack.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Sir JOHN MOWBRAY reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had added Sir Charles Pearson to the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufacture.

Ordered, That the Report do lie upon the Table.

PARISHES (UNITED, DIVIDED, &c.)

Address for—

"Return of Parishes divided and Districts assigned to Churches by the Ecclesiastical
Mr. Mac Neill

Commissioners for England under the provisions of the Church Building Acts and 'The Parish of Manchester Division Act, 1850'; of all Districts and new Parishes constituted by the same Commissioners under the New Parishes Acts; and of all Districts or Parishes assigned or constituted by the same Commissioners under 'The St. Leonards and St. Mary Magdalen Church Districts Act, 1868,' or any other local Act, from the 31st day of October 1880 to the 31st day of October 1890 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 413, of Session 1881)."—(Mr. Talbot.)

RAILWAY SERVANTS (HOURS OF LABOUR) COMMITTEE.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of Twenty-six Members.

Ordered, That Sir Albert Rollit and Mr. Pickard be added to the Committee.
—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

SUPPLY.

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.—(Mr. Jackson.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SEA COMMERCE, BRITISH COLONIES AND DEPENDENCIES.

* (4.20.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I rise for the purpose of calling attention to the growth of Colonial Sea Commerce and increase of British Naval responsibilities caused thereby; and to move—

"That the growth of the Sea Commerce of the British Colonies and Dependencies and of the war fleets of Foreign Powers render it desirable that the annual Navy Estimates presented to this House should in future be accompanied by a Return showing the total number of war ships of each class in commission, in reserve, and building; the annual aggregate revenue; the annual Naval expenditure; the aggregate tonnage of the mercantile marine; and the approximate annual aggregate value of the Sea-borne Commerce of the British Empire and of each Foreign Power possessing war ships: and a further Return showing the annual Naval expenditure on Sea-going Forces, and the approximate annual value, exclusive of interchange with the United Kingdom, of the Sea-borne Commerce of British North America, British South Africa, British Australasia, and British India respectively."

We are asked, Sir, that you shall leave the Chair, in order to discuss the Navy Estimates for the coming year—Estimates which are intended to provide for the security of the sea interests of the whole of the Empire up to the end of March, 1892. What may happen before March, 1892, it is impossible to predict; but if war should by any chance break out before that date, we must stand or fall by the provision made by the Estimates now before the House, and the responsibility can only rest with the House of Commons. I wish, in the first place, to invite the attention of the House to the broad fact that if ever and whenever we are involved in war, and our naval sufficiency is put to the test, we shall find that our condition has entirely changed from what it was when we last fought upon the sea for our maritime supremacy. Then the population in these Islands was not dependent for food on the sea. Now that population is absolutely and entirely so dependent. Then British commerce, and, therefore, the area of danger of the commerce, was practically confined to European waters and the North Atlantic. Our trade with India was practically small, and its protection was confided to the care of the armed fleet belonging to the East India Company. The area of our maritime commerce now includes every ocean and every sea in the world, and our naval operations must include action not only in European waters and the North Western Atlantic, but over every sea and ocean. What we had to protect then was wholly and solely the commerce of the United Kingdom; but nowadays the commerce of the United Kingdom only forms a portion of British commerce which we have to protect. When the last gun was fired at Waterloo we had a Navy Estimate of £22,000,000, and we had only then the germs of a great Empire. The Navy Estimate now amounts to £14,000,000, and we have a gigantic oceanic Empire to protect. I will not trace the gradual growth of our Empire since that date, but I will mention one or two facts that have occurred during the reign of Her Majesty. The Revenue of the United Kingdom was £56,000,000 in 1837, and the annual sea commerce amounted to £155,000,000. The Revenue of the United Kingdom has now reached

£89,000,000, and the annual sea commerce £744,000,000. The Revenue of our colonies and dependencies in 1837 was £23,000,000, it is now £105,000,000; and the sea commerce of our colonies and dependencies now amounts to £460,000,000. Consequently, although the Revenue of the United Kingdom has only increased by one and a half times, the Revenue of the outlying Empire has increased five-fold; and while the sea trade of the Mother Country which the Navy has to protect has in the same period increased only five times, the sea trade of the outlying Empire, which the Navy has also to protect, has increased 20 times. It is quite apparent from these figures that we are within a measurable distance of the time when the sea trade and commerce of the outlying Empire will equal, if not surpass, that of the United Kingdom. It is interesting to compare the commerce of the Federal States of America when attacked by the Alabama with the present commerce of our Empire beyond the sea. The Federal States had then a sea trade of about £153,000,000. The aggregate trade of our three great groups of self-governing colonies—British North America, British South Africa, and British Australia, now amounts to £198,000,000. Those colonies have therefore at this moment a sea trade far greater than the total sea trade of the Federal States of America at the outbreak of the Civil War, and at the time of the operations of the Alabama. If we add the trade of our dependencies, I find that it amounts to £260,000,000, not far short of double the sea trade of the Federal States at the time of the commencement of the operations of the Alabama—so that the sea trade of our colonies proper exceeds the sea trade attacked by the Alabama by about £45,000,000, while that of our dependencies exceeds it by about £110,000,000. I may add that the sea commerce of Australia is larger at this moment than that of the Federal States at that time. The commerce of the outlying Empire divides itself properly into two parts. There is the interchange with the United Kingdom and the sea trade, which is carried on entirely independent of the United Kingdom; and what I desire to draw the settlement of the Newfoundland Fisheries Question will be presented to the House; and when it is intended to present the Papers already promised relating to the attempts that were made, with the consent of Her Majesty's Government, by Mr. Bond, representing the Colony of Newfoundland, to effect commercial and fishery arrangements with the United States?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is hoped that both sets of Papers will be ready for presentation in about a week or 10 days.

BRAZIL AND UNITED STATES TREATY.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is prepared to make a statement as to the position of proposed Treaty between the Republics of Brazil and the United States of America; and whether the 1st of April next is the day on which it is proposed the Treaty shall come into force?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Ministers have been directed to telegraph the date at which it will come into force, and to state whether ratification or legislation is necessary, the general effect of the Treaty is that United States imports to Brazil will be placed on the free list which hitherto have amounted to about 18½ per cent. of the entire imports of those articles; and United States imports will pay a reduced rate of 25 per cent. which hitherto have been under 5 per cent. of similar imports. In return, Brazilian sugar, molasses, coffee, and hides will be admitted free into the United States.

FRANCHISE QUALIFICATION FOR SCHOOL BOARD ELECTIONS.

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate what franchise qualification is necessary to enable an elector to record his vote at a School Board election?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The qualification necessary to entitle anyone to vote at a School Board election is that his name should appear on the latest valuation roll as owner or occupier of lands or heritages of not less than £4 annual value. In counties, as the valuation is now made up, under 52 & 53 Vic. c. 50, service franchise occupiers of premises of the prescribed value are entered as inhabitant occupiers; and, in my opinion, they are therefore entitled to vote at those School Board elections for which the county valuation rolls furnish the lists of voters.

SWAZILAND.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the grant in aid of £5,000 for Swaziland, he will state the amount of revenue collected for the period for which the aid of £5,000 is asked; from what sources is the revenue obtained; whether it is derived from the taxes, &c. on white persons imposed by Section 6 of the Proclamation of 18th December, 1889, or whether it includes taxation from other sources; whether he is aware that Article 9 of the Convention provides that such deficiency has to be certified according to rules as to accounting and audit to be approved by the High Commissioner and the President of the Transvaal; whether these rules have been made and approved, and whether the deficiency has been certified accordingly; and whether the Transvaal Government is contributing a like sum of £5,000?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The amount of revenue expected to be collected by the Joint Government during the period in question is estimated at £1,347. This revenue is derived from the sources indicated in the third part of the hon. Member's question, and does not include taxation from other sources. As regards the 4th paragraph, I am, of course, aware of the provisions of the Swaziland Convention; but the rules of Account and Audit have not yet been received from South Africa; nor could the amount of the deficit be certified under them until the year is closed on the 31st instant. The sum of £5,000 is an estimate, and no more of it will be applied to the deficiency of the current year than is requisite to make good a moiety of the certified deficit. The South African Republic has undertaken to supply a moiety of the deficit equal to that supplied by Her Majesty's Government.

LONDON FOGS.

VISCOUNT WOLMER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, considering the serious injury to health, the disturbance of business, and the hardships inflicted on many of the poorest wage earners of the Metropolis by the curtailment of their working hours, caused by the increasing prevalence of fogs, Her Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of appointing a Royal Commission to examine and report how far the evil is one which can be mitigated by legislation?

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will cause inquiry to be made as to the various descriptions of coal used in the Metropolis, and their relative capabilities for converting mist and white fog into the yellow and dark conditions of the atmosphere known as London fog; and also to the possibility of inducing persons residing in London to use coals comparatively smokeless by means of legislation, having the effect of placing taxes or duties on those coals which are most deleterious to the atmosphere?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Her Majesty's Government are, in common with other inhabitants of the Metropolis, extremely sensible of the serious injury, disturbance, and hardships inflicted by the increasing prevalence of fog. They are, however, sceptical as to the value of a Royal Commission for the investigation of the subject. It is notorious that the evil mainly arises from the smoke emitted by ordinary domestic fires, and the problem to be solved is whether it is possible by legislation to prohibit and prevent the production of smoke in this way. A Bill was introduced into the House of Lords in 1887 with this object, and was referred after a Second Reading to a Select Committee, which took evidence which went to show that smoke could be prevented by the use of non-bituminous coal, by the substitution of coke or gas for coal for heating purposes, and possibly by the adoption of an improved grate and great care in lighting and feeding fires with common coal. The Bill was not proceeded with beyond this stage in 1887. Another Bill with the same object has been introduced, and stands for Second Reading in the House of Lords this evening. If it should come down to the House, the noble Lord will have an opportunity of considering whether it is possible by penalty on occupiers of houses and tenements to secure the object he has in view.

VICE CHANCELLORS' COURTS AT OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will consider the advisability of introducing a Bill for the purpose of abolishing the Vice Chancellors' Courts at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and of making members of these Universities and inhabitants of the City of Oxford and Borough of Cambridge exclusively amenable to, and triable by, the ordinary law and the ordinary tribunals of the land?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: A meeting has, I understand, been arranged to take place between the Vice Chancellor of the University of Cambridge and the Mayor, as representing the Town Council of that place; and both parties have agreed to a Conference on the whole question of University authority over townsmen. As regards Oxford, proceedings are governed by Act of Parliament (6 Geo. IV., c. 97, sect. 3), and all cases are heard by the Vice Chancellor in open Court, another county magistrate in almost every case being present. Evidence is taken on oath unless the defendant pleads guilty, and she is entitled to be represented by a solicitor. Under the above circumstances, Her Majesty's Government do not consider that legislation is at present necessary.

ELECTORS REGISTRATION (ACCELERATION) BILL.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has prepared, with regard to this Bill, to accept the Amendments down on the Paper, striking out of it all interference with the Parliamentary register?

*MR. RITCHIE: I fear that we can hardly expect to make any progress with the Bill this evening. If we could make progress with it I should be glad, as the Bill is urgent. After all, it simply deals with a question of machinery. So far, I have put down on the Paper all the Amendments to which the Government are prepared to agree.

*MR. COBB: Does the right hon. Gentleman know that the object we have in view is merely to assist him in making a simple change without making any alteration in the Parliamentary register?

*MR. RITCHIE: I do not know what the hon. Member means by simple change, but I know that the Amendments on the Paper raise a vast number of questions of great importance, dealing not only with registration but also with amendments of the Electoral Laws. They are questions which the Government could not undertake to consider in connection with this Bill.

*MR. COBB: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that all the Amendments that were put down by myself in regard to the Parliamentary register were simply put down because the Bill dealt not only with the County Council register, but with the Parliamentary register?

*MR. RITCHIE: The law as it stands at present says distinctly that the revision of the County Council register, and of the Parliamentary register must take place at the same time; there could be no separation in regard to them.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): Is it not the fact that so far as London is concerned the unanimous feeling is that the Bill should apply to the Parliamentary register? Does the hon. Member for the Rugby Division claim to represent the majority of the electors of the country?

*MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Isle of Thanet): May I ask if I understand my right hon. Friend to express an opinion that Amendments tending to extend the scope of the measure should be discouraged?

*MR. RITCHIE: I must have been misunderstood. This is a Bill simply to alter the machinery of registration, and the Government could not undertake to consider Amendments which would in any way affect the franchise, whether Parliamentary or County Council.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): Will the right hon. Gentleman be prepared to consider mere alterations in the dates mentioned in his Bill?

Mr. Ritchie

*MR. RITCHIE: Such an Amendment would mean a very material alteration in the law, and that is an alteration which I cannot entertain. The dates in the Bill have been settled after most careful inquiry, and I do not think any change in them would be likely to advance the object which hon. Gentlemen opposite have in view.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON LABOUR.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, in connection with the appointment of members of the Royal Commission on Labour, if he will be good enough to take into consideration whether anyone shall be appointed on that Commission who has some special knowledge of questions affecting the agricultural labourers, and who shall be someone in whom those labourers shall have complete confidence?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There is a question on the Paper for to-morrow on this subject, and I will then give an answer.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he proposes to go on with the Army Estimates?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the hon. Gentleman can inform me when the Navy Estimates will be completed, I will give him an answer.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Will the Army Estimates be taken after Navy Estimates?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes.

BELFAST PRISON.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what has been the result of the conference between the Irish Government and the Irish Prisons Board, concerning the unanimous protest of the Corporation of Belfast against the projected alterations of Her Majesty's Prison at Belfast, upon the several grounds that they would create an eyesore, destroy the frontage line, and deteriorate the value of property in the district?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am not able to answer the question, and must ask the hon. Member to defer it.

MR. SEXTON: I will defer it until Thursday.

TELEGRAPH STATION AT KNOCK.

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has seen the Report of Sir Andrew Reed, the Inspector General of Royal Irish Constabulary, strongly recommending the establishment of a telegraph station at Knock, County Down, in order to afford greater protection to the person and property of those living in that locality; is he aware that outrages perpetrated at this place were frequently not communicated to the police till the following day, thus affording facilities for the escape of criminals, owing to the want of telegraphic communication; and would he take early steps to remedy a condition of things so seriously affecting the interests of a community which is rapidly growing, and which embraces a population at present of close upon 4,000 persons?

*MR. RAIKES: The Report of Sir Andrew Reed, which I understand is addressed to the Irish Government, has not been referred to me; and I have no knowledge of the circumstances attending the outrages mentioned by the hon. Member. In May of last year I made an offer to establish a telegraph office at Knock under a guarantee of £22 a year. This does not appear to me to be a sum which it should be difficult to raise if any importance is attached by the residents to such communication.

THE FOUR COURTS, DUBLIN.

MR. DE COBAIN: I had intended to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that complaints have been made by suitors and the public generally in regard to the delay on the part of the officials of the different Courts connected with the Four Courts, Dublin, in making up the orders and decrees given by the different Judges, almost a month, and sometimes even two months, elapsing in getting out the order; whether the different Law Societies have repeatedly complained of such delays; and whether, in view of the fact that the hours of attendance at the Four Courts are from 11.30 to 3.30, whereas in London the Judges sit from 10.30 to 4.30, some steps will be taken at an early date to ensure the greater despatch of business at these Courts, in the interest of the professional gentlemen practising there and of the public at large? At the request of my right hon. Friend I beg to postpone the question.

BELFAST STREET TRAMWAYS.

MR. DE COBAIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Belfast Street Tramway Company had, on the construction of their lines through the City of Belfast, infringed the provisions of the Act of Parliament which provides for a space of nine feet six inches being left at either side of the tramway lines, and that, notwithstanding this infringement proved a serious inconvenience to vehicular and other traffic at Donegall Street and other important thoroughfares, the Belfast Corporation, which had charge of the streets, took no steps to enforce compliance by this company with the provisions of the Act; and would he call upon the Local Authority to have the law in this particular observed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The matter referred to is not one under the control of the Executive Government. I understand, however, that the Belfast Tramway Acts confer on the Corporation certain discretionary powers, and that in any case where there has been a departure from the nine feet six inches space mentioned, the Corporation have sanctioned it.

IRISH RELIEF WORKS.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the relief works, to which he recently referred as instituted for the benefit of the inhabitants of the parish of Ardara, County Donegal, are seven miles distant from that parish; whether he is aware that an engineer named Gahan, who is employed in the Government relief works at Garrick, visited the parish of Ardara about a fortnight ago with a view to the making of the roads by the Government in the neighbourhood for the purpose of relief, but that hitherto no step in this direction has been taken; and whether, having regard to the fact that the fulfilment of his promise made at Ardara, that the Government would cut a road through the hill of Glengesh, would give employment to between 200 and 300 people in the neighbourhood of Ardara, and to the destitute condition of the people of this neighbourhood, any measures are to be taken for their immediate sustenance and relief?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A relief road has already been ordered to be opened in the Electoral Divisions of Inishkeel and Glengesh. It is expected that it will be commenced to-day.

BELFAST POLICE STATION.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the entire site for the new Central Police Station at Belfast has now been taken over, and when the work of building will begin?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the site for the new Central Police Station at Belfast consists of two plots or divisions, on one of which the barrack is to be built, and on the other the stables and offices in connection with them. The division required for the barrack has been taken over, and the necessary steps taken for proceeding with the erection of the building, which, it is expected, will be commenced in a few days. The second division of the site, that required for the stables, has not yet been taken possession of, but arrangements have been made for doing so to admit of that building being proceeded with in sufficient time to secure its being completed at the same time as the barrack.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had added Sir Charles Pearson to the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufacture.

Ordered, That the Report do lie upon the Table.

PARISHES (UNITED, DIVIDED, &c.)

Address for—

“Return of Parishes divided and Districts assigned to Churches by the Ecclesiastical
Mr. Mac Neill

Commissioners for England under the provisions of the Church Building Acts and ‘The Parish of Manchester Division Act, 1850;’ of all Districts and new Parishes constituted by the same Commissioners under the New Parishes Acts; and of all Districts or Parishes assigned or constituted by the same Commissioners under ‘The St. Leonards and St. Mary Magdalen Church Districts Act, 1868,’ or any other local Act, from the 31st day of October 1880 to the 31st day of October 1890 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 413, of Session 1881).”—(Mr. Talbot.)

RAILWAY SERVANTS (HOURS OF LABOUR) COMMITTEE.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of Twenty-six Members.

Ordered, That Sir Albert Rollit and Mr. Pickard be added to the Committee.
—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

SUPPLY.

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.—(Mr. Jackson.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

SEA COMMERCE, BRITISH COLONIES AND DEPENDENCIES.

*(4.20.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I rise for the purpose of calling attention to the growth of Colonial Sea Commerce and increase of British Naval responsibilities caused thereby; and to move—

“That the growth of the Sea Commerce of the British Colonies and Dependencies and of the war fleets of Foreign Powers render it desirable that the annual Navy Estimates presented to this House should in future be accompanied by a Return showing the total number of war ships of each class in commission, in reserve, and building; the annual aggregate revenue; the annual Naval expenditure; the aggregate tonnage of the mercantile marine; and the approximate annual aggregate value of the Sea-borne Commerce of the British Empire and of each Foreign Power possessing war ships; and a further Return showing the annual Naval expenditure on Sea-going Forces, and the approximate annual value, exclusive of interchange with the United Kingdom, of the Sea-borne Commerce of British North America, British South Africa, British Australasia, and British India respectively.”

We are asked, Sir, that you shall leave

the Chair, in order to discuss the Navy Estimates for the coming year—Estimates which are intended to provide for the security of the sea interests of the whole of the Empire up to the end of March, 1892. What may happen before March, 1892, it is impossible to predict; but if war should by any chance break out before that date, we must stand or fall by the provision made by the Estimates now before the House, and the responsibility can only rest with the House of Commons. I wish, in the first place, to invite the attention of the House to the broad fact that if ever and whenever we are involved in war, and our naval sufficiency is put to the test, we shall find that our condition has entirely changed from what it was when we last fought upon the sea for our maritime supremacy. Then the population in these Islands was not dependent for food on the sea. Now that population is absolutely and entirely so dependent. Then British commerce, and, therefore, the area of danger of the commerce, was practically confined to European waters and the North Atlantic. Our trade with India was practically small, and its protection was confided to the care of the armed fleet belonging to the East India Company. The area of our maritime commerce now includes every ocean and every sea in the world, and our naval operations must include action not only in European waters and the North Western Atlantic, but over every sea and ocean. What we had to protect then was wholly and solely the commerce of the United Kingdom; but nowadays the commerce of the United Kingdom only forms a portion of British commerce which we have to protect. When the last gun was fired at Waterloo we had a Navy Estimate of £22,000,000, and we had only then the germs of a great Empire. The Navy Estimate now amounts to £14,000,000, and we have a gigantic oceanic Empire to protect. I will not trace the gradual growth of our Empire since that date, but I will mention one or two facts that have occurred during the reign of Her Majesty. The Revenue of the United Kingdom was £56,000,000 in 1837, and the annual sea commerce amounted to £155,000,000. The Revenue of the United Kingdom has now reached

£89,000,000, and the annual sea commerce £744,000,000. The Revenue of our colonies and dependencies in 1837 was £23,000,000, it is now £105,000,000; and the sea commerce of our colonies and dependencies now amounts to £460,000,000. Consequently, although the Revenue of the United Kingdom has only increased by one and a half times, the Revenue of the outlying Empire has increased five-fold; and while the sea trade of the Mother Country which the Navy has to protect has in the same period increased only five times, the sea trade of the outlying Empire, which the Navy has also to protect, has increased 20 times. It is quite apparent from these figures that we are within a measurable distance of the time when the sea trade and commerce of the outlying Empire will equal, if not surpass, that of the United Kingdom. It is interesting to compare the commerce of the Federal States of America when attacked by the Alabama with the present commerce of our Empire beyond the sea. The Federal States had then a sea trade of about £153,000,000. The aggregate trade of our three great groups of self-governing colonies—British North America, British South Africa, and British Australia, now amounts to £198,000,000. Those colonies have therefore at this moment a sea trade far greater than the total sea trade of the Federal States of America at the outbreak of the Civil War, and at the time of the operations of the Alabama. If we add the trade of our dependencies, I find that it amounts to £260,000,000, not far short of double the sea trade of the Federal States at the time of the commencement of the operations of the Alabama—so that the sea trade of our colonies proper exceeds the sea trade attacked by the Alabama by about £45,000,000, while that of our dependencies exceeds it by about £110,000,000. I may add that the sea commerce of Australia is larger at this moment than that of the Federal States at that time. The commerce of the outlying Empire divides itself properly into two parts. There is the interchange with the United Kingdom and the sea trade, which is carried on entirely independent of the United Kingdom; and what I desire to draw the attention of the House to is the growth of that independent sea commerce, for the protection of which this House has to provide, and which neither goes from or comes to these islands. The value of the imports and exports of our outlying Empire is about £460,000,000, and of this amount only £187,000,000 is interchanged with the United Kingdom; therefore, the independent trade of the outlying Empire amounts to about £273,000,000. It amounts to 11 times the amount of the independent trade of the outlying Empire in 1837, and is one and three-quarters more than the total trade of the United Kingdom at the time of the commencement of Her Majesty's reign. That shows the increase of the naval responsibility incurred, not by the United Kingdom only, but by the communities which compose our colonies and dependencies beyond the seas. Let me take that independent trade, and compare it with the sea-borne trade of great Foreign Powers which possess large war Navies. I find that it is about four times as much as the sea-borne trade of all Russia; about equal to that of Germany; about three-fourths that of France; two and a half times that of Italy, and nearly half that of the United States. Every year the sea commerce of the outlying Empire, independent of the interchange with the United Kingdom, is increasing. It is not only overtaking the sea-borne commerce of the Mother Country, but in a short time it may eclipse all the sea-borne commerce of the great European countries. The net expenditure to be incurred by the United Kingdom on the Navy Estimates is £14,215,100, and the net naval expenditure by the outlying Empire, with its enormous trade, is only £381,546. It is interesting to consider for a moment the way in which this £381,546 is made up. India contributes for troopships and harbours £170,576, but for the sea-going force which has to protect her trade, independent and otherwise, she contributes only £84,200. Therefore, the total contributed by India for the defence of a trade greater than that of many first-class European Powers is £254,776. For the first time Australia appears as chief contributor to the expenses of the Fleet. It appears by the Estimates that Australia contributes £126,000; Jamaica £520 for a fresh water supply to the town of Port Royal; and Ascension £250 for pier dues. While last year Ceylon contributed £4,500 to the naval expenses, it disappears this year from the Estimates. The House will observe that out of every £1 spent for the naval protection of the Empire in 1891-92 the outlying Empire will spend about 6½d., and the United Kingdom spend the balance, 19s. 5½d. It is to be remembered that the larger part of the Revenue of the Empire is now raised outside these Islands, and that it is an increasing Revenue, while the Revenue of these Islands is almost stagnant. Looking at the outlying Empire by itself, and comparing it with the Revenues of the great first-class maritime Powers maintaining fleets for the protection of a smaller commerce, I find that the total Revenue of the outlying Empire, being about £105,000,000, is about 1½ times more than that of Russia, 2½ times that of Germany, more than three-quarters that of France, about 1½ times that of Italy, and 1½ times that of the United States. An interesting Return has been compiled by a distinguished member of the Foreign Office and is re-published in Whitaker this year, giving the average Annual Revenue and the average Naval and Military Expenditure of the Great Powers from 1882 to 1887. Taking on the one hand the Revenue and the independent sea commerce of the outlying Empire separately, and basing a comparison on those Returns, the following are the interesting results: If we take the percentage of Naval Expenditure to Revenue, for example, I find that while the Naval Expenditure of Russia is 5 per cent. of her total Revenue, of Germany 4 per cent., France 8 per cent., Italy 4 per cent., and the United States 3 per cent., the Naval Expenditure of the outlying Empire compared with Revenue is practically nil. If we take the percentage of Naval Expenditure of these nations and compare it with the Naval Expenditure of the outlying Empire in the ratio of Naval Expenditure to seaborne commerce it comes to this:—While the Naval Expenditure of Russia on every £1 value of her seaborne commerce is 1s. 9d., Germany 1d., and France 5d., and so on, that of the outlying Empire cannot be expressed in the appreciable fraction of a farthing. If we take the Naval Expenditure in proportion to the national shipping entered and cleared at national ports we find that Russia spends £5 10s. per ton, France £1 per ton, and the United States about 10s.; while our outlying Empire does not spend on protection the appreciable portion of a farthing on her tonnage. If we take the shipping owned it will be found that Russia is spending on her Fleet £11 3s. per ton of shipping owned; France, £10 13s.; and the outlying Empire 4s. 5d. I hope I have said enough to justify the importance of having Returns dealing with the matters specified in my Motion accompanying the Naval Estimates, so that the House may be placed in a proper position to discuss them from the only point of view from which they can be discussed—that is to say, the relation of their adequacy to the work to be done by the Fleet. It now only remains for me to deal with that part of the Motion which refers to ships in commission, in reserve, and building under the British and all other flags of Maritime Powers. The Navy, as we all know, is for the protection of maritime interests, and these interests, naturally, group themselves under two heads—the defence of seaboard and the defence of sea commerce. The relative national importance of the one or the other depends entirely upon several circumstances. For example, let us suppose Australia an independent State, and let us compare her with Russia, and see in what relation of importance a seaboard defence and sea commerce defence would apply to Australia and apply to Russia. Russia has an extensive seaboard, and so has Australia; but the sea commerce of Russia is not much more than half that of Australia. The sea commerce of Russia represents about 10s. a head for every Russian, while the sea commerce of Australia represents about £30 a head for every Australian—so that every Australian has 60 times the interest in the sea that the Russian has. Therefore, for purposes of pure defence, Russia could confine her naval preparations to harbour defence. But an independent Australia could do no such thing. An independent Australia, without a sea-going fleet, could be shut up in a few weeks like a telescope by the Fleet of China, Chili, or Japan, to say nothing of any European Fleet. The naval policy of a nation, therefore, can be sufficiently surmised from the number and class of her ships of war taken in relation to her real maritime necessities, and the necessities of her population as they appear by their enforced reliance upon the sea. If a nation with a small sea commerce develops a fleet of sea keeping cruisers it is fair to assume, indeed, I think it must be assumed, that such development indicates a policy of attack rather than a policy of defence. And thus to measure our naval necessities, we are absolutely bound to consider carefully the naval programmes and the fleets of foreign nations—not in an abstract way, but in relation to their maritime interests, and the distribution of the commerce and the sea property they have to protect. Therefore, I think it is exceedingly important that the information for which I ask in my Motion should be attached to and accompany the Annual Navy Estimate, so that the House and the country responsible for the security of this gigantic Empire, and the safety of this gigantic sea business, will be able to judge whether the preparations are adequate, and whether the Government are taking the steps necessary to secure these interests. Another reason why it is important we should have information of the number of war ships in commission, in reserve, and building at home, and the number belonging to foreign nations is the modern practice—a very good one so far as this House is concerned—of having programmes of shipbuilding spread over a series of years. This practice commenced with what is known as the Northbrook programme which brought about an increase in the fleet that was to be completed by a specified time. Whilst that programme was being carried out there was a development of British trade and a development of foreign navies, ships were built conceivably for purposes of attack; and taking our present programme which is to expire in 1894, seeing that foreign nations know what it is and are aware that we restrict ourselves to it until 1894—and seeing that they are now increasing their fleets, especially in the direction of sea-keeping cruisers—I cannot see the justification of our present voluntarily restricted naval position. But I will reserve any remarks

Sir J. Colomb

I may have to make on that subject to a future occasion. I trust the House will forgive me for having intervened, and having put, in this short way, certain broad facts before it to prove my contention—that certain specific information should be placed before us prior to our going into Committee on Navy Estimates. I think that information should accompany the Estimates, so that on broad grounds we may be able to see whether we are doing our duty—as we did it in the past, and whether we are facing our responsibilities and maintaining a force adequate to the naval wants of our Empire. It is also desirable that the House should be in a position to watch these developments, and that the communities under our flag should have it brought home to them year by year that they are not sharing the burdens with us—that they are piling up responsibilities on the United Kingdom, and that while they have increasing resources and revenue they are not fairly contributing or sufficiently helping the Old Country. It is a trite saying that the Navy is the first and chief line of defence of the Kingdom. Let us remember that we differ from all other States of the world in the fact that the internal communications of our Empire are sea communications, and that the sea being the commonage of the world, we cannot exist on sufferance, and must be prepared to maintain our water communications in the face of the world. Let us remember that it is the interest of every part of the Empire to assist in keeping the waterways free, and that it can only be done by a complete arrangement with all parts of the Empire and an adequate force established, not by abstract comparison with this or that Power, but with a due regard to all the facts and circumstances of the position as defined by geography and necessity. In the past we have gone wrong through making small abstract comparisons instead of calmly reviewing and working out the whole great problem, and deciding upon a comprehensive estimate of the amount and distribution of commerce to be protected, which is the only business-like way of arriving at the force necessary to prevent a collapse, not merely of the United Kingdom but of the whole Empire. I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name.

Sir J. Colomb

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "The growth of the sea commerce of the British Colonies and Dependencies and of the war fleets of Foreign Powers render it desirable that the annual Navy Estimates presented to this House should in future be accompanied by a Return showing the total number of war ships of each class in commission, in reserve, and building; the annual aggregate revenue; the annual naval expenditure; the aggregate tonnage of the mercantile marine; and the approximate annual aggregate value of the seaborne commerce of the British Empire and of each Foreign Power possessing war ships, and a further Return showing the annual naval expenditure on sea-going Forces, and the approximate annual value, exclusive of interchange with the United Kingdom, of the seaborne commerce of British North America, British South Africa, British Australasia, and British India respectively,"—(Sir John Colomb.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(4.53.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): We have heard the hon. and gallant Member state with ability and research most interesting facts with reference to the magnitude of the commerce of Great Britain. Well, that is a subject which we all contemplate with satisfaction and with pride, but the hon. and gallant Member's speech, from its tone, I consider one of the notes of alarm which hon. and gallant Gentlemen are constantly in the habit of sounding, and which are intended to induce people of this country to believe that there is some great danger threatening our commerce, and that the already enormous expenditure of the country upon naval and military defence is inadequate. I should think that that is not a view which is very satisfactory to Her Majesty's Government, because within the last two years Her Majesty's Government have in two measures, one called the Imperial Defence Act, and the other called the Naval Defence Act, provided for an expenditure of £24,000,000, and in that they have not merely made a present provision, but have really mortgaged the resources of the future. On that policy I will say nothing now as there will be other opportunities more appropriate for discussing it; but what was the object of the speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman? He has pointed out that there is this gigantic commerce in which England and her dependencies are interested. We all admit the magnitude of that commerce. It is to be counted by hundreds of millions—but the whole object of the hon. and gallant Member's speech and Motion was to represent to the country and the Government that the growth of that commerce indicated that the provisions which have been made for its defence are altogether inadequate, and that they ought to be increased. I confess that having regard to the knowledge and ability of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, I was extremely surprised that he did not refer to the position of that commerce in the event of a war. From the character of the attendance in the House this afternoon, there does not seem to be very much alarm in Parliament, and I hope there is not in the country. I do not see here a great collection of naval officers or, what is still more important, of the great merchants of England, who are trembling on account of the danger which threatens their commerce. The hon. and gallant Member has dealt not merely with the commerce of England but also with that of India and the colonies, and his great object seemed to be that India and the colonies should contribute much more largely than they do now to the defence of their commerce. If the hon. Member had been addressing the representatives of the various provinces of Australia, who are now gathered together for the purpose of uniting Australia, and had suggested a great scheme of taxation for raising an Australian Navy, I could have better seen the pertinence of his speech—or if he had been addressing the Government of India and saying, "You must contribute your millions towards the protection of this trade," that would have been intelligible, but he has not attempted to face the question of what will be the position of the commerce of England, or of any other country in a state of war. It is upon that point that I principally wish to make a remark. The hon. Member seems to imagine that in the event of war the commerce of this country would be at once threatened by a belligerent Power, and that we should then lose our exports and imports. That is a fair issue to take. I have seen alarmists and panic-mongers going about the country telling people who do not consider or understand the question—"Unless you have an overwhelming Navy which governs every sea, England will be ruined, because no corn will come here and your manufactures will stop because no cotton will be received, and you will have no export of your textile fabrics or hardware manufactures." Surely the hon. and gallant Gentleman is sufficiently well informed to be aware that not one single ton of these imports or exports can be threatened by war. Surely the hon. Member is not going back to the defence of commerce of the last century or the beginning of the present century. He is surely aware that by the Declaration of Paris the whole trade of a belligerent is safe. I am not speaking of the carrying trade, with which I will deal presently. Not a hundredweight less corn would come into England if we were at war, and not a yard less cotton would be exported; but the imports and exports would be carried under neutral flags. Goods could not be prevented from coming into England. So far from the country being starved by reason of no corn coming into Liverpool, it would be brought in in perfect security under a neutral flag and in as great quantities as at present, and so with cotton; and so with goods going out of the country. Goods could go out in absolute security, and, therefore, as regards what I may call general trade, the Declaration of Paris makes it secure—and do not let there be any mistake about that. The hon. and gallant Member may reply, "But you will lose the great carrying trade of England." No doubt that would be a great loss. Let us measure the loss. It is not the loss of hundreds of millions of which the hon. Member speaks, the goods will remain and come and go as before, but you will lose no doubt the carrying trade of Great Britain. This is the greatest carrying trade in the world, and greater now than at any former period. I do not depreciate the amount of that loss, but let us look at it as men of business and measure it. Of course you may say the world, apart from Great Britain, has not the ships to carry on that trade. But that will happen which has happened before—there will be a transfer of ships from the British to neutral flags. During periods of war in old days, when belligerent Powers were most predominant in the world, they might have disputed this transfer as a legitimate transaction. But as time has passed the power of belligerents to give the law to the world has diminished, and the power of neutrals has increased; and there would be no difficulty in finding ships which would carry the commerce in absolute security. I do not believe for a moment that any multiplication of expenditure on the Navy could create such a cruising fleet as would enable belligerent commerce to be carried on in belligerent bottoms. I heard the hon. Member for Southampton (Mr. Giles) speak upon this subject last year, and he, speaking as a practical man, said it was impossible that this could be done. Take the case the hon. Member has referred to by way of illustration. In the American Civil War the Northern States had a great naval superiority over the Southern States, and were able to maintain an effective blockade of hundreds of miles of coast. Yet the presence of one single Southern cruiser was enough to prevent the North from carrying on trade in belligerent bottoms. With these there must always be some risk, which is not shared by neutral bottoms, and this will effect a difference in the insurance sufficient to give the trade to the neutral flag. These things are perfectly well known to mercantile men and persons connected with shipping, and no amount of a cruising fleet you can get—unless you suppose you are going to have as in old days the assertion of the right to seize enemies goods in neutral vessels—will enable us to carry on trade in our vessels, we being belligerents. This is impossible under the operation of the modern law of nations since the Declaration of Paris. It is 75 years since England engaged in a maritime war in which this question could arise, for it did not arise in the Russian War. Therefore, in the whole of the dangers to which the hon. and gallant Member has directed his attention, he has omitted the main point in the consideration of the case. It is said that no food supplies would come to England in time of war unless our fleet practically covered the waters of the globe; but since the decision in the controversy between Great Britain and the United States, 100 years ago, on the subject of contraband of war—a controversy that is not likely to be renewed—since the decision of 1794 by which England paid compensation to America for treating food supplies to France as contraband of war—it is clear that no interference with food supplies conveyed in neutral bottoms can take place. To use the language of Lord Stowell, trade will fall into the lap of the neutral. There will be the loss of the carrying trade, no doubt a very considerable loss, but this is one of the recognisances which I confess I do not regard altogether with disfavour, one of the heavy recognisances under which a country is bound to keep the peace. The country need not be alarmed by stories of people being starved and factories closed in time of war. Truly this was the case of the Southern States in the American Civil War; but the Southern States were blockaded, and how can England be blockaded? This cannot be without an absolute defeat of our fighting fleet, such as the hon. and gallant Member does not contemplate. A country all seaboard cannot be blockaded. But if he considers that by any amount of exertion we can keep such a force in all quarters of the globe as will enable us to carry on our commerce in time of war, then I think the experience of all practical men will be against him. Stories are told of what will happen to the Suez Canal in time of war; but I do not believe that belligerent vessels will pass through the Canal, while neutral vessels can do so as in time of peace. There is no reason why they should not. A great fabric of panic has been reared, but let us apply to it the test of experience and the business-like way of regarding these transactions, and this is what I desire to do. My objections are not to the Return for which the hon. and gallant Gentleman has moved—they are rather addressed to the arguments that the Return is intended to reinforce. I do not wish it to be supposed that I seek to diminish the naval supremacy of Great Britain, and that I do not desire a fleet which would give perfect security to the great possessions of the Empire abroad. I desire Great Britain to have, and I believe that she always will have, a Navy competent to defend her great interests. But I cannot understand the argument of the hon. and gallant Gentleman addressed to the inadequacy of our fighting fleet.

Sir W. Harcourt

SIR J. COLOMB: I never entered into the question of the adequacy or inadequacy of our Fleet. I stated the facts, and drew no such deduction.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I gave the hon. and gallant Gentleman credit for making his speech with some object, and that object it was perfectly easy to perceive. I thought it was intended to put pressure upon Her Majesty's Government in view of future Naval Estimates. I desire to see the Fleet of England maintain that supremacy it has always held. I desire to have a Fleet that shall give security to the country at home and all our great possessions, and this is the desire of the nation. But I protest against attempts to alarm the country with the idea that its foreign commerce will be stopped and its industry at home and abroad will be paralysed if its foreign trade cannot be carried on in belligerent vessels. All the money expended on the hypothesis that it is possible, in any circumstances, to keep alive a force which will enable trade to be carried on in belligerent vessels in time of war, will be money wasted. The idea is an utter delusion. The difference in the rate of insurance alone would be sufficient to throw the trade into the hands of neutrals. It would therefore, in my opinion, be a great mistake on the part of the Government to allow themselves to be embarked in any great expenditure for this purpose. I hope the hon. and gallant Gentleman will not think that I have done him injustice in my remarks upon his speech, or that I in any way wish to disparage or diminish our naval supremacy.

(5.17.) MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea): I am prepared to support the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, though certainly not as an alarmist. I have not had the advantage of listening to the earlier remarks of my hon. and gallant Friend, and I do not know what he may have said to cause alarm to the right hon. Gentleman, but certainly in the latter part of my hon. and gallant Friend's speech he said nothing that induced me to believe that his object was to bring about a large increase to our Naval Estimates. I am under the impression that our Navy is sufficiently strong for all the requirements of the Empire. It is equal to any two of the other maritime countries, and that seems sufficient to me. In addition we have those fine and powerful mail steamers which can be converted into war cruisers in case of war. My hon. and gallant Friend has referred to the growing sea commerce of the United Kingdom; but that of the colonies and dependencies is growing very much faster. The trade of our Australian Colonies is, per head of population, 25 times that of the Mother Country. Perhaps the most extraordinary increase in the whole world is to be found in Hong Kong and Singapore. I believe that the sea business of those two ports is greater to-day than was the commerce of the whole of the British Empire 50 years ago. Though I am not prepared to sustain this with the exact figures, I believe I am within bounds in making the statement. I think it very improbable that this country will ever be engaged in another great war. There is no country except Russia with which it is likely that we may go to war, and I believe that in 15 or 20 years' time public opinion will have become so strong in favour of peace that there will be no probability of war even with Russia. I am no alarmist, and believe we can defend our interests even on the North West Frontier of India against Russia. Neither do I think my hon. and gallant Friend can be called an alarmist. We have often discussed questions in relation to our colonial and foreign trade, and I have not found my hon. and gallant Friend under the influence of alarmist views; and I think it is unfair for the right hon. Gentleman to put into the mouth of my hon. and gallant Friend words which he did not use. It has been said that neutral ships would carry our commerce in time of war; but at present there are very few neutral ships. Nearly 75 or 80 per cent. of the steam shipping of the world is owned in this country. I do not think it would be possible for us to convert our own ships into neutral vessels, and I believe my hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) has something to say as to difficulties under the Treaty of Paris upon the point. I do not believe that the information asked for by my hon. and gallant Friend, if given, would lead to an increase of the Navy ; but it would tend to give confidence to Members of the House and to people outside.

* (5.19.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The Motion of my hon. and gallant Friend seems to be a very fair Motion, because it proposes to embody in a practical shape certain information which may be very useful, not only to Members of this House, but to other parts of the Empire. All that my hon. and gallant Friend proposes is that there should be put into a succinct form the annual revenue, the amount devoted to naval purposes, the amount of our sea-going commerce, together with the contributions from different colonies. So far as the Government are concerned, there will be no objection to the information asked for being given, though not exactly in the form in which it is asked for. We must be careful not so to earmark the contributions from the colonies as to imply that they are too small, without considering that local contributions are generally associated with control. Local control is incompatible with that mobility which our Fleet in war time should possess. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has made a very interesting speech, in which he laid down the proposition that, if this country went to war, not one quarter of wheat less would come into the country. Trade, he said, under the provisions of the Treaty of Paris, would be carried on under a neutral flag. I think the right hon. Gentleman was rather rash in saying that our commerce would enjoy in time of war under a neutral flag the same immunity it finds in time of peace. Does the right hon. Gentleman lay down the proposition that belligerents will always recognise a neutral flag, however colourable the transfer?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I did not say colourable.

* LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The right hon. Gentleman says the transfer would be a real one ; but how could there be a sudden real transfer of our enormous tonnage to a neutral flag? It is an impossibility. Certain conditions attach to the neutrality of the flag, and one is that a considerable portion of the crew should be of the nationality of the flag. It has been said that if the misfortune of war should ever occur, it will not be confined to one or two nations, but will involve the great nations of Europe. In that case, the commerce of one belligerent would be colourably transferred to a neutral flag of a small nation. Is it to be assumed that the commerce of a great nation can be transferred to the flag of a small nation alongside, and that such a transfer will be recognised by the belligerents? Such a transfer would never be recognised. No one knows better than the right hon. Gentleman that all nations reserve to themselves the right of deciding what goods are contraband of war ; and not long ago a great nation declared that rice was contraband of war. If that is so, what becomes of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that in time of war not a quarter less of wheat would come into this country? I cannot agree with the observation of my hon. and gallant Friend that an increase of commerce must necessarily entail an increase of naval danger. I differ altogether from that doctrine. Comparing the naval expenditure of the five great naval Powers of Europe, it appears that, out of a total gross revenue of £89,000,000, England spends £15,600,000 on its Navy, or 17 per cent. In France, out of a revenue of £123,000,000, the naval expenditure is £8,300,000, or 7 per cent. In Germany the total revenue is £60,000,000, of which £4,600,000 is devoted to the Navy, or 8 per cent. ; while in Italy, out of £72,000,000, the Navy absorbs £5,000,000, or 7 per cent. ; and in Russia, out of £94,000,000, the Navy receives £4,300,000, or 4½ per cent. It thus appears that our naval expenditure is in excess of that of any two other nations. These figures ought surely to be regarded as satisfactory. It is also interesting to compare the average annual cost of naval protection per ton of the seagoing mercantile marine of these different nations. In this country the average cost of naval protection per ton is £1 6s. 11d. ; in France it is £7 19s. 11d. ; in Italy, £6 4s. 6d. ; in Germany, £2 19s. 10d. ; and in Russia, £10 4s. Therefore, according to these figures, Russia ought to have a much more effective protection in time of war than we have. Therefore, I differ from the conclusion of my hon. Friend that in proportion to the increase of British commerce must be the increase of British naval expenditure. The greater cost of naval protection in other countries shows that the navies of those countries have not behind them the commercial reserves that we have. We ought to keep up our Navy, so that it may maintain in every part of the world its fighting supremacy, and for this duty the Navy could not rely on any system of merchant cruisers. But the Navy, besides maintaining its fighting supremacy, has to give all protection that is possible to our commerce throughout the world. And in the discharge of this duty it certainly could be greatly assisted by merchant cruisers. During the last two or three years accordingly the Admiralty has subsidised and encouraged the building of merchant vessels with the most modern armaments which may be available at a moment's notice. There has thus been developed a system which will be an important instrument in protecting our commerce in time of war. Therefore while I cannot agree with all the conclusions of my hon. and gallant Friend, still I agree with him more than with the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and I shall be quite willing to grant the Return of which my hon. and gallant Friend has given notice, though, in order that such Return may be more useful and compact, I should like to confer with him as to the form such Return should take. My hon. and gallant Friend has referred to the enormous increase in our Mercantile Marine. That is certainly the case, and the most satisfactory feature of such increase has been the increase not in the number of ships built, but in the size of the individual vessels, for the larger the ships of our mercantile marine are the better will they be able to take care of themselves. Although the tonnage of our Mercantile Marine has so enormously increased, the number of our seagoing vessels at the present time is probably not greater than at the commencement of the century. The substitution of steam for sails and the facilities afforded by telegraphic communication have placed the commerce of the country at greater advantage in times of war; and, therefore, though we cannot hope that in any future war our merchant shipping will secure perfect immunity such as the right hon. Gentleman seems to anticipate, yet I believe that with the courage and resource which have always distinguished our Merchant Marine, it would fare much better than in the past.

(5.35.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): The noble Lord has gone into a statement with regard to which I may say that for my part I have not the slightest objection to offer to his figures. But the noble Lord said he agreed more with the conclusions come to by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir J. Colomb) than with those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt). I must say that I fail to understand in what the conclusions of the hon. and gallant Gentleman are to be preferred as opposed to the conclusions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby stated certain facts, and those facts have not been controverted in any way. The right hon. Gentleman said it was a matter of fact that if you go to war with any other nation, the rate of insurance will be so raised in British bottoms that commerce will go away from British bottoms to neutral bottoms. No one can deny this. We know that it occurred during the Crimean war, and also during the Secession War in the United States, and when persons talk very grandly and patriotically about giving a preference to British borne goods they are mainly actuated by their pockets; for no one likes to pay extra money in order that goods may be brought by British ships, when he knows he can get them cheaper from neutral bottoms. Well, what does the noble Lord say? He says, in the first place, that all countries have not signed the Treaty of Paris giving free ships and free goods. The noble Lord, when he spoke of all countries not having signed the Declaration, of course alluded to the United States. But the noble Lord is somewhat ignorant of history, or he would have been aware that the United States had joined in many treaties with other countries recognising free ships and free goods long before the Treaty of Paris. One of the reasons why the United States Government did not sign the Declaration of Paris was that they did not think any Treaty or Declaration was required on the part of the different Powers in regard to this point, because goods carried by free ships were in their nature free goods, and because if any treaty or agreement of the kind were suggested, any country might say it would withdraw from such a proposal. But the noble Lord says the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was wrong in saying that not a quarter of wheat less would come to this country if we went to war. I do not suppose that when the right hon. Gentleman said "one quarter of wheat" he meant only one quarter, or a dozen quarters, or a hundred quarters, or, even, thousands of quarters. What he really did mean was that the price of wheat would not be raised in any appreciable degree by our being at war, because it would be carried in neutral bottoms. But the noble Lord says belligerents would not allow the colourable transfer of British bottoms to a neutral flag. No one ever said they would, as the transfers would, of course, be bond fide. During the American Civil War a great part of the carrying trade of the United States was bond fide transferred to this country, and the result has been to place the United States in this difficulty, that having lost that trade they cannot recover it, and we have retained it ever since. Then the noble Lord asks, how do we know that if we had our ships placed under the flag of some weak neutral Power the belligerent with whom we might be at war would continue to recognise the principle? Well, Sir, the question is a very simple one. We should take care not to transfer our trade to a weak Power but to a strong Power. "Yes," says the noble Lord, "but three or four great belligerent Powers might be united in war against us," and that we should then have to transfer our trade to the United States. But I ask why should we transfer our trade to the United States? And do you think that the belligerent Powers of Europe wish to have the United States down upon them? The noble Lord says you cannot transfer to the States because they would insist upon certain conditions. But the United States are a very intelligent nation, and within three days they would alter the law. If they thought they could get our Mercantile Marine on the cheap, do you not think that they would run a law through enabling them to do it? The other objection of the noble Lord is that food is contraband of war. I should advise him to stick to his Navy, and not go into questions of International Law.

Mr. Labouchere

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I did not say that food was contraband of war.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The rule is this, that if you consider a port is being blockaded, and the people can be starved out, then you make food contraband of war. There has never been a country which has more abused the International Law with regard to what is contraband of war than has this country, yet we have never made food contraband of war. You must remember that although this country goes to war other countries are left out, and those countries are anxious to get the benefit of the increased commerce which arises. Depend upon it these neutrals will never recognise for a moment that wheat or food is contraband of war in respect of a country like this. The United States have an enormous quantity of wheat and cotton, for which they want a market, and if any of the European Powers declared that their produce should not come over in neutral bottoms, they would soon have the United States down upon them. When any country is at war with a large and important Power like ourselves they are not anxious at the same time to be at war with the United States. Whenever a suggestion is made for the increase of the Navy we have these stories about being starved out—and hon. Gentlemen opposite are less careful about those stories outside the House than they are inside it. There is not the slightest danger of our being starved out. I am not in favour of great military expenditure, and I would limit the whole of it to what is necessary for defensive purposes. I think what we do spend is generally better spent on the Navy than on the Army. I wish naval Members opposite would begin by saying that we spend a great deal too much on both the Army and the Navy, that a great deal too much is wasted and frittered away in the Army, and that the money would be better expended on the Navy. If they would do that, I can assure them they would have the warmest support from me. But when the First Lord of the Admiralty tells us one year that the Navy is perfect, and the next that it must be increased so that we may have a Navy equal to that of any other two maritime Powers, I say he is contradicting himself, and that he does not know much of his subject; he is not a sure guide in this matter. I believe no greater mistake could be made than to say in this House that we must have a Navy equal to the combined Navies of any other two Powers. What is the consequence? Why, that other Powers seeing our policy, themselves build more ships, which necessitates our building more, and so this game of brag goes on. I want to see our coaling stations defended, I want to see a sufficient fleet to defend our shores against attack; but I do not want a fleet which shall be sufficient to protect our whole maritime commerce all over the world. I do not believe that would be possible. Sometimes simmering, and sometimes bursting into flames, this abominable Jingoism distinguishes our country. We have a Jingo Government in power—a Jingo Government afraid to do much, but still doing something when they have the chance. I believe if we had that Government in power for the next 10 years we should be at war with some Power or other. They are most dangerous. When they have got our Army and Navy increased they will try some abominable scheme of annexation, or some arrangement with Germany or some other Power, in order to test both our Army and Navy. We have been dragged in this way into numerous wars, and Parliament has been told that it was too late to remonstrate, and that in honour England must fight. I hope it will be made clear to the House that the noble Lord stands to the proposition, or that he does not, that our Navy is to be made sufficient, not merely to protect our coasts, but also to protect our carrying trade in such a way that there will be no possible risk of our ships being seized if we are at war with any one or two great Powers, with the effect that the rate of insurance on our ships as against the rate for neutrals will not go up.

*(6.54.) ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): Sir, the senior Member for Northampton remarked that if this Government were in office for 10 years we should be involved in war. The hon. Member seems to forget that it has been in office for five years without a war, while the Government of which the hon. Member was a supporter had a war every Session between 1880 and 1885. I see no reason for his deduction at all. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby and the hon. Member seem to suppose that it is an absolute impossibility to maintain our carrying trade in security during the time of war. If they have studied the history of the old wars they must know perfectly well that such was the action of the British Fleet, that British bottoms were considered safer in those wars than neutrals. There are two periods which should be considered—that when we had an adequate Fleet, and that when we had an inadequate Fleet. During the French War at the beginning of the century to 1815 British commerce largely increased because we had an adequate Fleet, but during the War of Independence with the United States, when we had an inadequate Fleet, our commerce largely decreased,

SIR W. HARCOURT: Of course, I quite appreciate the hon. and gallant Member's argument, but he must remember that at that time neutral vessels were just as liable to capture as belligerent vessels. The whole distinction is in what has happened since.

*ADMIRAL MAYNE: But I do not admit the absolute safety of neutral bottoms of which the right hon. Gentleman spoke, nor do I think any person, certainly any naval officer, would for a moment admit it. It is sufficient for the purpose of a naval officer that the cargo of a neutral should be detained, and sent into a neutral port, so as to prevent it being landed at the proper time at the port for which it was embarked. And I am afraid I must admit that the captain of a cruiser would have no scruple about sending vessels to a neutral port. I should not like to criticise in as strong language as I well might use what the hon. Member for Northampton said as to our shipowners transferring their ships to neutral flags rather than look to the proper protection of our Fleet. I do not believe the shipowning community of this country have yet fallen so low. But when he spoke of Jingoism and of the present Government increasing the Navy, I must remind the House that no one ever feels more offended or insulted than hon. Gentlemen opposite by the slightest suggestion that they had allowed the Navy to fall off in strength. We have had Lord Northbrook's programme, and other programmes continually brought up, to show that the Navy never was allowed to go below a certain point; in fact, it has been contended that my noble Friend the First Lord has merely been continuing the Northbrook programme. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of an "absolute convoy," and about the fleet "covering the waters of the globe." I do not know that we ever contemplated any such thing, and if the right hon. Gentleman had studied this subject he would have found that all we aim at is the protection of certain fixed trade routes, which should be kept practically clear, and we believe that could be done for a very small amount in comparison with the enormous amount conveyed. I think that a great mistake is made when people talk about taking the fastest of our merchant vessels for war purposes; those are the vessels we shall in time of war want to carry the grain cargoes, and I believe shipowners will be able to run these vessels with comparative safety without transferring them to neutrals at all. With regard to this question of transfer, it must be remembered that not only is transfer to the United States impossible under the existing law, but also that France requires that a bond fide transfer shall be made; the captain and a large proportion of the crew in the latter case are to be Frenchmen; and they will not accept a transfer otherwise. So I do not hold with the right hon. Gentleman that it is an "utter delusion" that trade will be carried in belligerent bottoms. In the case of a European war our fleet, if only it is managed as it used to be, will carry by far the greater part of the trade of the whole world. As to the possibility of our being starved out, that is not worth arguing. We know the misery that France suffered years ago was due not alone to our action in stopping her commerce on the seas, but largely to internal exhaustion. As to the question of insurance, that may be dealt with in various ways, and much has lately been written upon it.

Admiral Mayne

I do not propose to go into that subject now, but I must say that I was utterly surprised to hear the light tone in which the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the loss of our carrying power. Does the right hon. Gentleman know that it means a loss of £80,000,000 a year? It means four times our Defence Bill. To lose it means, in all probability, that we shall lose it for ever—at all events, for a considerable time. I maintain that, properly protected, belligerent bottoms could and would carry almost the whole trade of the world. As to panic, we can afford to laugh at those who sneer at us. We know that in case of war it would be our duty to protect the country while others are sitting quietly at home. We shall be the sufferers if it is found we cannot face the enemy in a proper way. All that we are urging upon the First Lord of the Admiralty and the country is, that they should fix upon an adequate standard, and that they should keep up to that standard and maintain our maritime supremacy, not only by cruisers but also by battleships. Try to imagine the feeling of the people of this country if they woke up to find that we had been beaten in a great battle in the Atlantic! We are not asking to have too great a Fleet, but an adequate one. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has spoken of the emptiness of the House as showing that hon. Members do not feel alarmed at the state of the Navy. The right hon. Gentleman does not often honour us with his presence at naval discussions; if he had, he would have known that for the naval discussion this is rather a full House; we usually vote millions in the presence of very few Members on the opposite benches. I earnestly hope the House will not be led away by any such speeches as we have heard to-night from the paramount duty of making adequate provision for the Navy.

(6.11.) MR. H. J. ATKINSON (Boston): If the present had been a meeting of the Chamber of Shipping we should not have heard the allusion we have to the sweeping away of the ships of the United States in the Civil War. The hon. Members who made those references seem to have forgotten that the vessels so swept away were sailing ships. The war in question broke out just at the time when a transition was taking place from sailing to steaming, and therefore it was that a few small cruisers sent out by the Southern States of America were so successful in capturing the sailing ships of the Northern States. But at the present moment a steamship is a ship to be relied on, and England, in respect of such vessels, is far in advance of all other nations, simply because of her long purse. The increment of wealth of other nations, is not sufficient to enable them to keep pace with us. It is absolute nonsense to talk of our ships being transferred to other flags. I would point out that the shipowners would like to see their money before they transferred their ships, and what two or three nations combined could pay the sum required to buy the enormous steamship fleet of this country, even if we wished to sell it? They could not do it, and therefore it is a downright absurdity to tell us our ships are going to be transferred to other flags. There is no doubt we have the carrying power, we have the speed, we have the money, and we have the men. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby may laugh at that because it is a quotation from a music-hall song, but let me remind him it is a quotation which he has used in many of his political speeches. The hon. Member for Northampton called this a Jingo Government. He admits it will be 10 years hence before his Party get into power, and therefore I say his condemnation is like the curse of the Jackdaw of Rheims—it cannot hurt us. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, because he wrote letters on historical law, wishes to be taken as an authority on shipping, but we cannot accept him as such. I have had 45 years' experience, mostly in connection with steam shipping, and I tell him that all experts in shipping must know that the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman are all fallacious. If there is a panic, it will be from what the right hon. Gentleman has said to-night, but I do not think that the people of this country will believe it. The country owes a great debt of gratitude to Her Majesty's Government for having taken the best steamers on to their list, and thus encouraged the companies to build more like them; those vessels would bring in wheat or anything else that we want in time of war. As to the right hon. Gentleman's remarks on the subject of insurance, it must be remembered that a great part of the insurance of the country is carried out on the mutual principle, and, as a matter of fact, the right hon. Gentleman's City friends will tell him that marine insurance premiums are getting lower and lower from day to day. The right hon. Gentleman's fine spirit of panic is only the outcome of political necessity. The fact is, he has been altogether at sea in his arguments, and, at the same time, he has not been to sea sufficiently to enable him to make and apply proper arguments. When those acquainted with shipping matters read the right hon. Gentleman's speech to-morrow morning they will probably have as much contempt for his views upon insurance as the right hon. Gentleman would have for my opinion as to how a case before a Select Committee upstairs should be conducted.

*(6.18.) MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): With regard to the Declarations of the Treaty of Paris, I can remember that when this subject was discussed in this House years ago I urged that we ought to go beyond those Declarations, but my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby opposed that. I hold that, in the event of war, any Government in power, whether Liberal or Conservative, ought to endeavour to extend the limits of the Treaty so as to make all private property free from seizure. I would, therefore, urge Her Majesty's Government to enter into negotiations, with the American Government especially, and with other Governments, for the purpose of extending the Treaty of Paris, so that all private property shall be free from capture in time of war. Supposing we were at war with the United States; they could immediately buy and equip vessels as privateers for the capture of our ships in all navigable waters. No Power would suffer more with regard to war with the United States in its Mercantile Marine as this country. If we were at war with a European Power, our carrying trade would, I believe, be transferred to neutral bottoms. The insurances would prevent merchants shipping goods into belligerent bottoms. Although some of our steamers might and would outstrip the enemy's cruisers, we must not forget that an important part of our carrying trade is still conducted in sailing ships, which would be at the mercy of the enemy's cruisers. Therefore, that part, at least, must be transferred to neutral flags, and shipowners would be compelled to sell their vessels to foreigners. One great inducement to foreigners to purchase our ships would be the increase in freightage which would take place in the event of war. It would be an utter impossibility to convoy our merchant shipping in time of war. We failed to do so during the last French War, when privateers raked our very doors. Suppose, for instance, there should be starting on each of four or five trade routes 50 vessels simultaneously. How could we find convoys for them? And if we did, and an enemy's squadron were met and defeated, how could our warships chase them, unless the merchantmen accompanied them? I take it that the object of the hon. and gallant Member opposite in asking for these Returns is to show to what extent the colonies are protected by our Navy. Hence I say that if we are to give more protection to our colonies, which have become rich under Imperial protection, they ought to be made to pay the additional cost. India, a Crown colony, has already to pay her full share of the cost of the Army kept there for her defence. She requires no protection from the Navy. But if we make India pay for land defences, why should not the same rule apply to the colonies in regard to naval defence?

(6.26.) SIR E. J. REED (Cardiff): As one who has always insisted on the importance of maintaining the greatness of our Navy, I should like to say a few words. I think that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has administered to the House and the country a very necessary warning. It cannot be denied that for a long time past we have had comparisons made between our Mercantile Marine of to-day and the War Navy of to-day with the Mercantile Marine and War Navy of the past. I have seen assertions that there ought to be exact correspondence between the one and the other. Therefore, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was a valuable one, and it was supported by arguments which hon.

Mr. Gourley

Gentlemen opposite have not attempted to meet. I agree with him that it would not be possible to carry on trade in belligerent bottoms. One very sufficient and obvious reason is that those ships would furnish the enemy with the means of coaling in any part of the ocean. Every British steamer would be a coaling station for the Navy of the enemy, and thus relieve them of the greatest difficulty which has attended the efforts of hostile cruisers to prey upon our Mercantile Marine. Every captain of a privateer would at once look upon our merchantmen as coaling stations. I understand that the noble Lord offers no objection whatever to furnishing such a Return as the hon. and gallant Gentleman proposes. I desire to see such a Return, and for the reason that I do not believe the truth of this matter lies in any broad generalisation, but is to be found in a close study of all the facts and circumstances attendant upon a maritime war. We are very deficient of facts. Facts of the kind referred to in the Return proposed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman are generally brought forward by irresponsible persons and without sufficient care. I agree with the First Lord of the Admiralty that, while the form of it might perhaps be changed with some advantage, the Return would be very valuable. With respect to the question to which the proposed Return seems to point, I agree with the noble Lord that what we have to do is to secure our supremacy against the War Fleet of other nations with whom we are likely to come into conflict, and then to utilise, as far as we can, the constantly improving vessels of the Mercantile Marine in the protection of the commerce of the country. I think the present Government deserve very great credit for having taken steps to bring into relation, and that by simple and economic methods, the War Navy of the country and the powerful and fast steamers of the Mercantile Navy. My opinion is, that if we were brought into war to-morrow, we should not have in the Navy of the country any vessel built for the Navy proper so suitable for the protection of our commerce as the large transatlantic liners. Those vessels can be fitted with light armament, and they can carry a much larger supply of coal than vessels belonging to the Royal Navy. But whatever may have been the object of my hon. and gallant Friend in proposing this Motion, I am disposed to think we ought not to seek to use it for the purpose of goading the Admiralty into an increased naval expenditure, and I base that statement not so much upon the programme which the Admiralty brought before us a year or two ago, but upon the fact that the Government have realised the extreme importance of building ships quickly. I am sorry to say anything which in any way reflects upon my own Party, but I am obliged to say that for 17 years I have pleaded in vain in the House of Commons for the introduction of such a reform. I always regarded it almost as an outrage upon the commercial and business-like character of the country that we should vote money for ships which it was to be presumed were required for Her Majesty's Service, and then should linger for four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, and ten years over the construction of the vessels, thus involving the country in an expenditure which could have no fruit in the event of a naval war. It is greatly to the credit of the present Government that they have insisted on ships being quickly constructed, because when the money which was asked for a year or two since has been expended it will have produced three or four times the increase of naval force which the same sum of money would have produced under the old system, inasmuch as under the old system it would be spent on ships which never could have been turned to any useful purpose during time of war. I shall never fail to speak in favour of a policy which I believe tends to give the country value for its money, and which will add to the Naval Force of the country enormously in itself and still more enormously when it is compared with the policy of slow construction pursued by the French. While the British Government have been going from bad to better the French Government have been going from bad to worse, with the result that in a couple of years' time the comparison of naval strength will be almost incredibly greater in our favour than it could possibly have been under the old system of slow construction adopted by our Admiralty. I am in favour of this Return being granted, but think it should not be embodied in the Naval Estimates. There it would do harm. There it would lead to a false impression. There it would lead many persons astray; but placed in the hands of hon. Members as an ordinary Parliamentary Return, it would afford very valuable information, which it is very desirable the House should possess.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question again proposed.

PROMOTION FROM THE RANKS.

*(6.40.) CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): By the indulgence of the House I wish to say a few words upon a notice which stands on the Paper in my name: It is to call attention to the want of a proper system of promotion from the ranks. Hon. Members, no doubt, noticed a few weeks ago in most of the newspapers an appeal which was made from the ranks of the Navy in favour of a proper system of promotion to the rank of lieutenant and upwards. I do not wish to dwell on the appeal, or to take it in any sense as the text of the few remarks I desire to make, but I refer to it for one or two reasons. In the first place, those who read the appeal were very likely struck with the very strong point the appellants made of the paucity, or the supposed paucity, of lieutenants in the Navy, and that lieutenants could be taken from the ranks of warrant officers very much more cheaply than they can be found under the present system. I notice this, because I wish to correct what I think is an error. I have noticed, in talking over this matter with naval officers and others, that there is an impression that what is wanted by seamen and warrant officers is a regular system of recruiting from their ranks. I do not think that this was intended, and it is not what I advocate. Whatever is done must be done tentatively and gradually, and it ought not to be done on a very large scale. I have been told that the appeal did not come from the majority of the Navy. No doubt it came only from a minority, but that minority does not consist of the drones of the Service. There are many in the Service who cannot benefit by what is proposed, but there is a minority who really wish to have some means of raising themselves from the position they hold, and it is a laudable ambition that ought to be encouraged. What is the present system in regard to promotion? There is a certain amount of promotion from the ranks now, but it is so very small that it is practically at a deadlock. Many years ago the Admiralty issued a regulation to the effect that on certain conditions warrant officers might be promoted to the rank of lieutenant, and an Order in Council stated that the promotion should be given for exceptional gallantry in action. That is not the way to reward a warrant officer—for exceptional gallantry. I can conceive that a man may show conspicuous gallantry, and yet be the very last man who ought to be given a commission as lieutenant, because he is not qualified for it in other ways. Up to the present time only two have been so promoted. A certain number of chief warrant officers, who have served a certain length of time, are allowed on retirement to take the rank of lieutenant. I propose that this list should be considerably increased. As to promotion on the Active List, there are several objections, the first of which is the social difficulty created by the rise of rank. I have noticed that until quite recently that has been put forward as the leading objection, but latterly it has rather melted away. In a letter to the Times the other day Admiral Sir Geoffrey Hornby, who is regarded as one of the highest authorities in the Service, said that so far as regarded association on shipboard difficulty need not be apprehended, and Admiral Colomb, who is also considered a high authority upon these matters, does not think the existing body of lieutenants would be touched by the social difficulty. In the Navy there are so many different kinds of duties to be performed that appointments might be found for warrant officers where there would be no social difficulties at all. Then it is objected that our naval officers ought to be highly-educated men in every branch of their profession. I thoroughly endorse that. It is also said that the education of to-day is very different from what it was; and that the whole professional status of the lieutenant has very greatly risen. That is perfectly true, but it is also true that warrant officers have to pass examinations which are far more formidable than examinations were in days gone by. The warrant officers who aspire to be promoted to the higher ranks know perfectly well that they will have to undergo certain examinations. Let me remind the House what are the examinations that have to be passed by ordinary lieutenants in the Navy. They consist mainly of three subjects—seamanship, gunnery, and navigation. I do not think there is any naval officer here tonight who will deny that a gunner in the Navy is quite as well instructed in gunnery as any officer, or that the boatswains or the gunners are not quite as well up in seamanship as the ordinary lieutenant. In fact, it is the warrant officers who instruct the lieutenants in seamanship and gunnery. Then we come to navigation. Until very lately there were very few warrant officers who had any knowledge whatever of navigation, but some short time ago the Admiralty gave permission to warrant officers to qualify in that branch of a naval officer's education, and I think I am correct in saying that about 30 warrant officers voluntarily, and at their own expense, passed the examination in navigation. I think about six of them are at this moment surveying in the navigation line. This shows that it is not beyond the power of the warrant officer to qualify himself in that branch of a naval officer's education. Sir Geoffrey Hornby touches on this point, and says it will be easy for warrant officers to acquire a knowledge of navigation. Other officers who have written on the subject make no difficulty at all on the point. Admiral Hornby, however, goes on to say that capacity to handle a ship will be at their age much more difficult to acquire. I really do not see where the difficulty comes in. You do not want any special education for that. Like myself, many naval officers who had never been in charge of a ship before were suddenly appointed to the command of one, and had suddenly to acquire a knowledge of handling a ship. It is not a question of navigation, but of a cool head and plenty of nerve; it is rather a matter of a man's digestion than of a knowledge of history or navigation, or anything of that kind. It requires merely an average knowledge of the use of the sextant, and a cool head. I will deal with only one further objection, and that is a small one. It has been said this will be of no advantage to the men. As far as that goes, I really think those people who are advocating this change should be allowed to be the best judges whether it is of advantage to them or not. One gallant officer talks about its being a "Dead Sea apple." Well, there is an increase in the pay, and that is not a Dead Sea apple. But it is said that when one of these officers is on shore he will find it much more difficult to get on in society. I do not see that that follows at all. Many officers in the Navy at the present moment have risen from very humble positions indeed, and they find no difficulty in getting on on shore. We ought not to lose sight of the fact that it is not only an advantage to a man himself to become a commissioned officer, but it is also of advantage to his family. Undoubtedly there are many appointments which a commissioned officer's sons would be able to go in for, and which would not be open to so great an extent to the sons of a warrant officer. I have seen a great many of the men on this point, and they do not look upon it as a Dead Sea apple. They have indicated an alternative to the scheme under which, side by side with the proposal to advance warrant officers to the rank of lieutenant, warrant officers should, after a certain number of years, take the honorary rank of sub-lieutenant. I believe the appeal made by the men is a serious one, and I commend it to the House and the Government, because I believe its adoption will lead to the greater efficiency of the Service.

Captain Price

*(6.58.) ADMIRAL MAYNE: I regret very much that my hon. and gallant Friend has taken up this subject, as I think without due consideration, and without taking the opinion and advice of those officers in the Service who are most qualified to give sound opinions on the subject. I find myself in a very difficult position. In the first place, it is very unpopular to condemn anything which appears like helping the poor man to get on. As far as the social difficulty is concerned, if it consists in having as a messmate a man who has risen from the ranks, I do not believe there is one officer in 20 who would ever think of it. If there were any feeling at all it would be on the part of the man who had risen from the ranks, and not, I think, on the part of those among whom he is placed. The greater part of the hon. and gallant Member's speech advocated the promotion of warrant officers to the higher ranks of the Service. Well, the other day I saw a number of these officers, and I put to them various questions on this subject. The result was that they asked me to strike out of the proposal all that part which relates to the promotion, as all they wanted really was the honorary rank of lieutenant into the general line of the Service. I asked if they were authorised to say that on behalf of the warrant officers? and they said, "Yes, we have full authority, we do not want any substantive rank; we shall be perfectly content with retired rank." Now, I do not quite believe that they could undertake to answer for the whole of their class; but if that be so, of course that clears the ground to a great extent, knocking away most of the arguments against the proposal. Whether it may be possible to give them some better retirement is a question which may well be considered. I think the hon. and gallant Gentleman who brought forward this proposal has not spoken on behalf of any but a very small minority of the warrant officers; in fact, if I am rightly informed, some two or three men have got up the whole question. This small minority want something, but they do not know exactly what. The hon. and gallant Gentleman says this should be left to them; but there I differ from him, and experience in the Service tells me that when you give an officer rank, unless you give him pay according to that rank you immediately create another grievance. It is no use giving an officer gold lace without pay. I know in such a case the man promoted finds it is no good to him with the expenses of uniform and mess on the other side of the balance sheet. As a matter of fact, the two officers to whom the hon. and gallant Gentleman has referred, who were made lieutenants, have to be kept in two small commands, one at Portsmouth, the other, I think, at Plymouth; at any rate, two small commands; because the Admiralty does not consider itself justified in putting them to the expense and other awkwardnesses, if I may use the expression, of the ordinary ward-room mess, but keeps them in these two small commands by way of saving them expense and enabling them to eke out their pay by the command money. But the Admiralty cannot create small commands for all the warrant officers to be promoted. I remember a case in which a chief petty officer complained to me that he had much better have been left to follow his old lines, and that it had been no kindness to him to be removed from the lower deck, and be made a warrant officer. I remember a chief boatswain's mate refusing a warrant again and again, and when I questioned him he said, "I shall only be put out of my place. I am happy in the position in which I am." He objected on that very ground which the hon. and gallant Gentleman seemed to think an advantage, that his wife, his sons and daughters would be put into a position to which they were not bred and educated, and which he would not have money enough to support. I think it would in many instances be cruel kindness. The hon. and gallant Gentleman makes no claim on behalf of carpenters and engine-room artificers; but why should they be left out? Why should one class of warrant officers be selected for personal advantage, and not others? The fact is, warrant officers' rank was meant to apply to men specially selected because they had served well, and were good men to put into a class in a somewhat better position than their comrades, the principal object being to lessen the distance between the two classes on board ship, and give the men a better representation, so to say. I will not go into the question of the handling of ships, because I think that may be learned by some, but can never be learned by others, no matter what is their rank; and it is, as has been said, to some extent, a question of nerve and digestion. But the social position of a commander is another matter, and does not mean merely his position in a ball-room. If you put a man in command of a ship, you have to consider how he may bear himself in all the varied conditions imposed by the nature of the service on captains of ships on foreign stations. I remember very well the answer of the late Lord Malmesbury when questioned as to the chances of a war with America after the Trent affair. He replied that it depended very much upon the naval officers in command of ships meeting with each other at sea, and he expressed the greatest reliance on the tact and judgment, of the various officers in command, and, therefore, did not believe there was any imminent danger. Such tact and judgment, which are essential, can only be relied on with men in the position from which our officers are selected and educated from earliest youth in its exercise. I had a letter from a captain the other day in which he says—

Admiral Mayne

"This question of promotion from the ranks is got up by a few warrant officers of advanced ideas, and he had six warrant officers serving with him, and none of them were in favour of it. They believe that the extra expense that they would have to incur would do away with any advantage they would derive."

And he adds—

"If you make the bluejackets lieutenants, what about the engineers, stokers, and carpenters?"

The warrant officers do not wish for this change. It is proof of the general contentment that we can maintain a higher state of discipline than is maintained anywhere else without the slightest trouble, and at the present time the heaviest punishment you can inflict upon a man is to discharge him from the Service. I think before we make so fundamental a change as altering the whole rank of warrant officers, some more sufficient reason must be shown than has yet been advanced.

*(7.12.) MR. GOURLEY: I am glad the hon. and gallant Member has brought this question before the House, and for my part I do not see why a similar system should not govern promotion from the ranks in the Naval as in the Military Service. In the Army a "ranker" or private soldier has the opportunity of rising from the ranks to the highest position of "General." I would not have the promotions limited to honorary rank. I think there should be a system of substantive promotions from the ranks for a specified number of seamen. I hold the opinion that the whole system of officering the Navy requires reform. The special system of education on board the Britannia is no longer required for naval officers. The progress made in the education of the great masses of the people is such that the men who now fill the ranks of the Service are very different in education and qualifications to the seamen of 30 years ago. The exclusiveness of the Britannia system ought to be abolished. That opinion was expressed by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer many years ago and in that sense the present Under Secretary for India brought forward a Resolution in 1880, which I then seconded. I quite agree with the opinion expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer years ago that the Britannia system might be abolished and, under a specified curriculum, in our public schools and colleges boys should be prepared for naval examination, then enrolled as cadets, be taught seamanship and navigation in sailing vessels, and then be transferred to our men-of-war for the study of gunnery and other matters. The question as raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport comes to this, that if men pass a certain examination they shall be promoted from the position of warrant officers. There have, as the hon. and gallant Member has said, been only two promotions to the rank of lieutenant, and a warrant officer retiring with the rank of lieutenant does not receive anything like the pension awarded to an ordinary lieutenant. The Admiralty should lay down a system under which a certain number of boys should be under certain examinations and qualifications as to seamanship and navigation, and such matters, entered for the position of warrant officers, and be entitled to be promoted to the substantive rank of lieutenant. The honorary rank of lieutenant is no encouragement to a boy to exert himself and qualify himself to rise in his profession. Promotion from the ranks would, in my opinion, be a real benefit to the Service, and would increase esprit de corps in the Navy. I hope the Admiralty may see fit to accept the suggestion of the hon. Member for Devonport.

CONTROL OF PORTS AND COALING STATIONS.

(7.20.) SIR JOHN POPE HENNESSY (Kilkenny, N.): The Motion which I ventured to put before the House is in the following terms:—

“That the Ports and Coaling Stations held for naval purposes should be under naval and not military control.”

Some days after I had placed that notice on the Paper, the interesting statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty was distributed, and at the end of that statement I find the following passage:—

“There are officers of both Services who believe that measures should at once be taken by which the Navy should immediately undertake the defence of the great naval ports, and be, in time of war, responsible for the safety of the base of their own operations.”

“I admit,” continues the noble Lord,

“that if such a change could be carried out, it would tend to secure unity of action and responsibility, and would, in an emergency, secure at the great naval ports the rapid utilisation of all available resources, for whatever movement the exigency of the moment might require.”

Well, that seems a powerful argument in favour of the Motion I had put upon the Paper; but immediately afterwards the noble Lord goes on—

“But it is a proposal that involves so immense a charge that it is not under any conditions practicable in the immediate future.”

Now, this question has been for some time before Parliament and the country. The Hartington Commission in 1888 dealt with it conclusively, and in the Report of the Commission to which the noble Lord (Lord Hartington) himself made reference the other night the Commissioners take a very different view from the First Lord of the Admiralty as to the expediency or possibility of dealing with the subject at once. The Report of the Commission carries such authority that I venture to quote a passage—

“Two Departments are engaged in two branches of what is, or ought to be, one duty and one combined work. The first point which strikes us in the consideration of the organisation of these two great Departments is that, while in action they must be to a large extent dependent on each other, and while in some of the arrangements necessary as a preparation for war they are absolutely dependent on the assistance of each other, little or no attempt has ever been made to establish settled or regular intercommunication or relations between them, or to secure that the establishments of one Service should be determined with any reference to the requirements of the other. As illustrating the dependence of the Army on the co-operation of the Navy, it may be pointed out that a large part of the duty of the Army in time of war would be the defence of distant possessions and dependencies, such as India and the colonies. No perfection of military organisation, no completeness of military establishments, could enable the Army to discharge this function unless the Navy were, on its part, in a position to undertake the safe transport of reinforcements and of the necessary armaments and stores. The scope of action of the Navy in distant waters must mainly depend on the amount of confidence with which it can calculate on the power of self-defence of the principal coaling stations and reckon on finding there the necessary supplies. It has been stated in evidence before us that no combined plan of operations for the defence of the Empire in any given contingency has ever been worked out or decided upon by the two Departments; and some of the questions connected with the defence of military ports abroad, and even of those at home, are still, after much departmental correspondence, in an unsettled condition, and that the best mode of garrisoning some of the distant coaling stations is also undecided. In all these subjects a question of principle is involved, which no attempt has been made to solve by a final and definite decision."

No wonder the Commission summed up all this by calling it a "dangerous condition of affairs." That was in 1888. What have we heard this year from the Chairman of that Commission? Speaking on the 23rd of last month on the Army Estimates, the noble Lord (Lord Hartington) took occasion to repeat the warning, and it is evident he does not share the opinion of the First Lord that these reforms should be indefinitely delayed. The noble Lord referred to the want of a combined naval and military plan for the defence of the Empire, and to the fact that the best mode of garrisoning the coaling stations was still undecided, and he added—

"Thus, some of the most vital questions are still left in a dangerously uncertain condition."

The reply of the Secretary of State for War to some extent resembles the words I have quoted from the statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"When the Report of the Commission was brought before the country the Government watched to see the general drift of opinion with reference to the changes proposed. . . . As to the transfer (of the coaling stations and fortifications to the Navy), it was a question of enormous importance, which could not be carried out until the lapse of a considerable number of years."

Thus the two Members of the Cabinet most concerned concur in saying that a considerable period must elapse before the necessary reforms can be carried out. Now, what is the actual condition of affairs witnessed by those who have for some years resided at these coaling stations? I remember that at one particular coaling station the Governor received a telegram from Her Majesty's Government asking to be immediately supplied with a Report as to the state of the submarine defences. The Governor accordingly wrote to the officer commanding the troops, and then accompanied him to the harbour to confer with the officer having charge of these submarine mines. On embarking for the fort the general-in-command makes an apology to the Governor: "I am sorry they are so clumsy; but, in point of fact, the soldiers are not accustomed to the oars." The General and the Governor are conveyed across the harbour to the fort where the Engineer officer is. On arriving there, the Governor asks the Engineer officer, "How many hours will it take you to lay out the whole of the submarine mines?" The Engineer officer says, "Well, Sir; unfortunately the chart I have is rather an old chart, and some of the officers of Her Majesty's ship so-and-so, told me when they were recently in harbour, that the coral reefs have increased. The soundings have altered, there is now a current in another direction, and on the whole, I am afraid I cannot tell you within 36 hours or three days when I can lay out the submarine mines." Of course, the House will understand that this military man cannot be blamed. He is put in charge of purely naval work, and is not a naval man. Who is responsible for this? Her Majesty's Government. Now, to take another coaling station. Hong Kong is described as a coaling station of first-class importance. I remember there that it was the duty of the Governor to have a conference with the General-in-command and the Admiral during a Russian scare. The Admiral decided to take his ships to sea and there attack the Russian Fleet. The General said that would not do; the Admiral must not leave us defenceless. I was appealed to, and I ventured to express the opinion that it must be left to the Admiral to decide what to do with his Fleet. Next day the Admiral left, and not many hours elapsed before I got a telegram from London to the effect that at the War Office a very alarming message was received from the Commanding Officer, who had telegraphed openly that the Admiral had taken away the whole Fleet, and "Hong Kong was absolutely defenceless." Within an hour of the sending off of the telegram by the General its contents were known to the Russian Consul and telegraphed on to Europe. Her Majesty's Government instructed me to inform the General that in future he should send his telegrams through the Governor, who had the Foreign Office cipher. Accordingly, that was done; but, in fact, the colony had not been left so entirely defenceless as the officer in command of the troops supposed, for the Commandore who remained in charge of the Naval Yard acted cordially with me in improvising an efficient torpedo defence. Similar misunderstandings were constantly cropping up between the Military and Naval Authorities. I mention this as an illustration of the difficulty which is created by the Government itself in maintaining a divided responsibility in the defence of coaling stations. Now, Sir, Her Majesty's Government are no doubt aware that there are Reports in the possession of every Government on the Continent of Europe from the officers of the Foreign Intelligence Department, and that those Reports, referring to the defence of the ports and coaling stations of the British Empire, are all to the effect that the scheme of defence is radically defective. Our allies on the Continent do not always confide to us these Reports of experts on our shortcomings. But I assert that such Reports exist, that they are all in one direction, and that they are unanimous in saying that our system of coast and coaling station defence is on a wrong basis, and imperils the safety of the British Empire. Fortunately, the United States recently published the Report of Lieutenant Colwell, of their Intelligence Department. It entirely supports the views we have heard expressed this Session by Lord Hartington. Writing to the United States Government in June, 1888, Lieutenant Colwell says—

Sir John Pope Hennessy

"The coast defence of Great Britain is notably the most inefficient of any of the great European Powers. Owing to the divided control, lack of co-operation, absence of digested schemes for mutual support, and the mixing of naval and military duties, the defence is unwieldy in its administration, unprepared for sudden work, and labours under the disadvantage of placing military men outside their legitimate sphere of action."

We have already heard indications to-night from both sides that the House does not agree with Her Majesty's Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), though he is not in the habit of saying much in support of what are called the Services, did say to-night that he was very anxious to see the coaling stations of England adequately defended, and he added that in his opinion the money laid out on the Navy was generally better laid out than on the Army. The coaling stations are not adequately defended. They are established solely for naval purposes. The Secretary of State for War himself, in addressing the Colonial Conference in 1867, called them "the Admiralty coaling stations." They are intended to resist a naval attack only, but they are garrisoned by the military, and are under the War Office instead of being under the Admiralty. If I may dare to touch again on the more or less trivial experience of an individual, I remember a case in which it became necessary for me to inspect some of the look-out points of one of our coaling stations. The men entrusted with the looking out were all soldiers. I asked one of them whether, when ships come above the horizon, he could distinguish the difference between a German cruiser and an English man-of-war? "Oh no, sir," he said; "not until the flag goes up I could not tell any difference." I need hardly say that a sailor could tell the difference of fifty miles off. I am, unfortunately, old enough to remember—and I suppose nobody present is in the same predicament, unless perhaps it is the hon. Baronet on my left (Sir W. Lawson)—the great Debates which occurred 30 years ago when Lord Palmerston proposed a costly scheme of fortification and military defence. I voted against it, mainly because I saw that it was opposed by the best naval opinions of the day. It was a contest between the Military and Naval Authorities. In a small minority of 39, I then voted for the naval as opposed to the military defence of our coasts. But the two Front Benches, and practically both sides of the House, voted an expenditure of many millions, now admitted to have been mostly wasted. Parliament yielded to the military opinion in 1860; and a common phrase accurately describes what occurred as regards the military works at Alderney—the £1,500,000 were “flung into the sea.” The expenditure was absolutely useless; and at least £500,000 was similarly “flung into the sea” at Bermuda. The Navy was consulted too late. The real custodians of the waterways of the Empire were not consulted in time. The Secretary for War thought my proposal would involve increased expense. On the contrary, it would be true economy. If the Navy Estimates grew larger, the Army Estimates would be reduced in proportion. As to the increase of personnel and cost of administration at Whitehall, a trifling addition to Marine Staff at the Admiralty would suffice. The Public Works Department at the Admiralty was quite capable of looking after the forts. What said General Sir William Jervois, who had had more to do with our fortifications and coast defences than, perhaps, any other officer in Her Majesty's service?—

“I am confident that its adoption would be productive of economy through its intrinsic values of unity and simplicity. Nothing, it is well known, is more conducive to extravagance than the uncertain allotment of duty, division of responsibility, and departmental friction, evils from which the two Services have long been and still are suffering, to the prejudice of their own efficiency and the detriment of the British taxpayer. The truest economy consists in obtaining the best possible return for a given outlay.”

Another eminent military expert, General Sir Andrew Clarke, when occupying the responsible position of Inspector General of Fortifications and Director of Works, recorded his views in February, 1883, in favour of a Marine defence for our colonies. In discussing a paper of the hon. Member opposite (Sir John Colomb) on our Marine Forces, Sir Andrew Clarke said—

“In our smaller colonies, especially taking those colonies most valuable to us, and at the same time most difficult for us to control and defend—the whole of our colonies to the Far East, reaching up to China—I have always advocated and would advocate still that the garrisons should be entirely Marines. Regiments of the Line, constituted as they are, are not the most effective agents now for Colonial Defence, and they are most expensive in those positions, requiring, as they do, large Civil Departmental Corps to be attached to them to make them at all efficient. On the other hand, you can move the Marines at 12 hours' notice, or less than that, without all the necessary departmental arrangements which are involved in moving a regiment of the Line. That in the defence of the colonies is a point of great economic value. Their organisation offers another very great justification for their being employed in such a way. An Admiral, knowing every place where they are, on difficulties arising, whether amongst the civil population or by the approach of an enemy's fleet, could at any moment reduce his other garrisons and increase his forces at the menaced point. In our separate commands correspondence must take place, the case must be proved, and valuable time is lost before you can move any portion of the regiments, especially in parts of the world I have just spoken of. If there was one homogeneous command over the Marines stretching round the China Seas under one General or one Admiral, you would secure for the Empire a very efficient service, far more economical than the present one, and one which would especially meet the requirements of our Colonial Service. To me, at the present moment, having the responsibility of advising the Government in reference to the question not only of the defence of our commercial ports in England, because I can see the application of this very question of the Reserve of Marines to assist in the organisation of the defence of our commercial harbours as well as of our military harbours, but also in the question of the defence of our coaling stations abroad, I believe the Marine organisation offers a satisfactory solution of that question.”

The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Treasury is as anxious as any man to see the public money properly spent; therefore I would earnestly commend to his attention not the last sentence I read from the Memorandum of the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton), but the preceding sentences, and I would ask him and the Government to consider whether the time has not come, not for carrying out the whole of this great scheme, but for trying the experiment of beginning with the coaling stations on the China Sea. If the Government would do this they would have an opportunity at once of placing their coaling stations in that part of the world under the Admiral in command. They would then have an opportunity of practically testing the Motion that I put before them. I have no doubt that they would see that both in Hong Kong and in Singapore the Admiral-in-command would be able to raise a marine force, which would materially assist in securing a better defence for these coaling stations. And on this subject I would like to say to the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty and to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that Her Majesty's Navy is very popular in the colonies. Whatever the cause may be the Army is not so popular. And of all the branches of that popular Service—the Navy, I believe the Marines are themselves the most popular. The Marines can be recruited in many of the colonies as well as the Marine Artillery. If you were to garrison coaling stations with the Marines and the Marine Artillery, you would have a body of men easily transferred from station to station, a body of men inexpensively relieved, and ready, if necessary, to co-operate with the fleet in an active attack. Suppose the Admiral, under existing arrangements, came to the conclusion that the best way to save Hong Kong was to attack Vladivostock. Suppose he should say to the military commanders of Singapore and Hong Kong—"I desire to make an attack on Vladivostock, for it is undermanned and I can now occupy it; but to do so I must take away the troops from Hong Kong and Singapore." What would be the answer of the military men? I have never known a question of that kind arise without there being a difference, and an irreconcilable difference, between the Military and Naval Authorities. For my part, I should be perfectly content if Her Majesty's Government would try the experiment I advocate on the China Sea by garrisoning those Eastern outposts with Marines, and placing the zone of defence under the Navy.

Sir John Pope Hennessy

(7.47.) ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I think that all naval and military men—certainly all naval men—who read the speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down, and who speaks with such great authority on this subject, will be deeply grateful to him for his observations. No one can speak with greater knowledge and authority than the hon. Gentleman who has so recently returned from those distant parts; and he has left us naval men nothing to say. He has exhausted the arguments. The hon. Member gives us a most humorous description of the miserable state of things which existed for years at our coaling stations before the present Government came into power. At the time of the Russian scare if we had gone to war with Russia all our coaling stations might have been captured, unless ships of war had been detached to protect them. I had occasion to look into this question when I went on a trip to Australia a few years back, and I am firmly of the opinion expressed by the hon. Member. He only presses the Government to try an experiment. The noble Lord alluded to this particular question, and it is perfectly easy to read between the lines of the memorandum and see that he is very much exercised about it. The noble Lord I believe desires to grapple with it in the direction favoured by naval opinion, but he is more or less powerless unless supported by opinion in this House to strengthen his hands. We naval men generally are modest men, and we do not want the Government to do great things at the beginning. We only urge that an experiment should be made. It would be a huge folly for us to take possession of every naval station. We do not want anything to do with the great fortresses like Gibraltar and Malta; but the outstanding stations are the important points, and if the noble Lord can only see his way to put on the Estimates an increase to the Marine Force, the thing can be done in a month. There are many advantages in such a reform, and they are so obvious that it is needless to waste words in explaining them. They must be apparent to the poorest mind, however little acquainted with naval and military affairs. If a Marine detachment were placed in charge of the defensive works of places like Hong Kong and Singapore the Admiral will know the force he has to rely upon, and his wishes will be scrupulously regarded; there will be no conflict of authority, and he can, if necessary, go on a distant expedition after detaching a ship to guard what he leaves behind. Again, in the event of sickness breaking out in a garrison, nothing will be easier than for the Admiral to change the whole of the men, and give the sick a three months' cruise. That cannot be done with soldiers. The House is indebted to the hon. Member for Bow and Bromley for having first directed attention to this matter. A Commission afterwards sat, and from that day to this the question has been occupying the attention of the country. The present Government have done a great deal in providing guns for our coaling stations, but it must not be forgotten that, though we have the guns, we want garrisons and barracks, and that sufficient money has not been taken for these. The question still sleeps. We want pressure from behind, and I think we have that in the Motion and the speech of the hon. Member opposite. The House owes a debt of gratitude to the hon. Member for taking up this question and trying to rivet public attention upon it.

(7.54.) MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): As a civilian, I am reluctant to intrude in this interesting discussion, but I regret that I find myself unable to concur with the two speakers who preceded me. I had the honour of being a member of a Committee which sat at the War Office for a considerable period, the result of our deliberations being that the House was pleased to vote a considerable sum of money to strengthen the military ports of this country and the coaling stations. Therefore, since that time I have taken considerable interest in these questions. I listened with the deepest attention to what fell from the hon. Member for Kilkenny, and it seemed to me that in quoting the case of Hong Kong, as he did, he really gave himself away. The lesson which I should draw from the case of Hong Kong, as cited by the hon. Member, is that it is absolutely necessary that the fortifications, so far from being placed under a naval commander, should be left in the hands of the Military Authorities. What did he tell us occurred? Why, that when it was possible that war might break out, the naval commander at once took away all his ships and all his men, and left the harbour defenceless. In order that a harbour should not be defenceless, the fortifications should be complete and the mine-field ready to be laid down by persons on the spot, and not by men under the Naval Authority. Sir Astley Cooper Key's words on this point are very instructive—

"Nothing has pleased me more than to know that foreign countries intrust the defence of their ports to the Navy. We may thus be assured that many of their best officers will be shut up in their ports, and must be withdrawn from the strength of the Navy in time of war." It seems to me that the defence of a port resolves itself into two parts—the active defence and the passive defence. The active defence would naturally be taken charge of by the Admiral in command; but it seems absolutely necessary there should be on the spot a passive defence in the event of sudden attack upon the port; and that that passive defence should be in the hands of the Military Authorities, because it is pretty certain the Naval Authorities would take very good care to take away every available man and gun for the purpose of active defence. The gallant Admiral at my side (Admiral Field) says he would leave the Marines behind; but I am by no means sure that he would not do exactly as was done in the case quoted by the hon. Member opposite, if he had the means of transport, and take away every available man. It seems to me, therefore, that the question ought to be left as it is. It seems to me that there is another side to this question, and I do not wish the erroneous impression to go forth that the House shares unanimously the views which the two hon. Members have put forward.

Admiral Field

*(7.58.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I think the hon. Member for Kilkenny has certainly brought before the House a most difficult question affecting military and naval administration, and one well worthy the attention both of the House and the Services. The hon. Member has put a correct interpretation on the language I used in my Memorandum. It is true that I am not satisfied. On the other hand, I feel the difficulties are enormously great, and I want the House and the Services fully to appreciate what the change advocated really means. I can quite understand the idea of making the Army responsible for everything relating to the land, and the Navy for everything relating to the sea. But the peculiarity of the passive defence to which my hon. Friend has referred is that every year it is taking more and more an aquatic shape. As science develops and the range of guns increases, the passive defence becomes more and more an aquatic defence. That being so, what is the position of any officer who is intrusted with the defence of a station? He needs gunboats, torpedo boats, submarine mines.

and under-water communications. All that necessitates that there should be a certain appropriation of naval force for the purpose of participating in what is called passive defence. My attention was drawn to the matter some years back, and I went into it to see what it would cost. I want to show that any such change as is now proposed must involve a good deal of difficulty and a large increase of expenditure, and, moreover, if you once enter upon it you will not find it very easy to stop. I, for one, never would consent to any arrangement under which a naval force should be placed at isolated stations of an unhealthy character if they were not also to have charge of the more healthy stations; and if this were so it is estimated that to garrison in time of war all our coaling stations abroad, including Gibraltar and Malta, would require 35,000 men, who would need a reserve of 15,000 men at home, so that the transfer of the control of the coaling stations from the Army to the Navy would involve a transfer of something like 50,000 men from one Service to the other. That question itself is, therefore, a very grave one, because it would revolutionise the Force, would lead to great alterations in the system of administration, and would make it very difficult to carry on the regimental system in many cases. In addition to the financial and administrative difficulties, a very large number of experienced naval and military officers are opposed to the change, among them nearly all my naval advisers. What they say is that if this change is made it will attach a large land force to the Navy. I want the House to appreciate the enormous difficulty of attempting any change of the sort; but speaking my own individual opinion, which is not that of my naval advisers, the present system is one of difficulty in time of peace, and might be dangerous in time of war. I have seen it worked under the most favourable conditions, for my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War, who has done so much to benefit the Army, has occupied himself more than any of his predecessors with the interests of the Navy. The right hon. Gentleman was the first man who was impressed with the necessity of armed forts for the purpose of protecting the bases of naval operations, and in many other instances he has cordially worked with the Navy, and the same spirit animates both the Naval and the Military Boards. There is, therefore, complete co-operation between the two Departments as far as is possible when two Services are placed in a position which I do not think they ought to occupy towards each other. The Army is called upon in time of war to protect the permanent bases of operations, a duty which everyone knows is always unpopular in time of war, because those who have to perform this irksome duty naturally desire to go to the front. But when a duty is put upon one Service which ought to be put upon another the difficulty is enormously increased. The hon. Member for Northampton has said that he did not object so much to the expenditure on the Navy, but he wanted to see that on the Army much reduced. Let us suppose that the Party of the hon. Member comes into power. They have already promised to squeeze the Army Estimates, but in the process of squeezing those Estimates they would eliminate all the provision that ought to be made for the protection of the naval bases of operation. Military men would say, having already a difficulty in providing for the primary wants of the Military Service, that the secondary task in connection with the Navy must be subordinated. That is the difficulty in time of peace. Now, what would be the difficulty in time of war? Would anybody pretend that it was a right system to intrust all that relates to defensive operations to one man, one Service, and to one Department, and all that relates to offensive operations to another man, another Service, and another Department? The very anxiety which each officer of each Service would display in trying to carry out his part of the duty would make co-operation almost impossible. The House must recollect, too, that in the Army different trains of thought exist from those which exist in the Navy. The naval view is that at the outbreak of war the best protection to the commerce of the country would be to assume the offensive. I can understand that circumstances might occur when the naval authority might wish to take all his available forces of men and material for offensive operations, and that the success of those operations might, to a certain extent, depend on his being able to do so. The fact is, the duty of the Navy is to prevent an attack being made, while the duty of the Army is to repel that attack when it is made; and what we ought to aim at is to get the two Services in such a position that the one which has to perform a secondary duty should not endeavour to impose impossible conditions on the other which has to carry out a primary duty. The question has been under the consideration of the Government for some time past. The Secretary for War would be only too glad to be relieved of this anxiety, but he cannot assent to any proposal which would largely increase expenditure without some corresponding benefit accruing. It will not do to say that the increase in the Navy would be counterbalanced by a decrease in the Army. The expenditure is certain; but the saving, especially where there are a number of officers and men with claims to pension and emolument is problematical. Now, in the Statement which I have laid before the House, I have pointed out that we shall shortly have to establish a new station in the South Pacific, probably the Falklands, and we shall make an experiment there on a small scale. That will be garrisoned by Marines. I shall look into the question as to whether it is possible to try the experiment further; if it is, the next place will be the China stations. I will further undertake that no change is made of a character which would increase the impediments or the obstacles to a transfer. I wish that the question could be discussed in no spirit of jealousy or rivalry between the Services; and I may add that the matter which at first made the most impression upon me was that the country did not get its full benefit from that magnificent force, the Royal Marines. With regard to the question raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport—that of promotion from the ranks—every one will sympathise with the object which he has in view, but I do not think the hon. and gallant Member has quite faced many of the difficulties which such a proposal involves. In the Army the system is possible, and has worked well; but every essential condition, relating either to entrance, to pay, or to promotion, which exists in the Army is absent in the Navy. In the Army as a man rises from the ranks through the various grades of a non-commissioned officer to a commission, his pay continuously rises; but in the Navy warrant officers receive considerably higher pay than cadets, midshipmen, or sub-lieutenants. Therefore, it is not possible to promote from the ranks except by passing over a considerable number of commissioned officers who have entered in the regular way and who have complied with conditions which those put over them could not comply with. Then there is the difficulty of retirement. A warrant officer, as a rule, is 8 or 10 years older than a lieutenant on entering, so that at the age of retirement the State would get eight years' less work out of the former than out of the latter. There is also the difficulty of half-pay. I have a little personal experience of these difficulties. In 1887, which was the year we promoted the most capable warrant officers to the rank of lieutenants, I had the greatest difficulty in finding appointments for them which would not put too heavy a strain on their financial resources. As regards the social difficulty, I do not think it exists. Naval officers always welcome men of ability who are promoted to associate with them on terms of equality. Where the social difficulty does arise is in the standard of living. You cannot avoid that; therefore, I do not believe it would be to the benefit of the persons proposed for promotion or to the interest of the Service that anything like a wholesale promotion should be made from the ranks. But I sympathise with the wishes which my hon. Friend has expressed. There are naval men of great authority who think that if promotions were made for seamen, they should be made from smart petty officers, who could go to the lowest ranks of commissioned officers at an early age. If you promoted petty officers over the heads of warrant officers, you certainly would create a great difficulty. On the whole, I certainly think it better to leave well alone. Sailors, after all, form only part of the number on board ship. You have stokers and others; and there is no reason why a stoker should not become an engineer; and there is no reason why, according to that, if you dispense with examinations, a steward should not become a doctor; so you could go right through the roll, with the result that you would land yourself in troubles from which extrication would be very difficult. I have answered all the questions put to me, and I hope the Speaker will now be allowed to leave the Chair, especially as hon. Members will have an opportunity of discussing these matters on Vote A and Vote 1.

Lord G. Hamilton

*(8.20.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Sir, I think the hon. Member for Kilkenny ought, on the whole, to be satisfied with the discussion. For my part, I am perfectly satisfied with the limited promise which the noble Lord (Lord G. Hamilton) has made. I understand the noble Lord is prepared, in respect of the Falkland Islands [Lord G. HAMILTON indicated assent], and other naval stations to which the hon. Member for Kilkenny adverted, to try this experiment. My hon. Friend did not at all contemplate its application at present to Gibraltar and other large and important stations, because there might be grave difficulties to such a scheme. But in the case of coaling stations of no great magnitude, I think the experiment might fairly be made, and I cannot doubt it would be attended with great success. It does not seem to me that any additional expense need be incurred, inasmuch as there would be about the same number of men to support, and it would be merely the transference of the duty from the one Service to the other. I think the difficulty of that transference is one of the evidences of the want of harmony between the Services, and indicates that there is something wrong in the present system. The real fact is, that a transaction of this kind ought not to be attended with an increase of expenditure. I hope, therefore, that the noble Lord, in any change which he makes, will do his best to prevent any increase of expenditure. That there is difficulty in time of peace, and danger in time of war, under the present system no one can doubt. Nobody who has read the evidence taken by the Royal Commission presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, and the Report of that Commission, can doubt that for a moment. I think, therefore, that at the earliest possible moment some experiment in the direction indicated by my hon. Friend should be made by the Government. For my part, I am satisfied with the statement of the noble Lord, and I hope the experiment will be made very shortly, and that every effort will be made to give it a good start. With regard to the other question referred to by the noble Lord, I cannot but think that it would be wise, having regard to the general condition of the Service, to give the warrant officers greater hope of promotion. I do not understand the noble Lord to raise objections to the principle, but merely to the details. He seemed to throw cold water on the subject, and said on the whole it would be better to leave well alone. I think, however, that it would be wise if some action were taken—not, of course, anything like wholesale promotion, but still sufficient to raise the hope of warrant officers that they would have an opportunity of rising in the Service. (8.25.)

Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

NAVY ESTIMATES, 1891-2.

1. 71,000, Men and Boys.

*(8.56.) MR. DUFF (Banffshire): I should like to avail myself of the opportunity of a general discussion to congratulate the Board of Admiralty upon the energy with which they have persevered with the new programme. I think that the manner in which the new vessels have been turned out is very creditable to the Board and speaks well for its business capacity. But I feel that more might have been done in the direction of refitting and repairing some of our older ironclads. The hulls of many of these vessels are in good order, and it is the opinion of many competent naval officers that the Northumberland, Minotaur, Alexandra, and other vessels of that class might be rendered very useful at a cost of from £150,000 to £200,000. In fact, they might be made as good as the Admiral class, costing three-quarters of a million. I therefore quite approve of the policy of thus taking these ships in hand. With regard to the re-armament of the vessels of the Devastation class, I am glad to see by the statement that in all cases, with the exception of the

Rupert, the work has been satisfactorily undertaken. I may say with regard to the Rupert that if you are going to spend so much money on a vessel capable of going $14\frac{1}{2}$ knots you might give her some better armament than a 10-inch muzzle-loader capable of penetrating 11 inches, whereas a modern breech-loader of the same weight would penetrate twice that thickness. And so with regard to the Hercules, Achilles, and Superb, and similar vessels. I do not think it worth while spending a large sum of money on them, unless you give them better armaments than the old muzzle-loader. It is very desirable that modern breech-loading guns should be substituted for the old muzzle-loaders on the ships still armed with these. I fear that there is still an insufficiency of heavy breech-loading guns at the disposal of the Admiralty; but it would be more charitable to suppose perhaps they think it right to wait for the perfecting of the new smokeless powder before they supply additional breech-loaders. I do not quite approve the official programme as to repairs. For example, I doubt whether it is wise to spend money upon the Swiftsure and Satellite and some of the other ships classed with her. When I come to the Wrangler, the Racer, and the Starling, I confess I do not at all understand the proposals of the Admiralty. The Wrangler, the Racer, and the Starling belong to about the most inefficient and obsolete class in the Navy List. The Wrangler and Starling are vessels that can only be depended to go about nine knots. They are hopelessly slow, and no money spent on them will repay the outlay. I do not think the so-called Racer ever steamed more than 11 knots, and I doubt if you can get nine knots out of her now, and yet on this vessel you propose to spend £6,447. The Admiralty are only going to spend £307 on her propelling power and machinery, so you cannot make her much faster. I should like to know what service you propose to employ her on. I cannot find in the Estimates what amount you intend to lay out on the Wrangler and Starling; but, assuming it to be about the same as on the Racer, you will be throwing away on this obsolete class some £20,000. In 1889, when the First Lord made his statement, he certainly led the Committee to believe that as the new ships were completed we would get rid of a number of the obsolete vessels which now encumber the Navy List. The torpedo cruisers and the Pheasant class were, it was understood, to take the place of the obsolete gunboats of the Wrangler class. But if the Admiralty intend, as seems to be the case, to retain on the Navy List the older and obsolete class, in addition to the new vessels they are building, then I say they are not dealing fairly with the House and the country. In his statement the First Lord said that he had some difficulty at the time of the mobilisation of the Fleet in officering and manning all the ships, and that to meet this he was endeavouring to reduce the number of officers and men in our non-fighting ships. But if this is his policy, then I am entitled to ask, What is the use of lumbering the Estimates with charges for the repair of the vessels I have been referring to—wretched, obsolete gunboats, too weak to fight, and too slow to run away? Unless some reason, not apparent in the Estimates, is given for this expenditure, I shall certainly move its reduction when we come to the Shipbuilding Vote. Passing from the shipbuilding programme to the Ordnance Department, I am very glad to see that the Admiralty are steadily moving in the direction I have so frequently urged in the House, namely, that the Admiralty should assume the entire control and custody of all naval ordnance stores. When I brought forward a Motion urging this course two years ago, it was rejected on the advice of the Secretary for War and the First Lord by a majority of two to one. I am glad to find that since then wiser counsels have prevailed, and, except on one important point, as I understand the present arrangements, they have practically conceded all I then asked for. The point I refer to is in regard to the ordering of the guns. This I understand is still to be done through the War Office. The reason assigned for this is the necessity for interchangeability between the two Services; but this is a totally insufficient reason. Interchangeability can be perfectly well secured if the Admiralty order their own guns direct from Woolwich, or from a private firm. It is the Ordnance Committee that insure interchangeability. I have never proposed to relieve the Committee of this responsibility. The Committee consists of military officers and engineers, and the Admiralty are represented by a naval officer. A gun is agreed upon suitable for forts and ships. The pattern of the gun and the charges are the same whether the gun goes to a man-of-war or to one of the forts at Malta. Therefore, so long as you retain the Ordnance Committee as designers of a gun adapted for both Services interchangeability is secured. Let me remind the House what the present system is, and I think they will see it is somewhat complicated. The Admiralty take the money for naval guns; they order and are responsible for their own gun mountings. They are in future to have the custody and charge of their own ammunition, but the Admiralty decline the responsibility for the gun itself. There is no doubt about this. The First Lord, in his statement last year, said—

Mr. Duff

“The Navy speak on ordnance questions as users of the article supplied, but they are not responsible for the design or the manufacture of the weapon with which they are armed, except so far as gun mountings and torpedoes are concerned.”

But if the Admiralty are not answerable for the gun, do the War Office accept the responsibility? On this point General Alderson, the Director of Artillery, is quite as explicit as the First Lord, because, in his evidence before Sir James Stephen's Commission, he said—

“The Ordnance Committee are responsible for the design; but the Admiralty, not being obliged to accept a design of which they do not approve, become also responsible.”

It thus appears that neither the Admiralty, War Office, nor the Ordnance Committee accept the responsibility for the design of a naval gun. Supposing the Admiralty insist on arming our ships with 110-ton guns. They are not satisfied with the present service qualities of that weapon, and they ask the Ordnance Committee to design them another pattern. The Committee may think, as most people now do, that a gun of this enormous size is not suitable for naval purposes. The Admiralty may reply that they, and not the Committee, are the best judges of this. The gun proves a complete failure. I am only putting a hypothetical case. Have the Admiralty no responsibility? It would be absurd to make the War Office responsible in such a case. If the Admiralty ordered their own guns, subject always to designs approved by the Ordnance Committee, they would relieve the War Office of a duty with which they have no right to be saddled; they would bring the Admiralty into direct communication with the manufacturer in all questions concerning gun mountings, and they are many; they would save a deal of useless correspondence now passing on this subject through the War Office; they would thus accelerate the delivery of guns, and they would limit the responsibility, at any rate, to the Ordnance Committee and the Admiralty. I should like to say one word about the supply of guns. In his statement the First Lord takes his usual optimistic view of the supply of guns, and he informs the Committee that “the satisfactory rate of progress has been maintained.” He also dwells at some length on the number of breech-loading guns that have been delivered. Now the supply of guns between 4in. and 6in. in diameter has, I believe, been satisfactory enough; no complaint, so far as I know, has been made about them. It is in reference to the larger guns—over 9in. in diameter—that the great delay has occurred. Of these guns I maintain that we are still short. The noble Lord in his statement says that we have 1,410 breech-loading guns afloat. To hon. Gentlemen who have not looked closely into this subject, and no doubt to the general public, this may seem a very satisfactory statement; but, in regard to recent shortcomings in the delay of delivery of guns, it is not one which will bear a very close investigation. Out of the 1,410 breech-loading guns I can only make out 122 above 9in. in diameter. The first naval breech-loader was delivered in 1883. Up to the 31st of March, 1889, the latest Return I have been able to get, we had only in the whole Navy 68 breechloaders of the class I am dealing with. In the year 1890 the First Lord took credit for 27 guns, and he takes credit for an equal number this year, making 122. In his statement last year the First Lord told us that we wanted, to complete the old and new programme, 112 guns.

Well, if we go on at the present rate of delivery we shall not get the 112 guns required till the middle of 1894, and I understand most of the ships are to be ready in 1893. No doubt I shall be told that the rate of delivery will be accelerated; but I have heard this so often that I am getting a little sceptical on the subject, especially when I contrast our accomplished achievements in this respect with the promises which have been held out. It is always difficult to extract from right hon. Gentlemen opposite what their calculated output of guns is to be in the year. After a certain amount of pressure, the First Lord told me in August, 1888, that 45 guns above 9in. in diameter would be delivered by the end of the financial year—that was by March 31, 1889. Last year, after the close of the Session, I got the Return I had moved for, which it took the War Office six months to produce, enabling me to verify the accuracy of the First Lord's forecast. How many out of the 45 guns promised were actually delivered? Only 17! In 1889 the Secretary of State for War told us that up to the end of the financial year he expected to deliver 81 guns over 22 tons in weight. But on the 17th of last March he had a very different story to tell the House. Only 67 guns had been delivered, but these were not 22-ton guns, but guns over 6in. in diameter, and we have yet to learn how many of these were 22-ton guns. I should be glad to have the information. I think that the War Office have not kept faith with regard to these guns. There is one matter of considerable importance about which in his statement the First Lord has maintained a complete silence, and about which the country is getting very anxious, namely, the question of the 110-ton guns. After the repeated failure of the Sans Pareil's guns I should like to ask the Government what their policy is concerning these guns? The Sans Pareil guns were ordered as far back as 1886; they were promised in 1888, and now in 1891 the Sans Pareil, which has cost £800,000, is practically unarmed, as she has not got her principal armament. That is, in my opinion, a scandalous state of things. So far back as 1886, when I went to the Admiralty, there was a strong opinion in naval circles against these guns. The preponderating opinion of naval members of the Board was opposed to them. It may be asked, if that was the case, why we did not stop them. To that I have to reply that the time of the Board was then a good deal occupied about the Collingwood guns, and besides that when Lord Ripon came to the Admiralty he was not at all satisfied with the organisation of the Naval Ordnance Department, and he appointed a Departmental Committee to inquire into it. That Departmental Committee was sitting at the time the present Admiralty came into office, and we did not like to settle the large question of the 110-ton gun, until the large matter of the organisation of the Naval Ordnance Department had been settled. So impressed was I with the opinion of my naval colleagues in 1886 that as far back as 1887 I pressed the First Lord of the Admiralty to give up the 110-ton guns on board both the Victoria and the Sans Pareil. My reason was that the then Controller, Sir William Graham, had impressed me with the impolicy of putting those guns on board a ship, and I urged the First Lord very strongly to give up the 110-ton guns, and to substitute for them 67-ton guns.

Mr. Duff

LORD G. HAMILTON: Did you ascertain what it would cost?

MR. DUFF: I remember the noble Lord replied that the 110-ton guns were ordered, and to counter-order them and to alter the fittings of the ships would be a very costly process; but, for my own part, I think that the course persevered in will turn out in the end the more costly of the two. I am perfectly willing to admit that the position of the First Lord has been an embarrassing one; and two things have happened since, which, had they been known at the time, might have influenced his opinion, and caused him to arrive at a different decision. The first of these is that experience has proved the 67-ton gun to be a most efficient weapon, and the second is that further experience has proved the 110-ton gun most unreliable. But what I want to know now is what the Admiralty intend doing in the future. Would it not be better even now to replace the 110-ton gun with the 67-ton gun? I am not prepared to say what the cost of the change would be; but if you are going to spend £800,000 on what is really a gun carriage, it would be cheaper to spend £100,000 than to have guns which are of no use to you. Nothing can be more extravagant than to spend £800,000 on a ship, and then put in guns you are afraid to fire.

LORD G. HAMILTON: May I ask the hon. Member on what authority he makes the statement that we are afraid to fire these guns? It is rather an important matter, and statements have appeared in the Press on the subject.

MR. DUFF: I simply want to say this: You have fired the guns on board the Benbow, but you have not been able to reproduce those guns, and you have not a gun you can put on board the Sans Pareil that you can fire with any confidence. It is public property. Everyone has read the published accounts of the trials. But even if you can fire these guns, I am prepared to say that even on the First Lord's own showing the 67-ton gun is a better weapon. For my own part, I contend that even now, in spite of the expense, it would be far better to put 67-ton guns on board these vessels than to go on with the 110-ton guns. In his Statement this year the First Lord tells us that the Trafalgar fired four rounds from her 67-ton guns in nine minutes and a half. I doubt whether the 110-ton guns after the first shot could fire two rounds in 10 minutes; and certainly it could not go on at that rate. The 67-ton gun in the four rounds would throw projectiles weighing 5,000lb.; whereas the two shots from the 110-ton gun would only represent 3,600lb. It is true that the 110-ton gun is capable of penetrating 33 inches of iron and the 67-ton gun only 27 inches at 1,000 yards, but as no ship afloat, I believe, carries more than 23 inches of iron, the 67-ton gun would do all we require. These guns need not be wasted if they are handed over to the Secretary for War. In his large schemes of Imperial defence the right hon. Gentleman will, no doubt, be able to find a more suitable place for them than on board one of Her Majesty's ships. I see that Admiral Sir George Elliot has an article in one of the magazines, advocating the fortification of the Scilly Isles. That in many respects would be a suitable place for the 110-ton guns, and there would be lots of sea-room for practice. But, in any event, you ought to get rid of these guns out of the Navy. You are saddled with them in the Benbow, but you ought to get rid of them elsewhere. If you have got the guns for the Sans Pareil why do you not put them on board the ship, and let the gunners try to fire them? I have not heard much about the Victoria guns. It is our business in Committee to look into these questions, and there appears to me to have been a scandalous waste of public money after keeping ships waiting for their armaments. After all that has happened, I think we are entitled to some explanation on these points. As to the promotion of warrant officers to the quarterdeck, that is a very difficult and delicate subject. I do not think any commanding officer would care to trust the safety of his ship to a navigating lieutenant who had never had any practical experience in navigating. I do not see how, at the present time, you can open promotion to warrant officers to the rank of captain. With every desire to assist warrant officers and to do what might be a popular thing, we must give the first consideration to the interests of the Service. Having said that, I must confess I think it is unfortunate that we have not at the present time any connection between the quarterdeck and the forecastle. Warrant officers used to get their sons educated at Greenwich School and passed into the Navy as masters'-assistants mates, from which rank they were promoted to the quarterdeck. I think the Admiralty would do well to revive Greenwich School as a school for warrant officers' sons, and in that way establish a connection between the quarterdeck and the forecastle. I do not gather that that would satisfy the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and indeed his recommendations were not very definite, but I commend this suggestion to the attention of the Admiralty. I am sorry to have detained the Committee at some length, but I hope I have touched upon matters that deserve explanation, especially in reference to the 110-ton guns.

(9.35.) ADMIRAL FIELD: It is with considerable diffidence and hesitation that I follow the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. The main part of his speech was an attack upon the Government in respect to matters for which they are not responsible, and for deficiencies due to the Government of which the hon. Gentleman himself was a Member.

MR. DUFF: Long before I had anything to do with the Admiralty.

ADMIRAL FIELD: Everyone is aware of the miserable condition in which things were left by that Government, not only as regards the Navy, but the coaling stations; and it is rather hard for the hon. Gentleman to present an embodiment of virgin purity on behalf of his late colleagues to attack the present Board of Admiralty. It is notorious, the country knows it, the Press of the Kingdom has rung with it, articles upon articles have shown how six line-of-battle ships were kept waiting for their guns by the Government of which the hon. Gentleman was a Member. Yet the hon. Gentleman has the hardihood to speak with righteous indignation of the misdoings of a wicked Tory Government, and accuses them for deficiencies for which the colleagues of the hon. Gentleman are really responsible. The hon. Member found fault with the Admiralty and the War Office because the Admiralty have not got an absolute control of the making of the guns. The hon. Member assisted myself and others in a work that has been of some service—the transfer of the Vote for Naval Ordnance to the Navy Estimates. Year after year we endeavoured to bring about this transfer. In 1886 the Vote for guns was transferred from the Army to the Navy Estimates, and that transfer involved changes of very great magnitude and difficulty. I fail to see why the Admiralty should not get their guns from the War Office if they got them as good there as elsewhere. It was a great responsibility for the Department to take over the control of this one and a quarter millions of money. It is well, surely, to provide our Woolwich operatives with plenty of work if we can get good guns from the War Department; but it is equally open to the Admiralty to avail themselves of the Armstrong firm, Whitworths, and others. As to the 110-ton gun, we none of us like it, but I believe it was ordered by the late Government. But having the ships ready and the gun carriages, surely it would be the height of folly not to use them out and then have no more of them. But I will not further follow in the path pursued by the hon. Gentleman. I turn to matters in the Memorandum issued by the noble Lord, in which naval men take deep interest. I do not like the First Lord's statements in the Memorandum as to the manning of the Fleet. It seems to me the Admiralty are almost afraid to face the question of the increase in the personnel of the Navy, and are taking refuge in an untried Naval Reserve. The noble Lord says—

Admiral Field

“An investigation into the actual duties which engage the Naval Service shows how large a proportion of officers and men are locked up in training establishments and educational courses, and in performing subsidiary work, such as surveying and transport of troops, &c.”

Well, I do not consider this is subsidiary work. Surveying has ever been an important work in the Service, and I hope will continue to be, and the transport of troops is work in which Her Majesty's ships may be usefully occupied in time of peace, and I hope it will not be changed. Then the noble Lord goes on to say—

“At the time when the ships in commission were insufficient to give adequate work and training to the officers and men of the Fleet, such employment was judicious; but when the number of fighting vessels is so increased as to be more than able to employ and train the peace establishments, the employment of very highly trained and instructed men in work of so secondary a nature is a waste of power.”

I do not call it work of a secondary nature or a waste of power. Further, the noble Lord says—

“I am, therefore, taking steps to reduce as far as I can the number of officers, men, and boys afloat in non-fighting vessels,”—

all very right, so far as it goes. Ships in harbour, I suppose, are meant—

“and at the same time, to shorten the general course of study for officers at the Naval College, and of gunnery and torpedo instruction for all but those who show special aptitude and ability.”

I hope I do not read in this an intention to shorten the course of study. The words may cover much or little. Of course, I do not want men to go on studying gun and torpedo service when they will not be in that branch of the Service. Then I come to the words in which the First Lord seems to contemplate an addition to the personnel of the Service, and yet seems afraid to face it—

"In looking ahead to the increased demands which the gradual completion of the new ship-building programme will make upon our manning resources, I have endeavoured to keep in view and combine certain definite objects. It seemed to me to be quite unreasonable to expect that the whole of the extra force required to man, three years hence, our greatly increased Fleet should exclusively consist of officers and men on the permanent establishments of the Navy, of continuous service, and entitled to pension. I was, therefore, anxious to associate the increase of the permanent establishments with a steady growth in the numbers and efficiency of the Royal Naval Reserve. The additions which have been made to the personnel of the Navy since the Naval Defence Act was passed have been large. Vote A stood at 62,600 in March, 1889. It has now reached 68,800, and I propose to raise it to 71,000 this year, and gradually to work up in subsequent years to a total of 75,000."

Now, no time is fixed for the increase to the maximum of 75,000. If we are to wait until the ships are built, then I reply the men will not be ready for the ships. You cannot make seamen in two years. The noble Lord is very properly going to establish a new training ship, but you cannot, I say, make seamen in two or three years. Therefore, it seems to me from the attention I have been able to give to this Memorandum, that the Admiralty have not faced this question of an increase in the personnel, but are relying too much on the Naval Reserve, as to whom there is this paragraph in the Memorandum—

"The sufficiency of my proposals entirely depends upon how far the Royal Naval Reserve is a reliable auxiliary force upon which the Naval Authorities can in emergency lay their hands with confidence."

But are we to wait until war breaks out until we discover whether reliance is to be placed on the Reserve? Will the noble Lord do as his predecessor did in 1869 when the Reserves were called out by notice? The retention or abolition of the Reserves depended upon the result of that call, and the result was most praiseworthy. I forget the percentage, but the men of the Royal Naval Reserve responded to the call in very large numbers, practically all we may say who were in the country, and went afloat in the reserve squadron, and upon a rare occasion the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Childers) flew the Admiralty flag. The call was a success then. If the noble Lord has any doubt now, let him repeat the experiment. Let him call out the Reserves this summer, and with a proper proportion of men-of-war men let them man the ships if they rally to the call. But if there is any doubt, do not, let us place a reliance where we may meet with failure in the hour of trial. The noble Lord is bound to test whether we can have confidence in the Reserves or not. The additions to the number of men and boys this year are satisfactory so far as they go, but I am sorry no addition is proposed to the force of Marines. I trust that steps will be taken to secure proper training for stokers. I am glad to see that there is to be an increase of Naval Reserve officers. With the claim of warrant officers for promotion I have no sympathy. I do not want to say anything about it, and I am sorry it was started; but, being started, I am glad it has met with the reception it has received. It is, I think, an unwise proposal, and would be of no advantage to the Service. The changes on the South African station will, I think, be viewed with gratification by naval men. I shall be glad to hear from the noble Lord as to the chief petty officers, who have had no increase of pension in proportion to their increase of pay. It is perhaps a small matter, but it has been promised that it shall be considered. I have seen a report in the papers that the Admiralty have granted it, but the petty officers themselves are uncertain. There is another small grievance on the part of majors of the Royal Marines and the Marine Artillery. They claim that they should be put in the same position as majors in the Sister Service. There is at present a difference of a year in the period after which extra pay is allowed; in the Army it is two years, in the Marines it is three years. Then I must refer to the dock accommodation, or want of it, at Bombay. For years past I have called attention to this subject—ever since I visited Bombay and saw the necessity for a dock there. And then when I saw a flagship for the Indian Station coming from Bombay to be docked at Malta, I said I would be unceasing in my efforts to get such a gross scandal remedied. We have been three years at it, and at last the Admiralty seem willing enough to undertake the work. I do not think the Admiralty are now to blame; I understand that the objection comes from the Treasury. But the Admiralty have no right to claim credit for the dock accommodation now provided at Bombay. It is no information to naval men. We have been aware of it for some time, and I may say that naval men do not approve of the dimensions of the dock. In any case, it is not the Imperial Government that can claim any credit for it, but the Bombay Trust, and they have done fairly well with the means at their disposal. I am very glad, indeed, to find that communication is to be made between the Admiralty and signal stations round the coast. If that were the only result from the late manœuvres, the expenditure would have been quite justified. One more question I should like to ask, and that is, "When will the dock at Malta be finished?" (Dock No. 4). This closes the subjects on which I have to speak at the moment. Some of them may seem of small importance; but they are of importance to naval men. I do not intend to now go into larger questions, upon which a great deal more might be said.

* (9.55.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I wish to say a few words on the finances of the Navy. Last year I pointed out that the Estimates as they stood for the Army and Navy were utterly unreliable, and that they gave no real indication of what the expenditure would be. My statement that the expenditure would be £6,000,000 more than appeared on the Estimates was denied at the time by the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty and by the Secretary of State for War. But a Return subsequently laid on the Table of the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer showed that I had understated the figures. The estimates for the two Services provided for £31,000,000; but the expenditure, under various subterfuges, shifts, and devices, reached £38,320,000, a difference of £7,000,000. When I come to the present year I find very much the same thing. We have an additional cause of confusion arising from a Supplementary Estimate. I have no hesitation in saying that this Supplementary Vote is for the purpose of relieving the Vote of the present year. It cannot be supposed that last year there was an under estimate of £350,000. I have no doubt that the purchase of armour plates and other materials has been hastened in order to relieve the Estimates of the coming year. In my experience that course was never permitted by the Treasury, and Supplementary Estimates were only allowed in the case of some unforeseen work having to be undertaken. The actual expenditure contemplated in the Estimates for the coming year upon the Navy is £14,215,000, but in addition to this there will be an expenditure under the Naval Defence Act of £3,400,000, and out of unexpended balances £140,000, and I understand a further expenditure out of the unexpended balances of previous years of about £300,000 more. When I come to the Army I find much the same state of things. The expenditure on the Army under the Estimates will be £17,897,000; but beyond this there would be an expenditure of £600,000 on fortifications, £300,000 on armaments under the Imperial Defence Act, whilst the Financial Secretary to the War Office told me he thought it probable that the expenditure under the Barracks Act would be between £400,000 and £600,000. Adding these various sums together, I find that the total expenditure on the two Services in the coming year will amount to no less a sum than £37,800,000, out of which only £32,000,000 appear on the Estimates of the year, £1,400,000 will be provided by the Consolidated Fund, £700,000 will come under the Imperial Defence Act, £600,000 under the Barracks Act, £3,440,000 under the Naval Defence Act for ships building by contract, and £500,000, I believe, out of the unexpended balances of former years. I say that, by providing for the expenditure in this variety of ways, you altogether destroy anything like financial control, and make the Estimates of the two Services absolutely unreliable as an index of what the expenditure within any financial year will be. I should like to call attention to what the real increase of expenditure has been in the two Services as compared with past years. I find that the average for the 10 years ending 1884 in the two Services was £25,000,000 a year. In 1884 it rose to £26,700,000; in 1889 it rose to £29,790,000; and in the coming year the amount will be £32,000,000 on the ordinary Estimates, and, besides that, there will be an expenditure provided for in the course of the last three or four years under the Naval Defence Act, the Imperial Defence Act—for fortifications, armaments, barracks, and ships—of £17,000,000. Therefore, there has been an increase on the ordinary Estimates within the last four or five years of £5,500,000, and a further and extraordinary expenditure provided for amounting to no less than £17,000,000. That appears to me to be a serious increase, and the only way to check it in future, in my opinion, is to insist on the payment of the expenditure for the year within the year. It is only in that way that the increase in the expenditure can be continually brought home to the House and the country. In 1879 the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) made a most vehement protest against the addition of extraordinary to ordinary expenditure. He said—

Admiral Field

“The cause of economy was unpopular enough at all times. Even when increased expenditure meant increased taxation it was difficult enough for its advocates to make way; but when increased expenditure did not mean increased taxation, but only the accumulation of burdens in the future, where, he should like to know, would be the cause of economy? The payment of taxes acted as a sobering force on our national policy. It sobered those who had to impose the taxes and those who had to pay them.”

It seems to me that those words of the right hon. Gentleman are exactly applicable to the present state of things and to the expenditure which the Government is now incurring. The general effect of the Naval Defence Act, the Imperial Defence Act, and the Barracks Act has been to postpone payments which ought to come within the financial year and to throw the burden on the future. It seems to me that the main object of all these transactions has been, in the first place, whilst expending considerable sums of money on the Army and Navy, not to increase the apparent burdens of the country; and, in the second place, to conceal the real expenditure of the country, and at the same time to claim credit for not largely increasing the Estimates, and to enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to claim a surplus when there has really been no surplus. I believe that if in the current year you had provided sufficient money to meet the expenditure within the year there would have been not a surplus, but a deficit. What the position in the coming year may be I do not know, but I think that in all probability there will be very little surplus, even taking into account all these payments. If they were made within the year, not only would there be no surplus, but there would be a large deficit. These considerations appear to me to be very weighty ones, as bearing on the continually growing expenditure of the country. My belief is that that expenditure will always grow unless we lay down as a matter of principle that the expenditure for the year is to be borne by the taxation of the year. That is the only real check that can be imposed on expenditure of this kind. With regard to the actual proposals of the Government for the year, I find that the increase on the Votes is about £350,000, after making certain deductions. Of this, £126,000 is due to the Wages Vote; but there would have been a still greater increase of payment under the Wages Vote if it had not been that there are for the first time considerable payments made to the credit of the Vote out of the contract with the Australian Colonies, and also payments coming from the Indian Government. Taking these two items into account, there would have been a further increase of no less than £130,000. I am unable to trace to what this large increase on the Wages Vote is due. No doubt there is an increase of 2,200 men to the Navy, but that only accounts for £80,000. I may here remark that I do not consider it at all satisfactory that this increase in the number does not include a single able seaman, but is composed of 900 boys, 412 pensioners, and 764 who are engineers. To my mind, it is open to objection that an addition should be made to the number of pensioners employed in active service. I know that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer was at the head of the Admiralty it was his policy to discourage very much the entry of pensioners into the Service. By that system you have side by side men performing similar duties, some of whom receive pensions for length of service in addition to their pay, whilst the others receive only their pay. And, after all, these 412 pensioners are no real addition to the strength of the Navy, because under any circumstances they would be bound to serve in time of war, and form, in fact, a kind of reserve. This addition really means a calling up of men from the Reserve to act as seamen in the Fleet, and I do not think that a desirable process. What is the cause of the increase in the number of men which has been going on for some years? Ten years ago it was not thought desirable to add to the number, as there were so many men at the home ports. I take it that the increase in the personnel is due to the increased number of ships on the foreign stations. I have no objection to the increase which has been made on certain stations in respect to very powerful vessels; but what I do think is open to consideration is whether, when we are making these additions to our foreign squadrons, we should not reduce the number of the smaller class of vessels which are really of no great use for war purposes. We have many of the latter class—vessels which steam at a small rate of speed, and which in time of war would not add to our strength, but would fall an easy prey to the enemy. On this point I would like to quote from one of the ablest writers on naval subjects in France. M. Weyl, in his work on La Marine Francaise, says—

“The Colonial Powers, and England more than any others, have numerous ships maintained for the empty purpose of exhibiting the national flag in distant seas, which are useless in a fighting sense. Such vessels may inspire the negro with awe, and gratify Englishmen by displaying their flag in foreign ports, but on the first alarm of war they must disappear from the seas.”

Again, my noble Friend Lord Brassey, with reference to the withdrawal of vessels from our foreign squadrons, says—

“The policy should be to replace as far as may be the permanent squadrons abroad by flying squadrons, and to keep in commission a less number of ships of an efficient type in lieu of the inefficient ships hitherto maintained. An occasional visit to foreign ports by an effective foreign squadron always makes a telling impression.”

Without going the length of saying that all our foreign squadrons should be replaced by flying squadrons, yet I cannot but think that the demand for seamen might have been met to a considerable extent by reducing the number of very small vessels on the foreign stations—vessels which are practically of no great use for war purposes, and which really seem only to be used for the purpose of showing our flag in the manner described by M. Weyl. I should like to ask the noble Lord to state at some greater length what is the real nature of the operation he is going to perform in respect of the squadrons on the West Coast of Africa and the North-East Coast of America. Perhaps the noble Lord will also inform the Committee whether St. Helena will be the new station on the West Coast of Africa, and also whether it is proposed to make any addition to the number of ships employed in that squadron. The noble Lord states in his Memorandum that Ascension Island will be the centre of the new station. Last year I brought under the notice of the House the subject of Ascension Island, showing to the best of my ability from high authorities that St. Helena is a far better station than Ascension; and I propose, at a later stage of the Estimates, to raise the question again this year. The subject was discussed late one night at the end of last Session, and the House will recollect, perhaps, that the discussion came to an end through an extraordinarily irrelevant speech made by an hon. Member, which induced the Deputy Speaker to allow the Closure to be moved as a means of putting an end to that speech. I shall propose to bring the subject on again when the Victualling Vote is before the Committee. In the meantime, I would merely ask the noble Lord to say what the increased establishment on the island will be, and whether there will be an addition made to the vessels on that station, and also what the cost of making a new station in that part of the world will be? In conclusion, I would only repeat that, in my opinion, the continual increase of expenditure both on the Army and the Navy can only be checked by bringing the burden of that expenditure on the taxpayers within the year.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

*(10.26.) THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. Forwood, Lancashire, Ormskirk): If I might venture to offer a suggestion as to the best mode of keeping down the expenditure of the Army and the Navy—certainly of the Navy—it would be to follow a directly contrary policy to that adopted by the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken when he was Secretary to the Admiralty. In the three years during which the right hon. Gentleman occupied that responsible position the expenditure on new construction fell to about the lowest ever known in recent years. The result of allowing the expenditure in any year to fall so far below that which is necessary to maintain the Fleet—

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I would remind the hon. Member that the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer was at the head of the Admiralty at that time.

*MR. FORWOOD: Whoever was at the head of the Admiralty during those three years, the fact remains that an abnormally low rate of expenditure involves an increased expenditure in future years, and disturbs all calculations either as to taxes to be laid or as to the condition at which the Navy ought to be maintained. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that our Estimates are unreliable as to the total expenditure, and that we are providing the money by devices and subterfuges. The devices and subterfuges are Acts passed by Parliament, and every sixpence we have spent has been based upon proposals approved by the House. The right hon. Gentleman says it is clear to his mind that the Supplementary Vote is taken for the purpose of relieving next year's Estimates. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that it is nothing of the sort. The Supplementary Vote of £350,000 is required for the expenditure of this year. I will explain shortly the reason of it. We are administering the programme of new construction under an Act of Parliament that very properly is very rigid, but at the same time very difficult. In interpreting that Act in connection with the preparation of last year's Estimates, we anticipated that certain sums, savings that had been paid into the bank, would have been placed at our disposal during the past year. But they were not; and in lieu of those savings the Admiralty have to ask the House for the Supplementary Vote of £350,000. Whilst we ask for that sum, the House will see that we have a considerable sum of money at our credit. Whilst we ask the House for £350,000, we have no less than £540,000 at our disposal in the Bank of England, available, under the Act, for expenditure in future years. I cannot follow the right hon. Gentleman in his figures, seeing that he mixes the Army and Navy expenditure together. I am here to answer for naval administration, and for expenditure under the Naval Defence Act. I think it will be seen that we have kept very closely in our expenditure to the Estimates we have laid before the House. I will give one or two figures to show what have been our performances compared with the statements contained in our Estimate. We estimated that in our statement of March 1889-90 our expenditure would be £1,290,000 on the new programme; whereas we have really expended £1,183,000. We estimated for 1890-91 that we might spend £2,394,000; whereas we really expended £2,386,000. It was estimated that the expenditure for the coming year would be £2,560,000; whereas, in fact, the amount actually provided for in the Estimates is £2,524,000. In order to complete the new programme, it is estimated that for the next two years the expenditure will amount to £2,390,000; whereas it will amount to £3,300,000, or an excess of £1,000,000. Of this over £300,000 is due to the cost of unexpected alterations and improvements which had to be made in vessels under construction, leaving the sum of only £600,000 in excess of the original Estimate of the cost of ships and armaments under the new programme of contract and dockyard work. This excess I claim to be a very small one on an original Estimate of £22,000,000 for the construction of new ships and armaments, and it certainly compares very favourably with the excess on the estimated expenditure under the programme of 1885 of £8,000,000 of money when the excess was something like £750,000. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has twitted my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer with not having provided the funds necessary for carrying out the programme year by year. Now, as regards the shipbuilding programme, the full cost of the ships built in the dockyards has been provided year by year out of the Revenue as acquired, and by the end of the present year we shall have spent in carrying out our programme something like £7,800,000, or at the rate of £2,600,000 per annum for three years. Therefore, the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman opposite can only be made applicable to the case of the contract ships, which are regarded as being outside the normal building Vote. These were required to make up the strength of the Fleet to the necessary point which in previous years a false economy has allowed to fall below the actual requirements. Of the £10,000,000 required for the construction of vessels by contract within the period allowed, no less than £7,000,000 will be provided in the five years, leaving a little over £2,000,000 to be provided from the Revenue of the two following years, so that out of the £22,500,000 to be expended under the Naval Defence Act for the construction of new ships and armaments, no less than £20,500,000 will have been provided for out of the taxation of the current years. I claim, therefore, that I have thus shown that the provisions of the Act have been well and wisely administered, and that Her Majesty's Government are not open to the charge either of not having kept within their promises as to their programme of expenditure, or of having constructed a large fleet of ships without paying for them out of the taxation of the country. The hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Banff (Mr. Duff) and the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir E. Reed) have congratulated the Admiralty on the progress they have made in carrying out their programme, and their remarks have emboldened me to make the statement I have just made with regard to the work we have done. Both those hon. Members have pointed out very properly that the rate at which Her Majesty's Government have pushed on the construction of the various new vessels has been of material benefit in reducing the cost of the ships; comparing their cost and the estimates made of them to the cost of the ships built under the former system, I think it will be seen that a great saving has been effected, and that whereas formerly the cost was about 20 or 30 per cent. over the Estimates, as a normal state of things it does not now exceed 3 per cent. The hon. Member for Banffshire alluded more especially to guns and ships of the old ironclad type. I may state that we have within the last two years done much towards making the old ironclads fit to take their place, in case of emergency, in the second line of Naval Defence. Some of these vessels which naval officers have thought worth the cost, have been re-engined, re-boilered, and re-armed, while those which are not quite so up to modern requirements have had new boilers put into them, and no doubt will serve as excellent vessels for defence around the coasts of this country. The hon. Gentleman opposite stated with regard to the armament of the old ships that we were not re-arming the Rupert. The fact is, however, that she is to be armed with breech-loading guns. The hon. Gentleman added that he regarded this as a proof that we were short of heavy breech-loading guns, and he stated that although my noble Friend takes credit for having over 1,400 breech-loading guns, the majority of those guns are the 4·7 inch and 6 inch guns. Undoubtedly, Sir, guns of these calibres must be the majority, because where a ship now carries two, or, at the most, four, heavy guns, she will have, in addition, from 10 to 16 guns of a smaller calibre. I think the hon. Member said there are only 67 nine-inch guns.

Mr. Forwood

*MR. DUFF: I said there were only 68 nine-inch guns in 1889, but that since then 27 were added last year, and an almost equal number this year, making altogether 122 guns of the nine-inch calibre.

*MR. FORWOOD: But that statement refers to a period some time back. What I say is, that we have now already delivered, mounted, or in reserve, 163 guns of eight-inch calibre and upwards.

*MR. DUFF: I referred to guns of over nine-inches diameter.

*MR. FORWOOD: The hon. Gentleman spoke of two years ago, and I was dealing with the figures given by the noble Lord the head of the Admiralty. I can assure the hon. Member that the construction of the heavier guns for the ships in the programme is proceeding as rapidly as possible. The hon. Member also dealt with the 110-gun, and suggested that we should condemn that gun. Does the hon. Member realise the fact that in condemning that gun we shall be condemning all the fittings for the gun and the gun-carriage itself, which, in point of fact, is the ship which carries it. In doing this we should be wasting a very large sum of money. I doubt if the hon. Member is aware of the cost involved in the alteration of one of the new ships from its adaptation to the 110-ton gun to that of say two 67-ton guns. According to the information we have on this point this could not be done for a much less cost than £200,000, inasmuch as it would involve almost a complete reconstruction of the vessel in all its fittings, carriages, and everything else which adapts it to its intended purpose, besides which it would take at least two years to make the new guns, and to re-construct and re-fit the ships. I can hardly think the hon. Member is prepared to suggest that the three ships which carry these heavy guns should be re-fitted with other guns at a cost of £600,000. We maintain that the 110-ton guns are good and efficient weapons, and those who are able to form the best opinion on the subject say there is nothing to impugn their safety or power of penetration. We have the Victoria and the Benbow with these guns on board, and so far no complaints have been made. With respect to the armament of the Sans Pareil, one gun had been proved and fitted and another is in the course of proof. But even supposing that one of the 110-ton guns of the Sans Pareil does not pass proof, two more are to be delivered next month, either of which can be placed on the Sans Pareil. Although the Admiralty admit that the 67-ton guns are the better, it would be a mistake to displace the 110-ton guns already mounted; and, as a matter of fact, these 110-ton guns were not first adopted when the present Government was in office, but by its predecessor. We have endeavoured loyally to carry out the policy assigned to us, and we have placed on the ships those guns intended for them. As regards smaller vessels, no one could be more opposed to the multiplication of small vessels than the First Lord of the Admiralty. The policy of the Board has been to replace smaller with larger vessels whenever practicable; but a certain number are needed for the demands of the Service, and so the Racer, a well-armed vessel, was launched in 1884. She has breech-loading guns on board, and is fit for many purposes. It is better, moreover, to spend money in refitting the two other small gunboats which had been referred to for the services they are required to perform than to spend a greater sum in building new vessels at an extra cost. I trust I have now answered all the points raised by the right hon. Gentleman.

(10.50.) SIR E. J. REED: I am rather surprised that the hon. Gentleman took so much to heart the observations of my right hon. Friend, who spoke of the subterfuges by which the actual expenditure has been brought down to a nominal point; because everybody must know that the old form which was adopted for the purpose of making public the great increase of the Navy, and involving the inclusion in the aggregate amount of the current expenditure of the following five years, was in itself a colossal subterfuge, though fortunately one we all clearly understand. If the Government, when they proposed the scheme for adding to the Navy, had put it before the country in two parts, one as relating to mere normal expenditure sanctioned by Parliament, and the other as an excess of expenditure to constitute an actual increase over and above the normal expenditure, it would not have been open to the objection that has been raised. I am bound to say that there is a very great deal of force in what my right hon. Friend has held as to this House of Commons losing control over the expenditure, because of its being brought in so many forms in excess of the Estimates for the year. I am satisfied that a few years hence it will be difficult to trace the present progress of the expenditure on ship-building, and it will be found, owing to the present system, almost impossible to extricate it from its confusion. At the same time, I must say that I, for one, care less about the form of these things than about the substance. As I have already stated, I think the redeeming feature of the Admiralty policy with regard to excess expenditure has been that they are doing their very utmost, and with marked success, to carry out the promise which they made to the House. That is, after all, a great point. My hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty has made reference to the enormous saving resulting from that policy—an actual saving in outlay upon the ships, which results from a quicker and more energetic construction, and the saving of the interest during the progress of construction upon capital that would lie idle while awaiting the adoption of a policy. From whichever side of the House that policy has come, it is deserving of the utmost credit. With regard to the suggestion of my hon Friend the Member for Banffshire that 68-ton guns must be substituted for 110-ton guns on certain ships, I was annoyed to hear the Secretary to the Admiralty say that the cost of the change of guns would amount to £200,000 per ship. It seems to me an impossible amount, seeing that the weight of the armament proposed to be substituted is less than that to be unshipped. I should like to see how that estimate is made out. I do not think it can be altogether satisfactory. The Secretary to the Admiralty has made a statement with reference to the progress of ships now building. I must say that this is a feature of Admiralty administration which I am disposed to watch with the greatest closeness. I think it would be a very extravagant thing indeed to interfere with ships during their progress by amending the plans or making alterations in the designs which are not beneficial, and might be the source of incalculable expenditure. As far as the statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty goes, I acknowledge readily that the changes made have been for good. The changes that have been made consist mainly of raising and lengthening the forecastles of the fast steamships, and mounting guns upon the elevated forecastle, with the result of improving the capability of the vessel in chasing an enemy. Consequently, I am not disposed to take exception to the course the Admiralty have taken. I rose to congratulate the First Lord on having published a preliminary Statement. It has had the effect of making the Debates in this House much more satisfactory than they could otherwise have possibly been, while it discourages anything like captious criticism. The Statement shows that matters of the greatest possible importance are engaging the attention of the Admiralty, and but for that knowledge the Debates might have very much extended, for during the past year there has been much to criticise. Take, for instance, the numerous trials of ships which have resulted in distinct failure. Had this fact been extracted in Debate the criticism would probably have been much keener; but the First Lord has dealt with the matter very fairly in his Statement. The noble Lord has been very wise to change his first intention with regard to many of these vessels, and to enlarge their boiler power instead of depending on forced draught. It is all very well to look to forced draught for steam service, but I hold that nothing can compensate for deficiency of boiler power. That fact seems to have been fully recognised by the Admiralty. There is one feature of the Estimates with which I am not satisfied—that is, the manner in which this scheme is being dealt with as regards the engineering of the Fleet. It must be known that the greatest calls are made upon, and the greatest responsibility falls upon, naval officers of the engineer class. I am astonished that in the days of a Steam Navy so little consideration should be given to the engineering management of the Navy. I have put together hastily the figures which are proposed this year to be expended on non-engineer officers. I find that the sum of £400,000 is to be paid to officers who are in no way capable of dealing with actual difficulties should they arise in connection with the machinery of a vessel. I remember very well the case of a trial with ships in the Channel Squadron, when a 13 knot vessel left entirely behind a 14 knot vessel which kept company as a matter of fact with an 11 knot vessel. I was asked for an explanation of the fact, and I suggested that the Board of Admiralty had better inquire of the captain. That gentleman was accordingly sent for, and he said that he had given the signal for full speed, and did nothing else, believing that he had completely executed his duty. I took a somewhat different view, and so, I am glad to say, did the Board of Admiralty. I want to know why we are to spend £400,000 a year on officers who do not understand steam machinery, and who are not charged with the responsibility of its management, while we only pay £153,000 a year to the Engineering Staff. Having regard to the great expenditure upon steam machinery, and the responsibility and importance connected therewith, I cannot understand why there is no representative of the engineering class on the Board of Admiralty. Why are there three Naval Lords and not one single representative for the vast concerns of the Machinery Department? But how is the engineering interest dealt with within the Admiralty? I say the system of representation is antiquated to the last degree. Will it be believed that this very year, when the amount of money to be expended upon steam machinery is £750,000, the gentleman responsible for the design and construction of this great mass of machinery receives £1,000 a year? I do not believe there is any man connected with a large mechanical enterprise in this country who would for a single moment defend such an arrangement as this. I think it shows a want of consideration and of appreciation of the circumstances on the part of the Admiralty. And my objection to it is, not that it is wrong in itself, but it injures confidence in the Admiralty. I can assure the First Lord there is a widespread want of confidence in Admiralty administration—and I am not speaking now of the Engineering Department—but it is looked upon with the greatest contempt by men totally unconnected with the Service. I do not understand why the Admiralty do not make some improvement in that respect. With regard to the engineer officers, their case is one which must be brought forward on another occasion. I can only say that at present the Navy is not properly supplied with engineer officers, and this is a subject which must receive early attention. Before I sit down I should like to say that I think the form of the Estimates and the additional figures which my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford has laid before the Committee will make it necessary to ask the Government to put the expenditure on the Army and Navy into a more compact form, so that the House may really know what they are dealing with. I should like to ask the First Lord whether, in view of the Debate and the criticisms made, he can next year present the figures relating to naval expenditure in such a form as to be available for comparative uses?

Sir E. J. Reed

*(11.7.) LORD G. HAMILTON: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford has moved for a Return corresponding to that produced last year, and I believe that this Return will give all the information required. If not, I shall be glad to supplement it with further information. As to the remuneration of engineers, it is well known that technical ability is not too highly paid either in Her Majesty's Service or in other Departments. The right hon. Gentleman has asked for reasons for the proposed increase in the number of men. Before the number of men is fixed there is a special estimate of all the men that are required to man the ships for which there are guns; and it has been part of the policy of the Admiralty to increase the personnel of the Navy so as to make it adequate to the increasing number of ships. The additional number of ships that has been brought into commission lately have been big ships, and there were now fewer small ships than there have been for many years past. This is a policy that will be continued. In my judgment, one cruiser showing the flag is worth two or three gunboats. The gunboats will be concentrated on the stations where they will be useful. With regard to the reduction of the standard in which my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Eastbourne has asked a question, my belief is that it is now too high for everybody, and I have substituted a lower standard for the gunboats; but, of course, those who show special aptitude can go higher—a change which I believe will be beneficial to teachers as well as to the taught. The hon. Member for Banff has made a violent attack on the 110-ton gun; and I must protest against the hon. Member's annual speech of one hour's duration.

*MR. DUFF: I never spoke an hour in my life.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The hon. Member censured me because I did not condemn everything done by the former Government. Personally I had nothing to do with the 110-ton gun; and I assume that the hon. Gentleman's colleagues when they introduced it took every care that it was likely to be useful to the Service. The hon. Gentleman has spoken of these guns as the laughing stock of the world. The Italians have a powerful Navy, and every ironclad is armed with the 110-ton gun, which have given the Italians no trouble. Yet their Navy certainly cannot be said to be the laughing stock of the world. Out of their twenty 110-ton guns none have given them trouble. But of the nine guns we have ordered two have given serious trouble. One was rejected and sent back, and the other is still under proof. I am surprised the hon. Gentleman should say we are afraid to fire it while it is still under proof. For this statement the hon. Member has no authority; but I will now read an opinion from one whose name will carry weight. Sir Benjamin Baker is probably of all engineers alive the man who has had the greatest experience of the strength and tensile power of steel, and he has made a most careful examination of this gun. It must be remembered that this is the worst of the guns delivered. We have been told that it has split from top to bottom, that it will burst next time, and that it has deflected so that it is utterly untrustworthy and cannot be fired. I have had a Report drawn up upon this gun, because I wished to know what the exact state of things is, and the following is the paragraph relating to this particular gun, endorsed by Sir Benjamin Baker after careful examination :—

"Some of the 110-ton guns on being tested exhibited defects which, although not affecting the power of penetration or the safety of the gun, pointed to the necessity of modification of designs, which has since been carried out, with the result of bringing them to the required level."

Therefore, the opinion of one of the first engineers in the country is that this defect neither affects the safety nor the power of penetration of the gun. I have seen every officer who has been in command of a vessel where the 110-ton gun has been placed, and I have never heard one single word of complaint from any naval officer who has had the handling of them. Some may have objected to the calibre, but all have expressed themselves contented as to the safety and accuracy of fire. Therefore, I hope that Members of Parliament will not catch up any gossip or anonymous paragraphs they see in the newspapers, and give currency to rumours which are absolutely untrue. I should like to inform the House what the effect is of circulating these rumours.

Lord G. Hamilton

A Government which has previously got its guns in this country has refused to get the guns for a ship any longer in this country, on the ground that Members of Parliament are constantly finding fault with the guns made in this country, and those guns have been made elsewhere, though I maintain that they will be inferior to the guns which would have been made in this country. All that I have done is, on finding that gun settled upon by my predecessor, to see that it has fair play. The hon. Member says that somebody told him that it was a bad gun, and he recommended that we should take it out and put in 67-ton guns. That would mean a cost of £100,000 or £200,000 in every ship, besides laying up the ships for a long time. The 110-ton gun penetrates 37in. of iron at a close range, and although no ship may carry that amount of armour, with the 110-ton gun there is the probability of the shot penetrating armour even when the blow is an oblique one. I maintain that we have made a most careful examination of the question, and have taken care that no gun in any way unsafe has been put on board any of Her Majesty's ships.

(11.26.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Do I understand the noble Lord to say there will be no increase in the West Coast Squadron?

LORD G. HAMILTON: None.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: May I ask whether St. Helena will be within the ambit of the new squadron?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I cannot answer that question offhand. It is just upon the line, and my impression is that it is just outside the ambit.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Will the noble Lord lay on the Table of the House a comparative statement of the ships on Foreign Stations as compared with the number six years ago? I think it is desirable we should know what change has been made.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I will consider that.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: There is another question I should like to ask. Why is the contribution of the Island of Ceylon not included in this Vote? Formerly the Island used to pay £4,500 a year for naval purposes. Has that contribution ceased? I hope on some future occasion the noble Lord will give us some reason why that contribution has ceased—if that be the case.

*(11.28.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I wish to impress upon the First Lord of the Admiralty the importance of having one or two ocean despatch boats capable of steaming at the rate of 25 knots per hour continuously for six days without stopping to coal, thus steaming at the rate of 600 knots per 24 hours; and thereby carrying a despatch from England to the Cape of Good Hope in six days. These despatch boats might require a double or even a treble set of boilers, to enable one set to be cleaned during the passage; but there is no good reason why such a vessel should not be built, considering there already exist steamers which are capable of steaming at the rate of 27 knots per hour for short distances. In the case of an European war there is little doubt that the Suez Canal would be immediately closed to our men-of-war and despatch boats. It is, therefore, all-important that we should be able to communicate with the Cape quicker than any other nation, for it must be borne in mind that immediately war is declared it invariably happens that the submarine cables are broken or become disabled. During the Russian difficulty in 1885 the Cape was without telegraphic communication with Europe for many weeks. Such a despatch boat would be capable of carrying at least two long-range guns and a sufficient number of rapid-firing machine guns for self-defence, if surprised. One of these despatch vessels should always be in readiness in England, another at the Cape, and a third should be stationed either in Ceylon or at Singapore. They would be of enormous importance not only in time of war in protecting our commerce, but in preventing war when any complications had arisen with foreign Powers. I would ask the Admiralty whether they cannot see their way to laying down, at all events, one of these ocean despatch boats in the present year.

(11.31.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berkshire): The First Lord of the Admiralty and my hon. Friend the Member for Banffshire (Mr. Duff) have been exchanging shots on the biggest bores in the Service. I am going to challenge the noble Lord on the smallest bore. I trust that by continually pegging away I shall be able to instil into the minds of the noble Lord and his colleagues that the magazine rifle does not possess all the excellent qualities with which they credit it. It seems to me very remarkable that though so much has been heard about the re-arming of the Army with the new magazine rifle, not a word has been said by the First Lord of the Admiralty as to re-arming our sailors and marines. I should like to know what is to be the policy of the Admiralty with regard to this matter? Our sailors and marines are quite as frequently called into action as the Army, and it is very desirable that, as they are often employed side by side, they should be armed, if not with identically the same weapon as the Army, at any rate with a rifle of the same bore and using the same cartridges. Does the Admiralty approve the new magazine rifle? If not that is a strong argument against its adoption for the Army. If the Admiralty do approve it, why is it not proposed to distribute it to the sailors and marines? I would advise the First Lord and his advisers at the Admiralty not to look at this new magazine rifle with the same rose-coloured spectacles as the War Office. I would like to give two instances that have occurred during the last few days of the way in which the rifle is viewed in the Army itself. An hon. and gallant Member, a supporter of Her Majesty's Government, told me that he had asked several of his Service friends what they thought of the weapon, and that they only smiled and said, "We had rather not say anything about it; we do not want to be quoted;" and the commanding officer of one of the regiments of Foot Guards told me that upon the command to "order arms" it is no longer possible to judge of the smartness with which it is obeyed by the simultaneity of the sharp rap of the rifles on the ground, as this has been abandoned owing to its being considered that the mechanism of the weapon will not stand the blow on the ground. I would remind the noble Lord of the unfavourable Reports which were sent in by the Naval Authorities to whom the rifle was in 1888 forwarded for trial.

LORD G. HAMILTON: Might I say one word. We are taking no Vote for the magazine rifle.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: That is just my point. If I am out of Order, I have no doubt the Chairman will call me to Order. My point is that, if this weapon is as good as it is represented to be at the War Office, it is a monstrous shame that the Navy should not have it. It is because it is not included in these Estimates that I am finding fault.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman is quite entitled to find fault with the Navy for not adopting the rifle if he is prepared to advocate its adoption, but not otherwise.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I am prepared to advocate the adoption of a different rifle to the one now in use in the Navy, and I am endeavouring to show the reason why, though a different rifle should be adopted, the Admiralty should not adopt the weapon recently adopted by the War Office. I want to show that the Reports received from the various ships bear out my view, and justify the noble Lord in taking the line I am about to suggest. The officers of H.M.S. Excellent, in reporting on the weapon, said:—"The mechanism appears too weak to stand the usage of active service," and similar Reports were received from other ships.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is not in Order in adducing evidence against a rifle which the Vote does not refer to.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I wish to know whether the noble Lord thinks it a desirable thing that the Army should be armed with a weapon of one calibre and carrying one sort of cartridge, and the Navy with another weapon carrying another sort of cartridge. We know perfectly well what took place on the expedition across the desert to Khartoum. In a single square, consisting of 1,120 men, there were no less than five sorts of ammunition in use, and the consequence naturally was the greatest confusion. I want to know whether the Admiralty think the Navy should be armed with the Martini-Henry, with a bore of 450, and the Army with a rifle having the bore of the magazine rifle. Then I want to know why, if it is necessary for our Army to have a magazine rifle, it is not necessary for our Navy; why should our Blue Jackets and Marines be placed on a different footing to our soldiers?

*(11.41.) MR. DUFF: I am bound to make one or two remarks in reply to the noble Lord. The noble Lord went out of his way to attack me, and I appeal to the Committee whether he was justified in that attack. There were several Motions on the Paper on going into Committee of Supply. Upon one or two of those Motions I was prepared to speak, but I refrained from speaking on any of them to facilitate the progress of public business. My hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) asked me if I would make my remarks on the Vote, and I consented to do so. When we got into Committee I made what I thought was a rather conciliatory speech. I congratulated the Admiralty upon the progress they had made in the building of ships. In regard to the 110-ton gun. I said I did not blame the First Lord and his Board. But the First Lord has made a very violent attack upon me. He said I am in the habit of speaking for an hour and making the same speech every year. I have not said a word about the 110-ton gun since 1887. In that year I did appeal to the noble Lord not to put such guns on board the Victoria and Sans Pareil—we could not help ourselves with regard to the Bombow—and I am satisfied that if the advice which I then gave had been taken, the country would have been saved a great deal of money. An hon. and gallant Member (Admiral Field) has said to-night that the insufficiency of guns for the Navy is the result of the policy of the Liberal Government in letting down the Navy. From that I altogether dissent. I assert that the reason of the insufficiency will be found in the action of the present Government who reduced the Estimates in 1887-88 by £793,000, and in 1888-89 by £905,000, making £1,698,000 in two years. Nothing could exceed the vacillation of the Government in their naval policy, for after making these reductions they came to the House and said "we want £21,000,000." Before resuming my seat, I wish to ask what the Admiralty intend to do with regard to the two small vessels which have been sent to the Zambesi. I understand that the rate of mortality amongst the crews is very heavy owing to the unhealthiness of the climate, and that the vessels can only do useful work for three months in the year, the water during the other nine months being too shallow for them to operate.

*(11.42.) LORD G. HAMILTON : The position of the Admiralty as to the magazine rifle is this:—They tried the magazine rifle, and one of the Reports was not entirely favourable, but the other was that the weapon was a great improvement on the heavy Martini-Henry rifle. There is no hurry for the magazine rifle in the Navy. It is well that the two Services should have the same weapon, but the duties of the sailors vary very much from those of the soldiers, and there is not as much necessity for the Navy to have the new rifle as for the Army. The Admiralty do not propose to order any this year, and I hope that the result of postponing the orders will be that we will not only get the rifle much cheaper, but that the improvements indicated will be perfected. The hon. Member for Banff has complained of my remarks concerning him. I thought those remarks were harmless; but if they have given him any offence, I retract them. The vessels in the Zambesi will be there for some time. Certain parts of the Zambesi are healthy; and as these vessels have a draught of 1½ ft. only, they can go anywhere. We have not heard from the officer for some little time, but the last Report was that the vessels were doing excellent work. In reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) I have to say that by some arrangement with the Treasury the appropriation in aid lapsed this year. If the right hon. Gentleman will put a question on the Paper in regard to the matter, I will answer it.

MR. MARJORIBANKS : I do not in the least say that because the Army is to have the magazine rifle the Navy, therefore, must have the same weapon, but I maintain that all small arms should have the same calibre and carry the same cartridge.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £3,404,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the expense of wages, &c., to Officers, Seamen and Boys, Coast Guard, and Royal Marines, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892.”

(11.53.) Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”—(Mr. Channing.)

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I appeal to the hon. Member not to press this Motion. If this Vote is not taken now I shall be compelled to ask for the time of private Members next week.

SIR E. J. REED: Can the right hon. Gentleman give us a promise that the general Debate may be taken on the next Vote?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will endeavour to meet the reasonable wishes of the hon. Gentleman on that point. I hope the Report of this particular Vote may be taken at an early hour. If we cannot take the Report at an early hour I will undertake that an opportunity for discussion will be afforded on the next Vote.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I presume that if this Vote is taken to-night the Government will not take private Member's nights next week.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I shall be glad if there is no necessity to take private Members' nights next week; but I must remind the hon. Gentleman that we must have certain Votes by the 16th of March.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I hope that if the Vote is taken now a further opportunity will be afforded for a general discussion of Navy questions, so that hon. Members who desire to do so can range over the whole question of Navy expenditure.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We are in the hands of the Chairman, but, so far as the Government are concerned, they will raise no objection to such discussion.

*MR. DUFF: May I ask you, Mr. Chairman, if it would be in order to take a general discussion on a subsequent Vote?

THE CHAIRMAN: A general discussion has been allowed upon the Victualling Vote.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported to-morrow.

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

ARMY SCHOOLS BILL.—(No. 211.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I hope the House will agree to give this Bill a Second Reading. Its purpose is simply to put Army schools in the same position as other schools under the Elementary Education Act, enabling such to earn the Government grant.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

PENAL SERVITUDE BILL.—(No. 192.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I do not know if the House will be content to treat this Bill in the same manner. The Bill is of a simple character. It proposes to reduce the minimum term of penal servitude to three years, and to make some minor changes with regard to penal servitude and the prevention of crimes. I propose that it shall be referred to the Law Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Matthews.)

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I presume the right hon. Gentleman will allow an interval to elapse before putting down the Bill for the Committee stage?

MR. MATTHEWS: It is my intention to move that the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Law.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask does the Bill extend to Ireland?

MR. MATTHEWS: Certainly, that is the intention.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

ELECTORS REGISTRATION (ACCELERATION) BILL.—(No. 147.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Causton.)

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I hope the hon. Member will not persist in the Motion. The Bill, I believe, has general approbation. County Councils have again and again urged us to introduce it and they have stated that unless the Bill is passed they do not see any possibility of carrying out the elections on November 2nd with anything like satisfaction or accuracy, that the number of elections is very large, and that the time for revising and printing under the existing law will not allow of the register being made up in time for the forthcoming County Council elections. It is a matter of urgency, and we have introduced the Bill at the request of the County Councils.

*MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I think the right hon. Gentleman cannot have examined the Amendments on the Paper to this Bill. They are Amendments of a very serious character and I do not think it is reasonable to ask the Committee to proceed with the discussion at such a time. If the right hon. Gentleman wishes to make progress with the Bill he must take the discussion earlier in the evening. I cannot waive my objection.

*MR. RITCHIE: Surely the hon. Member will allow us to proceed to the first Amendment? It is clear that unless the Bill passes before Easter it will be useless and must be withdrawn. The hon. Gentleman is aware that the Government have certain financial business that must now be proceeded with and this is simply a Bill for the readjustment and acceleration of the registration machinery.

*MR. CAUSTON: I am not opposed to the principle of the Bill but I must maintain my objection to proceeding with it without discussion.

*MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): The House should bear in mind that County Councils have pressed upon individual Members the desirability and urgency of passing the measure. It must be obvious that when hon. Members opposite give notice of Amendments which widen the scope of the Bill and convert it into something else, it will be a reasonable inference that their object is to defeat the measure by a side wind. I hope Her Majesty's Government will insist on passing the Bill, and if necessary devote a Morning Sitting to the purpose.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): The desirability of passing the Bill is generally acknowledged. I hope the hon. Member will not persist in his Motion. If the Bill is not passed the result must be that a large number of electors will be disfranchised so far as the next County Council elections are concerned. When County Councils were established it was recognised as one of the advantages that County Councils might make useful suggestions to this House, and here is the first practical suggestion, the value of which is acknowledged. I hope the Government will stand by their Bill, and if necessary name a day for the Committee to report the Bill to the House.

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax): It is desirable that we should understand each other. I understand that the right hon. Gentleman will be satisfied if we get as far as the first Amendment?

*MR. RITCHIE: No, not satisfied at all.

MR. STANSFELD: I suppose there is no suggestion that any of us are desirous of defeating the Bill? I am not aware that there is any such desire. But we claim time for the discussion of Amendments which appear on the Paper. To proceed through Committee to-night would not be reasonable; but I think there is no objection to making some progress, and, under the circumstances, I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw his Motion.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member withdraw?

*MR. CAUSTON: No, Sir.

*MR. RITCHIE: We are extremely anxious to pass the Bill, because we have a great regard for the wishes and representations of the County Council as to the enormous difficulties they will have to encounter if the Bill does not pass. The Government have placed on the Paper certain Amendments in order to carry out their undertakings. The other Amendments deal not with matters of mere machinery for registration, but with questions of franchise, and these the Government cannot accept. Therefore, it is entirely in the hands of the House whether the Bill shall pass or not.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): May I suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should revert to the old practice of committing the Bill pro forma, when the Government Amendments could be inserted? It is most difficult to see how the Government Amendments will work, and the anxiety is in regard to Parliamentary registration. Many Members are of opinion that as the Bill stands it is a disfranchising measure. I do not say whether they are right or wrong, but I am quite sure the Government Amendments will help to clear up many points, and if these were inserted pro forma we should be better able to judge of the effect.

*MR. RITCHIE: Very well. The Government Amendments are few, though important; and I will adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman if the Bill will be forwarded by that course.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): Sharing the strong feeling that the Bill should be proceeded with, and yet admitting the force of the objection to the Bill being proceeded with at this time of night, I venture to suggest to the Government that they should take a Morning Sitting for the Bill. Time has been wasted on Friday nights recently, Members not availing themselves of the opportunity afforded them for Motions of which they have given notice, and a Morning Sitting on Friday might be usefully devoted to the Bill.

*MR. RITCHIE: If the hon. Member will withdraw his Motion I will formally move the insertion of my Amendments.

*MR. CAUSTON : I really cannot agree to the proposition. It is now nearly half-past 12. Members who have Amendments on the Paper are not here, not expecting the Bill to come on. I have no desire to stop the acceleration of the register; indeed, the nearer the register upon which an election is taken the better for the Liberal Party. Nothing is further from my intention than to disfranchise any elector, but it is unreasonable, under the circumstances, to proceed with the Bill, and I must persist in my objection.

MR. H. H. FOWLER ; Let me assure my hon. Friend that the proposal is to take a merely formal stage, and the rights of himself and others to move Amendments will remain intact. It is, in fact, merely a reprinting stage. We shall have the convenience of having the Bill in the shape in which the Government desire it to proceed through Committee in the usual way, and subject to other Amendments.

*MR. CAUSTON : On this understanding, and in deference to the right hon. Gentleman, I withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made.

Bill reported; to be reprinted, as amended [Bill 234]; recommitted for Thursday.

ARCHDEACONRY OF CORNWALL BILL [LORDS]—(No. 177.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress ; to sit again upon Thursday.

ASSESSMENT OF TAXES (REGULATION OF REMUNERATION) BILL—(No. 221.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

Committee report Progress ; to sit again upon Thursday.

POLLEN FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL. (No. 91.)

As amended, considered ; read the third time and passed.

LOCAL BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 151.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University) : I beg to move that Progress be reported. I agreed to the Second Reading of the Bill inasmuch as the Bill was one tending in the direction of an ultimate development of the local administration of the Bankruptcy Law. I said, however, the principle must be safeguarded in its operation. The Bill deals with an extremely technical subject, and its details require careful consideration, and in some respects revision, to bring them into harmony with existing legislation on the subject, and to safeguard its operation. I would ask the hon. Member to postpone this stage until after Easter.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) : I confess I am considerably surprised and disappointed at the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. I speak within the memory of many hon. Members when I say that he assented to the Second Reading on the ground that the discretion rested in the Lord Lieutenant to provide a sufficient safeguard.

*MR. MADDEN : I do not make the Motion in any spirit of hostility to the Bill. I stated on the Second Reading that I should never have assented to that stage if the Bill had not contained the safeguard referred to, but I never said, or implied, that I was satisfied with the Bill in its present form. My only desire is that the Bill shall be carefully considered by those well versed in bankruptcy law and proceedings. There is no intention of impeding the progress of the Bill, after Easter, I merely wish to insure it being a safe and useful measure.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress ; to sit again upon Monday, 13th April.

MARRIAGES OF NONCONFORMISTS
(ATTENDANCE OF REGISTRARS)
BILL.—(No. 144.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS ACTS
AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 17.)

As amended, considered; to be read the third time to-morrow.

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION BILL.

(No. 40.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I object.

MR. A. H. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I think the object of the Bill is well known and approved by all friends of education. Nearly every County Council is interested in the matter. I hope the hon. Member will not persist in his objection.

MR. TOMLINSON: I am not sure that all persons interested in education do agree with the Bill in its present form.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL FOR EDUCATION (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I hope my hon. Friend will allow the Bill to proceed. The subject does very much exercise the minds of County Councils.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

CORN SALES BILL.—(No. 131.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): This is a matter which Her Majesty's Government must reserve the right of dealing with. I think my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Agriculture may possibly have something to say to a Bill which compels all corn to be sold by weight, while at present it may be sold by measure.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday.

MOTION.

PUBLIC BODIES (PROVISIONAL ORDERS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Tomlinson, Bill to remove doubts as to the powers of Public Bodies in reference to Provisional Orders Bills under "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Tomlinson, Sir Richard Paget, Sir William Houldsworth, Mr. Whitley, Mr. Hunter, Sir Albert Rollit, Mr. Barclay, Mr. Lafone, and Mr. Woodall.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 233.]

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

[APPENDIX.]

APPENDIX.

MEMORANDUM OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE RELATING TO THE ARMY ESTIMATES, 1891-92.

Presented to both Houses of Parliament by Command of Her Majesty, February, 1891.

A recommendation of the Public Accounts Committee, which has been approved by the Treasury, compels a further change to be made in the form of the Estimates. The system, however, which was adopted last year makes it comparatively easy to make a comparison between the two years. The result of the change is that the number of Votes has been increased from 13 to 16.

The Estimates for 1890-91, including the Ordnance Factories Vote, after making the necessary transfers, in order to make a fair comparison with those for 1891-92, show an anticipated expenditure of £14,565,100 for Effective and £3,092,200 for Non-Effective Services, making a total of £17,657,300. Afterwards, a Supplementary Estimate of £180,100, mainly for the equipment of the Volunteer Force, was agreed to, bringing up the total amount voted by Parliament for 1890-91 to £17,837,400.

For 1891-92 the Estimates, with the Ordnance Factories Vote, show an expenditure of £17,545,400, of which £14,453,400 is for Effective, and £3,092,000 for Non-Effective Services. It will thus be seen that, including the Supplementary Estimate, the amount now required shows a net decrease of £292,000 as compared with last year.

The number of men on the Establishment shows little variation. A few men of special skill have been added for the charge of the more complicated armaments now in use, and a small addition has been made to the Ordnance Store Corps.

The number of enrolled Militiamen has decreased during the past year by 1,865. Considering the revival in trade, and the facilities given to Militiamen to purchase releases from their engagements, this decrease in numbers can scarcely cause surprise. It would have been more marked but for the revision of Militia Establishments last year, which provided for increase in those localities where recruits could be more easily obtained. The recommendations of Lord Harris's Committee are being followed in the extension of the course of musketry for recruits, the issue of flannel shirts, and in the provision of greater comforts to Militiamen under canvas. The reports of the Inspecting Officers are almost uniformly creditable to the Militia. Much zeal is evinced by all ranks during the training.

The Yeomanry continues to be well reported on as regards general efficiency, and its numbers remain almost stationary. Some alterations advantageous to the force have been made in the regulations in respect of men kept from duty by sickness, the injury allowance to men and horses, and the travelling expenses of the Permanent Staff. The tenure of command by Militia, as well as Yeomanry Commanding Officers, has been reduced to five years, with power of renewal.

The Volunteers show a reduction in enrolled numbers of nearly 3,000 men. This reduction is brought about mainly by the very stringent conditions of efficiency, which have weeded out some of the older and less energetic men, but is also partly due to the fact that, whilst efforts have been made to increase the Artillery Branch in places where their numbers would be deficient on mobilization, it did not seem desirable to allow increases of Establishment to Volunteer Infantry in districts where there existed an undue proportion of that arm. Some increases of Establishment have, however, been lately sanctioned, and there seems no reason to fear a continued diminution of numbers. I am satisfied that the Volunteers we now have are very much more efficient for their duties than before. I am sorry to say that the dearth of Officers still continues. While it is mainly due to the increasing disinclination of gentlemen of means and leisure to make the necessary sacrifices, there can be no doubt that the falling off of local subscriptions, even in the matter of prizes, has thrown greater expense on Volunteer Officers.

During the past year 18 Brigade Camps have been held, and have proved to be an unqualified success in England. All the General Officers of districts are unanimous in praising the good effect of these camps. In many cases the brigades went into camp well advanced in all their internal arrangements for Transport and Supply, and for Medical and Sanitary Services, and without any assistance at all from the Regular Army. It is satisfactory also to record the general approval of the work done by the new Batteries of Position, of which there are now 79, with 316 guns. The value of this addition to our defensive forces can hardly be exaggerated.

On the face of the Estimates there appears to be a reduction on the Volunteer Vote of nearly £180,000. It is hardly necessary to point out that this sum represents the expenditure for equipment granted last year, and that in reality this Vote shows a small increase.

Vote 1 shows a net increase of about £42,000. This is mainly due to the large number of men, who, after the termination of their seven years' engagement, are receiving their deferred pay, and are being passed into the Reserve, by the occurrence of leap-year, and by a proposal which I hope to be able to make during the present Session for improvement in the position and training of the Garrison Artillery. The increase would have been greater but for the larger contributions made by certain colonies towards the cost of their defence. This subject is being thoroughly threshed out by the departments concerned, and it has been found in several cases just and necessary to require an increased amount of colonial contribution.

The Vote for Warlike Stores and Armaments shows a reduction of £202,504. This is almost entirely due to the approaching completion of the programme undertaken in 1838, under the Imperial Defence Act for the improvement of the defences of our ports and coaling stations. The amount taken in this Vote for the new rifle is almost identical with that in the Estimates for the present year.

I am compelled to ask for an increase of £51,500 on the Vote for Works. Of this sum, £10,000 is taken towards the provision of new range accommodation, which is becoming more and more difficult every year. £6,894 is required for carrying out the provisions of the Aldershot Roads Act of last Session, by which ranges of paramount importance are permanently secured to the Regular Army and to the Volunteers. And a large increase is also occasioned by the demands for new sanitary services and other minor improvements in Barrack accommodation in all parts of the country, as well as for additional stations for Position Finding.

The fall in prices accounts for the reduction on the Vote for provisions of £37,804. On the other hand, the item of Miscellaneous Services is swollen to the extent of £61,304 by the charge for Interest on the Imperial Defence and Barrack Loans. In the latter case provision has been made for a sinking fund, which will pay off the whole amount in 20 years.

EDWARD STANHOPE.

7th February, 1891.

STATEMENT OF FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY, EXPLANATORY OF

THE NAVY ESTIMATES, 1891-92.

Presented to both Houses of Parliament by Command of Her Majesty.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

The Naval Estimates for 1891-92 show an apparent increase of £428,500 over those of 1890-91, the respective figures being £14,215,100 and £13,786,600.

This increase of expenditure is associated with an increase of duties, the custody of Naval Ordnance Stores having been transferred from the War Office to the Admiralty. This entails a special expenditure of £78,000, to meet which £70,500, hitherto borne on Army Estimates, has been transferred to Navy Votes. On the other hand an increased appropriation is anticipated from the Indian Government in aid of Naval funds for work done in Indian waters. The full subsidy payable under the Imperial Defence Act by the Australian Colonies will become due this financial year. Against this has to be put the cost of keeping in commission and reserve the seven ships constituting this special squadron, and the payment of an annuity for the redemption of the original cost of the construction and equipment of these vessels. The last instalment of this annuity will be paid on the 1st April 1900.

Including these various contributions and items, the net increase to Navy Votes is reduced to £358,500.

NEW CONSTRUCTION.

To appreciate the full advance made in new construction during the past year, and the progress anticipated in 1891-92, it is necessary to comprise all the vessels building for the Navy in the following groups, giving the sources from which their cost is met:—

1. Contract Ships. Old programme: cost met out of annual estimate.
2. Contract Ships. Naval Defence Act: paid for by special provision under Naval Defence Act and repayable by an annuity charged on the Consolidated Fund.
3. Australian Flotilla. Cost defrayed out of Consolidated Fund, repayable by an annuity chargeable on Naval Votes.
4. Dockyard-built Ships. Cost charged against Annual Naval Votes.

CONTRACT SHIPS.

Old Programme.

At the close of the year 1890-91, of the ships building by contract only one ship belonging to the Old Programme of Construction will remain in the hands of private shipbuilders, viz., the "Blenheim," First Class Cruiser, building on the Thames.

It is anticipated that she will be delivered in the autumn of 1891.

CONTRACT BUILT SHIPS.

The progress of work by contract under the Naval Defence Act during the year 1890-91 has been carried on under conditions of considerable difficulty, arising out of the great activity in mercantile shipbuilding, and the consequent extraordinary demands both for labour and materials.

Notwithstanding these adverse conditions, very good progress has been made.

Of the seventeen Second Class Cruisers building by contract eight have been launched, and one, the "Latona," has been delivered at Portsmouth, where she is now completing for sea.

A number of the remaining vessels of the class are rapidly advancing, and will be speedily set afloat.

It is anticipated that with two exceptions all of them will be delivered by the ensuing autumn, and remaining two before April 1892.

The five First Class Cruisers building by contract are also making good progress, and will be launched during the year 1891-92.

Three of the four First Class Battle Ships building by contract are now considerably advanced. The fourth is in an earlier stage of construction.

The deliveries of armour for all the battle ships, both building in the Dock-yards and by contract, have been on the whole so satisfactorily carried out as greatly to facilitate the progress of work. The manufacture of such large quantities of armour in so limited a period was a difficulty which required very careful consideration and pre-arrangement, but the necessities of the case have been well met, and notwithstanding the sudden past inflation of the price of metals the contracts made have been on the basis of the prices paid in 1886 for the armour of the "Trafalgar" and "Nile."

The whole of the contract programme of the Naval Defence Act has been thus placed, except six vessels of the torpedo gun type. They will shortly be put out to contract. As they are of small dimensions, their construction and completion will not occupy more than eighteen months.

AUSTRALIAN FLOTILLA.

The completion of the five cruisers and two torpedo gunboats, building under the Imperial Defence Act of 1888, has been delayed by the conditions of the market, both as regards labour and materials, but the main cause of the delay has been the unusually long period required for the completion of the steam trials of these vessels to surmount difficulties which have arisen with their boilers.

It has been finally decided by the Board to take over the vessels without insisting upon the completion of the maximum forced draught trials embodied in the contracts.

The natural draught trials of all the vessels have now been finished, and the results, within the limits of power developed, have fully realised or exceeded the intentions of the design.

It was stated that with 4,500 (natural draught) horse-power, the protected cruisers of the "Katoomba" (late "Pandora") class would have measured mile speeds of $16\frac{1}{2}$ knots.

The typical vessel of the class, which has been tried, attained a mean speed of $17\frac{1}{4}$ knots for a period of eight hours' continuous steaming; and on the measured mile reached a maximum speed, with natural draught, of $18\frac{1}{2}$ knots, with an indicated horse-power of 5,450.

In connection with the building and completion of the Australian Flotilla, an experiment was made that has proved completely successful.

Having been built under a special Act of Parliament, it was decided that the vessels should be completed in all respects for sea, with the exception of their ammunition and consumable stores, at the Works of the Contractors. This arrangement it was hoped would avoid the delay, cost, and alterations which not unfrequently attend trials of contract-built ships at the dockyards. The anticipated advantage of this arrangement has been fully realised, and the trials of guns, torpedoes, and propelling machinery, have all been carried out and completed before the vessels have been handed over. They will all be ready for commission within the financial year 1890-91.

DESIGNS OF SECOND CLASS BATTLE SHIPS, AND OF DOCKYARD SHIPS LAID DOWN IN 1890-91.

At the time when the Statement explanatory of the Navy Estimates for 1890-91 was drawn up, the designs for the "Centurion" and "Barfleur" were still incomplete. The vessels are now in hand, and the following are their leading particulars:—

Their principal dimensions are:

Length	360 feet.
Breadth	70 "
Displacement	10,500 tons.

Speed on Measured Mile:

Forced draught	18 to 18½ knots.
Natural draught	17 knots.

Coal supply at designed load draught ... 750 tons.

The Armament of each ship will include:

- 4 10-inch 29-ton guns in two barbettes.
- 10 4.7-inch quick-firing guns.
- 17 6-pr. and 3-pr. quick-firing guns.
- 5 Torpedo tubes, above water.
- 2 " " submerged.

The disposition of the armament is very similar to that of the First Class Battle Ships.

The 10-inch guns are mounted in pairs in armoured barbettes which extend down to the steel protective deck at the top of the armour belt. These guns will be capable of being worked entirely by manual power, and, in addition, steam power will be supplied for the training of the guns and the supply of the ammunition.

The armour protection of the hull proper consists of a belt of armour, having a maximum thickness of 12 inches, extending over a length exceeding 200 feet amidships, being completed by armoured bulkheads, with a steel deck from 2 to 2½ inches in thickness at the top of the belt. Before and abaft the armour belt a strong protective under-water deck completes the protection to the bow and stern.

Above the thick belt the broadside will be protected to a height of 9½ feet above water by steel armour and wood backing equivalent to a total thickness of 4 inches of steel.

Screen bulkheads, similarly armoured, complete the protection to the sides of the barbettes.

The barbette armour has a maximum thickness of 9 inches.

The guns forming the auxiliary armament and their crews are also well protected, either by fixed casemates, or by strong shields revolving with the mountings.

The heavy guns forward are carried at a height of 25 feet above water, and those aft a trifle lower.

These ships, like the First Class Barbette Battle Ships, will be of high free-board throughout their length, with a flush upper deck.

It will be noted that the size of these Second Class Battle Ships as built will exceed the dimensions of its original estimate. This increase in size has been approved after very full consideration, and is associated with the following advantages:—

- (1) Wood and copper sheathing on the bottoms, adapting the vessels for employment on distant services, where docking facilities may not be available.

- (2) An increase in the weight of armament, both of guns and torpedoes.
- (3) Improved protection, in the form of casemates, to the guns in the auxiliary armament.
- (4) Larger and heavier boilers, giving a higher development of power for continuous sea service.
- (5) The limitation of extreme draught, when fully laden, to 26 feet.

If these vessels are completed without further demands being made upon them for additional weights to be carried in connection with the armament or equipment, they will be capable of carrying 50 per cent. more coal than has been named above, and bunker space sufficient to carry this full supply has been provided.

“ROYAL ARTHUR” AND “CRESCENT.”

Modifications in Designs.

These two First Class Cruisers were the last laid down in the Dockyards under the Naval Defence Act of 1889.

After full consideration it was decided by the Board to modify their design in the following particulars:—

- (1) To give to the vessels a long forecastle, extending about 110 feet from the bow, and increasing the height of freeboard forward by $7\frac{1}{2}$ feet. Upon this forecastle, at a height of $25\frac{1}{2}$ feet above water, two 6-inch quick-firing guns are to be mounted as bow chasers, in place of the single 9·2-inch gun carried forward on the upper deck in the other First Class Cruisers.

A description of the design of the First Class Cruisers appeared in the Navy Estimates of 1889-90, and it applies also to the “Royal Arthur” and “Crescent,” in all other respects than those above mentioned. These vessels will be wood-sheathed and coppered.

DESIGNS FOR ASTRÆA CLASS.

Second Class Cruisers.

The experience gained by the behaviour of the Cruisers during recent Naval Manœuvres determined the Board of Admiralty to somewhat modify the design of the eight Second Class Cruisers remaining to be built from the original design for the “Apollo” class described in preceding Navy Estimates.

The Principal Dimensions of the Astræa class are:—

Length	320 feet.
Breadth	49 feet 6 ins.
Displacement	4360 tons.

Speed on Measured Mile:—

Forced draught	$19\frac{1}{2}$ knots.
Natural draught	$18\frac{1}{4}$ „

Armament:—

- 2—6-in. quick-firing guns, bow, and stern chasers.
- 8—4·7-in. guns, quick-firing on the broadside.
- 9—6 prs. and 3 prs. quick-firing.
- 4 Torpedo tubes (18-in. torpedo new pattern).

The thicknesses of protective deck, and protection to the machinery, as well as the coal supply to be carried at the designed load draught, are identical with those of the vessels of the “Apollo” class.

All these eight vessels are to be wood-sheathed and coppered.

As compared with the “Apollo” class, the essential difference is that they are of high freeboard throughout the length with a flush upper deck, instead of having a poop and forecastle and waist.

Two 4·7-inch guns have been added to the broadside armament.

The whole of the broadside armament is carried on the upper deck in the "Astræa" class at about eight feet greater height above water than in the "Apollo" class. This increase in dimensions, combined with higher freeboard, will greatly facilitate the continuous maintenance of a high rate of speed in a seaway.

TORPEDO GUNBOATS.

In my statement for 1890-91, I then pointed out that the orders for the remaining torpedo gunboats under the Naval Defence Act were purposely delayed, in order to benefit by the experience to be obtained from the completion of trials then in progress with earlier vessels of the class.

These trials have occupied a considerable period during the last year, as unforeseen difficulties have occurred with the boilers, when working at the highest powers intended in the design.

These difficulties have with the experience gained been to a large extent overcome, but the maximum power under forced draught, originally intended to be developed, has not been obtained.

The structural strength of the vessels has been severely tested during their long-continued steam trials, and several of them have been launched with machinery and boilers on board. The result has been satisfactory.

Two of the vessels are now in commission. The "Speedwell" has been attached to the Channel Squadron for several months, and took part in the Naval Manœuvres of 1890. The reports, which have been received, have on the whole been satisfactory in relation to seaworthiness and behaviour.

The question of the modifications to be embodied in the designs for the vessels yet to be ordered is now on the point of being dealt with finally.

DOCKYARD-BUILT SHIPS.

All the ships that were ordered and commenced in the dockyards before 1889-90 will, with the exception of "Blake," be practically completed this financial year. This ship will be completed in 1891-92.

The number of ships of all classes building or to be built in the dockyards under the Naval Defence Act of 1889, by the 31st March, 1894, was thirty-eight, and they comprise four First Class Battleships, two Second Class Battleships, four First Class Cruisers, twelve Second Class Cruisers of the "Apollo" and "Astræa" classes, four Second Class Cruisers of the "Pandora" class, and twelve Torpedo Gunboats. Twenty-eight of these vessels are in hand, and are being advanced with great rapidity. Of the remaining ten, five Second Class Cruisers of the "Apollo" class will be commenced during the financial year 1891-92, and five Torpedo Gunboats will be laid down in the financial year 1892-93.

The first of the four First Class Battleships, the "Royal Sovereign," building at Portsmouth, will be launched on the 26th February; the second, the "Renown," building at Pembroke, in May next; and the third, the "Hood," at Chatham, will be ready for launching very shortly.

The "Royal Sovereign" was laid down in the month of September, 1889, and the work upon her and the other vessels of her class has been performed with unprecedented quickness and economy.

The two Second Class Battleships have just been commenced.

The first of the four First Class Cruisers, the "Edgar," was launched at Devonport in November last; the second, the "Royal Arthur," will be launched at Portsmouth on the 26th February; and the third, the "Hawke," is nearly ready for launching at Chatham.

One of the Second Class Cruisers was launched last August, and the second will be launched on the 10th February. Three of the Second Class Cruisers of the "Pandora" class are already afloat. Two of the Torpedo Gunboats, the "Gossamer" and "Gleaner," have been launched, and are nearly complete. The machinery of these two vessels has been made in the dockyard, and the "Gossamer" has passed her steam trials with great success. She will be completed ready for commission during the present financial year.

The propelling machinery for several dockyard-built ships has recently been made in the workshops of those establishments.

This step was originally taken for economical reasons, as it has been impossible to keep all the different classes of workmen and the plant necessary for dealing in an emergency with the repairs of the fleet profitably employed at other times upon small work. The experiment has been most successful both in the quality and cost of the work done. It is not, however, proposed for the present to do more in this direction than to so combine orders for new machinery with repairs as to keep up the engineering establishment to a proper standard of numbers and efficiency.

The ships that have thus been engined are the gunboats "Pheasant," "Partridge," "Lapwing," "Ringdove," and "Gossamer," and they have passed their steam trials with successful results. Those for which new machinery is now in hand are the "Rupert"—an old vessel requiring re-engining—the "Astræa" and "Phœbe," two of the new Second Class Cruisers, and the Torpedo Gunboat "Gleaner." The machinery for the Second Class Cruisers "Fox," "Forte," and "Hermione," and the Torpedo Gunboat "Hebe," will be taken in hand during the financial year 1891-92. This association work upon the machinery and hulls will be closely watched, and the whole effect of this arrangement as regards economy and efficiency will be thoroughly tested.

The reductions previously reported in the cost of building the "Trafalgar" and "Nile" over the original estimates (which were based on the old system), have been confirmed as regards "Trafalgar" by the complete cost accounts for that ship. They alone show a saving of over £100,000. The vessels of the same class now building under the Naval Defence Act have been built at a cheaper rate, up to date.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The re-arming and re-engining of "Thunderer" has been completed during the year, and similar work upon "Devastation," "Rupert," and "Hercules" has been advanced as far as possible.

REFITS.

The "Alexandra" has had new boilers fitted and her armament partly altered, and she will now be commissioned as the flagship of the Reserve Squadron.

The "Achilles" and "Minotaur" have been similarly dealt with, but their main armaments remain unaltered. The "Minotaur" has been completed; and the "Achilles" will be passed into the 1st Class Reserve before the end of the present financial year.

The "Superb" has been re-engined and re-boilered, and she will now be placed in the 1st Class Reserve.

The repair and refit of "Swiftsure," "Satellite," "Icarus," "Wrangler," "Racer," and "Starling" will be completed during the present financial year; similar work in the "Nelson" and "Calliope" will be also well advanced.

MISCELLANEOUS DOCKYARD SERVICES.

The expenditure under this head, which comprises repairs to yard machinery, yard plant, &c., storekeeping, manufacture and repair of ordinary stores for issue to ships, &c., has been for some time past closely watched and kept as low as possible without sacrifice of efficiency at the various yards.

This class of expenditure at the Naval yards abroad is now being personally looked into with other matters of importance. The inspection of these yards by Admiralty Officers has made considerable advancement during the last two years, and much good has resulted from it.

MACHINERY AND STEAM TRIALS.

The total number of vessels which, since 31st March last, have passed their final machinery trials are:

No.	Class.	Name.
2	Battle ships	"Nile," "Thunderer."
9	3rd Class Cruisers.....	{ "Blanche," "Blonde," "Barracouta," "Bellona," also the five Colonial Cruisers, "Tauranga," "Ringa- rooma," "Katoomba," "Mildura," and "Wallaroo."
2	1st Class Screw Gunboats
10	Torpedo Gunboats	{ "Lapwing" and "Ringdove." "Speedwell," "Skipjack," "Sea- gull," "Salamander," "Shel- drake," "Sharpshooter," and "Spanker," "Gossamer," and two Colonial Boats, "Karra- katta," "Boomerang."
1	Tug and Water Tank Vessel ...
		"Asp."

It is anticipated that the following ships will pass through their machinery trials before 31st March next, viz. :—

No.	Class.	Name.
1	Battle Ship	"Superb."
1	Torpedo Depot Ship.....	"Vulcan."
1	2nd Class Cruiser.....	"Latona."
5	3rd Class Cruisers.....	{ "Pearl," "Philomel," "Pallas," "Phoebe," and "Barham."

I stated last year that the trials of "Vulcan" would take place early in this financial year, but owing to difficulties which have been encountered with the boilers of ships similarly fitted, viz., with double-ended boilers having common combustion chambers, it was considered desirable to postpone the trials of the "Vulcan," and those of other ships, till certain further experiments with their boilers had been completed.

On the steam trials of the "Blanche" and "Blonde" the principal defects developed were connected with leakage of boiler tubes. To remedy this the Engineer-in-Chief directed the number of tubes to be reduced, believing that the leakage was largely due to a want of circulation of water over the tube plates. This alteration reduced by about 5 per cent. the I.H.P. expected to be obtained, but the leakages were practically stopped.

It was afterwards decided not to carry out in vessels thus boilered the extreme forced draught trial.

All the battle ships and cruisers now building under the Naval Defence Act have boilers of a different type, and their capacity and weight have in most instances been largely increased upon the original design. The air pressure or forced draught under which their maximum speed is to be developed is limited to a pressure of 1" on the water gauge. Every precaution has been taken to prevent a repetition of the difficulties recently experienced.

The "Latona," the first of the thus-engined vessels, is now undergoing her steam trials. They have been completely successful. On the eight hours natural draught 7,250 H.P. have been developed, as against 7,000 contracted for, giving a speed of 19 knots, as against 18½ promised on the design.

At the conclusion of the trial a thorough examination showed the boilers to be in a practically perfect condition.

On the forced draught trial, with a moderate air pressure of about 1", the high speed of 20 knots was reached without difficulty.

The estimates as to maximum power at forced draught in the boilers of the torpedo gun-boats, and also of the "Barham" and "Bellona" (third-class cruisers), which are of the locomotive type, have not been realised. The earlier trials developed defects chiefly connected with leakage of boiler tubes. Various experiments were carried out, the results of which led to certain modifications being made in these boilers; and on progressive trials since carried out in some of these ships an I.H.P. of 3,900 has been obtained, as against 4,500 originally specified, or within $12\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. of that H.P.

This reduction in power represents a loss in speed of about a knot under forced draught conditions.

The trial at maximum forced draught in vessels with boilers of the locomotive type has not been pressed.

In the five boats of this class now under construction larger and heavier boilers will be fitted, and a lower maximum power has been specified, while the power at limited air pressure, which is unaltered, will be more easily obtained and maintained. The orders for the machinery of these boats have been placed.

The review, therefore, of the steam trials of the past year cannot be said to be altogether satisfactory. The difficulties experienced have been overcome, but by changes reducing the estimated I.H.P. and speed of the vessels.

The Engineer-in-Chief deserves high credit for the assiduity and ingenuity which he has displayed in overcoming the difficulties connected with the designs of boilers which he did not originate. The specifications and details of marine engines are of so technical a character that none but a trained and practical engineer can adequately supervise or criticise them. Thus an unusually heavy responsibility is centred on the Engineer-in-Chief which cannot be shared by members of the Board of Admiralty. The dimensions of a ship, its armament, and equipment can be criticised, altered, and discussed by Naval officers, and laymen even, although they may have little technical knowledge of the principles of shipbuilding. Such a discussion or examination is not possible, to the same extent, except by trained experts, upon the specifications of a design for marine machinery. The hasty adoption of a faulty principle or immature idea in the designs of engines might not be detected outside the department preparing or initiating the design until the actual working of the engines themselves revealed the mistake made.

The first public test imposed on engines and machinery of men of war is the measured mile trial. In this age of eager competition the wish to beat all recorded performances is a legitimate ambition of a skilled engineer. The measured mile lends itself to a fallacious test, for the ratio of boiler to engine power, which on a given weight will give the highest speed under limited conditions both of time and distance, is not the proportion which will ensure the best result for longer distances in the open sea.

When the designs for the machinery of the first ships to be built for the Naval Defence Act were under consideration, three Inspectors of Machinery from the Dockyards, as representing the latest views of sea-going engineers, were formed into a Committee to co-operate with the Engineer-in-Chief. The result of their joint deliberations was a large increase in the boiler power of the cruisers, and the addition of weight by the substitution of single for common combustion chambers. The Board of Admiralty propose to make permanent this Committee, and to associate with its work certain remuneration. Their duty will hereafter be to examine all new designs, and as the members of the Committee will be selected from the Inspectors of Machinery and Chief Engineers of the Dockyard who are periodically changing, it will continue to represent the latest views of practical seagoing and manufacturing Engineers.

In making this Committee a permanent institution, the Board of Admiralty wish at the same time to record their full confidence in the Engineer-in-Chief, who has discharged his exceptionally onerous duties with ability and discretion. They believe that the establishment of such a Committee will not only ensure the necessary combination of theory and experience, but will be a guarantee that changes and innovations of importance in the machinery of the Navy will not be adopted without full discussion and adequate experiment.

NAVAL DEFENCE ACT.

The work contemplated by the Naval Defence Act is now sufficiently advanced to enable a reliable forecast to be made both of the date at which it will be completed, as well as of its actual as compared with its estimated cost. The number of ships to be built was seventy, of an estimated displacement of 316,000 tons, and carrying 540 guns, exclusive of machine guns and guns of small calibre. The whole of these vessels with their armament and equipment were to be completed and ready for commission before the 1st April 1894. With the single exception of one contract-built ship, whose progress has been slow, there is every reason to believe, upon our present data, that the remaining sixty-nine will, with their armament and reserve guns, be finished before the date named.

The sketch estimate made in 1889 of their prospective cost made an allowance of £10,000,000 for 32 contract-built ships and £11,500,000 for 38 dockyard-built ships. This was inclusive of armament and equipment.

The 32 contract ships will, so far as we can foresee, be finished, armed, and equipped for that sum. The extra guns for reserve will also be provided, but owing to certain additional charges which I will subsequently enumerate, we shall not be able to supply in addition the amount of reserve ammunition we have originally contemplated.

On the armament of the dockyard-built ships there is a saving of £313,000, and an excess of £920,000 on the hulls, boilers, and machinery, making a net excess of £607,000.

This excess over the original estimate is due to a remarkable rise in prices, to the substitution of larger and heavier boilers in the cruisers, necessitating an increase in their dimensions, to the strengthening of the gun mountings and gun pedestals to meet the recoil of the higher velocity imparted by smokeless powder, and to certain modifications and improvements in the later of the dockyard ships suggested by the experience gained at the manœuvres and elsewhere afloat.

Of the causes which thus disturbed our calculations all except rise in prices represent a distinct gain in the efficiency and power of the ships building, and a rise in prices, even though it may prejudicially affect Navy votes, more than compensated the exchequer from which such payments are made by its addition to the national revenue.

At the time the Naval Defence Act was under consideration, it was urged by its advocates that the method of placing a statutory obligation on a department to finish a great ship-building programme in its entirety within a given time would ensure a rapid and continuous prosecution of ships once begun, would prevent subsequent structural alterations and changes, and would further secure a closer adherence to the original estimates of cost than the more dilatory and changeable system it superseded.

The administrative advantages associated with the change then inaugurated have been completely realised, and although I regret that the financial results show an excess over the forecast of expenditure, still the improvement even in this respect is satisfactory. Taking the actual cost of the larger ships built for the ten years previous to 1885, they show an excess on the average over their original estimates, as presented to Parliament, of from 20 to 30 per cent. The excess here shown is less than 3 per cent., and including the amount of the reserve ammunition, less than 5 per cent.

Under the old system the excess over individual estimates was so buried in the general expenditure of the year that notice or attention was not necessarily directed towards it. But any excess of a statutory maximum requires a fresh Act of Parliament for its sanction and a special vote to defray it.

To meet this excess no special provision over and above the ordinary estimates is necessary. Between now and April 1894 we calculated that if the ship-building vote remained at its present level, and the Naval Defence Act Estimates were not exceeded, there would be an aggregate surplus on that vote of about £3,000,000, and any excess will be met out of that sum. We do not propose this year to introduce any special Act to enlarge the limits of expenditure of the original Act, as it will be better to wait until actual figures can be substituted for the forecast now made.

The success which has attended the changes of late years in the dockyards, and the reduction in cost of work done, is largely due to the manner in which the trades and workmen of the dockyards have accepted these reforms. The Admiralty have, therefore, been glad to be able to recommend to the Treasury, after a careful enquiry into the petition and complaints of the men, an increase to the wages now paid. This rise will commence on the 1st April next. The increase in wages will be an addition, so far as new construction is concerned, to the present estimated cost of the ships building under the Naval Defence Act.

NAVAL ORDNANCE.

The satisfactory rate of progress with the manufacture and supply of guns for the Navy, which was mentioned in the statement for last year, has been maintained during the year ending December 31, 1890, and the total number of new breech-loading guns (exclusive of small quick-firing and machine guns) completed by the manufacturers during the year is 240, viz. :—

Nature of Gun.				Number Completed.
16·25-inch of 110 tons	2
13·5 " 67 "	11
10 " 29 "	2
9·2 " 22 "	12
6 " 5 "	12
6-inch quick-firing	2
5 " of 40 cwt.	41
4·7-inch quick-firing	134
4-inch of 26 cwt.	24
Total ...				240

The manufacture of the guns for the ships building under the Naval Defence Act, 1889, has been materially advanced, especially in the case of the heavy guns which are being made in the Royal Gun Factory.

The number of breech-loading guns afloat and mounted on December 31, 1890, was 1,410, as compared with 1,293 on December 31, 1889. This is exclusive of small quick-firing and machine guns.

Much discussion has taken place on the relative value of hand and hydraulic worked guns. As frequently pointed out, the 10-inch breech-loading gun of 29 tons weight is the heaviest service gun which it is considered can be efficiently worked on board ship by hand power alone. The "Thunderer" has recently been re-armed with four such guns, and has just completed her gunnery trials satisfactorily. In the new second class battle ships it is arranged that the 10-inch guns will be similarly worked by hand; but even with 10-inch guns, except when mounted singly, it is imperative to employ steam or hydraulic power for efficiently training the turret or barbette under ordinary circumstances, accepting manual power only as a reserve with slower motion.

The type of mounting which hand-working necessitates has, however, certain disadvantages, compared with one worked by hydraulic power. For instance, if placed in a turret a much larger port is required, since a hand-worked gun must be pivotted further inside the turret, owing to the use of trunnions, than one on an hydraulic mounting, involving greater exposure of the gun, mounting, and gun's crew; whilst if placed in a barbette, the gun and a portion of the mounting are permanently above the thick armour protection, and this disadvantage is serious. Then there is considerable difficulty in working by hand the breech-screw of a heavy gun, as well as the various parts of the mounting, without the introduction of mechanism far more delicate and liable to injury than the hydraulic arrangements now in use.

It is very often objected that guns worked by hydraulic power are more liable to failure than those worked by hand, and that the mechanism is delicate. This is not correct. As stated above, the adoption of hand-worked guns of large size necessitates the introduction of various mechanical devices to give the necessary power to the hand gear. Hydraulic mechanism, on the other hand, is exceedingly simple; and if a comparison be made between the actual machinery for opening and closing the breech of a 9·2-inch breech-loading gun of 22 tons, and the 16·25-inch breech-loading gun of 110 tons, the former by hand, the latter by hydraulic power, the latter has undoubtedly the advantage in simplicity.

The above reasons have so far militated against the adoption of hand-worked mountings for guns of heavier calibre than 10 inches. No doubt much larger guns than these can be worked by hand-power alone, but there would follow a corresponding increase in the complexity of the mechanism required to enable manual labour to work the heavier moving parts.

At the same time every endeavour has been made to introduce, where possible, alternative hand gear in connection with the hydraulic mountings of the new first-class battle ships, and where hand gear has been found to be impracticable, duplication of the machinery has been adopted.

In order to test the accuracy of the statement so frequently made that the heavy breech-loading guns can only be fired once in a quarter of an hour, four rounds were fired from one of the 67-ton guns in the "Trafalgar's" turret as rapidly as possible during the gunnery trials of that ship. The time occupied was 9½ minutes; this rapidity would be exceeded in a ship which had been a short time in commission, when the gun's crew would have gained more experience, and had become accustomed to work together. Eight rounds could have been fired in the same time had both guns been worked together.

The most important advance made in Naval Ordnance during the year has been the completion of the new 6-inch 100-pounder quick-firing gun and mounting. Most satisfactory trials have already been carried out, and the results attained are far in advance of anything that has before been accomplished. As many as six rounds a minute have been fired. The type of mounting is a very great advance on previous designs, especially as regards the amount of protection afforded to the gun's crew.

The full power, however, of these quick-firing guns will not be advantageously employed until smokeless powder has been introduced into the Naval Service. Arrangements are now in progress for issuing smokeless powder to certain ships for further trial under service conditions, and it is hoped that its general adoption into the Naval Service will not be long delayed.

The 4·7-inch 45-pounder quick-firing gun, with which further experience has now been gained, has proved to be thoroughly efficient. Several ships armed with this weapon, including the whole of the Australian Squadron, have completed their gunnery trials with most satisfactory results.

During the year ending 31st December, 1890, 150 of the more powerful Whitehead torpedoes referred to in last year's report, together with 587 of the previous smaller pattern, have been added to the existing stock.

An important inquiry as to the custody of Naval Ordnance stores and the accounts connected therewith has been carried to a successful issue. On March 31st next the Admiralty will assume entire control of the custody of all Naval Ordnance Stores at Portsmouth, Devonport, Chatham, and Woolwich; and during the course of the year it is hoped that similar arrangements will be made as to the remaining Ordnance depôts abroad, and the minor depôts at home. This important re-organisation will be effected without any increase in the cost of management, and it is believed that at last a thoroughly satisfactory solution has been arrived at of a most difficult problem.

While a complete separation will be thus effected as regards the custody, accounts, and administration of Naval Ordnance stores, the necessity of absolute interchangeability in Ordnance material belonging to the Navy, Army, India, and the Colonies respectively has been assured by making it a sine qua non that all sealed patterns and experiments shall be dealt with by the Ordnance Committee, and that all guns and Ordnance stores of every description shall pass through one Central Inspection Department before issue.

Further modifications may be desirable and will be considered, but in so large and important a matter it is very desirable to act with caution, so as to avoid too great a disturbance in the current work of supply and administration of stores valued at twenty millions sterling.

ARMOUR-PLATE EXPERIMENTS.

During the year 1890-91 an extensive series of experiments with armour-plates has been carried out in continuation of those which have been in progress during the last three years.

These trials have added largely to our information as to the qualities of different kinds of armour, and has led to a considerable extension of the sources of supply for armour-plates.

The range of the experiments has been great, extending from plates 4 inches in thickness up to plates 18 inches in thickness, fired at by guns varying from 5 inches in calibre to 12 inches; and including examples of the best modes of manufacture in compound (or steel-faced) armour and steel.

Under the last mentioned category several specimens of nickel-steel armour have been fired at, the first nickel-steel plate being tested in April 1890.

Arrangements have been made for the continuation of these experiments in connection with the supply of the armour for the "Centurion" and "Barfleur." The broad conclusions hitherto arrived at and acted upon have been that for armour of the thicknesses required for the main defence of the First Class Battle-ships, compound (or steel-faced) plating was to be preferred.

These experiments show that the manufacture of steel armour has greatly improved of recent years, whilst that of compound armour has been less progressive.

All-steel armour has therefore been used in large quantities for the secondary defence of the battle-ships, for the protection of the auxiliary armaments, and for the protection of the machinery in vessels of the Cruiser classes.

It has not been considered expedient hitherto to publish details of these experiments; but, in order to encourage British manufactures in every possible way, full details of the trials of any particular plates have been furnished to their makers, and in many cases the Admiralty have undertaken to fire at experimental plates supplied by the manufacturers.

NEW WORKS.

The Estimate for the New Works Vote for 1891-92 shows a reduction, chiefly due to a less sum being taken up for storehouses and other works for Naval Ordnance stores.

During the present financial year the New Dock at Malta will be completed, and the extension of the Yard will be completed in 1892-93.

The coaling arrangements at Portland are well in hand.

At Portsmouth the New Coaling Station will be ready for use this year.

It is proposed to proceed at once with the construction of a Coaling Jetty at Keyham Dockyard. The Estimate for this work is £70,000, which includes the necessary railways and approaches, &c., but is exclusive of machinery.

The Naval Gunnery Establishment and Barracks at Whale Island, Portsmouth, will be completed by the end of the current year.

It is proposed to commence the construction of New Naval Barracks at Portsmouth to accommodate 50 officers and 1,000 men.

The favourable results anticipated from the substitution of commodious buildings on shore for the old hulks in which the seamen were previously accommodated, have been fully realised in the case of Whale Island and Keyham Barracks, and the extension of the system of Naval Barracks is recognised as a matter of urgent necessity.

The Admiralty are now in negotiation for the transfer from the Home Office of the late convict barracks at Chatham, which at a moderate cost can be converted into and fitted up as Naval Barracks. They are in the immediate vicinity of the dockyard.

The dredging of the channel of the river Medway will be completed early in the current year.

At Haulbowline it is intended to provide dolphins at the basin entrance to the new dock to facilitate the passage of ships; in other respects the works are now completed.

At Sydney, New South Wales, naval works comprising naval and victualling stores, engine and ship repairing factory, deep water wharf with sheers to lift the heaviest guns, and extensive magazines for Naval Ordnance Stores, are being carried out by, and at the expense of, the Colonial Government. The completion of these works will allow of the surrender of the Admiralty Establishment at the Circular Quay, Sydney, to the Colonial Government.

At Bombay, a dry dock constructed by the Port Trust, of the following dimensions, is approaching completion:—

Length on floor 500 feet, breadth of entrance $65\frac{1}{2}$ feet, depth for docking $27\frac{1}{4}$ feet at high water ordinary spring tides.

The dock will admit the "Aurora" and "Edgar" classes of H.M. ships, but not the largest battle ships.

The Halifax Commercial Dock subsidised by the Admiralty is now open, and the first payment will be made in 1891-92. The two other subsidised docks at Esquimalt and Hong Kong are both open and in use.

For the purpose of affording communication, 120 new signal stations have been recently established round the coast of the United Kingdom.

MOBILISATION AND MANNING REQUIREMENTS OF THE FLEET.

In a paper already laid before Parliament (November 1890) a full description has been given of the partial mobilisation of the Fleet and Manœuvres in 1890.

The order for the partial mobilisation was issued on July 21st, and on the following day 48 ships and torpedo boats (24 of each) were commissioned.

In addition to these, nine coast guard ships and three guard ships, all armour clad, had their crews completed, and on the 26th the whole of the 36 ships, with three exceptions, and torpedo boats had reached the places of assembly, forming, together with the Channel Squadron and Training Squadron, a total of 56 ships of various classes, and 24 torpedo boats.

As the number of ships, especially those of modern types, in permanent commission previous to mobilisation was larger than in 1889, the actual number suddenly put in commission by the order to mobilise was less than in the preceding year. About 9,000 men were added to those already afloat, and the total number engaged in the subsequent manœuvres was about 19,000. There were practically no deficiencies in manning the above-mentioned ships, and the resources in engine-room ratings allowed a certain number of supernumerary stokers to be carried for training. The reports of Commanding Officers on these men were very satisfactory.

One of the impediments to efficient and rapid mobilisation is the condition of Chatham-Sheerness as a naval port. The increased capacity of Chatham Dockyard has outstripped the available resources of the personnel there located. Considerable numbers of men have to be transferred from the western ports to complete the complements of the ships in this eastern port. This is especially the case as regard gunnery and torpedo ratings, there being no gunnery or torpedo school attached to the Chatham-Sheerness command. To remedy this inconvenience, steps are being taken to obtain increased barrack accommodation, and to so add to the Chatham establishments as to make them, as far as is practicable, self-supporting.

The chain of signal stations established round the coast of the United Kingdom were mobilised on August 7th, the day before the 1890 manœuvres commenced, and during the progress of the simulated hostilities, the system of distributing intelligence, which had been somewhat modified in accordance with the experience gained during the manœuvres of 1889, was tested with satisfactory results. Too much importance cannot be attached to this part of the preparation for war, and to the necessity of periodically subjecting to a practical test the completeness of this portion of our arrangements. The only two points in which these arrangements now fall short of completeness are :—

1. In the connection of certain of the signal stations with the general telegraphic system, and
2. The provision of semaphores for signal stations on the coasts of Scotland, Ireland, and the West of England, those for the South and East coast of England having been provided this year.

With regard to (1) where it is not proposed to actually connect up stations, arrangements are being made for doing so as rapidly as necessary in case of emergency, and the full provision of semaphores, though postponed this year, will be taken in hand the year following.

Advantage was also taken at the time of the manœuvres to test the sufficiency of the accommodation of the Home Hospitals for wounded men in time of war, the efficiency of the staffs of the establishments, and the arrangements for the prompt reception and treatment of such patients. The result of the investigation was very satisfactory, and it was found that there would be ample means by expansion in time of pressure.

The health of the Navy during 1889, the last year for which returns have been tabulated, has been most satisfactory, the rates of sickness, invaliding, and death being lower than in many preceding years.

Owing to the increase of duties imposed on our sea-going fleet, considerable additions have during the last eighteen months been made both to the number of ships and men in commission, especially in the Mediterranean and Channel Squadrons; the number of ships and men in commission being:—

				Ships.	Complements.
1st January 1891	277	43,296
1st April 1889	266	38,928
Increase	11	4,268

This increase to our fleets abroad has reduced the number of trained men in reserve at the home ports, and pending the additions to the seamen class, which the very large entries of boys during the last two years will give, some difficulty has been experienced in providing all the reliefs required for service abroad. An investigation into the actual duties which engage the Naval service shows how large a proportion of Officers and men are locked up in training establishments and educational courses, and in performing subsidiary work, such as surveying, and transport of troops, &c. At the time when the ships in commission were insufficient to give adequate work and training to the Officers and men of the fleet, such employment was judicious, but when the number of fighting vessels is so increased as to be more than able to employ and train the peace establishments, the employment of very highly trained and instructed men in work of so secondary a nature is a waste of power.

I am therefore taking steps to reduce as far as I can the number of Officers, men, and boys afloat in non-fighting vessels, and at the same time to shorten the general course of study for Officers at the Naval College, and of gunnery and torpedo instruction for all but those who show special aptitude and ability. These changes will in course of time give some relief, and increase the numbers available for foreign reliefs and active service at home.

In looking ahead to the increased demands which the gradual completion of the new ship-building programme will make upon our manning resources, I have endeavoured to keep in view and combine certain definite objects. It seemed to me to be quite unreasonable to expect that the whole of the extra force required to man, three years hence, our greatly increased fleet, should exclusively consist of Officers and men on the permanent establishments of the Navy, of continuous service and entitled to pension. I was therefore anxious to associate the increase of the permanent establishments with a steady growth in the numbers and efficiency of the Royal Naval Reserve. The additions which have been made to the personnel of the Navy, since the Naval Defence Act was passed, have been large. Vote A stood at 62,600 in March 1889. It has now reached 68,800; and I propose to raise it to 71,000 this year, and gradually to work up in subsequent years to a total of 75,000.

Success in future naval wars will, I believe, rest not so much with numbers as with the force who can make the best use of the scientific weapons at their disposal.

The requirements of the Naval service may be thus classified in the order in which there is the most difficulty of supply.

- 1a. Executive Officers.
- b. Warrant Officers.
- 2a. Engineer Officers.
- b. Engine-room Artificers.
3. Petty Officers and Seamen.
4. Fleet Artificers.
5. Stokers.

1 and 2 represent Officers and men for whose complete training years are required. They could not be obtained to any considerable extent in an emergency.

3 and 4. Require a more limited training and, with the exception of Petty Officers, probably could be obtained in considerable numbers in an emergency if high enough terms were offered.

5. Require only a limited training, and could be obtained rapidly at short notice.

Following out the views which this classification suggests, I propose that the increase to the establishment should mainly consist of highly-trained men, and I wish to supplement this addition by arrangements for drawing largely in time of emergency (but with the assent and co-operation of their employers), upon those whose work and daily vocation specially trains them for service afloat.

The sufficiency of my proposals entirely depends upon how far the Royal Naval Reserve is a reliable auxiliary force, upon which the naval authorities can, in emergency, lay their hands with confidence. It must be remembered that in addition to our war ships and subsidised cruisers, armament for 50 merchant cruisers is provided in our dockyards at home and abroad, and the complements of these ships must mainly be provided from the Mercantile Marine. The Royal Naval Reserve therefore constitutes a larger part of our system of naval defence than at first sight is apparent.

If this force is one which can be made a trustworthy complement of the regular forces, the time has arrived when it should be further developed. If it is merely a peace paper force it should be abolished, and the money spent upon it devoted to an increase of the regular Establishment. I enclose in an appendix the report made to me by Vice-Admiral Sir George Tryon, Admiral-Superintendent of Reserves, upon the result of his inspection and experience of the past year. It is highly satisfactory. I thought it however advisable to more thoroughly sift the whole question, and to obtain such an authoritative report as would justify decisive action one way or the other.

I have therefore appointed a Committee "to enquire into and report on the" "present system for the enrolment and maintenance of the Naval Volunteer Forces" "raised under 22, 23 Vict.,* and under 36, 37 Vict.†"

"Also to enquire and report on the numerical strength of the force, with a" "view to a possible increase, both in numbers and efficiency, of a reserve closely" "and intimately connected with the regular Naval force of the country, with" "authority to call witnesses and report, and to enquire at ports when necessary" "personally or by Sub-Committee."

The Committee will consist of—

Vice-Admiral Sir George Tryon, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Captain E. Rice, R.N.

Captain T. F. Hammill, R.N. (Naval Intelligence Department).

Mr. Swanston, C.B. (Board of Trade).

Sir Charles Rivers Wilson, K.C.M.G., C.B. (representing Treasury).

Sir Allen Young, C.B., Hon. Commander, R.N.R. and R.N.A.V.

Mr. Ismay (White Star Line).

Captain Angove (P. and O. Company), Hon. Commander, R.N.R.

* The first Act refers to the force popularly called the R.N.R.

† The second Act refers to the R.N.A.V.

The increase to Vote A this year will comprise 2,200, made up as follows :—

Commissioned Officers	17
Subordinate Officers	70
Warrant Officers	52
Artificers	125
Engine Room Ratings	670
Other Petty Officers, and Ratings	361
Boys {	Service	755
	Training	150
Total	2,200

The increase to the number of boys in training will require an additional training ship. At present all the Ships engaged in this work are located in the south of England. A training ship is a recruiting attraction, and the districts in which they are placed consequently contribute more than other parts of the country to the manning of the Fleet. A large proportion of the hereditary seafaring class is now to be found in the northern districts of the country, and, with a view of obtaining recruits from this natural source of supply, the new training ship will be placed in the Firth of Forth at Queensferry.

GENERAL ADMINISTRATION.

The changes proposed in my statement of last year by which the Mediterranean Fleet was to be raised to a strength of ten battle ships and two armoured cruisers, the channel squadron converted into a homogeneous squadron of modern ships of high speed, and seagoing ironclads substituted for the hulks then flying the flags of the Commanders-in-Chief at the Home Ports have all been carried out, with the single exception of the flagship at Portsmouth. The "Nelson" will in a short time take the place of the "Duke of Wellington."

There has been shown of late an increasing tendency on the part of naval authorities abroad to concentrate the great bulk of their fleets in their home waters. I do not therefore contemplate any considerable addition to our fleet in commission abroad, but the increased numbers which we propose to take in this and subsequent years will, by being employed in keeping effective in reserve, the large number of ships to be delivered at the dockyards, enable a much needed change to be effected in our dockyard administration. Under present arrangements ships, until complete, are under the control of the Admiral Superintendent. On completion they are passed into 1st Class Steam Reserve and under the Captain of the Steam Reserve, and on commission they pass under the authority of the Commander-in-Chief. The Captain of the Steam Reserve's duties are multifarious, and his staff is limited. Complaints have been made that in the intermediate stage after completion and before commission, vessels have from imperfect supervision and want of caretaking gone back, and that the success of a rapid mobilisation might be seriously impaired by the consequence of these drawbacks.

The Board has therefore given directions for the Commanders-in-Chief to take charge of the vessels when complete and after inspection. Thus the redundant or supernumerary men under his orders can be utilised in keeping effective the ships in reserve, and it is hoped that in the case of the vessels next for commission a certain proportion of the complement will be permanently attached to them.

A careful enquiry into the limits and areas of our foreign stations abroad has been made during the last twelve months with a view to such a new delimitation as the strategical, commercial, or political considerations of the present time might suggest. Only two alterations of importance are proposed. The limits of the present Cape station end on the East Coast of Africa at Delagoa Bay, but on the West they run up to 20° North latitude, or in other words, 55° North of the head-quarters of the station. The distance from the Cape, the insalubrity of the climate, and the small class of vessel there employed, render it desirable to make the North-West Coast of Africa into a separate command. The future head-quarters of the station will be Ascension, and the squadron will be re-fitted and relieved direct from home. On the East Coast the Cape station will be extended up to the Equator, thus placing under one naval authority the whole of the East Coast between the Equator and the Cape.

These changes will take place on the 1st April. They involve no increase of ships in commission, but a different distribution between the various stations.

The other change is a sub-division of the present Pacific station, by which the whole of the West Coast of South America would be taken from that station and, together with the East Coast of South America, be placed under a new command, with head-quarters at the Falkland Islands. Enquiries are being made as to which of the harbours in these islands is most suitable; in the meantime no action is proposed.

The transfer of the custody of naval ordnance stores from the War Office to the Admiralty is the latest of the various steps taken in recent years to give to the Admiralty control over, and responsibility for, business, which, from its very nature and incidence, could not be as satisfactorily undertaken by another Department.

There are Officers in both Services who believe that this transfer of duties from the Army to the Navy might with advantage be pushed much further, and that measures should at once be taken by which the Navy should immediately undertake the defence of the great naval ports, and be, in time of war, responsible for the safety of the base of their own operations.

I admit that if such a change could be carried out it would tend to secure unity of action and responsibility; and would, in an emergency, secure at the great naval ports the rapid utilisation of all available resources, for whatever movement the exigency of the moment might require.

But it is a proposal that involves so immense a change, that it is not under any conditions practicable in the immediate future. The transfers of men and money, material and buildings, which it entails would revolutionise the proportions the Army and Navy now bear to one another, and many experienced Naval Officers are averse to the change. Moreover, its increased cost in one direction is certain, whilst the counterbalancing savings are problematical. Still looking to the fact that nearly every foreign power has adopted the principle of placing their naval authorities in charge of maritime defences, care should be taken that the various alterations which from time to time must occur in the organisation both of the Army and Navy, do not increase the obstacles to such a transfer of duties. Further investigation and experience can alone determine whether the change is desirable in the common interests of both Services, and nothing in the meantime should be done to prejudice that future decision.

GEORGE HAMILTON.

February 9th, 1891.

APPENDIX I.

REPORT ON ROYAL NAVAL RESERVE.

During the past year the number of Royal Naval Reserve Officers has increased—in the case of Lieutenants, from 103 to 150, and of Sub-Lieutenants from 202 to 262, and of Midshipmen from 173 to 194.

The numbers allowed to be borne in future have been increased—

From 150 to 250	Lieutenants.
„ 270 „ 420	Sub-Lieutenants.
„ 200 „ 300	Midshipmen.

The number of Officers selected for a year's training, actually on service on board Her Majesty's Ships, has been maintained till recently at the fixed number of 20 annually, but last year it was decided to increase that number.

Since the regulations on this subject came into force in 1887, 33 Officers have served for a year's training in the Royal Navy; and, further, there are now 21 still serving who are in course of completing the year's service.

Other Officers have been entered for short periods of service in the Navy for the Summer Manœuvres and for short courses of Gunnery and Torpedo work in the training Establishments; the number appointed in the past year for this purpose was 28 as against 23 in 1889; and others volunteered to come forward, but at the last moment they were prevented from taking up their appointments by engagements to their employers.

In all there are now on the active list 85, Officers Royal Naval Reserve of different grades who have served for various periods in Her Majesty's Ships, against 60 at the end of 1889.

Whether in regard to those who have passed through the longer or the shorter course on board Her Majesty's Ships, the reports received from those under whom these Royal Naval Reserve Officers have served are so satisfactory from a professional point of view, that they justify me in confidently expressing the opinion that this body of officers form a valuable and reliable reserve to the Royal Navy; and, while the success of this system that has only been in force for a short time is so far assured, it is attended by the additional important advantage of bringing the Officers of Her Majesty's Navy in contact with the Officers of the Royal Naval Reserve and by the establishment of a feeling of good comradeship.

A considerable increase is observed in the entries of Engineer officers, Royal Naval Reserve, there being now 87 borne as against 66 at the end of 1889. New regulations have recently been sanctioned and are about to be put in force, the effect of which will be to improve the pay, position, and prospects of the Engineers, Royal Naval Reserve, when called out for service, while the qualifications required have been fully maintained.

As regards the men of the Royal Naval Reserve, they maintain the general standard, both in numbers and efficiency. The full number of first-class Royal Naval Reserve has been maintained, and even exceeded, but all the 1,000 second-class Royal Naval Reserve men sanctioned last year have not yet been entered—these men come forward, both for drill and for entry, during the winter months, and no difficulty whatever is to be anticipated in entering full numbers.

The number of firemen Royal Naval Reserve still slowly increases, 583 being borne at end of 1890 against 548 at end of 1889.

All the drill ships, and some of the more important Royal Naval Reserve batteries, have been supplied with a modern breech-loading gun for drill purposes, and Nordenfolt guns have recently been added to all drill stations. As guns of modern type become available they will be supplied to all batteries.

The following statement shows the progress of the Royal Naval Reserve force in 1890 :—

OFFICERS.
NUMBERS BORNE.

Rank.	31 December 1891.	31 December 1890.	Estimated for 1891.
Lieutenants	103	141	191
Sub-Lieutenants	202	262	291
Midshipmen	173	194	258
Engineers and Assistant Engineers	66	87	105

	During 1889.	During 1890.
Officers who have completed a year's training :—
Lieutenants	6	11
Sub-Lieutenants	5	4
Midshipmen	2	1
	—13	—16
Officers who have completed their training this year or are now under training :—
Lieutenants	—	2
Sub-Lieutenants	—	14
Midshipmen	—	8
		—24
Total number of Officers who have been trained or are under training :—	40	54
Officers not under training who have been through the "Excellent" or "Vernon" for a short course of instruction :—
Lieutenants	6	6
Sub-Lieutenants	1	3
Midshipmen	1	3
	—8	—12
Officers not under training who served in the Fleet during Summer Manœuvres only :—
Lieutenants	5	7
Sub-Lieutenants	7	5
Midshipmen	3	4
	—15	—16

MEN.

NUMBERS BORNE.

	1889.	1890.	1889.	1890.
	Borne.	Allowed.	Borne.	Allowed.
First Class	9,498	9,600	9,817	9,600
Second Class	8,873	9,000	9,243	10,000
Firemen	548	800	583	700
Third Class (Boys)... ..	259	300	238	300

G. TRYON,
Admiral Superintendent,
26th January, 1891.

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

VOLUME CCCL.

SECOND VOLUME OF SESSION 1890-91.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

Bills, Read 1°, 2°, 3°, or 1°, 2°, 3°, Read the First, Second, or Third Time.—In Speeches, 1R., 2R., 3R., Speech delivered on the First, Second, or Third Reading.—Adj., Adjournment.—Admy., Admiralty.—Amendt., Amendment.—A., Answer.—As., Answers.—Att. Gen., Attorney General.—Ch. of Exch., Chancellor of the Exchequer.—Chf. Sec., Chief Secretary.—Cols., Colonies.—c., Commons.—Com., Committee, Committed.—Con., Considered.—Consideration.—Dept., Department.—Fin. Sec., Financial Secretary.—Fn. Affrs., Foreign Affairs.—l., Lords.—Ld. Adv., Lord Advocate.—Obs., Observations.—P.M. Gen., Postmaster General.—Pres., President.—Pres. Bd. Ag., President of the Board of Agriculture.—Pres. Bd. Trade., President of the Board of Trade.—Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd., President of the Local Government Board.—Q., Question.—Qs., Questions.—R.P., Report Progress.—Re-com., Re-committed, Re-committal, Re-commitment.—Res., Resolution.—Sec., Secretary.—Sol. Gen., Solicitor General.—Treas., Treasury.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

The subjects of Debate, as far as possible, are classified under "General Headings:"—e.g., ARMY—NAVY—INDIA—IRELAND—SCOTLAND—WALES—PARLIAMENT—POOR LAW—POST OFFICE—METROPOLIS—CHURCH OF ENGLAND—EDUCATION—LAW AND JUSTICE AND POLICE—LABOUR, TRADE, AND COMMERCE—LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—BOARD OF AGRICULTURE—BOARD OF TRADE.

ABERDEEN, Earl of Betting of Infants Bill, 2R. 1325
 Custody of Children Bill, 3R. 432

ABRAHAM, Mr. W., Glamorgan, Rhondda
 Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1769
 Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 78,
 233; Motion to give Precedence, 324

ABRAHAM, Mr. W., Limerick, W.
 Ireland—Distress—Relief Works, 1376

Access to Mountains—Resolution
 Q. Dr. Farquharson; A. The First Lord of
 Treas. Feb 17, 846

ACLAND, Mr. A. H. D., York, W.R., Rotherham
 Teachers' Registration Bill, 2R. 1000, 1002, 1003, 1005
 Technical Instruction Bill, 2R. 2045
VOL. CCCL. [THIRD SERIES.]

ACLAND, Mr. C. T. D., Cornwall, Launceston
 Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, 2R. 569
 Navy—Lieutenants—Retired List, &c. 1350
 Technical Instruction Bill, 2R. 1799

ADDISON, Mr. J. E. W., Ashton-under-Lyne
 Ballot Act—Illiterate Voters, 477
 Factory and Workshops Act Amendment
 Bill, 2R. 985

ADMIRALTY—(see NAVY)

ADMIRALTY—First Lord (see HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord G. F.)

ADMIRALTY—Secretary to (see FORWOOD, Mr. A. B.)

ARMY—cont.

Recruiting, Amendt. to Motion for going into Com. of Supply Feb 19, 1089; Q. Mr. L. Knowles; A. The Sec. for War Mar 2, 1931

Regiments

Leicestershire, Q. Mr. Tapling; A. The Sec. for War Feb 12, 473

Manchester Regiment (see sub-heading Ireland)

Regular Infantry—Musketry Instruction, Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The Sec. for War Feb 13, 604

Army Estimates

Questions on (see Parliament—Business of the House)

Memorandum of the Secretary for War relating to the Army Estimates 1891-92 (see Appendix)

Land Forces (153,696, of all Ranks), Com. Feb 19, 1173; Feb 23, 1382; Report * Feb 24, 1558

£5,632,700—Pay and Allowances and other Charges at Home and Abroad, Com.—R.P. Feb 23, 1459

Army Guns (Rifled Iron, and Steel)

Address for Return Feb 19, 1088

Army Officers' Pay, Retirement, and Pensions

Address for Return Feb 12, 465

Army Schools Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Feb 12, 465

Read 2^o Mar 2, 2039

Army (Stoppages of Pay)

Address for Return Feb 24, 1465

ASHER, Mr. A., Elgin, &c.

Army—Volunteer Officers—Case of Sergeant Mason, 603

Asiatic Turkey, Papers Relating to (see ARMENIA)Assessment of Taxes (Regulation of Remuneration) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Feb 17, 944

Read 2^o * Feb 26, 1798

Com. *—R.P. Mar 2, 2043

ATKINSON, Mr. H. J., Boston

America—"Alabama" Indemnity, 846

Currency—Issue of Bank Notes, 1467, 1847

Duration of Speeches (Parliament) Bill, 2R. 1538

Income Tax, Res. 1491

Marriages of Nonconformists (Attendance of Registrars) Bill, 2R. 1541, 1544, 1551

Parliament—Answers to Questions, 846

[cont.]

ATKINSON, Mr. H. J.—cont.

Railway Servants (Hours of Labour), Select Com., Appointment of, 1509

Sea Commerce, British Colonies and Dependencies, Res. 1972

ATTORNEY GENERAL (see WEBSTER, Sir R. E.)ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (see MADDEN, Right Hon. D. H.)*Australasian Treaties (see title Colonies)*AUSTRALIAN COLONIES

British Trade—Colonial Conference, &c. (see title Colonies)

Postage, Q. Mr. H. Heaton; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 27, 1832

Responsible Government Acts, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. The Under Sec. for Colon. Feb 19, 1070

AUSTRIA

Bread, Address for Return Feb 19, 1057

BADEN-POWELL, Sir G., Liverpool, Kirkdale Africa

Limpopo River, 679

Natal—Responsible Government, 679

Colonies—Investment of Trust Funds, 1932
International Maritime Conference at Washington, 146

Jamaica Exhibition, 494

Newfoundland Fishery Dispute, &c. 1068

BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH, Lord (Secretary to the Board of Trade)

Dover Harbour Bill, 2R. 193

BALFOUR, Right Hon. A. J. (Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland), Manchester, E.Ireland

Agriculture—Instruction in Dairy Work, 469

Contagious Diseases—Cattle in County Galway, 685

Criminal Law and Procedure Act, 1887

Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 696, 710, 769, 772, 773, 774, 776, 777, 781, 782, 802

Castlereagh Inquiry—Arrests, &c. 491, 609, 686, 1075

Dillon and O'Brien, Messrs. 499, 1472, 1709

Distress—Failure of Potato Crop

Death of Mary M'Gee, 1371

Relief Fund, 611

Relief Works, 473, 476, 480, 1683, 844, 1081, 1082, 1083, 1472, 1709, 1836, 1844, 1947

Seed Supply (Ireland) Act, 1374, 1375, 1376, 1377, 1378, 1379, 1708

[cont.]

BALFOUR, Right Hon. A. J.—cont.

Education

Day Schools, Return, 1080
National School Fees, 680
National School Teachers, 1372

Evictions

Falcarragh—Charges against the Police (see sub-heading Law and Justice and Police—Charges against the Police)

Olphert Estate—Bunbeg Prosecutions (see sub-heading Law and Justice and Police)

Fisheries Loan, 1364

Land Commission—Returns, 687

Land Holdings, 1363

Land Purchase, 686 (see also sub-heading Purchase of Land, &c. Bill)

Law and Justice and Police

Bunbeg Prosecutions (see sub-heading Police, Charges against)

Emergency Man, Prosecution of, 1708
Police

Belfast Police Station, Small-Pox in, 1369

Bunbeg—Complaints against the
Police, 608, 1471, 1084

Charges against the Police, 487, 607,
1075, 1705

Constabulary Force Fund, 1366, 1704,
1843

Fort Stewart Barracks, 1076

Local Government and Poor Law

Bandon Union, Veterinary Inspector
to, 1374

Distress—Relief Works (see sub-heading Distress)

Revision Courts, 1373

Magistracy

MacSheehy, Mr. J. T., Resident Magistrate, 479

Magan, Mr. P., Charges against, 494

Miscellaneous

Ether Drinking, 1370

Gold Mining Royalties, 1839

Market Rights and Tolls, 1367

Street Preaching in Arklow, 1076

Prisons

Belfast Gaol—Proposed Alterations,
1084, 1369, 1945

Railways and Tramways

Belfast Street Tramways—Free Passes,
&c. 1367, 1707, 1946

Finn Valley Railway, 480

(Refer also to sub-heading Distress—
Relief Works)

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts
(Ireland) Bill, 475

BALFOUR, Mr. J. S., Burnley

Government Contracts, Res. 643

Ballot Act

Illiterate Voters, Q. Mr. Addison; A. The
Att. Gen. Feb 12, 477

Bankruptcy (see title Board of Trade)

Bank Notes (see title Currency)

BARTLEY, Mr. G. C. T., Islington, N.

Income Tax, 1080, 1928; Res. 1475, 1487,
1499

London County Council (General Powers)
Bill, Instruction to Com. 1809, 1813, 1814,
1818

Post Office—Upper Holloway—Letter Delivery, 1827

Profit Sharing, 1357

South Kensington Museum—Competition
Drawings, 146

South Kensington and Paddington Subway
Bill, Instruction to Com. 462

BARTELOT, Colonel Sir W. B., Sussex,
N.W.

Army—Recruiting, Res. 1137, 1138

BASING, Lord

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com.
1620, 1621, 1635, 1664

BAUMANN, Mr. A. A., Camberwell,
Peckham

Cheap Trains (London) Bill, 2R. 1520

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1734,
1735

Hours of Labour Abroad, 482

South Kensington and Paddington Subway,
1844

South Kensington and Paddington Subway
Bill, 2R. 455

BEACH, Right Hon. Sir M. E. HICKS
(President of the Board of Trade),
Bristol, W.

Board of Trade

Bankruptcy—Bethnal Green Bank, 1361

Manchester Ship Canal, 302

Profit Sharing, 1357

Thames Conservancy, 613

Trade Disputes, Board of Arbitration for,
Res. 1900

Cheap Trains (London) Bill, 2R. 1520

Colonies—Trade and Treaties Committee, 490

Corn Sales Bill, 2R. 2046

Great Northern Railway Company (Rates and Charges) Provisional Orders Bill, 299

Labour

Hours of Labour Abroad, 482

London Tramway Men, 306

Statistics, 1826

Merchant Shipping

Bulkheads, 498

International Maritime Conference at Washington, 146

Patent Office—Abridgments of Specifications, 470

Railways

Rates, 672

Servants (Hours of Labour)—Returns, 577, 578; Select Com., Appointment of, 1505, 1507, 1510

[cont.]

BEACH, Right Hon. Sir M. E. Hicks—cont.

Railway Servants (Hours of Labour) Bill, 756
Thames Watermen and Lightermen Bill, 1855

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 60, 84, 85, 93, 98, 220, 221, 222, 223, 228, 241, 248, 249, 250, 252, 262, 264, 269, 271, 272, 273, 277, 282, 286, 288, 332, 335, 337, 338, 340, 344, 345, 348, 347, 348, 350, 352, 353, 354, 356, 357, 368, 374, 375, 376, 387, 388, 389, 390, 392; Motion to give Precedence, 323; 3R. 500, 508, 509, 511

Trading (Registration) Bill, 2R. 574

Wales—Holyhead Harbour—Platters Rocks, 1829

BEAUFOY, Mr. M. H., Lambeth, Kennington
Liverymen of the City of London, Res. 167
Prisons—Warder Schoolmasters, 1682

BECKETT, Mr. E. W., York, N.R., Whitby
Capital and Labour, Res. 1503
Labour Commission, 1473

BENTINCK, Right Hon. G. A. C., Whitehaven
Archbishop's Throne at Canterbury, 1829
Metropolis—Public Carriages, Lights on, 1691

BETHELL, Captain G. R., York, E.R., Holderness
Army—Education—Examinations, Res. 1172

Betting by Infants Bill

l. Presented; Read 1st Feb 10, 289
Read 2nd and com. to Com. of the whole House Feb 23, 1321

Bills of Sale Act (1890) Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1st Feb 16, 807

BIRKBECK, Sir E., Norfolk, E.
Adulterated Manures and Feeding Stuffs, 1926
Inflammable Liquids Bill, 1846
Market Rights and Tolls Commission, 1927

BLUNDELL, Colonel H. B. H., Lancashire, S.W., Ince
Army—Recruiting, Res. 1147
Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1781

BOARD OF AGRICULTURE—President (see CHAPLIN, Right Hon. H.)

Board of Agriculture

Adulterated Manures and Feeding Stuffs, Q. Sir E. Birkbeck; A. The Pres. Bd. Ag. Mar 2, 1926

Allotments (see that title)

Anthrax—Mr. Hankin's Cure, Q. Mr. Chan-ning; A. The Pres. Bd. Ag. Feb 12, 477

Commons, Select Com. on (see that title)

Irish Cattle (see title Ireland)

Board of Agriculture—cont.Labourers

Labourers' Union, Q. Major Rasch; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 23, 1346

(Refer also to title Labour, Trade, and Commerce—Royal Commission on Labour)

Land, Taxation of, Res. Feb 27, 1853

Market Rights and Tolls Commission (see that title)

Stallions, Thoroughbred, Q. Mr. Stephens; A. The Pres. Bd. Ag. Mar 2, 1932

Swine Fever—Compensation for Slaughtered Cattle, Qs. Mr. Fellowes, Mr. H. Gardner; As. The Pres. Bd. Ag. Feb 19, 1071

BOARD OF TRADE—President (see BEACH, Right Hon. Sir M. E. Hicks)

BOARD OF TRADE—Secretary (see BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH, Lord)

Board of Trade

Bankruptcy—Bethnal Green Bank, Postponed Q. Mr. Howell Feb 19, 1072; Q. Mr. Howell; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 23, 1361

British Trade and the Colonies (see title Colonies)

Inspectors of Weights and Measures (Appointments by County Councils under Provisions of Act 1889), Return ordered Feb 5, 51

International Maritime Conference at Washington, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 6, 146

Labour and Capital (see title Labour, Trade, and Commerce)

Machinery, Rating of, Q. Mr. Duncan; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 9, 200; Q. Mr. Duncan; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 16, 672

Madrid Industrial Property Convention (see title Labour, Trade, and Commerce)

Manchester Ship Canal, Q. Mr. P. Stanhope; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 10, 302

Merchant Shipping

British Steamer "Arbib Brothers" Arrested for Salvage in Algiers, Q. Dr. Cameron; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 17, 833

Bulkheads, Q. Mr. Furness; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 12, 497

Sea Commerce, British Colonies and Dependencies, Amendt. to Motion for going into Com. of Supply Mar 2, 1948

Patent Office (see title Labour, Trade, and Commerce)

Piers and Harbours

Holyhead Harbour—Platters Rocks, Q. Mr. T. Lewis; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 27, 1829

(See also title Ireland)

Railways

Board of Trade Orders, Return ordered Feb 12, 576

Rates, Q. Mr. Tomlinson; A. The Att. Gen. Feb 5, 13; Q. Mr. Sinclair; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 16, 672

[cont.]

[cont.]

Board of Trade—cont.*Servants (Hours of Labour)Glasgow and South Western and otherRailways (Weekly-paid) Servants, Re-turn ordered Feb 5, 111; Feb 12, 575Hours of Labour Abroad, Q. Mr. Bau-mann; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb12, 482Select Com. appointed Feb 24, 1504;Addition Mar 2, 1948(Refer also to title Labour, Trade, andCommerce)Thames Conservancy, Q. Mr. Lawson; A. ThePres. Bd. Trade Feb 13, 613Trade Disputes, Board of Arbitration for, Res.Feb 27, 1890Tramways—London Tramway Men (see titleLabour, Trade, and Commerce)BOLTON, Mr. T. H., *St. Pancras, N.*Central London Railway Bill, Instruction toCom. 453Cheap Trains (London) Bill, 2R. 1524, 1526Income Tax, Res. 1485, 1487Railway Servants (Hours of Labour), SelectCom., Appointment of, 1504, 1507Rating of Machinery (No. 2) Bill, 2R. 1615South Kensington and Paddington SubwayBill, Instruction to Com. 457, 464Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 51,55BOORD, Mr. T. W., *Greenwich*Navy—Greenwich Hospital, 605Borrowing (Infants) Billl. Presented; Read 1st Feb 23, 1343BORTHWICK, Sir A., *Kensington, S.*Alexandra Gate, 141BOULNOIS, Mr. E., *Marylebone, E.*London County Council (General Powers)Bill, 2R. 1809BEABOURNE, LordTithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 1018,1040; Com. 1617, 1619, 1622, 1623, 1624,1628, 1631, 1636, 1668, 1675, 1676BRAMWELL, LordTithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1618,1624, 1627, 1629, 1640, 1652BRAZILEmigration, Q. Mr. De Lisle; A. The UnderSec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 27, 1840United States Treaty, Qs. Mr. O. V. Morgan;As. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 9,207; Feb 12, 480; Mar 2, 1939*Bread, Price of, in Austria and Italy*Address for Return Feb 19, 1057*Brewers' Licences*Return ordered and presented Feb 17, 849BRIGHT, Mr. Jacob, *Manchester, S.W.*Barnsley Magistrates, 304BRIGHT, Mr. J. A., *Birmingham, Central*Factory and Workshops Act AmendmentBill, 2R. 969Brine Pumping (Compensation for Subsidence) Billc. Read 2nd and com. to Select Com., andOrders with Reference to Petitions,Papers, &c., Feb 17, 944BRISTOWE, Mr. T. L., *Lambeth, Norwood*Civil Service Clerks, 675*British and Foreign Spirits—Select Committee*Either as an Intoxicant, Q. Sir L. Playfair;A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 26, 1683BROADHURST, Mr. H., *Nottingham, W.*Capital and Labour, Royal Commission on,1474, 1703Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1752,1753, 1796BRODRICK, Hon. W. St. J. F. (Financial Secretary to the War Office), *Surrey, GuildfordArmyAuxiliary Forces—Militia and Volunteers,Strength of, 1468Examinations—Classics, 1835IrelandEnniskillen Barracks, 843Manchester Regiment at Tipperary,1706Range Accommodation, Res. 1156Recruiting, Res. 1144Army EstimatesLand Forces, 1415, 1416, 1424Pay and Allowances, 1461, 1462Navy—Coast Defence and SubmarineMines, Res. 1164, 1165BRUCE, Lord H., *Wilts, Chippenham*Army—Militia and Volunteers, Strength of,1468Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill,2R. 534Navy—Coast Defence and SubmarineMines, Res. 1167BRUNNER, Mr. J. T., *Cheshire, Northwich*Barbed Wires, 468Law and JusticeHandcuffing Prisoners, 468Marriages of Nonconformists (Attendanceof Registrars) Bill, 2R. 1554Midnight Interment—Extension of Licences,1833South Kensington and Paddington SubwayBill, 2R. 457*

BRYCE, Mr. J., Aberdeen, S.

- East India (Financial Statement), Res. 864
- Egypt—Judicial Reforms, 614
- Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1787
- Foreign Office and Diplomatic Service, 13
- Indian Councils Bill, 139
- Newfoundland Fishery Dispute, 1068, 1938
- Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 315
- Reform of the House of Lords, 1074

BUCHANAN, Mr. T. R., Edinburgh, W.

- Africa
 - Anglo-French Agreement—Spheres of Influence, 1843
 - Swaziland—Grant in Aid, 1940
- East India (Presidential Government), Res. 873, 908
- Museums and Gymnasiums Bill, Com. 1616
- Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act, 145
- Scotland
 - Education—Public Schools—Children's Term of Attendance, 1350

Building Societies

- Return ordered Feb 10, 299

BURDETT-COUTTS, Mr. W. L. A. B., Westminster

- Westminster Sewers, 1930

Burial Acts (England and Wales)

- Cemetery at Hyde, Q. Mr. Summers; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 19, 1063
- Midnight Interment, Qs. Mr. Brunner, Mr. Coghill; As. The Home Sec. Feb 27, 1833
- Plumstead, Burial at, Q. Colonel Hughes; A. The Home Sec. Feb 13, 605

BURT, Mr. T., Morpeth

- Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1779
- India
 - Cambay—Disturbances, 1058
 - Gurgaon District, 835
 - Stores, Overcharges on, 1849
- Railway Servants (Hours of Labour), Select Com., Appointment of, 1509

BUXTON, Mr. S. C., Tower Hamlets, Poplar

- Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1722
- Government Contracts
 - Res. 616, 630, 643
 - St. Martin's-le-Grand Post Office, 147
- Income Tax, Res. 1488
- Labour Commission, 1475

CADOGAN, Earl (Lord Privy Seal)

- Parliament—Standing Orders Relating to Standing Committees, Report con. 289, 292

CALDWELL, Mr. J., Glasgow, St. Rollox

- Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1586, 1590

CALDWELL, Mr. J.—cont.

- Scotland
 - Education
 - Ardochattan and Muckairn School Board, 8, 147, 307
 - Private School Registers, 612
 - Glasgow—Pottery Workmen, 1833

CAMERON, Dr. C., Glasgow, College

- France—Arrest of the British Steamer "Arbith Brothers," 833
- Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1561, 1573, 1606, 1607, 1575, 1576, 1597
- Scotland—Law and Justice—Reid, Andrew, Case of, 834

CAMPBELL, Sir G., Kirkcaldy, &c.

- Africa
 - Natal—Colonial Legislation, 1070
 - Zanzibar—Compensation by the Sultan, 478
- Army—Examinations, 497, 1380; Res. 1169, 1170
- Army Estimates, 1944
- Land Forces, 1448
- Egypt
 - International Tribunal, 1689
 - Soudan and Tokar, 488, 1380
- India
 - Factory Acts, Papers Relating to, 1060
 - Factory Labour—Berlin Conference, 845
 - Financial Statement, Res. 858, 861
 - Presidential Government, Res. 905
- Law and Justice—Clergyman, Conviction of a, 496

CAMPBELL, Mr. H., Fermanagh, S.

- Ireland
 - Post Office, Dublin, 1471
 - Rosslea National League, 1471

CAMPBELL, Mr. J. A., Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities

- Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1771

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Right Hon. H., Stirling, &c.

- Army—Recruiting, Res. 1134
- Army Estimates
 - Land Forces, 1408, 1410
- Egypt—Tokar, Occupation of, 1380
- India (Presidential Government), Res. 888
- Navy Estimates
 - Officers, Seamen, &c.—Wages, &c. 2038
- Parliament—Business of the House, 1797
- Private Bill Legislation, 1711

CAMPERDOWN, Earl of

- Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1641

CANADA

- British Trade—Colonial Conference (see title Colonies)
- Newfoundland Fishery Dispute, &c. (see title NEWFOUNDLAND)

CANADA—cont.

Proposed Lines of Steamers between Canada and West Indian Islands (see title WEST INDIES)

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of
Betting by Infants Bill, 2R. 1326
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 1029

Canterbury—Archbishop's Throne (see Literature, Science, and Art)

Capital and Labour—Royal Commission
(see title Labour, Trade, and Commerce)

CARLISLE, Bishop of
Custody of Children Bill, Com. 119

CAUSTON, Mr. R. K., Southwark, W.
Electoral Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 550
Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill,
2R. 538, 539; Com. 2040, 2041, 2042,
2043
Labour Commission, 1475
Religious Disabilities, 206

Central London Railway Bill
c. Instruction to Com., Adjourned Debate resumed and Motion withdrawn Feb 12, 453

Certificated Teachers in Public Elementary Schools
Return ordered Feb 16, 665

CEYLON
Military Contributions, Q. Sir R. Lethbridge;
A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Feb 6, 139
Paddy Tax, Q. Mr. Seale-Hayne; A. The Under Sec. for India Feb 23, 1344

CHANCE, Mr. P. A., Kilkenny, S.
Ireland
Army—Soldiers' Children in Kilkenny, 20
Criminal Law, &c. Act—Long, Mr., 17
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 83,
84

CHANCELLOR, The Lord (see HALSBURY, Lord)

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (see GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J.)

CHANNING, Mr. F. A., Northampton, E.
Anthrax—Mr. Hankin's Cure, 477
Ireland—Instruction in Dairy Work, 469
Magistrates' Clerks and Solicitors, 1840
Railway Servants (Hours of Labour), Returns, 576, 578; Select Com., Appointment of, 1510
Vaccination Acts, Sentence Under, 670

Chapel Royal, Whitehall (see Church of England)

CHAPLIN, Right Hon. H. (President of the Board of Agriculture), Lincolnshire, Sleaford
Allotments—St. Margaret's, Leicester, 1696
Board of Agriculture
Adulterated Manures and Feeding Stuffs,
1926
Anthrax—Mr. Hankin's Cure, 477
Market Rights and Tolls Commission, 1927
Stallions, Thoroughbred, 1932
Swine Fever—Compensation for Slaughtered Cattle, 1072
Land, Taxation of, Res. 1870, 1875, 1879, 1881
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 383

Charitable Trusts Bill
c. 2R.; Bill withdrawn Feb 16, 808

Charity Commissioners
Allotments (see that title)

Cheap Trains (London) Bill
c. 2R. negated Feb 24, 1510

Child Life Insurance Registration (Scotland) Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o Feb 17, 851

CHILI (see AMERICA—SOUTH)

CHINA
Ports and Coaling Stations, Control of, Res.
Mar 2, 1985
(See also title HONG KONG)

Church of England
Belsize Court Estate (see title Ecclesiastical Commissioners)
Bishop of Exeter and the Rev. H. Marriott,
Q. Mr. Furness; A. The Home Sec. Feb 5, 7
Chapel Royal, Whitehall, Q. Mr. James; A.
The First Com. of Works Feb 9, 202; Q.
Mr. James; A. The Sec. to Treas. Feb 10, 306
Parishes (United, Divided, &c.), Address for Return Mar 2, 1947

City Livery Charities Commission
Liverymen of the City of London, Res. Feb 6, 158

Civil Establishments
Royal Commission, Q. Mr. Bryce; A. The
Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 5, 13

Civil Service
Admiralty Department (see title NAVY)
[cont.]

Civil Service—cont.

Clerks, Qs. Mr. Tuite; As. The Sec. to Treas. Feb 5, 10; Feb 6, 146; Feb 24, 1466; Q. Mr. Bristowe; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 16, 675
Superannuation, Q. Mr. Leake; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 19, 1065
Volunteer Civil Servants—Easter Review, Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The Sec. to Treas. Mar 2, 1927
Writers, Q. Mr. Tuite; A. The Sec. to Treas. Feb 5, 10

CLARK, Dr. G. B., Caithness

Army Estimates
Land Forces, 1450, 1451, 1454
Pay and Allowances, &c. 1459, 1462
Land Taxation, Res. 1888
Local Authorities (Scotland) Loans Bill, 2R. 1006
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 320
Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1596, 1607
Railway Servants (Hours of Labour), Select Com., Appointment of, 1504, 1505, 1506, 1509
Scotland — Crofters' Commission — Fair Rents, &c. 1685, 1686

CLARKE, Sir E. G. (Solicitor General), Plymouth

Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, 2R. 561, 571
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 257

Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill

l. Presented; Read 1st Feb 23, 1843

Coal, Cinders, &c.

Accounts ordered Feb 26, 1876

COBB, Mr. H. P., Warwick, S.E., Rugby

Army Officers—Baccarat Scandal, 677
County Councils—River Improvements and Floods, 140
Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill, 691, 1088, 1942, 1943; 2R. 524, 527, 528, 532, 538
Labour, Royal Commission on, 1944
Law and Justice
Inquests—Bedford, The late Duke of, 1686, 1687
Queen's Bench Division—Dissatisfaction with a Judge, 1362, 1701
South Kensington and Paddington Subway, 1845

COGHILL, Mr. D. H., Newcastle-under-Lyme

Army
Recruiting, Res. 1145
Soldiers on March—Rations, 1935
Volunteer Position Artillery, 1398
Burials—Midnight Interment—Extension of Licences, 1834
Metropolitan Street Accidents, 303

Coinage (see Currency)COLLINGS, Mr. J., Birmingham, Bordesley

Allotments—St. Margaret's, Leicester, 1696

COLOMB, Sir J. C. R., Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1385, 1388, 1404, 1407
Customs Out-Door Department, 12
Income Tax, Res. 1484
Navy
Coast Defence and Submarine Mines, Res. 1165
Sea Commerce, British Colonies and Dependencies, Res. 1948, 1961
Parliament—Business of the House, 1851

COLONIES—Secretary of State (see KNUTSFORD, Lord)COLONIES—Under Secretary of State (see DE WORMS, Right Hon. Baron H.)*Colonies

Investment of Trust Funds, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. The Ch. of Exch. Mar 2, 1932
Mining Royalties, Q. Mr. Pritchard Morgan; A. The Att. Gen. Feb 27, 1847

Self-Governing Colonies—Trade and Treaties Committee

Colonial Conference, &c., Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 12, 490; Motion and Debate (Lords) Feb 12, 433; Res. Feb 17, 908

Sea Commerce, British Colonies and Dependencies, Amendt. to Motion for going into Com. of Supply Mar 2, 1948

(See also title BRAZIL—Treaty with United States)

Colonisation—Select Committee

Message to the House of Lords for leave for Viscount Gordon (Earl of Aberdeen) to attend as Witness Feb 6, 158

Message received Feb 9, 193

Message from the Lords consenting Feb 13, 429; Feb 13, 616

COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION—Lord President (see CRANBROOK, Viscount)

Vice President (see DYKE, Right Hon. Sir W. H.)

Commons

Select Com. ordered and appointed Feb 16, 808

Companies Act (1862) Amendment Bill

c. Read 2nd Feb 11, 427

COMPTON, Earl, York, W.R., Barnsley
Capital and Labour—Royal Commission, 1703

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1731
Post Office—Savings Bank Clerks, Sorters, &c., 12, 615, 1689, 1929
Windsor, Insanitary Condition of, 1359

CONDON, Mr. T. J., Tipperary, E.
Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act—Administration—
Tipperary Trials, &c., Res. 771
Education—Day Schools, Returns, 1080

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act (see
Board of Agriculture)

CONYBEARE, Mr. C. A. V., Cornwall, Camborne

Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, 2R. 558;
Com. 807
Electoral Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 553;
Com. 805

India

Abdul Rasoni, 668, 838
Financial Statement, Res. 866
Salt Industry in Burma, 667

Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act—Administration—
Tipperary Trials, &c., Res. 800

Law and Justice

Carter, H. W., Case of, 839

Chelmsford Magistrates—Severe Sentence, 843

Poaching—Case of W. Laycock, 678

Mines—Royalties, Dues, and Wayleaves, 192

Parliament—Business of the House, 574

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 99,
249, 252, 258, 265, 269, 272, 278, 285

COOKE, Mr. C. W. R., Newington, W.
Colonial Conference, Res. 941, 942

Copyright (see title Literature, Science, and Art)

Copyright Bill

1. Petition that the Bill be referred to Select
Com. &c. Feb 26, 1617

CORBET, Mr. W. J., Wicklow, E.
Ireland

Arklow Street Preaching, 1076
Greystones Harbour, 1075

CORBETT, Mr. A. C., Glasgow, Tradeston
Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act—Administration—
Tipperary Trials, &c., Res. 745

Corn Sales Bill

c. Road 2^o Mar 2, 2046

County Councils (see Local Government Board)

County Councillors (Qualification of Women) Bill

1. Presented; Read 1st Feb 9, 196

COURTNEY, Right Hon. L. H. (Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means and Deputy Speaker), Cornwall, Bodmin

Lancashire County Council Bill, 2R. 454

Leicester Extension Bill, Instruction to
Com. 297

London County Council (General Powers)
Bill, 2R. 1808; Instruction to Com. 1817

London Overhead Wires Bill, Instruction to
Com. 1824

Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee,
138

South Kensington and Paddington Subway
Bill, 2R. 457; Instruction to Com. 463

(Rulings as Chairman of Committees)

Navy Estimates

Men and Boys, 2035

Officers, Seamen, &c.—Wages, 2039

COX, Mr. J. R., Clare, E.

Ireland—Distress—Relief Works, 1471

CRAIG, Mr. J., Newcastle-upon-Tyne

Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, 2R. 571

Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Belsize Court
Estate, 1680

CRANBORNE, Viscount, Lancashire, N.E., Darwen

Technical Instruction Bill, 2R. 1799

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 67,
223, 381

CRANBROOK, Viscount (Lord President of the Council)

Betting by Infants Bill, 2R. 1323

Elementary Education (Blind and Deaf)
Bill, 2R. 581, 651, 658, 660, 661, 662;
Com. 1336, 1337, 1340

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1618

CRAWFORD, Mr. D., Lanark, N.E.

Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1591,
1593

Railway Servants (Hours of Labour) Bill, 675

CREMER, Mr. W. R., Shoreditch, Haggerston

Capital and Labour—Royal Commission, 1703

Cheap Trains (London) Bill, 2R. 1517, 1518

Government Contracts, Res. 633, 640

Railway Servants (Hours of Labour), Select
Com., Appointment of, 1508

Registration of Electors Acts Amendment
Bill, Com. 1464

CRILLY, Mr. D., Mayo, N.

Ireland

Distress—Relief Works, 153

Post Office Savings Banks, 155

Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland)
Act, 1887

Return ordered Feb 9, 217

CROSS, Hon. W. H., Liverpool, West Derby
Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill,
2R. 413

Post Office—Liverpool Postmen, 304

CROSS, Viscount (Secretary of State for India)

East India Officers Bill, 2R. 649

Currency

Bank Notes, Issue of, &c., Qs. Mr. Sinclair;
As. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 10, 303; Feb 23,
1358; Postponed Q. Mr. Atkinson Feb 24,
1487; Q. Mr. Atkinson; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 27, 1847

Irish Bank Notes, Qs. Mr. Flynn; As. The
Ch. of Exch. Feb 16, 682; Feb 23, 1374
Legislation, Q. Sir W. Harcourt; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 16, 671

CURZON, Viscount, Bucks, Wycombe

Post Office—Telegrams, 306

Custody of Children Bill

l. Com. Feb 6, 113

Report Feb 9, 195

Read 3^a; Amendt. made, and passed Feb 12, 429

c. Read 1^o * Feb 16, 808

2R. deferred Feb 26, 1798

Customs and Inland Revenue

Customs

Messengers, Q. Mr. Pickersgill; A. The
Sec. to Treas. Feb 6, 142

Out-Door Department, Q. Sir J. Colomb;
A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 5, 12

Inland Revenue

Clerks (see title Civil Service)

Income Tax

Qs. Mr. Dixon-Hartland, Mr. Bartley;
As. The Ch. of Exch. Mar 2, 1928;
Motion for Select Com. Feb 24, 1475

Inhabited House Duty, Q. Mr. Storey; A.
The Ch. of Exch. Feb 19, 1072

Rating of Government Property, Q. Colonel
Hughes; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 13, 605

Rating of Machinery, Q. Mr. Duncan; A.
The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 9, 200; Q.
Mr. Duncan; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade
Feb 16, 672

Taxation of Land, Amendt. to Motion for going into Com. of Supply Feb 27, 1853

Ireland (see that title)

Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1890

County Councils and Technical Education
(see title EDUCATION)

DALRYMPLE, Sir C., Ipswich

Industrial Schools Bill, 1358

DALTON, Mr. J. J., Donegal, W.

Ireland—Distress—Relief Works, 151, 154, 310

DAVEY, Sir H., Stockton

South Africa Company and Manicaland, 202

DAWNAY, Colonel Hon. L. P., York, N.R., Thirsk

Law and Justice

Hargan, W., Res. 30, 36, 37

Law of Self-Defence, 495

Sbetland Islands—Oological Expedition, 837

DEASY, Mr. J., Mayo, W.

Ireland—Distress—Relief Works, 1709

Deaths from Starvation (Metropolis)

Address for Returns Feb 23, 1381

DE COBAIN, Mr. E. S. W., Belfast, E.

Ireland

Belfast Street Tramways, 1367, 1707, 1946

Four Courts, Dublin, 1945

Post Office—Knock, Telegraph Station at, 1945

Local Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment
Bill, 2R. 1536

Marriages of Nonconformists (Attendance
of Registrars) Bill, 2R. 1550

DE LISLE, Mr. E. J. L. M. P., Leicestershire, Mid

Brazil, Emigration to, 1840

Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill,
Com. 2042

M'Kinley Tariff Bill and Irish Muslin Trade, 311

Marriages of Nonconformists (Attendance of Registrars) Bill, 2R. 1546, 1547, 1548

Religious Disabilities, 207

Vaccination Commission, 1827

DENMAN, Lord

Parliament—Standing Orders Relating to Standing Committees, Report con. 291

Women's Suffrage Bill, 2R. 809

DE RAMSEY, Lord

Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis)
Bill, 2R. 1916

DE ROS, Lord

Betting by Infants Bill, 2R. 1323

London Streets, 582

DE WORMS, Right Hon. Baron H. (Under Secretary of State for the Colonies),
Liverpool, East Toxteth

Africa (South Coast)

Natal—Responsible Government, 679, 1071

Swaziland—Grant in Aid, 1940

Africa (West Coast)

Gold Coast—District Commissioner, 487

[cont.]

DE WORMS, Right Hon. Baron H.—cont.

British Honduras—Baron Siccama's Reports, 1937
Ceylon—Military Contributions, 139
Newfoundland Fishery Dispute, 1067
Perak—Ex-Sultan Abdullah, 1058
West Indies
Jamaica Exhibition, 494
Leeward Islands—Medical Officer, 198

DICKSON, Mr. T. A., Dublin, St. Stephen's Green

Nelson's Pillar (Dublin) Bill, 2R. 601

District Councils Bill

Q. Mr. D. Thomas; A. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 17, 847

DIXON-HARTLAND, Mr. F. D., Middlesex, Uxbridge

Cheap Trains (London) Bill, 2R. 1534
County Council, London—Parish Assessments, 1933
Income Tax, 1928
Parliament—Index to Members, 1929

Dover Harbour Bill

l. Read 2^a Feb 9, 193

DUFF, Mr. R. W., Banffshire

Navy Estimates
Officers, Seamen, &c.—Wages, &c. 2038
Ships—"Sans Pareil," &c. 2002, 2008, 2009, 2011, 2024, 2030, 2036

DUNCAN, Mr. J. A., Barrow-in-Furness

Chili, Revolution in, 206
Rating of Machinery, 200, 672

DUNRAVEN, Earl of

Colonies—Conference on Imperial Trade and Defence, Res. 433, 452
Local Government Act, 1888 — Medical Officers of Health, Res. 813, 817
Newfoundland Fishery Question, 817

Duration of Speeches (Parliament) Bill

l. 2R. negatived Feb 24, 1538

DYKE, Right Hon. Sir W. H. (Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education), Kent, Dartford

Archbishop's Throne at Canterbury, 1829
Education Department (England and Wales)
Bangor Training College, 835
Ipsden School, Oxfordshire, 1351
Rochdale Half-Timers, 1682
Technical Education and the County Councils Funds, 4
Technical Instruction Bill, 2R. 1799, 2045

EAST INDIA (see INDIA)

East India Officers Bill

l. Presented; Read 1^a Feb 10, 289
Read 2^a, and com. to Com. of the whole House Feb 16, 649
Com.* and Re-com. to Standing Com. Feb 23, 1335

Ecclesiastical Commissioners

Belsize Court Estate, Qs. Mr. Craven, Mr. Lawson, Sir W. Lawson; As. Sir J. Mowbray Feb 26, 1680
Parishes (United, Divided, &c.), Address for Return Mar 2, 1947

EDUCATION—Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education (see DYKE, Right Hon. Sir W. H.)

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES)

Attendance of Children at Board Schools and Mr. Montagu Williams, Qs. Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. Mundella; As. The Home Sec. Mar 2, 1938

Bangor Training College, Q. Mr. D. Thomas; A. The Vice Pres. Feb 17, 834

Ipsden School, Oxfordshire, Q. Mr. F. Parker; A. The Vice Pres. Feb 23, 1351

Rochdale Half-Timers, Q. Mr. Picton; A. The Vice Pres. Feb 26, 1682

School Buildings, Stock for, Qs. Mr. Keay; As. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 9, 211; Feb 12, 494

Teachers

Certificated Teachers in Public Elementary Schools, Return ordered Feb 16, 665

Elementary Teachers' Superannuation, Select Com. (see that title)

Technical Education—County Councils Funds—Local Taxation, &c. Acts, Qs. Sir R. Paget, Mr. Hinckes, Mr. Hobhouse; As. The Ch. of Exch., The Vice Pres., The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 5, 3

Educational Endowments (Banffshire) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^a Feb 11, 428

Educational Endowments (Ireland) Act,

1885.—Rainey School, Magherafelt
Answer to Address Feb 26, 1679

EGERTON, Hon. A. de Tatton, Cheshire, Knutsford

London Water Supply, 465

EGERTON of TATTON, Lord

Elementary Education (Blind and Deaf) Bill, 2R. 657, 658, 661; Com. 1337, 1341

EGYPT

International Tribunals—Judicial Reforms, Q. Mr. Bryce; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 13, 614; Q. Sir G. Campbell; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 26, 1689

EGYPT—cont.Soudan

Famine Relief, Q. Mr. S. Gedge; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 9, 196
Tokar, Occupation of—British Troops, &c., Q. Sir G. Campbell; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 12, 488; Qs. Mr. J. Morley, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Sir G. Campbell; As. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 23, 1379; Qs. Mr. Labouchere, Mr. J. Morley; As. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 26, 1694; Qs. Mr. Labouchere, Sir W. Lawson; As. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Mar 2, 1937

(Refer also to Debate on Army Estimates Feb 23, 1425)

Electoral Disabilities Removal Bill

c. Read 2^o Feb 12, 549

Com. Feb 16, 804

Com. *—R.P. Feb 26, 1798

Electors Qualification and Registration Bill

c. 2R.; Bill withdrawn Feb 11, 442

Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill

c. Read 2^o Feb 12, 521

Com. and Re-com. Mar 2, 2040

Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill

Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Cobb; As. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 16, 691; Q. Mr. Cobb; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 19, 1088; Qs. Mr. Cobb, Sir J. Goldsmid, Mr. J. Lowther, Mr. H. Gardner; As. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Mar 2, 1942

Elementary Education (Blind and Deaf) Bill

l. Presented; Read 1st Feb 9, 196

Order for 2R. read and deferred Feb 13, 581

Read 2^o and com. to Com. of the Whole House Feb 16, 651

Com. and Re-com. to Standing Com. Feb 23, 1335

Elementary Teachers' Superannuation

Select Com. ordered Feb 10, 392

ELLIOT, Hon. A. R. D., Roxburgh

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, 2R. 419

Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1584, 1600

ELLIS, Mr. J., Leicestershire, Bosworth

Ireland—Land Purchase, 212

Leicester Extension Bill, Instruction to Com., Res. 293, 296, 298

ELLIS, Mr. J. E., Nottingham, Rushcliffe
 Bridport Savings Bank, 1357

Ireland

Ashbourne Acts—Returns, 152

Land Holdings, 1363

Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee, 137

Post Office, Nottingham, 673

Registration of Electors Acts Amendment Bill, Com. 1464

ELPHINSTONE, Lord

Navy—Admiral Colomb's Invention, 194

Emigration and Immigration

Emigration to Brazil, Q. Mr. De Lisle; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 27, 1840

ESHER, Lord

Betting by Infants Bill, 2R. 1325

ESMONDE, Sir T. G., Dublin Co., S.Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act

Administration of — Tipperary Trials, &c., Res. 749

Castlereagh, Arrest of Women at, 21

Dillon and O'Brien, Messrs, 1472, 1709

Distress—Relief Works, 1844

Financial Relations between England and Ireland, 1849

Land Purchase, 475

Law and Justice and Police

Constabulary Force Fund, 1365, 1704, 1843

Emergency Man, Prosecution of, 1708

French Detective Officer, 1074

Navy—Ships—"Egeria," 1348

West Indies

Leeward Islands—Medical Officer, 198

Proposed Lines of Steamers to Canada, 1470

ESSLEMONT, Mr. P., Aberdeen, E.

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1796; Com., Res. 1797

India—Assam-Chittagong Railway, 1344

Law and Justice — Whitechapel Murder, 1693

London Overhead Wires Bill, Instruction to Com. 1821

Parliament—Business of the House, 1852

Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1581, 1583, 1594

Scotland—Weights and Measures, Inspectors of, 11

South Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill, Instruction to Com., 460

EVANS, Mr. S. T., Glamorgan, Mid.

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 62, 66, 102, 106, 108, 220, 221, 222, 228, 243, 251, 261, 264, 275, 282, 288, 330, 332, 343, 346, 347, 352, 353, 354, 355, 358, 365, 369, 391; Motion to give Precedence, 317

EYRE, Colonel H., Lincolnshire, Gainsborough
Post Office—Packets, 488

Factories Act

(See titles Labour, Trade, and Commerce and India)

Factories (Certificates of Birth) (Fees) Bill

c. Read 2^o Feb 26, 1799

Factories and Workshops Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Feb 10, 392
Read 2^o and com. to Standing Com. on Trade, &c. Feb 26, 1712

Factories and Workshops Bill

Q. Mr. Johnston; A. The Home Sec. Feb 26, 1710

Factory and Workshops Act (1878) Amendment Bill

c. Read 2^o Feb 18, 945
Com. to the Com. on the Factories and Workshops Bill Feb 26, 1800

Factory and Workshops Acts Amendment Bill

Postponed Q. Sir H. James Feb 19, 1074;
Q. Sir H. James; A. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 23, 1362

Factory and Workshop Sanitation Bill

l. Presented; Read 1^o * Feb 5, 1

False Marking Prevention (No. 2) Bill

c. 2R. deferred Feb 12, 575

FARQUHARSON, Dr. R., Aberdeenshire, W.
Army

Recruiting, Res. 1138
Sentry Duty at Public Buildings, 1356
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1423
Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1766
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 319
Scotland—Access to Mountains, Res. 846

FARQUHARSON, Mr. H. R., Dorset, W.
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 333, 335, 345, 364, 381

FELLOWES, Hon. A. E., Huntingdonshire, Kamsay

Post Office—Sawtry Telegraphic Communication, 1842
Swine Fever—Compensation for Slaughtered Cattle, 1071

FENWICK, Mr. C., Northumberland, Wansbeck

Gold Mining Royalties, 1838
Government Contracts, Res. 626
Navy—Docks—Plymouth and Devonport, 7, 148
Railway Servants (Hours of Labour), Select Com., Appointment of, 1506

FERGUSON, Mr. R. C. Munro, Leith, &c.

Army—Range Accommodation, Res. 1153
India
Presidential Government, Res. 895
Railway Annuities, 1465
Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 1380

FERGUSON, Right Hon. Sir J. (Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), Manchester, N.E.

Africa

Anglo-French Agreement—Spheres of Influence, 1843
England and Portugal in—Manicaland—South Africa Chartered Company, &c. 202, 1353, 1469

Africa (East Coast)—Zanzibar—Compensation by the Sultan, 478

Africa (South)—Limpopo River, 680

Africa (West Coast)—King Ja Ja, 145

Armenia

Papers Relating to, 205
Political Prisoners, &c. 1831
Zeitoun—Salih Pasha, 1935

Army Estimates—Egypt—British Troops, &c. 1434, 1435, 1441, 1454

Brazil

Emigration to, 1840
United States Treaty, 207, 480, 1939
Chili Revolution, 206, 1712

Egypt

International Tribunals—Judicial Reforms, 614, 1689

Soudan

Famine Relief, 197
Tokar, Occupation of—British Troops, &c. 489, 1379, 1695, 1937

Foreign Office and Diplomatic Service, 13

France—Arrest of the British Steamer "Arbib Brothers," 833

Newfoundland Fisheries, 1939

FIELD, Admiral E., Sussex, Eastbourne

Navy

Launch of New Warships—Members of Parliament Accommodation, 302
Ports and Coaling Stations, Control of, Res. 1993

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 2011
Nelson's Pillar (Dublin) Bill, 2R. 600

FIELDEN, Mr. T., Lancashire, S.E., Middleton

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1730
Law and Justice—Hargan, Walter, Res. 48

GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J.—cont.

- Ether as an Intoxicant, 1683
- Financial Relations between England and Ireland, 1849
- Gold Coinage Bill, 302
- Gold Mining Royalties, 5, 1837, 1838
- Imperial Defence Act, Barracks Act, and Naval Defence Act, 1693
- Ireland
 - Bank Notes, Issue of, 682, 683, 1374
 - Income Tax and Oldcastle Board of Guardians, 1079
 - Tithes, 210
- Naval Pensions, 482
- Patent Office—Encouragement of Inventors, 200
- Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill—Sinking Funds, &c., 23, 212, 494
- Savings Bank, Bridport, 1357
- Scotland—West Highland Commission, 1073

GOURLEY, Mr. E. T., Sunderland

- Navy
 - Officers—Promotion from the Ranks, Res. 1984
- Sea Commerce, British Colonies and Dependencies, Res. 1974
- Ships
 - "Mohawk," 494
 - "Sans Pareil"—The 110-Ton Guns, 496
- Rating of Machinery Bill, 2R. 424

Government Contracts

- Res. (Mr. S. Buxton); Amendt. (Mr. Plunket) Feb 13, 616
- St. Martin's-le-Grand Post Office, Q. Mr. S. Buxton; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 6, 147

Government Securities

- Guarantee and Sinking Funds (see title Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill)
- Stock for School Buildings, Qs. Mr. Keay; As. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 9, 211; Feb 12, 494

GRAHAM, Mr. R. C., Lanark, N. W.

- Ireland—Criminal Law, &c. Act—Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 794

GRANVILLE, Earl

- Dover Harbour Bill, 2R. 193

GRAY, Mr. C. W., Essex, Maldon

- Income Tax, Res. 1487
- Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 338, 345, 370, 375; 3R. 514

Great Northern Railway Company (Rates and Charges) Provisional Orders Bill

- c. Ordered Feb 10, 298

GREY, Sir E., Northumberland, Berwick

- Thames Watermen and Lightermen Bill, 1354

GRIMTHORPE, Lord

- Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1621, 1637

HALL, Mr. A. W., Oxford

- Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, 2R. 406

HALSBURY, Lord (Lord Chancellor)

- Betting by Infants Bill, 2R. 1324
- Custody of Children Bill, Com. 122, 124, 131, 132; Report, 195; 3R. 430
- Elementary Education (Blind and Deaf) Bill, 2R. 581
- Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis) Bill, 2R. 1917
- Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1627, 1643, 1676

HAMBRO, Colonel C. J. T., Dorset, South

- Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 345

HAMILTON, Lord E., Tyrone, N.

- Metropolis—Smoke Annihilation, 845

HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord G. F. (First Lord of the Admiralty), Middlesex, Ealing

- Navy
 - Charts and Surveys—Zambesi River, 475
 - Defences
 - Defence Act, Expenditure under, 1934
 - Sea Commerce, British Colonies and Dependencies, Res. 1963, 1968
- Docks
 - Haulbowline, 214, 474
 - Plymouth and Devonport, 149
 - Portsmouth—Launch of New Warships
 - Members of Parliament—Accommodation, 303
 - Sheerness, 1360
- Greenwich Hospital, 606
- Miscellaneous
 - Admiralty Department—Clerks, 1827
 - Queenstown Memorial to the Admiralty, 847
 - Widows' and Orphans' Fund—H.M.S. "Serpent," 472

Officers

- Lieutenants—Active and Retired Lists, 1350
- Ports and Coaling Stations, Control of Res. 1996
- Royal Naval Reserve, 1062

Ships

- "Egeria," 1348
- "Mohawk," 495
- "Ravenshall"—Missing Vessels and the Crozet Islands, 199
- "Sans Pareil"—The 110-Ton Guns, 496
- "Serpent," 472
- Steam Colliers, 472
- "Sultan," 473
- Torpedo Gunboats, 1936

HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord G. F.—cont.

Navy Estimates, 615
Men and Boys, 2008, 2009, 2030, 2032,
2034, 2037

HAMLEY, General Sir E. B., Birkenhead
Army—Recruiting, Res. 1109

HANBURY, Mr. R. W., Preston
Army

Barracks, Fulwood, 204
Magazine Rifles, 204
Militia and Volunteers, Strength of, 1468
Recruiting, Res. 1089, 1093, 1094, 1095,
1118, 1119, 1120, 1124, 1149

HARCOURT, Right Hon. Sir W. G. V., Derby

Currency—Legislation, 671
East India (Financial Statement), Res. 858, 859
Ireland—Criminal Law, &c. Act—Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 776,
782, 786, 797, 798
Law and Justice—Hargan, Walter, Res. 42, 44

Navy

Imperial Defence Act, &c. 1697
Sea Commerce, British Colonies and Dependencies, Res. 1956, 1961, 1963, 1970
Parliament—Business of the House, 691;
Res. 314
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 54,
55, 72, 109, 221, 225, 336, 337, 344, 345;
3R. 500, 503, 509, 511

HARLAND, Sir E. J., Belfast, N.
Nelson's Pillar (Dublin) Bill, 2R. 601

HARLECH, Lord
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1626

HARRISON, Mr. H., Tipperary, Mid.
Ireland—Criminal Law, &c. Act—Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 763

HARROWBY, Earl of
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1635

HARTINGTON, Right Hon. Marquess of,
Lancashire, Rossendale
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1388
India—Presidential Government, Res. 884

HAVELOCK-ALLAN, Lieutenant-General
Sir H. M., Durham, S.E.
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1418

HAYDEN, Mr. L. P., Leitrim, S.
Ireland
Criminal Law, &c. Act—Castlereagh Arrests,
492, 608
Magistracy—Magan, Mr. P., 493, 1085,
1087

HEALY, Mr. M., Cork

Ireland
Bankruptcy Law, 842
Land Purchase in Cork, 841
Post Office—Telegraph Delivery, 841, 843

HEALY, Mr. T. M., Longford, N.

Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, Com. 806
Electoral Disabilities Removal Bill, Com.
804

Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill,
691; 2R. 543, 547, 548

Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act
Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c.,
Res. 796, 804
Walsh, Mr., 216

Distress

Relief Fund, 473, 476, 611
Relief Works, 473

Fisheries Loan, 1364

Land Commission—Mr. Justice Bewley,
155

Landlord and Tenant—Lord Waterford's
Tenant, Michael Keily, 481

Law and Justice and Police
"Heffernan v. Carter," 485

Police

Charges against—Bunbeg Prosecutions, 607

Complaints against the Police—Arrest of Mrs. Gara, 608

Shadowing—Father Humphries, 149

Licensing (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 428

Nelson's Pillar (Dublin) Bill, 2R. 601

Parliament—Business of the House, Res.
326

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 85,
87, 93, 246, 249, 250, 254, 257, 390, 392

HEATON, Mr. J. H., Canterbury

Post Office
Australian Colonies, Postage to, 1832
Calais-Brindisi Mails, 1831
Indian Postcards, 1832

HENEAGE, Right Hon. E., Great Grimsby

Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill,
Com. 2041

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill,
2R. 415

Parliament—Sittings of the House—Ash
Wednesday, Res. 312

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 3R. 518

HENNESSY, Sir J. POPE, Kilkenny, N.

Navy—Ports and Coaling Stations, Control of, Res. 1985

HENNIKER, Lord

Local Government Act, 1888—Medical
Officers of Health, Res. 815, 816, 1817

Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act (see SCOTLAND)
4 I 2

HERSCHELL, Lord

Africa—British South Africa, 581
 Betting by Infants Bill, 2R. 1321, 1333
 Custody of Children Bill, Com. 121, 126
 Elementary Education (Blind and Deaf) Bill, 2R. 652
 Intermediate Schools, &c. Sites Bill, Com. 1342, 1343
 Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis) Bill, 2R. 1907, 1919
 Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1613, 1620, 1621, 1623, 1627, 1637, 1640, 1644, 1653, 1654, 1656, 1671, 1673, 1677

HILL, Colonel E. S., Bristol, S.

Madrid Industrial Property Convention, 490
 Newfoundland Fisheries, 489

HILL, Mr. A. S., Staffordshire, Kingswinford

Colonial Conference, Res. 914
 Newfoundland Fishery Dispute, &c. 1087
 Tithe Bill, Motion to give Precedence, 321
 Wolverhampton Corporation Bill, 2R. 822;
 Instruction to Com. 822, 829, 832

HINCKES, Mr. H. T., Staffordshire, Leek

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1784
 Technical Education and the County Council Funds, 4

HOARE, Mr. E. B., Hampstead

British Honduras—Baron Siccama's Report, 1936
 Regent's Park—Direction Posts, 486

HOBHOUSE, Mr. H., Somerset, E.

Education—Technical Education and the County Council Funds, 4
 Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill, 2R. 531, 532

HOME DEPARTMENT, Secretary of State (see MATTHEWS, Right Hon. H.)HOME DEPARTMENT, Under Secretary of State (see WORTLEY, Mr. C. B. Stuart)*HONDURAS, BRITISH

Baron Siccama's Report, Q. Mr. B. Hoare;
 A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Mar 2, 1936

HONG KONG

Ports and Coaling Stations, Control of, Res. Mar 2, 1935

HOULDSWORTH, Sir W. H., Manchester, N. W.

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1757
 Factory and Workshops Act Amendment Bill, 2R. 959
 India—Factory Commission, 1059

HOWELL, Mr. G., Bethnal Green, N. E.

Bethnal Green Bank, 1072, 1361
 Bridport Savings Bank, 1356
 Labour Commission, 1474, 1704

HOWORTH, Mr. H. H., Salford, S.

Parliament—House of Commons Reading Room, 1064
 Whitechapel Murder, 1037

HOYLE, Mr. I., Lancashire, S. E., Heywood

Factory and Workshops Act Amendment Bill, 2R. 986, 988

HUGHES, Colonel E., Woolwich

Electoral Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 557
 Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill, 2R. 529
 Government Contracts, Res. 645
 Government Property, Rating of, 605
 Plumstead, Burials at, 605
 School Board for London (Superannuation) Bill, Select Com., Res. 648
 Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 230, 245, 260

HULSE, Mr. E. H., Salisbury

Metropolis
 Public Carriages, Lights on, 1691
 Street Accidents, 1349, 1692, 1932

HUNT, Mr. F. S., Marylebone, W.

Admiralty Department—Clerks, 1827

HUNTER, Mr. W. A., Aberdeen, N.

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 324
 Railway Servants (Hours of Labour), Select Com., Appointment of, 1507

ILLINGWORTH, Mr. A., Bradford, W.

Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, 2R. 563, 568
 Factory and Workshops Act Amendment Bill, 2R. 983
 Ireland
 Criminal Law, &c. Act—Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 804
 Marriages of Nonconformists (Attendance of Registrars) Bill, 2R. 1543, 1544, 1545, 1547, 1550, 1551
 Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 86

Imperial Defence Act (see ARMY)Income Tax (see title Customs and Inland Revenue)*INDIA—Secretary of State (see CROSS, Viscount)*INDIA—Under Secretary of State (see GORST, Right Hon. Sir J. E.)

INDIA

Africa

Indian Subjects, Q. Mr. Conybeare; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Feb 16, 668

Agriculture

Gurgaon District, Papers Relating to, Q. Mr. Burt; A. The Under Sec. for India Feb 17, 835

Army

Ceylon Military Contributions, Q. Sir R. Lethbridge; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Feb 6, 139

Hospital Corps, Q. Sir W. Foster; A. The Under Sec. for India Feb 10, 300

Magazine Rifles, Q. Mr. Hanbury; A. The Sec. for War Feb 9, 204; Q. Mr. Marjombanks; A. The Sec. for War Feb 10, 301

Presidential Government, Motion and Debate (Lords) Feb 17, 873

Stores, Overcharges on, Q. Mr. Burt; A. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 27, 1849

Assam—Railways (see sub-heading Railways)

British Trade—Colonial Conference (see title Colonies)

Burma

Opium Smoking, Q. Mr. S. Smith; A. The Under Sec. for India Feb 26, 1680

Salt Industry (see sub-heading Finance)

Cambay—Disturbances, Q. Mr. Burt; A. The Under Sec. for India Feb 19, 1058;

Address for Returns Feb 23, 1381

Councils, Address for Return Feb 17, 850

Factory Labour—Factory Acts, &c., Qs. Mr. J. Maclean, Sir G. Campbell; As. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 17, 844; Qs. Mr. King, Sir W. Houldsworth; As. The Under Sec. for India Feb 19, 1059; Q. Sir G. Campbell; A. The Under Sec. for India Feb 19, 1060

Finance

Financial Statement, Res. Feb 17, 851

Land Tax, Q. Mr. Burt; A. The Under Sec. for India Feb 19, 1058

Railway Annuities, Q. Mr. M. Ferguson; A. The Under Sec. for India Feb 24, 1465

Salt Tax, Q. Mr. Conybeare; A. The Under Sec. for India Feb 16, 667

Law and Justice

Abdul Rasoul, Qs. Mr. Conybeare; As. The Under Sec. for India Feb 16, 668; Feb 17, 838

Magistrates—Fordyce, Mr., Q. Mr. Mac Neill; A. The Under Sec. for India Feb 16, 666

Native States

Perak—Ex-Sultan Abdullah, Q. Mr. F. S. Stevenson; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Feb 19, 1057

Post Office—Post Cards, Q. Mr. H. Heaton; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 27, 1832

Railways

Assam—Chittagong, Q. Mr. Easlemon; A. The Under Sec. for India Feb 23, 1344

Railway Annuities (see sub-heading Finance)

Indian Councils Bill

Q. Mr. Bryce; A. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 6, 189

Industrial Schools Bill

Q. Sir C. Dalrymple; A. The Under Home Sec. Feb 23, 1358

Inflammable Liquids Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o Feb 9, 218

Inflammable Liquids Bill

Q. Mr. Stephens; A. The Home Sec. Feb 16, 674; Q. Mr. Pinkerton; A. The Home Sec. Feb 19, 1070; Q. Sir S. Northcote; A. The Home Sec. Feb 24, 1470; Qs. Mr. Kelly, Mr. J. Rowlands, Mr. W. F. Lawrence; As. The Home Sec. Feb 26, 1699; Qs. Sir E. Birkbeck, Mr. H. Gardner; As. The Home Sec. Feb 27, 1846

Inhabited House Duty (see Customs and Inland Revenue)

Inland Revenue (see Customs and Inland Revenue)

Inspectors of Weights and Measures (Appointments by County Councils under Provisions of Act of 1889)

Return ordered Feb 5, 51

Intermediate Schools, &c. Sites Bill

l. Com. to Com. of the Whole House Feb 17, 809

Com. and Re-com. to Standing Com. Feb 23, 1342

International Industrial Conference at Madrid (see Labour, Trade, and Commerce)

International Maritime Conference (see Board of Trade)

Interpretation (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o Feb 5, 110

Investments in Trust Funds (see title Colonies)

IRELAND

Agriculture—Instruction in Dairy Work, Qs. Mr. Channing, Mr. Johnston; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 12, 469

Army

Barracks—Enniskillen, Qs. Mr. Jordan; As. The Sec. for War Feb 13, 612; Feb 16, 687; Feb 17, 843

Manchester Regiment at Tipperary, Qs. Mr. J. O'Connor; As. The Sec. for War Feb 13, 607; Feb 26, 1705; Qs. Mr. J. O'Connor, Colonel Waring; As. The Sec. for War Feb 19, 1076

IRELAND—Army—cont.

Pensions—Case of Thomas Black, Q. Mr. Mac Neill; A. The Sec. for War Feb 16, 681

Soldiers' Children in Kilkenny, Q. Mr. Chance; A. The Sec. for War Feb 5, 20

Contagious Diseases—Cattle in County Galway, Q. Mr. Sheehy; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 16, 684

Criminal Law and Procedure Act

Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c., Motion (Mr. J. Morley) Feb 16, 692; Obs. Mr. W. H. Smith, Mr. J. O'Connor Feb 12, 499; Qs. Mr. J. M'Carthy, Mr. Sexton; As. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 16, 688

Arrest of Irish Members—Letter Received by Mr. Speaker Feb 16, 665

Castlereagh Inquiry—Arrests, Qs. Sir T. Esmonde, Mr. Sexton; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 5, 21; Q. Mr. O'Kelly; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 6, 151; Qs. Mr. O'Kelly, Mr. Kilbride, Mr. Hayden, Mr. T. W. Russell; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 12, 490; Qs. Mr. Hayden, Mr. O'Kelly, Mr. Sexton; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 13, 608; Qs. Mr. O'Kelly, Mr. Sexton; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 16, 686; Q. Mr. O'Kelly; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 19, 1075

Dillon and O'Brien, Messrs., Qs. Mr. J. M'Carthy, Mr. J. O'Connor; As. The Chf. Sec., The Home Sec. Feb 12, 499; Qs. Sir T. Esmonde, Mr. Sexton, Mr. J. Morley; As. The Chf. Sec., The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 24, 1472; Qs. Sir T. Esmonde, Mr. Sexton; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 26, 1709

Gara, Arrest of (see sub-heading Police, Complaints against)

Long, Mr., Qs. Mr. Flynn, Mr. Chance; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 5, 17
Walsh, Mr., Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 9, 216

Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887, Return ordered Feb 9, 217

Customs and Inland Revenue—Income Tax and the Oldcastle Board of Guardians, Qs. Mr. Mahony, Mr. Bartley; As. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 19, 1079

Distress—Failure of Potato Crop

Case of Mrs. Mary M'Gee, Q. Mr. Sexton; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1370

Relief Fund, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Mac Neill; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 12, 473; Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 13, 611

Relief Works, Q. Mr. O'Hanlon; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 5, 18; Q. Colonel Nolan; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 5, 20; Q. Mr. Foley; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 5, 22; Q. Mr. A. O'Connor; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 5, 22; Q. Mr. W. A. Macdonald; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 5, 24; Q. Mr. Dalton; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 6, 151; Qs. Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien, Mr. Crilly, Mr.

[cont.]

IRELAND—Distress—Failure of Potato Crop—cont.

A. O'Connor, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Dalton; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 6, 152; Qs. Mr. Knox, Mr. Mac Neill, Mr. Morrough, Mr. Flynn; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 9, 207; Qs. Mr. W. A. Macdonald, Colonel Waring, Mr. A. O'Connor; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 9, 215; Qs. Mr. Morrough; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 10, 309; Qs. Mr. Morrough, Mr. Dalton, Mr. Mac Neill; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 10, 309; Qs. Mr. Maguire, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Mac Neill; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 12, 473; Qs. Mr. Morrough, Mr. T. M. Healy; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 12, 476; Qs. Mr. Mac Neill; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 12, 479; Mar 2, 1946; Qs. Mr. Morrough, Mr. Kilbride, Colonel Nolan; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 16, 683; Q. Mr. Morrough; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 17, 844; Qs. Mr. Morrough, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Roche, Mr. P. M'Donald, Mr. Mac Neill; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 19, 1081; Qs. Mr. Roche, Mr. Tanner, Mr. Morrough, Mr. Knox, Mr. W. Abraham (Limerick), Mr. Stack, Mr. Mac Neill, Colonel Nolan, Mr. Flynn; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1374; Qs. Mr. Cox, Mr. Sexton; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 24, 1471; Q. Mr. Deasy; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 26, 1709; Q. Mr. Sexton; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 27, 1836; Q. Sir T. Esmonde; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 27, 1844

Seed Supply (Ireland) Act, Q. Mr. Flynn; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 26, 1707

Drainage

Barrow River, Q. Mr. W. A. Macdonald; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 5, 24
Little Brosna River, Q. Dr. Fox; A. The Sec. to Treas. Feb 5, 21
(Refer also to sub-heading Distress—Relief Works)

Education

Day Schools—Returns, Q. Mr. Condon; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 19, 1080

National Schools—Fees, &c.—Returns, Q. Mr. Mahony; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 16, 680

National School Teachers, Q. Mr. W. A. Macdonald; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1371

Educational Endowments (Ireland) Act, 1885—Rainey School, Magherafelt, Answer to Address Feb 26, 1679

Financial Relations between England and Ireland, Q. Sir T. Esmonde; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 27, 1849

Fisheries—Loans, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1364

(Refer also to sub-heading Distress—Relief Works)

Labour Commission, Qs. Mr. Sexton, Colonel Waring; As. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 26, 1702; Qs. Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. Sexton; As. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 27, 1850

(See also title Labour, Trade, and Commerce)

cont.

IRELAND—cont.

Land Acts and Land Commission

Ashbourne Acts—Returns, Q. Mr. J. E. Ellis; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 6, 152

Bewley, Mr. Justice, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 6, 155
Fair Rent Appeals, Q. Mr. Knox; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 5, 15

Land Commission Returns, Q. Mr. Lea; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 16, 687

Land Commission, Return ordered Feb 23, 1381

Land Holdings, Number and Area of, Q. Mr. J. E. Ellis; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1363

Land Purchase Act, 1885 (Advances), Return ordered Feb 18, 1003

Land Purchase Acts (Default of Installments), Return ordered Feb 16, 664

Local Registration of Title—Legislation, Q. Mr. M. Kenny; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 23, 1369

Purchases under Land Purchase Acts, Q. Mr. Knox; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 5, 15; Q. Mr. J. E. Ellis; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 9, 211; Q. Mr. A. O'Connor; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 16, 685

(Refer also to title Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill)

Landlord and Tenant

De Freyne's Estate—Arrests (see sub-heading Criminal Law, &c. Act—Castlereagh Inquiry)

Falcarragh Evictions and the Police (see sub-heading Law and Justice and Police)

Lord Waterford's Tenant, Michael Keily—Purchase of Holding, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 12, 481

Olphert Estate Evictions—Bunbeg Prosecutions (see sub-heading Law and Justice and Police)

Termon Estate, Q. Mr. M. Kenny; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 23, 1365

Law and Justice and Police

Administration, Mr. Morley's Motion, &c. (see sub-heading Criminal Law, &c. Act)

Bankruptcy Law, Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 17, 842

Bunbeg Prosecutions (see sub-heading Police, Charges against)

Emergency Man—Alexander Fitzpatrick, Prosecution of, Q. Sir T. Esmonde; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 26, 1708

Four Courts, Dublin, Postponed Q. Mr. De Cobain Mar 2, 1945

"Heffernan v. Carter," Qs. Mr. J. O'Connor, Dr. Tanner, Mr. Mac Neill, Mr. T. M. Healy; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 12, 483

Jurors, Special, Q. Mr. T. W. Russell; A. The Att. Gen. Feb 5, 19

Magistrates, Actions against (see sub-heading Magistracy)

Police

Barracks at Fort Stewart, Q. Mr. A. O'Connor; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 19, 1076

IRELAND—Law and Justice and Police—Police—cont.

Belfast Police Station, Q. Mr. Sexton; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1369; Q. Mr. Sexton; A. The Sec. to Treas. Mar 2, 1947

Belfast Street Tramways—Free Passes (see sub-heading Railways and Tramways)

Charges against the Police—Bunbeg Prosecutions—Mr. W. O'Brien's Actions, &c., Qs. Mr. Mac Neill, Mr. T. M. Healy; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 13, 606; Qs. Sir T. Esmonde, Mr. Johnston; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 19, 1074; Q. Mr. Mac Neill; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 19, 1084

(See also sub-heading "Heffernan v. Carter")

Complaints against the Police

Falcarragh Evictions, Police at, Qs. Sir J. Swinburne, Mr. Mac Neill; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 12, 487

Mrs. Gara, Qs. Mr. O'Kelly, Mr. T. M. Healy; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 13, 608

Rosslea National League, Q. Mr. H. Campbell; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 24, 1471

Shadowing—Father Humphries, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Sexton; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 6, 149

Tarbert Democratic Labour Federation, Qs. Mr. Stack, Mr. Sexton; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 26, 1705

Constabulary Force Fund, Qs. Sir T. Esmonde, Mr. Johnston; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 19, 1074; Qs. Sir T. Esmonde; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1365; Feb 26, 1704; Feb 27, 1843; Return presented Feb 24, 1465

Uniforms, Numbers on, &c., Qs. Mr. Mac Neill, Mr. Sexton; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 9, 210

Tipperary Trials (see sub-heading Criminal Law, &c., Act)

Untried Prisoners at Limerick, Qs. Mr. O'Keefe; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 9, 214; Feb 10, 311

Local Government and Poor Law

Bandon Union—Veterinary Inspector, Q. Mr. Flynn; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1373

Cattle in County Galway (see sub-heading Contagious Diseases)

Distress—Failure of Potato Crop (see sub-heading Distress—Relief Works)

Dunfanaghy Guardians—Death of Mrs. Mary McGee, Q. Mr. Sexton; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1370

Kanturk Union—Destitution, Q. Mr. Flynn; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 5, 16

Oldcastle Board of Guardians and Income Tax, Qs. Mr. Mahony, Mr. Bartley; As. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 19, 1079

Revision Courts, Q. Mr. W. A. Macdonald; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1373

IRELAND—cont.

Magistracy

Belfast Street Tramways—Free Passes (see sub-heading Railways and Tramways)

Magan, Mr. P., Charges against, Q. Mr. Hayden; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 12, 493; Qs. Mr. Hayden, Mr. Sexton, Mr. M. Kenny; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 19, 1085

Resident Magistrates, Action against, Q. Mr. Mac Neill; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 12, 478

Resident Magistrates and Constabulary Force Fund (see sub-heading Law and Justice and Police)

Miscellaneous

Bank Notes, Issue of, Qs. Mr. Flynn; As. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 16, 682; Feb 23, 1374

Dublin

Mount Jerome Cemetery—Mr. T. Davies's Statue, Q. Mr. Mahony; A. The Sec. to Treas. Feb 26, 1710

St. Michan's Church Tower, Postponed Q. Mr. Mac Neill Feb 16, 681; Q. Mr. Mac Neill; A. The Sec. to Treas. Feb 19, 1078

Ether Drinking, Q. Mr. M. Kenny; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1370

Gold Mining—Royalties, Qs. Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. Sexton, Mr. W. P. Morgan; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 27, 1839

Market Rights and Tolls Commission, Q. Mr. Knox; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1367

Muslin Trade and the M'Kinley Tariff Bill, Q. Mr. De Lisle; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 10, 311

(See also sub-heading Distress)

Pawnbrokers, Qs. Mr. Johnston, Mr. Sexton; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 10, 310

Street Preaching in Arklow, Q. Mr. W. Corbet; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 19, 1076

Tithes, Q. Mr. P. Fitzgerald; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 9, 210

Navy

Docks—Haulbowline, Q. Mr. Morrogh; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 9, 214; Q. Mr. Flynn; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 12, 474

Queenstown Memorial to the Admiralty, Q. Mr. Morrogh; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 17, 847

Piers and Harbours

Greystones, Q. Mr. W. Corbet; A. The Sec. to Treas. Feb 19, 1075

Post Office

Dublin, Q. Mr. H. Campbell; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 24, 1471; Q. Mr. J. Rowlands; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 26, 1701

Facilities between Sligo and Ballina, Q. Mr. P. M'Donald; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 19, 1080

Glengelvin and Dowra Post Offices, Q. Mr. Knox; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 5, 16

Inchigeela, Q. Dr. Tanner; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 12, 477

IRELAND—Post Office—cont.

Knock, Telegraph Station at, Q. Mr. De Crcain; A. The P.M. Gen. Mar 2, 1945

Mails

Cavan and Clones, Q. Mr. Knox; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 23, 1366

England, Scotland, and Ireland, Qs. Captain M'Calmont, Mr. Sexton; As. The Sec. to Treas., The P.M. Gen. Feb 5, 14

Larne and Stranraer Route, Q. Mr. Sexton; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 23, 1368

(See also title SCOTLAND—Scotch-American Mails)

South-Eastern Districts, Q. Mr. Morrogh A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 12, 475

Waterford and Limerick, Q. Mr. Webb A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 5, 19; Q. Mr. Mahony; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 16, 680; Q. Mr. O'Keeffe; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 23, 1368

Savings Bank Department, Q. Mr. Crilly; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 6, 155

Prisons

Belfast Gaol—Proposed Alterations, Qs. Mr. Sexton; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 19, 1083; Feb 23, 1368; Mar 2, 1944

Downpatrick Gaol—Joseph Mullett, Q. Mr. Sexton; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 6, 151

Railways and Tramways

Belfast Street Tramways—Free Passes, &c., Qs. Mr. De Cobain; As. The Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1367; Feb 26, 1707; Mar 2, 1946

Finn Valley Railway, Q. Mr. A. O'Connor; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 12, 480

(Refer also to sub-heading Distress—Relief Works)

(See also Post Office—Mails)

Irish Land Commission

Return ordered Feb 23, 1381

ISAACS, Mr. L. H., Newington, Walworth South Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill, Instruction to Com. 461

ITALY

Bread, Address for Return Feb 19, 1057

JACKSON, Right Hon. W. L. (Secretary to the Treasury), Leeds, N.

Chapel Royal, Whitehall, 306

Civil Service

Clerks, 10, 146, 1466

Volunteer Civil Servants—Easter Review, 1928

Writers, 10

Customs' Messengers, 142

Ireland

Ancient Monuments Board—St. Michan's Church Tower, Dublin, 1078

Belfast Police Station, 1947

Drainage—Little Brosna River, 21

Greystones Harbour, 1075

Mount Jerome Cemetery—Mr. T. Davies's Statue, 1710

[cont.]

[cont.]

JACKSON, Right Hon. W. L.—cont.

Parliament—Business of the House, 572, 573, 574

Post Office—Mail Service—England, Scotland, and Ireland, 15

JACOBY, Mr. J. A., Derbyshire, Mid.

Army—"Coffin" Targets, 498, 1348

Law and Justice—Milk Stealing, Imprisonment for, 615

JAMES, Right Hon. Sir H., Bury, Lancashire

Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill, 2R. 524

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1721, 1738

Factory and Workshops Act Amendment Bill, 1074, 1362, 1363; 2R. 945, 976, 980, 988, 997, 998

Rating of Machinery Bill, 2R. 424

JAMES, Hon. W. H., Gateshead

Chapel Royal, Whitehall, 202, 306

Rating of Machinery (No. 2) Bill, 2R. 1614

Shetland Islands—Oological Expedition, 836

South Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill, Instruction to Com. 463

JEFFREYS, Mr. A. F., Hants, Basingstoke

Army—Recruiting, Res. 1148

Electoral Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 552

Income Tax, Res. 1494

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, 2R. 401

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 342

JOHNSTON, Mr. W., Belfast, S.

Factories and Workshops Bill, 1710; 2R. 1745

Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act—Administration—

Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 743

Dairy Instruction, 469

Mr. W. O'Brien's Action against Lord

Salisbury, 1074

Pawnbrokers, 310

Local Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Bill, 2R. 1537

Nelson's Pillar (Dublin) Bill, 2R. 594, 596

JORDAN, Mr. J., Clare, W.

Ireland—Army—Enniskillen Barracks, 612, 687, 843

Justices of the Peace Qualification Amendment Bill

l. Presented; Read 1st Feb 19, 1010

KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Right Hon. Sir U. J., Lancashire, Clitheroe

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1773

KEAY, Mr. J. S., Elgin and Nairn

Education Acts—Stock for School Buildings, 211, 494

KEAY, Mr. J. S.—cont.

Purchase of Land, &c. (Ireland) Bill—Sinking Fund, 23, 211, 494

Scotland—Agricultural Holdings Act—Alleged Perjury, 6

KELLY, Mr. J. R., Camberwell, N.

Glebe Lands Bill, 2R. 1007

Inflammable Liquids Bill, 1699

Licensing—Tied Public Houses—"Keen v. Ushers and Co.," 676

London County Council (General Powers) Bill, Instruction to Com. 1816, 1817

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, 2R. 393

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 326

Qualification of Voters (Guardians) Bill, 2R. 1558

Teachers' Registration Bill, 2R. 1000, 1002, 1004, 1005

KENNY, Mr. M. J., Tyrone, Mid

Ireland

Ether Drinking, 1370

Landlord and Tenant—Termon Estate, 1365

Magistrates—Magan, Mr. 1087

Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Bill, 1369

KENYON-SLANEY, Colonel W., Shropshire, Newport

Wolverhampton Corporation Bill, Instruction to Com. 824

KILBRIDE, Mr. D., Kerry, S.

Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act—Castlerea Arrests, 492

Distress—Relief Works, 683

KIMBER, Mr. H., Wandsworth

Liverymen of the City of London, Res. 175, 176, 177

KIMBERLEY, Earl of

Elementary Education (Blind and Deaf) Bill, 2R. 662

Navy—Admiral Colomb's Invention, 1924

Newfoundland Fishery Rights, 821

Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis) Bill, 2R. 1902, 1909

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 1016, 1050, 1057; Com. 1621, 1629, 1637, 1646, 1648, 1657, 1665, 1668, 1677, 1678

KING, Mr. H. S., Hull, Central

India

Factory Acts Commission, 1059

Hours of Labour, 1059

KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, Hon. E., Rochester
Borstal Prison, Kent, 9

KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, Mr. H. T., Kent, Faversham

Army—Wall Marsh, Sheerness, 144
 Navy—Docks—Sheerness, 1360
 Post Office—Telegraph in Isle of Sheppy, 1700
 Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 340

KNOWLES, Mr. L., Salford, W.

Army Recruits, 1931
 Labour Commission, 1475
 Marriages of Nonconformists (Attendance of Registrars) Bill, 2R. 1543
 Registration of Electors Acts Amendment Bill, 2R. 999; Com. 1464

KNOX, Mr. E. F. V., Cavan, W.

Ireland
 Distress—Relief Works, 207, 1376
 Land Commission
 Fair Rent Appeals, 15
 Tenants' Holdings, 15
 Market Rights and Tol's, 1367
 Post Office
 Cavan and Clones—Mail Service, 1366
 Glengelvin and Dowra Post Offices, 16
 Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 237

KNUTSFORD, Lord (Secretary of State for the Colonies)

Newfoundland Fishery Question, 818, 821

LABOUCHERE, Mr. H., Northampton

Africa
 England and Portugal—Manicaland—South Africa Chartered Company, &c. 201, 1353, 1468
 Mashonaland
 Lobengula's Concession, 1351, 1469
 Natives, Treatment of, 1354
 Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, Com. 1798
 Army—Examinations, Res. 1167
 Army Estimates
 Land Forces, 1425, 1441, 1454, 1455
 Pay and Allowances, &c. 1462
 Egypt—Tokar, Occupation of, 1694, 1937
 Law and Justice and Police
 Cambridge "Spinning House" Case, 1694
 Hargan, Walter, Res. 45
 Police—Durham Evictions—Conduct of Police, 1693
 Navy—Defences—Sea Commerce, British Colonies and Dependencies, Res. 1966, 1968
 Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 93, 108

Labour, Trade, and CommerceBritish Trade

Brazil—Commercial Treaties, &c., Qs. Mr. O. V. Morgan; As. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affs. Feb 9, 207; Feb 12, 480; Mar 2, 1939

Colonial Conference (see title Colonies)

Sea Commerce, British Colonies and Dependencies, Res. Mar 2, 1948

Labour, Trade, and Commerce—cont.Factory and Workshops Acts

Abridged Version of, &c., Q. Mr. Randell; A. The Home Sec. Feb 5, 9
 Female Inspectors, Q. Mr. Leng; A. The Home Sec. Feb 26, 1690
 Inspectors, Q. Mr. H. B. Reed; A. The Under Home Sec. Feb 27, 1851
 (Refer to title INDIA)

Foreign Trade (Comparative Growth), Return ordered Feb 12, 465

Labour

Agricultural Labourers' Union, Q. Major Rasch; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 23, 1946

Cardiff Strike (see title WALES)

Hours of Labour Abroad, Q. Mr. Baumann; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 12, 482

London Tramway Men, Q. Mr. W. M'Laren; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 10, 305

Madrid Industrial Property Convention, Q. Colonel Hill; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 12, 490

Pottery Workmen in Glasgow (see title SCOTLAND)

Profit Sharing, Q. Mr. Bartley; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 23, 1357

Railway Servants (see title Board of Trade)

Royal Commission on Capital and Labour, Qs. Mr. Beckett, Mr. Howell, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. O. V. Morgan, Mr. L. Knowles, Mr. S. Buxton, Mr. Causton, Sir J. Swinburne; As. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 24, 1473; Res. (Mr. Beckett) Feb 24, 1503; Qs. Mr. Sexton, Colonel Waring, Mr. Cremer, Earl Compton, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Howell; As. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 26, 1702; Qs. Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. Sexton; As. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 27, 1850; Q. Mr. Cobb; A. The First Lord of Treas. Mar 2, 1944

Statistics, Q. Mr. S. Smith; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 27, 1826

Machinery Rating (see title Board of Trade)
 Manchester Ship Canal (see Board of Trade)

Mines

Gold and other Mining Royalties (see title Woods and Forests and Land Revenues of the Crown)

Llanerch Colliery Explosion, Q. Mr. Pickard; As. The Home Sec. Feb 17, 840

Patent Office

Abridgments of Specifications, Q. Mr. Leng; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 12, 470

Encouragement to Inventors, Q. Mr. Leng; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 9, 199

Petroleum Trade, Q. Mr. Stephens; A. The Home Sec. Feb 16, 674; Q. Mr. Pinkerton; A. The Home Sec. Feb 19, 1070; Qs. Mr. Kelly, Mr. J. Rowlands, Mr. W. F. Lawrence; As. The Home Sec. Feb 26, 1699; Qs. Sir E. Birkbeck, Mr. F. As. The Home Sec. Feb 27
 (Refer also to Inflamm)

Labourers' Cottage Gardens Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Feb 9, 288

LAFONE, Mr. A., Southwark, Bermondsey
Cheap Trains (London) Bill, 2R. 1529

Lancashire County Council Bill

c. Read 2^o Feb 12, 454

Land Purchase (Ireland) Act, 1885
(Advances)

Return ordered Feb 18, 1008

Land Purchase (Ireland) Acts (Default of Instalments)

Return ordered Feb 16, 864

Land Purchase (Ireland) Bill (see Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill)

LAURIE, Colonel R. P., Bath
Army—Range Accommodation, Res. 1151

Law and Justice and Police

Attendance of Children at Board Schools—
Mr. Montagu Williams, Qs. Mr. Pickers-gill, Mr. Mundella; As. The Home Sec.
Mar 2, 1938

Baccarat Scandal, Qs. Mr. Morton; As. The Home Sec. Feb 13, 613; Qs. Mr. Summers,
Mr. Cobb; As. The Sec. for War Feb 16,
670; Qs. Mr. Morton; As. The Home Sec.
Feb 26, 1697

(See also ARMY—Officers)

Bertillon Anthropometric System, Q. Mr. P.
Smith; A. The Home Sec. Feb 9, 197

Cambridge

"Spinning House" Case, Q. Mr.
Labouchere; A. The Home Sec. Feb 26, 1694

Vice Chancellors' Courts at Oxford and Cambridge, Q. Mr. Summers; A. The
First Lord of Treas. Mar 2, 1942

Clergyman, Conviction of a, Q. Sir G. Campbell; A. The Home Sec. Feb 12, 496

Cunningham, Luke—Alleged Inadequate Punishment, Q. Mr. S. Smith; A. The
Home Sec. Feb 26, 1683

Handcuffing Prisoners, Q. Mr. Brunner; A.
The Home Sec. Feb 12, 468

Hargan, Walter, Motion (Mr. J. Lowther)
Feb 6, 24

High Sheriffs of Counties, Allowances to, Q.
Mr. Lockwood; A. The First Lord of
Treas. Feb 23, 1361

Inquests—Bedford, The Late Duke of, Q. Mr.
Cobb; A. The Home Sec. Feb 26, 1686

Licensing

Licences under the Intoxicating Liquors
Act—"M'Ewan v. Justices of Manchester," Q. Mr. Rowntree; A. The
Home Sec. Feb 19, 1066

Tied Public Houses—"Keen v. Ushers
& Co.," Q. Mr. Kelly; A. The Home
Sec. Feb 6, 676

Law and Justice and Police—cont.

Magistrates

Barnsley, Q. Mr. J. Bright; A. The Home
Sec. Feb 10, 304

Chelmsford—Severe Sentence, Q. Mr.
Conybeare; A. The Home Sec. Feb 17, 843

Magistrates' Clerks and Solicitors, Q. Mr.
Channing; A. The Home Sec. Feb 27,
1840

Maidstone Assizes—Carter, Harry Wyndham,
Case of, Q. Mr. Conybeare; A. The Home
Sec. Feb 17, 839

Milk Stealing, Imprisonment for, Q. Mr.
Jacoby; A. The Home Sec. Feb 13, 615

Poaching—Case of W. Laycock, Q. Mr.
Conybeare; A. The Home Sec. Feb 16,
678

Police—Silksworth Evictions—Conduct of Police, Q. Mr. Labouchere; A. The Home
Sec. Feb 26, 1693

Prisons

Borstal Prison, Kent, Q. Mr. E. Knatchbull-Hugessen; A. The Home Sec.
Feb 5, 9

Clerks and Storekeepers, Q. Mr. Lawson;
A. The Home Sec. Feb 27, 1841

Prisoners in Custody before Trial, Q.
Colonel Nolan; A. The Home Sec.
Feb 9, 213

Warder Schoolmasters, Q. Mr. Beaufoy;
A. The Home Sec. Feb 26, 1682

Prosecution of Offences Act (1879 and 1886),
Address for Returns Feb 23, 1381

Queen's Bench Division—Dissatisfaction with a Judge, Qs. Mr. Cobb; As. The First
Lord of Treas. Feb 23, 1362; Feb 26
1701

Religious Disabilities, Qs. Mr. Causton, Mr.
Summers, Mr. De Lisle; As. The Att.
Gen. Feb 9, 206

Self-Defence, Law of, Q. Colonel Dawnay;
A. The Home Sec. Feb 12, 495

Vaccination Acts, Sentences under, Q. Mr.
Channing; A. The Home Sec. Feb 16,
670

Whitechapel Murder—Sadler, &c. Q. Mr. H.
J. Wilson; A. The Home Sec. Feb 17,
849; Q. Mr. Howorth; A. The Home
Sec. Feb 19, 1037; Q. Mr. Easlemont; A.
The Home Sec. Feb 26, 1693

LAWRENCE, Mr. W. F., Liverpool, Abercromby

Inflammable Liquids Bill, 1700

LAWSON, Mr. H. L. W., St. Pancras, W.
Belize Court Estate, 1681

Cheap Trains (London) Bill, 2R. 1526

County Councils and their Bills, 613

Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill,
2R. 534

Lancashire County Council Bill, 2R. 454

London County Council (General Powers)
Bill, Instruction to Com. 1815, 1816

London Overhead Wires Bill, Instruction to
Com. 1821, 1822

Metropolis—Lights on Public Carriages,
1691

LAWSON, Mr. H. L. W.—cont.

Prisons—Storekeepers and Clerks, 1841
 South Kensington and Paddington Subway
 Bill, Instruction to Com. 461
 Thames Conservancy, 613

LAWSON, Sir W., Cumberland, Cockermouth

Belsize Court Estate, 1681
 Egypt—Occupation of Tokar, 1938

LEA, Mr. T., Londonderry, S.

Ireland—Land Commission Returns, 637
 Parliament—Business of the House, 158

LEAKE, Mr. R., Lancashire, S.E., Radcliffe

Civil Service Superannuation, 1065.

LEES, Mr. E., Oldham

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1752

LEFEVRE, Right Hon. J. G. Shaw, Bradford, Central

Army—Imperial Defence Act and Barracks
 Act, Expenditure under, 1357
 Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1764

Navy

Dockyard Expenditure, 1934
 Ports and Coaling Stations, Control of,
 Res. 2001

Navy Estimates

Men and Boys, 2015, 2021, 2032
 Officers, Seamen, &c.—Wages, &c. 2038

Parliament—Business of the House, 572,
 573

Leicester Extension Bill

Debate on Instruction to Com. Feb 10, 292, 298

LENG, Mr. J., Dundee

Factories—Female Inspectors, 1690
 Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1785
 Patent Office, 199, 470

LENNOX, Lord W. G., Sussex, Chichester

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill,
 2R. 412

LETHBRIDGE, Sir R., Kensington, N.

Ceylon—Military Contributions, 139
 East India—Financial Statement, Res. 854
 London Overhead Wires Bill, Instruction to
 Com. 1818, 1825

LEVESON-GOWER, Mr. G. G., Stoke-upon-
Trent

Armenia—Political Prisoners, &c. 1830

LEWIS, Mr. T., Anglesey

Holyhead Harbour, 1829

Licensing

Brewers' Licences, Return ordered and presented Feb 17, 849

Ether Drinking, Q. Mr. M. Kenny; A. The
 Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1370

Extension of Licences at a Midnight Interment, Qs. Mr. Brunner, Mr. Coghill; As,
 The Home Sec. Feb 27, 1833

Tied Public Houses—"Keen v. Ushers & Co."
 (see Licensing under Law and Justice and Police)

Licensing (Ireland) Bill

c. 2R.; Bill withdrawn Feb 11, 428

LICHFIELD, Bishop of

Lichfield Cathedral Bill, 2R. 194

Lichfield Cathedral Bill

l. Read 2^a and com. to Com. of the whole
 House Feb 9, 194

Com.*; Reported; Standing Com. negatived
 Feb 10, 292

Read 3^a* and passed Feb 12, 433

c. Read 1^o Feb 18, 1008

Ordered to be referred to Examiners Feb 19, 1088

LIMERICK, Earl of

Navy—Admiral Colomb's Invention, 1923

Literature, Science, and Art

Archbishop's Throne at Canterbury, Q. Mr.
 C. Bentinck; A. The Vice Pres. Feb 27,
 1829

British Copyright, Q. Sir R. Lethbridge; A.
 The First Lord of Treas. Feb 6, 149

National Gallery, Return ordered and presented Feb 13, 615

South Kensington Museum

Buildings, Return ordered Feb 10, 299

Competition Drawings, Q. Mr. Bartley;
 A. The First Com. of Works Feb 6, 146

Science Collections, Q. Sir H. Roscoe;
 A. The First Com. of Works Feb 6, 142

Liverymen of the City of London (see City Livery Charities Commission)*LLOYD-GEORGE, Mr. D., Carnarvon, &c.

Marriages of Nonconformists (Attendance of Registrars) Bill, 2R. 1555

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 63,
 65, 232, 244, 248, 251, 260, 263, 264, 267,
 274, 283, 344, 348, 350, 351, 352, 356, 357,
 362, 384, 388, 389, 391, 392

Local Authorities (Scotland) Loans
Bill

c. Order for 2R. read and adjourned Feb 18, 1006

Read 2^a* Feb 25, 1615

Com.*—R.P. Feb 26, 1800

Local Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Bill

c. Read 2^o Feb 24, 1534
Com.*—R.P. Mar 2, 2044

Local Government Act, 1888 (Medical Officers of Health)

Return ordered Feb 17, 813

Local Government Act, 1888—Technical Education Funds (see EDUCATION—County Councils, &c.)

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—President (see RITCHIE, Right Hon. C. T.)

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—Secretary to (see LONG, Mr. W. H.)

Local Government Board

Barbed Wires, Q. Mr. Brunner; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 12, 468
Cemetery at Hyde, Q. Mr. Summers; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 19, 1063

County Councils

County Councils and their Bills, Q. Mr. Lawson; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 13, 613

Metropolitan Improvements (see title Metropolis)

Parish Assessments, Q. Mr. Dixon-Hartland; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Mar 2, 1933

River Improvements and Floods, Q. Mr. Cobb; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 6, 140

Technical Education—Local Government Act, 1888, &c. (see title EDUCATION)

Local Government Act, 1888 (Medical Officers of Health), Return ordered Feb 17, 813

London Water Supply, Q. Mr. T. Egerton; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 12, 465

Market Rights and Tolls Commission (see that title)

Rating of Machinery, Qs. Mr. Duncan; As. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 9, 200; Feb 16, 672

Vaccination

Royal Commission, Q. Mr. De Lisle; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 27, 1827

Vaccination Acts, Sentences under, Q. Mr. Channing; A. The Home Sec. Feb 16, 670

Westminster Sewers, Q. Mr. Burdett-Coutts; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Mar 2, 1930

Windsor, Insanitary State of, Q. Earl Compton; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 23, 1359

Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o Feb 5, 110

Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Bill

Q. Mr. M. Kenny; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 23, 1369

Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Act, 1890

County Council and Technical Education (see title EDUCATION)

LOCKWOOD, Mr. F., York

High Sheriffs of Counties—Allowances, 1361

LONDON, Bishop of

Betting by Infants Bill, 2R. 1332
Elementary Education (Blind and Deaf) Bill, Com. 1340
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 1651, 1657, 1664, 1667, 1663, 1670, 1671, 1678

London County Council (General Powers) Bill

c. Read 2^o, and Motion for Instruction to Com. Feb 27, 1807

London Overhead Wires Bill

c. Read 2^o*, and Motion for Instruction to Com. Feb 27, 1818

LONG, Mr. W. H. (Secretary to the Local Government Board), Wilts, Devises Qualification of Voters (Guardians) Bill, 2R. 1557

LOBD ADVOCATE, The (see ROBERTSON, Right Hon. J. P. B.)

LOBD CHANCELLOR, The (see HALSBURY, Lord)

LOBD LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND—Chief Secretary to the (see BALFOUR, Right Hon. A. J.)

LOBD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (see CRANBROOK, Viscount)

LORD PRIVY SEAL (see CADOGAN, Earl)

Loss of Life at Sea

Return ordered Feb 9, 218

LOTHIAN, Marquess of (Secretary for Scotland)

Fishery Board (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1801

LOWTHER, Right Hon. J., Kent, Isle of Thanet

Colonial Conference, Res. 925, 926, 929
Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill, 1943

LOWTHER, Right Hon. J.—cont.

Law and Justice—Hargan, Walter, Res. 24, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 44, 49, 50
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 314

LOWTHER, Mr. J. W., Cumberland, Penrith

Allotments—Dorset, 144
Navy—Ports and Coaling Stations, Control of, Res. 1995

LOWTHER, Hon. W., Westmoreland, Appleby

Metropolis—Public Carriages, Lights on, 1691

LUBBOCK, Right Hon. Sir J., London University

London County Council (General Powers) Bill, 2R. 1807, 1808, 1809; Instruction to Com. 1813, 1814, 1817
London Overhead Wires Bill, Instruction to Com. 1822, 1826

LYMINGTON, Viscount, Devon, South Molton

Liverymen of the City of London, Res. 172, 178

MACARTNEY, Mr. W. E., Antrim, S.

Local Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Bill, 2R. 1536
Nelson's Pillar (Dublin) Bill, 2R. 590, 592, 593, 594, 595

MACDONALD, Mr. W. A., Queen's Co., Ossory

Government Contracts, Res. 646
Ireland
Distress—Relief Works, 24, 215
Education—National School Teachers, 1371
Revision Courts, 1373

MACINNES, Mr. M., Northumberland, Hexham

Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill, 2R. 648

MACLEAN, Mr. J. M., Oldham

Factory and Workshops Act Amendment Bill, 2R. 973, 976
India—Factory Labour, 844
Post Office—Press and Private Telegrams, 1828

MAC NEILL, Mr. J. G. S., Donegal, S.

India
Financial Statement, Res. 869
Magistrates—Mr. Fordyce, 666
Ireland
Ancient Monuments Board—St. Michael's Church Tower, Dublin, 681, 1078
Army Pensions—Thomas Black, 681

[cont.

MAC NEILL, Mr. J. G. S.—cont.

Criminal Law, &c. Act—Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 739, 743, 782
Distress—Relief Works, &c. 208, 310, 473, 479, 1082, 1083, 1377, 1946
Law and Justice and Police
Charges against the Police—"Heffernan v. Carter"—Bunbeg Prosecution, &c. 484, 488, 606, 1084
Police Uniform, 210
Magistracy—Resident Magistrates, Actions against, 478

McCAlMONT, Captain J., Antrim, E.

Post Office—Mails—England, Scotland, and Ireland, 14

McCARTHY, Mr. J., Londonderry

Ireland
Criminal Law, &c. Act
Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 792
O'Brien and Dillon, Messrs. 499
Parliament—Debate on Mr. Morley's Motion, 688

McDONALD, Mr. P., Sligo, N.

Ireland
Distress—Relief Works, &c. 1082
Post Office—Facilities between Sligo and Ballina, 1080

McDONALD, Dr. R., Ross and Cromarty

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1750

McKENNA, Sir J. N., Monaghan, S.

Financial Relations between England and Ireland, 1850

McLAREN, Mr. W. S. B., Cheshire, Crewe

London Tramway Men, 305
Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, 2R. 409

MADDEN, Right Hon. D. H. (Attorney General for Ireland), Dublin University

Ireland
Criminal Law and Procedure Act
Castles Inquiry—Arrests, 22, 152
Dillon and O'Brien, Messrs. 1473
Long, Mr., 17
Walsh, Mr., 216
Distress—Relief Works, &c. 18, 20, 23, 23, 24, 151, 153, 154, 208, 215, 309, 310

Land Acts and Land Commission

Ashbourne Acts, Returns, 153
Bewley, Mr. Justice, 156
Fair Rent Appeals, 16
Purchases under Land Acts—Tenants' Holdings 15

(See sub-heading Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill)

[cont.

MADDEN, Right Hon. D. H.—cont.

Landlord and Tenant

Lord Waterford's Tenant, Michael Kelly, 481

Termon Estate, 1365

Law and Justice and Police

Bankruptcy Law, 842, 843

"Heffernan v. Carter," 483

Jurors, Special, 19

Police

Shadowing—Father Humphries, 150

Uniform, 211

Untried Prisoners at Limerick, 214, 311

Magistracy

Magan, Mr. P., 1085

Pawnbrokers, 310, 311

Poor Law—Kanturk Union—Destitution, 17

Prisons — Downpatrick Gaol — Joseph Mullett, 151

Railways (see sub-heading Distress—Relief Works)

Licensing (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 428

Local Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Bill, 2R. 1537; Com. 2044

Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Bill, 1370

Nelson's Pillar (Dublin) Bill, 2R. 598, 599

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill—Land Purchase, 19, 212, 841

MADRID

Industrial Property Convention, Q. Colonel Hill; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 12, 490

MAGUIRE, Mr. T. R., Donegal, N.

Ireland—Distress—Relief Works, 473

MAHONY, Mr. P., Meath, N.

Glasgow Cattle Market—Weighbridges, 670

Ireland

Income Tax and Oldcastle Board of Guardians, 1079

Mount Jerome Cemetery—Statue of Mr. T. Davies, 1710

National Schools—Return, 680

Post Office—Mails, 680

MAKINS, Colonel W. T., Essex, S.W.

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, 2R. 421

South Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill, 2R. 457; Instruction to Com. 460

MALCOLM, Colonel J. W., Argyllshire

Scotland—West Highland Commission, 1073

MALLOCK, Mr. R., Devon, Torquay

Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill, 2R. 535

Manchester Ship Canal (see Board of Trade)

MAPLE, Mr. J. B., Camberwell, Dulwich
Cheap Trains (London) Bill, 2R. 1511, 1518

MAPPIN, Sir F. T., York, W.R., Hallamshire

Post Office—Bradfield Facilities, 11

MARJORIBANKS, Right Hon. E., Berwickshire

Army—Magazine Rifles, 301, 1355; Res. 1157, 1160

Army Estimates—Magazine Rifles, 1415, 1416

Navy Estimates—Magazine Rifles, 2033, 2035, 2037

Market Rights and Tolls

Royal Commission, Q. Mr. Picton; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 23, 1349; Q. Mr. Knox; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 23, 1367; Q. Sir E. Birkbeck; A. The Pres. Bd. Ag. Mar 2, 1927

Marriages of Nonconformists (Attendance of Registrars) Bill

c. Read 2^o Feb 24, 1541

Com. *—R.P. Mar 2, 2045

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill

c. Read 2^o Feb 11, 393

Com. *—R.P. Feb 12, 574

MATTHEWS, Right Hon. H. (Secretary of State for the Home Department), Birmingham, E.

Burials

Midnight Interment — Extension of Licences, 1834

Plumstead, Burials at, 605

Church of England—Bishop of Exeter and the Rev. H. Marriott, 7

Factories and Workshops Bill, 1710; 2R. 1712, 1721, 1735, 1753, 1786; Com., Res. 1797

Factory and Workshop Act

Abridged Version of, 9

Female Inspectors, 1691

Factory and Workshops Act Amendment Bill, 2R. 978, 980, 998

Inflammable Liquids Bill, 674, 1070, 1700, 1847

Law and Justice and Police

Attendance of Children at Board Schools and Mr. Montagu Williams, 1938

Baccarat Scandal, 613, 1697

Barnsley Magistrates, 305

Bertillon Anthropometric System, 198

Cambridge "Spinning House" Case, 1694

Chelmsford Magistrates—Severe Sentence, 843

Clergyman, Conviction of a, 497

Cunningham, Luke—Alleged Inadequate Punishment, 1684

Handcuffing Prisoners, 468

Hargan, Walter, Res. 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 50

[cont.]

MATTHEWS, Right Hon. H. —cont.

Inquests—Bedford, The Late Duke of, 1686, 1687

Law of Self-Defence, 495

Licensing

Licences under the Intoxicating Liquors

Acts, 1067

Tied Public Houses—"Keen v. Ushers & Co.," 676

Magistrates' Clerks and Solicitors, 1841

Maidstone Assizes—Carter, H. W., Case of, 840

Milk Stealing, Imprisonment for, 615

New Scotland Yard, 604

Poaching—Case of W. Laycock, 678

Police—Durham Evictions—Conduct of Police, 1694

Prisoners in Custody before Trial, 213

Prisons

Borstal Prison, Kent, 9

Storekeepers and Clerks, 1841

Warder Schoolmasters, 1683

Vaccination Acts, Sentence under, 671

Whitechapel Murder, 849, 1087, 1693

Liverymen of the City of London, Res. 185, 187, 188

Metropolis

Public Carriages, Lights on, 1692

Street Accidents, 304, 1692, 1933

Mines—Llanerch Colliery Explosion, 841

Penal Servitude Bill, 2R. 2039

Scotland, Roads in, 498

Trading Registration Bill, 2R. 427

Wales—Cardiff Strike, 309, 1830

MAXWELL, Sir H. E. (A Lord of the Treasury), Wigton

Parliament—House of Lords Papers, 1699

MAYNE, Admiral R. C., Pembroke and Haverfordwest

Navy

Coast Defences and Submarine Mines, Res. 1161, 1165

Officers—Promotion from the Ranks, Res. 1981

Royal Naval Reserve, 1062

Sea Commerce, British Colonies and Dependencies, Res. 1969, 1970

Ships

Steam Colliers, 472

"Sultan," 472

Widows' and Orphans' Fund, 471

MEATH, Earl of

Custody of Children Bill, Com. 120

London Streets, 585, 588

Merchant Shipping (see title Board of Trade)Metropolis

Carriages, Public—Lights on, Qs. Mr. Lawson, Mr. C. Bentinck, Mr. Hulse, Mr. W. Lowther; As. The Home Sec. Feb 26, 1691

Deaths from Starvation, Address for Returns Feb 23, 1381

METROPOLIS—cont.

Fog and Smoke Annihilation, Q. Lord E. Hamilton; A. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 17, 845; Qs. Viscount Wolmer, Sir H. Tyler; As. The First Lord of Treas. Mar 2, 1941

Improvements

Alexandra Gate, Q. Sir. A. Borthwick; A. The First Com. of Works Feb 6, 141

New Scotland Yard, Q. Mr. J. G. Talbot; A. The Home Sec. Feb 13, 604

Liverymen of the City of London (see title City Livery Charities Commission)

London Water Supply (see title Local Government Board)

Parish Assessments (see title Local Government Board—County Councils)

Parks, &c.

Kensington Gardens—Kensington and Paddington Subway, Qs. Mr. Baumann, Mr. Cobb, Sir H. Roscoe, Mr. Picton; As. The First Com. of Works Feb 27, 1844

Regent's Park—Direction Posts, Q. Mr. E. Hoare; A. The First Com. of Works Feb 12, 486

Street Accidents, &c., Q. Mr. Coghill; A. The Home Sec. Feb 10, 303; Obs. Lord De Ros, Earl of Meath, The Marquess of Salisbury Feb 13, 582; Q. Mr. Hulse; A. The Under Home Sec. Feb 23, 1347; Qs. Mr. Hulse; As. The Home Sec. Feb 26, 1692; Mar 2, 1932

MIDDLETON, Viscount

Betting by Infants Bill, 2R. 1328

Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis) Bill, 2R. 1912

MILNER, Sir F. G., Nottingham, Bassellaw

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1750

Law and Justice—Hargan, Walter, Res. 46

Mines (see Labour, Trade, and Commerce)Mines (Eight Hours) Bill

Q. Mr. Pickard; A. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 27, 1848

Mining Royalties (see Woods and Forests and Land Revenues of the Crown)

MONK-BRETTON, Lord

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1628, 1646, 1648, 1662

MONTAGU, Mr. S., Tower Hamlets, White-chapel

Army—Tower Wharf, 670

Gold Coinage Bill, 302

MORGAN, Right Hon. G. Osborne, Dew-bighshire, E.

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 60, 67, 224, 244, 274; 3R. 515

Welsh Postmasters, 482

MORGAN, Mr. J. L., Carmarthen, W.
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 224, 274

MORGAN, Mr. O. V., Battersea
Brazil and United States Treaty, 207, 480, 1939
Labour Commission, 1474
Sea Commerce, British Colonies and Dependencies, Res. 1961

MORGAN, Mr. P., Merthyr Tydvil
Mining Royalties, 4, 1837, 1838, 1839, 1847
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 96

MORLEY, Earl of Parliament—Committee of Selection for Standing Committees, Appointment of,
1009

MORLEY, Mr. A., Nottingham, E.
Ireland—Criminal Law, &c., Act—Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 803

MORLEY, Right Hon. J., Newcastle-upon-Tyne
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1441, 1445,
1447
Egypt—Tokar, Occupation of, 1379, 1695
Ireland
Criminal Law, &c. Act
Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c.
Res. 692, 696, 710, 772, 773, 776, 777,
781, 801
Dillon and O'Brien, Messrs. 1478
Parliament—Business of the House, 848

MORRIS, Lord
Custody of Children Bill, Com. 113, 125

MORROGH, Mr. J., Cork, S.E.
Ireland
Distress—Relief Works, 209, 309, 476,
683, 844, 1081, 1375, 1376
Haulbowline Docks, 214
Post Office—South-Eastern Districts, 475
Queenstown Memorial to the Admiralty,
847

MORTON, Mr. A. C., Peterborough
Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, 2R. 568
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1457
Baccarat Scandal, 613, 1697
London County Council (General Powers)
Bill, 2R. 1807, 1808
Qualification of Voters (Guardians) Bill, 2R.
1556, 1558
Railway Servants (Hours of Labour), Select
Com., Appointment of, 1505, 1506
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 261;
3R. 519, 521
Trade Disputes, Board of Arbitration for,
Res. 1890, 1892, 1894

Movable Dwellings Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o Feb 18, 1007

MOWBRAY, Right Hon. Sir J. R., Oxford University
Belsize Court Estate, 1681
Glebe Lands Bill, 2R. 1007

MUNDELLA, Right Hon. A. J., Sheffield, Brightside
Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1787,
1791
Factory and Workshops Act Amendment
Bill, 2R. 993, 995, 996, 997, 999
Law and Justice—Attendance of Children at Board Schools and Mr. Montagu
Williams, 1938

MURPHY, Mr. W. M., Dublin, St.
Patrick's
Nelson's Pillar (Dublin) Bill, 2R. 599

Museums and Gymnasiums Bill
c. Read 2^o Feb 18, 1007
Com. Feb 19, 1184; Feb 25, 1615

National Gallery (see Literature, Science, and Art)

National Gallery
Return ordered and presented Feb 13, 615

NAVY

Admiralty Department—Clerks, Q. Mr. S.
Hunt; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb
27, 1827
Charts and Surveys—Zambesi Surveys, Q. Sir
J. Swinburne; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 12, 475

Defences
Coast Defence and Submarine Mines,
Debate Feb 19, 1161
Imperial Defence Act, Naval Defence Act,
Expenditure under, &c., Q. Sir W. Harcourt; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 26, 1697; Q. Mr. S. Lefevre; A. The First
Lord of Admy. Mar 2, 1934
Sea Commerce, British Colonies and Dependencies, Amendt. to Motion for going into Com. of Supply Mar 2, 1943

Docks
Plymouth and Devonport, Postponed Q.
Feb 5, 7; Q. Mr. Fenwick; A. The First
Lord of Admy. Feb 6, 148
Portsmouth—Launch of New Warships—
Accommodation for Members of Parliament, Q. Admiral Field; A. The First
Lord of Admy. Feb 10, 302
Sheerness, Q. Mr. H. Knatchbull-Hugessen; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 23, 1360
(See also sub-heading Ireland)
Greenwich Hospital, Q. Sir J. Puleston; A.
The Ch. of Exch. Feb 12, 482; Q. Mr.
Boord; A. The First Lord of Admy.
Feb 13, 605

NAVY—cont.

Ireland

Docks—Haulbowline, Q. Mr. Morrogh; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 9, 214; Q. Mr. Flynn; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 12, 474

Queenstown Memorial, Q. Mr. Morrogh; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 17, 847

Officers

Lieutenants' List, Q. Mr. C. Acland; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 23, 1350

Officers Training Royal Navy and Royal Marine Artillery, Return ordered Feb 10, 299

Promotion from the Ranks, Debate Mar 2, 1978

Pensions

Widows' and Orphans' Fund, Q. Admiral Mayne; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 12, 471

(See also sub-heading Greenwich Hospital)

Ports and Coaling Stations, Control of, Amendt. to Motion for going into Com. of Supply Mar 2, 1985

Royal Naval Reserve, Q. Admiral Mayne; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 19, 1062

Ships

"Egeria," Q. Sir T. Esmonde; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 23, 1348

"Mohawk," Q. Mr. Gourley; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 12, 494

"Ravenshall" and the Crozet Islands, Q. Mr. M. Stewart; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 9, 199

"Sans Pareil"—The 110-Ton Guns, Q. Mr. Gourley; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 12, 496

(Refer also to Debate on Navy Estimates Mar 2, 2002, &c.)

"Serpent," Loss of—Widows' and Orphans' Fund, Q. Admiral Mayne; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 12, 471

Steam Colliers, Q. Admiral Mayne; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 12, 472

"Sultan," Q. Admiral Mayne; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 12, 472

Torpedo Gunboats, Postponed Q. Mr. S. Smith Feb 26, 1698; Q. Mr. S. Smith; A. The First Lord of Admy. Mar 2, 1936

War Ships, Launch of (see sub-heading Docks—Portsmouth)

Signalling—Admiral Colomb's Invention, Q. Obs., Lord Sudeley, Lord Elphinstone Feb 9, 194; Q. Obs. Lord Sudeley, Earl of Limerick, Earl of Kimberley Mar 2, 1920

Navy Estimates

Statement of First Lord of the Admiralty Explanatory of the Navy Estimates, 1891-92 (see Appendix)

71,000 Men and Boys—Com. Mar 2, 2002
23,404,000—Officers, Seamen and Boys, &c.—Wages, &c.—Com. Mar 2, 2038

Navy (Ships Lost Otherwise than in Action)

Return ordered Feb 5, 50

Nelson's Pillar (Dublin) Bill

c. Read 2^o Feb 13, 590

NEVILLE, Mr. R., Liverpool, Exchange
South Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill, Instruction to Com. 464

NEWFOUNDLAND

Fisheries—Disputes as to French Rights, &c.
Qs. Colonel Hill, Dr. Tanager; As. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs., Mr. Speaker Feb 12, 489; Q. Obs., Earl of Dunraven, Lord Knutsford, Earl of Kimberley Feb 17, 817; Qs. Mr. S. Hill, Mr. Bryce, Sir G. Baden-Powell; As. The Under Sec. for Cols. Feb 19, 1067; Q. Mr. Bryce; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Mar 2, 1938

NOLAN, Colonel J. P., Galway, N.

Army

Education—Examinations, Res. 1170

Recruiting, Res. 1094, 1107, 1120

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1183, 1184, 1383, 1395, 1423, 1424

Ireland—Distress—Relief Works, 20, 684, 1378

Prisoners in Custody before Trial, 213

NORRIS, Mr. E. S., Tower Hamlets, Limehouse

Government Contracts, Res. 630, 631

NORTHBOURNE, Lord

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1633

NORTHCOTE, Hon. Sir H. S., Exeter

Inflammable Liquids Bill, 1470

NORTON, Lord

Betting by Infants Bill, 2R. 1329

Custody of Children Bill, Com. 118, 123, 128, 130, 132, 133; Report, 195; 3R. 429, 432

Elementary Education (Blind and Deaf) Bill, 2R. 654, 663; Com. 1335, 1336, 1337

Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis) Bill, 2R. 1905

O'BRIEN, Mr. J. F. X., Mayo, S.

Ireland—Distress—Relief Works, 152

Occupiers and Lodgers (Metropolis) Bill

c. Order for 2R. read; Bill withdrawn Feb 25, 1616

O'CONNOR, Mr. A., Donegal, E.

Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act—Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 724

Distress—Relief Works, 22, 153, 216

Land Purchase, 685

Police Barracks at Fort Stewart, 1076

Railways—Finn Valley, 480

Trading (Registration) Bill, 2R. 427, 574

O'CONNOR, Mr. J., Tipperary, S.

Ireland

Army—Manchester Regiment at Tipperary, 607, 1076, 1705

Criminal Law, &c. Act—O'Brien and Dillon, Messrs. 439

Gold Mining Royalties, 1839

Law and Justice—"Heffernan v. Carter," 483

Labour, Royal Commission on, 1850

Parliament

Mr. Morley's Motion—Vote of Censure,
500

Officers Training Royal Navy and Royal Marine Artillery

Return ordered Feb 10, 299

O'HANLON, Mr. T., Cavan, E.

Ireland—Distress—Relief Works, 18

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts
(Ireland) Bill, 18

O'KEEFE, Mr. F. A., Limerick City

Army Bandmasters, 486

Ireland

Post Office—Limerick Mails, 1368

Untried Prisoners at Limerick, 214, 311

O'KELLY, Mr. J. J., Roscommon, N.

Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act—Castlereagh Inquiry—Arrest of Women, &c. 156, 490,
609, 686, 1075

Police, Complaint against—Arrest of Gara, 608

OLDROID, Mr. M., Dewsbury

Factory and Workshops Act Amendment
Bill, 2R. 954

ORE-EWING, Sir A., Dumbarton

Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1577

PACIFIC ISLANDS

British Trade (see Colonies—Colonial Conference)

Crozet Islands—Missing Vessels, Q. Mr. M.
Stewart; A. The First Lord of Admy.
Feb 9, 199

PAGET, Sir R. H., Somerset, Wells

Education—Technical Education and the County Councils, 3

Land, Taxation of, Res. 1859, 1885

Rating of Machinery Bill, 2R. 424

Parishes (United, Divided, &c.)

Address for Return Mar 2, 1947

PARKER, Mr. C. S., Perth

Education—Ipsden School, Oxfordshire, 1851

Parliament

LORDS

Business of the House

Orders with reference to Tuesdays Sittings
Feb 27, 1806

Miscellaneous

House of Lords Papers, Q. Sir G. Trevelyan;
A. A Lord of Treas. Feb 26, 1899

Message from the Commons for Total of Fees for each unopposed Scotch Bill since 1885 Feb 9, 218; Ordered to be communicated Feb 9, 193

Reform of the House of Lords

c. Postponed Q. Mr. Bryce Feb 19, 1074

Standing Committees

Ordered Feb 12, 453

Appointment of Chairman Feb 24, 1465

Committee of Selection for Standing Committees, Appointed Feb 12, 453; Feb 19, 1009

Standing Orders Relating to Standing Committees, Report con. Feb 10, 289

Took the Oath for the First Time

Feb 5—The Lord Bishop of Ely

COMMONS—

Business of the House and Public Business

Qs. Mr. W. E. Gladstone, Mr. Sexton, Mr.
Lea; As. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 6, 156; Statement by The First Lord of Treas. Feb 9, 216; Obs. and Qs. Mr. S.
Lefevre, Mr. H. H. Fowler, Mr. Conybeare,
The Sec. to Treas., Mr. Speaker Feb 12,
572; Q. Sir J. Puleston; A. The First
Lord of Admy. Feb 13, 615; Qs. Mr. F.
S. Stevenson, Sir W. Harcourt; As. Mr.
Speaker, The First Lord of Treas. Feb 16, 689; Qs. Mr. Sexton, Mr. J. Morley; As.
The First Lord of Treas. Feb 17, 848;
Obs. Mr. W. H. Smith, Mr. Campbell-
Bannerman Feb 26, 1797; Qs. Sir W.
Foster, Sir J. Colomb, Mr. W. E. Gladstone, Mr. Easlemont, Mr. Sexton; As.
The First Lord of Treas. Feb 27, 1851;
Q. Sir G. Campbell; A. The First Lord of Treas. Mar 2, 1944

Mr. Morley's Motion, Obs. The First Lord of Treas., Mr. J. O'Connor Feb 12, 499; Qs.
Mr. J. McCarthy, Mr. Sexton; As. The
First Lord of Treas. Feb 16, 688

(Refer also to heading Ireland—Criminal Law, &c. Act)

Motion for Adjournment to discuss the Sentence on Walter Hargan Feb 5, 24

Committees

Petitions (see that sub-heading)

Public Accounts Committee, Report Feb 18, 1008

Standing Orders (see sub-heading Private Bills)

PARLIAMENT—COMMONS—Committees—cont.

Standing Committees (Chairmen's Panel), Report Feb 17, 850

Nomination of Com. of Selection Feb 24, 1559; Report Mar 2, 1947

Members

Leave of Absence (Mr. R. Chamberlain) Feb 12, 464

Mr. Speaker acquainted the House of the Arrest of Irish Members under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act Feb 6, 665

Miscellaneous

Answers to Questions, Q. Mr. Atkinson; A. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 17, 846

Ballot Act—Illiterate Voters, Q. Mr. Addison; A. The Att. Gen. Feb 12, 477

New Member Sworn

Feb 16—Moses Philip Manfield, esquire, Borough of Northampton

Parliamentary Papers

Index to Members, Q. Mr. Dixon-Hartland; A. The Under Home Sec. Mar 2, 1929

Petitions

Committee, Reports Feb 11, 428; Feb 18, 1008; Feb 25, 1616

Private Bills

Standing Orders, Motion to Amend Feb 17, 851

Rules and Order of Debate (see Speaker, The)Sittings and Adjournments of the House

Ash Wednesday, Motion Feb 10, 312

Motion to give Precedence and Exemption from Standing Orders—The Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill Feb 10, 312, 320

Standing Orders, Exemption from—Mr. J. Morley's Motion Feb 16, 692

PALACE OF WESTMINSTERHouse of Commons

Reading Room, Q. Mr. Howorth; A. The First Com. of Works Feb 19, 1064

Tea Room—Map of British Possessions in Africa, Q. Sir J. Swinburne; A. The Sec. for War Feb 12, 476

Parliamentary Elections Bill

c. 2R.; Bill withdrawn Feb 25, 1615

Parliamentary Voters' Qualification Bill

c. 2R.; Bill withdrawn Feb 25, 1616

Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill

c. 2R. put off for six months Feb 25, 1561

Patent Office (see Labour, Trade, and Commerce)

Pauper, Indoor (Members of Benefit Societies)

Return ordered Feb 27, 1852

PEARSON, Sir C. J. (Solicitor General for Scotland), Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, 2R. 418, 419

Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1592, 1593, 1594, 1596, 1597

Scotland—Glasgow Pottery Workmen, 1833

PEASE, Sir J. W., Durham, Barnard Castle

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1433, 1434

Cheap Trains (London) Bill, 2R. 1513, 1518, 1526

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 316

PEEL, Right Hon. A. W. (see SPEAKER, The)

Penal Servitude Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o Feb 9, 218

Read 2^o Mar 2, 2039

Penal Servitude Bill

Bertillon Anthropometric System, Q. Mr. P. Smith; A. The Home Sec. Feb 9, 197

PERAK

Ex-Sultan Abdullah, Q. Mr. F. S. Stevenson; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Feb 19, 1057

PHILIPPS, Mr. J. W., Lanark, Mid.

Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, 2R. 569, 570

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 276, 277

Physical Education in Elementary Schools Bill

l. Presented; Read 1^o Feb 6, 113

PICKARD, Mr. B., York, W.R., Norman-ton

Llanerch Colliery Explosion, 840 Mines (Eight Hours) Bill, 1848

PICKERSGILL, Mr. E. H., Bethnal Green, S.W.

Customs' Messengers, 142

Law and Justice

Attendance of Children at Board Schools and Mr. Montagu Williams, 1938

Livermen of the City of London, Res. 189

Post Office—Savings Bank Clerks, 614

South Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill, Instruction to Com. 464

PICTON, Mr. J. A., Leicester

Africa
 Gold Coast—District Commissioner, 487
 Portugal and England in, 1353
Allotments—St. Margaret's, Leicester, 1696
Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, 2R. 562
Education—Rochdale Half-Timers, 1682
Electoral Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 555
Market Rights and Tolls Commission, 1349
Parliament
 Ash Wednesday, Res. 312
 Business of the House, 318
 South Kensington and Paddington Subway, 1846
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 278, 284

PINKERTON, Mr. J., Galway

Petroleum Trade, 1070

PLAYFAIR, Right Hon. Sir Lyon, Leeds, S.

Colonial Conference, Res. 918, 920, 921, 923, 926, 929
 Ether as an Intoxicant, 1683
Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1746
 Government Contracts, Res. 642

PLOWDEN, Sir W. C., Wolverhampton, W. India

Financial Statement, Res. 851
 Presidential Government, Res. 883, 898
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 351

PLUNKET, Right Hon. D. R. (First Commissioner of Works, &c.), Dublin University

Chapel Royal, Whitehall, 202
 Government Contracts
 Res. 636, 640
 St. Martin's-le-Grand, 147
Metropolis
 Alexandra Gate, 141
Parliament
 House of Commons Reading Room, 1064
 Regent's Park—Direction Boards, 486
 South Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill, 1845
 South Kensington Museum
 Competition Drawings, 146
 Science Collections, 143

Police and Sanitary Regulations

c. Motion for Com. (Mr. Stuart Wortley); Instruction to Com., Motion (Mr. H. H. Fowler); Motion agreed to, and Papers, &c. ordered Feb 6, 1833

Pollen Fisheries (Ireland) Bill

c. Com.; Read 3^o*, and passed Mar 2, 2043

POOR LAW (ENGLAND AND WALES)

Allotments—Labourers' Allotments (see title Allotments)
Paupers, Indoor (Members of Benefit Societies), Return ordered Feb 27, 1852
Rating of Machinery (see title Local Government Board)

Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o* Feb 18, 1008

PORTUGAL

Portuguese in Africa (see AFRICA)

Possession of Game Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o* Feb 19, 1184

POST OFFICE

America (see that title)
Australian Colonies (see that title)
Deliveries—Upper Holloway, Q. Mr. Bartley; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 27, 1827
India (see that title)
Ireland (see that title)

Mails

Calais-Brindisi, Q. Mr. H. Heaton; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 27, 1831
England, Scotland, and Ireland, Qs. Captain M'Calmont, Mr. Sexton; As. The Sec. to Treas., The P.M. Gen. Feb 5, 14

Officials

Liverpool Postmen, Q. Mr. Cross; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 10, 304
Sorters—Vacancies, &c., Qs. Mr. J. Rowlands; As. The P.M. Gen. Feb 26, 1701
 (Refer also to sub-heading Savings Bank Department)

Packets

Q. Colonel Eyre; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 12, 438

Post Offices

Bradfield Facilities, Q. Sir F. Mappin; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 5, 11
Nottingham, Qs. Mr. J. E. Ellis; As. The P.M. Gen. Feb 16, 673
St. Martin's-le-Grand, Q. Mr. S. Buxton; A. The First Com. of Works Feb 6, 147

Savings Bank Department

Clerks, Sorters, &c., Qs. Earl Compton; As. The P.M. Gen. Feb 5, 12; Feb 26, 1689; Mar 2, 1929; Qs. Mr. Pickersgill, Earl Compton; As. The P.M. Gen. Feb 13, 614
 (See also IRELAND)

Savings Banks, Return ordered Feb 17, 849
Scotland (see that title)

Telegraphs

Deliveries, Q. Viscount Curzon; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 10, 306; Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 17, 841
Fressingfield—Telegraphic Communication, Q. Mr. F. S. Stevenson; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 26, 1687
Isle of Sheppy, Q. Mr. H. Knatchbull-Hugessen; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 26, 1700
Press and Private Telegrams, Q. Mr. J. Maclean; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 27, 1828
Sawtry Communication, Q. Mr. Fellowes; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 27, 1842
Supervising Classes, Q. Mr. Wallace; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 26, 1688
Wales (see that title)

Post Office (American Mail Service)
Return ordered Feb 5, 2

Post Offices in Licensed Premises (Scotland)
Return ordered Feb 5, 2

Postal Distribution of Printed Publications Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1° * Feb 16, 1807

POSTMASTER GENERAL (see RAIKES, Right Hon. H. C.)

POWELL, Mr. F. S., Wigan
Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, 2R. 570; Com. 1798
Factory and Workshops Act Amendment Bill, 2R. 991, 993
London Overhead Wires Bill, Instruction to Com. 1823
Museums and Gymnasiums Bill, 2R. 1007; Com. 1616
Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee, 135
School Board for London (Superannuation) Bill, Select Com., Res. 647
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 59

Presentation to Benefices Bill
l. Com. *; Report Feb 6, 133
Read 3° * Feb 9, 196
c. Read 1° * Feb 18, 1008

Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act (see SCOTLAND)

PRICE, Captain G. E., Devonport
Navy—Officers—Promotion from the Ranks, Res. 1978

PRIME MINISTER (see SALISBURY, Marquess of)

Private Bill Legislation
Q. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman; As. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 26, 1711

Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill
Q. Mr. M. Ferguson; A. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 23, 1380

Private Bills (Scotland) [Fees]
Return ordered Feb 9, 218
Message to the Lords for Total of Fees for each unopposed Scotch Private Bill since 1885, Feb 9, 218; ordered to be communicated Feb 9, 193

Prosecution of Offences Act, 1879 and 1886
Address for Returns Feb 23, 1381

PROVAND, Mr. A. D., Glasgow, Blackfriars, &c.
Inland Revenue—Taxation of Land, Res. 1853, 1854, 1859, 1875

Public Bodies (Provisional Orders) Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1° * Mar 2, 2046.

Public Health (Interments) Act (1879) Amendment Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1° * Feb 10, 330

Public Health (London) Law Amendment Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1° * Feb 26, 1800

Public Health (London) Law Amendment Bill
Q. Mr. D. Thomas; A. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 17, 847

Public Health (London) Law Consolidation Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1° * Feb 26, 1800

Public Trustee (No. 2) Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1° * Feb 23, 1382

Public Works and Repairs (Contracts)
Return ordered Feb 16, 692

PULESTON, Sir J. H., Devonport
Navy
Estimates, 615
Pensions, 482

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill
Land Purchase—Issue of Stocks, &c., Q. Mr. O'Hanlon; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 5, 18; Qs. Mr. Keay; As. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 5, 23; Feb 9, 211; Q. Sir T. Esmonde; A. The Chf. Sec. Feb 12, 475; Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 17, 841

Qualification of Voters (Guardians) Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1° * Feb 17, 851
2R. Feb 24, 1556

RAIKES, Right Hon. H. C. (Postmaster General), Cambridge University
Post Office
Australian Colonies, Postage to, 1832
India—Post Cards, 1832
Ireland
Dublin, 1471
Facilities between Sligo and Ballina, 1080
Glengelvin and Dowra, 16
Inchigoels, 477
Knock—Telegraph Station, 1945
Limerick, 1368

RAIKES, Right Hon. H. C.—cont.

Mails—Miscellaneous, 20, 680, 1366, 1368

Savings Bank Department, 155
South-Eastern Districts, 475

Mails

Calais-Brindisi, 1632
England, Scotland and Ireland, 15

Officials

Liverpool—Postmen, 304
Sorters—Vacancies, &c. 1701
Packets, 438

Post Offices

Bradfield Facilities, 11
Nottingham, 673

Savings Bank Department

Clerks, &c. 13, 614, 1690, 1920

Scotland

Scotch-American Mails, 204, 1062
Strome Ferry and Lochmaddy, 1349

Telegraphs

Deliveries, 306, 842
Pressingfield—Telegraphic Communication, 1687

Isle of Sheppy, 1700

Press and Private Telegrams, 1828

Sawtry Communication, 1842

Supervising Classes, 1688

Wales—Welsh Postmasters, 483

Railway and Canal Traffic Acts Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Feb 12, 575

Railway Servants (Hours of Labour)

Select Com. &c. (see title Board of Trade, sub-heading Railways)

Railway Servants (Hours of Labour) Bill

Q. Mr. Crawford; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade
Feb 16, 675

Railways (Board of Trade Orders)

Return ordered Feb 12, 576

Railways (Weekly-Paid Servants)

Return ordered and Motion withdrawn (Mr. Channing) Feb 12, 575

RANDELL, Mr. D., Glamorgan, Gower

Factories (Certificates of Birth Fees) Bill, 2R. 1799

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1742, 1745

Factory and Workshop Act, 9

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 82, 222, 223, 241, 245, 358

RASCH, Major F. C., Essex, S.E.

Agricultural Labourers' Union, 1346

Army

Discharged and Reserved Soldiers, 1069

Magazine Rifles, 471

Recruiting, Res. 1103, 1107, 1149

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1414, 1415

Rating of Machinery Bill

c. Order for 2R. Feb 11, 422

2R.; Bill withdrawn Feb 25, 1615

Rating of Machinery (No. 2) Bill

c. Order for 2R. read and adjourned Feb 25, 1613

REDMOND, Mr. J. E., Wexford, N.

Ireland—Criminal Law, &c. Act—Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 719, 774, 790

REED, Mr. H. B., Bradford, E.

Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, 2R. 565, 566
Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1786; Com., Res. 1797

Factory Inspectors, 1851

Factory and Workshops Act Amendment Bill, 2R. 965, 968

REED, Sir E. J., Cardiff

Cardiff Strike, 308, 1829

Navy—Defences—Sea Commerce, British Colonies and Dependencies, Res. 1975

Navy Estimates

Men and Boys, 2026

Officers, Seamen, &c.—Wages, 2038

Railway Servants (Hours of Labour), Select Com., Appointment of, 1508

Registration of Assurances (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Feb 5, 110

Registration of Electors Acts Amendment Bill

c. Read 2^o Feb 18, 999

Com. Feb 23, 1463; Feb 24, 1553, Feb 25, 1616

Con. * Mar 2, 205

Registration of Voters (Scotland) Bill

c. Order for 2R. read, and Bill withdrawn Feb 23, 1484

Religious Disabilities (see Law and Justice and Police)

RENDEL, Mr. Stuart, Montgomeryshire

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 73, 74, 241, 266, 276; Motion to give Precedence, 323

RITCHIE, Right Hon. C. T. (President of the Local Government Board), Tower Hamlets, St. George's

Allotments in Suffolk, 837

County Councils

County Councils and their Bills, 614

County Councils' Funds—Technical Education, 4

Parish Assessments, 1933

River Improvements and Floods, 140

[cont.]

RITCHIE, Right Hon. C. T.—cont.

Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill, 691, 1088, 1942, 1943, 1944; 2R. 521, 527, 528, 542, 547, 548; Com. 2040, 2041, 2042

Factory and Workshops Act Amendment Bill, 2R. 997

Lancashire County Council Bill, 2R. 454

Local Government Board

Barbed Wires, 469

Cemetery at Hyde, 1063

London Water Supply, 466

Rating of Machinery, 200, 673

Westminster Sewers, 1930

Windsor, Insanitary State of, 1360

London County Council (General Powers) Bill, Instruction to Com. 1815, 1816

Market Rights and Tolls Commission, 1349

Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee, 136

Vaccination Commission, 1827

Wolverhampton Corporation Bill, Instruction to Com. 831, 832

ROBERTS, Mr. J. B., Carnarvonshire, Eifion

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 58, 62, 79; 3R. 518

ROBERTSON, Mr. E., Dundee

Scotland—Education—Leaving Certificates, 604

ROBERTSON, Right Hon. J. P. B. (Lord Advocate), Bute

Local Authorities (Scotland) Loans Bill, 2R. 1006

Museums and Gymnasiums Bill, Com. 1616

Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1603, 1606, 1607

Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act, 145

Scotland

Agricultural Holdings Act—Alleged Perjury, 7

Crofters' Commission—Fair Rents, &c. 1685, 1686

Education

Ardchattan and Muckairn School Board, 8, 148, 307

Leaving Certificates, 604

Private School Registers, 612

Public Schools—Children's Term of Attendance, 1351

School Board Elections—Franchise Qualification, 1939

Fishery—Herring Fishery Act, 201

Law and Justice—Reid, Andrew, Case of, 834

Miscellaneous

Distress in South Uist and Barra, 1347

Glasgow Cattle Market—Weighbridges, 670

Shetland Islands—Oological Expedition, 836

Weights and Measures, Inspector of, 12

ROBINSON, Mr. B., Dudley

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1740

ROBINSON, Mr. T., Gloucester

Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill, 2R. 530

ROBY, Mr. H. J., Lancashire, S.E., Eccles

Army—Education—Examinations, Res. 1171

ROCHE, Mr. J., Galway, E.

Ireland—Distress—Relief Works, &c. 1081, 1374

ROLLIT, Sir A. K., Islington, S.

Government Contracts, Res. 645

Local Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Bill, 2R. 1536

ROSCOE, Sir H. E., Manchester, S.

Army—Education—Classics, 1835

South Kensington and Paddington Subway, 1846

South Kensington Museum—Science Collections, 142

ROWLANDS, Mr. J., Finsbury, E.

Electoral Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 554

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1761

Inflammable Liquids Bill, 1700

Law and Justice—Hargan, Walter, Res. 47

Liverymen of the City of London, Res. 154, 166, 173, 176, 177, 187, 188

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 318

Post Office—Sorters, 1701

South Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill, Instruction to Com. 462

ROWLANDS, Mr. W. B., Cardiganshire

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 70, 227, 228, 356, 361; 3R. 511

ROWNTREE, Mr. J., Scarborough

Licences under the Intoxicating Liquors Act, 1066

Royal Irish Constabulary Force Fund

Return ordered and presented Feb 24, 1465

RUSSELL, Sir C., Hackney, S.

Cheap Trains (London) Bill, 2R. 1523

Electoral Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 556, 557

Ireland—Criminal Law, &c. Act—Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 799

Marriages of Nonconformists (Attendance of Registrars) Bill, 2R. 1553

RUSSELL, Mr. T. W., Tyrone, S.

Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act

Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 711, 719, 724, 727, 729, 734, 804

Castlereagh Arrests, 493

RUSSELL, Mr. T. W.—cont.

Financial Relations between England and Ireland, 1850
Jurors, Special, 19
Marriages of Nonconformists (Attendance of Registrars) Bill, 2R, 1550, 1551

RUSSIA

Jews, Treatment of—Memorial of the Lord Mayor and Citizens of London, Q. Mr. Summers; A. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 12, 499

Sale of Goods Bill

l. Presented; Read 1^a * Mar 2, 1901

SALISBURY, Marquess of (Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs)

Africa, England and Portugal in, 582
Betting by Infants Bill, 2R, 1332
Colonies—Conference on Imperial Trade and Defence, Res. 447
Intermediate Schools, &c. Sites Bill, Com. 1343
London Streets, 587, 588
Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis) Bill, 2R, 1906, 1919
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R, 1010, 1016, 1039, 1055, 1057; Com. 1621, 1622, 1623, 1624, 1630, 1637, 1638, 1639, 1640, 1647, 1653, 1654, 1655, 1656, 1657, 1667, 1668, 1670, 1671, 1673, 1675, 1677, 1678
Women's Suffrage Bill, 2R, 812

Savings Banks

Bethnal Green, Postponed Q. Mr. Howell Feb 19, 1072; Q. Mr. Howell; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 23, 1361
Bridport, Qs. Mr. Howell, Mr. J. E. Ellis; As. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 23, 1356

Savings Banks Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^a * Feb 17, 944

Savings Banks

Return ordered Feb 17, 849

School Board for London (Superannuation) Bill

Select Com., Nomination of, Feb 10, 329; Feb 13, 647; Feb 26, 1800

SCOTLAND, Secretary for (see LOTHIAN, Marquess of)

SOLICITOR GENERAL (see PEARSON, Sir C. J.)

LORD ADVOCATE (see ROBERTSON, Right Hon. J. P. B.)

SCOTLAND

Access to Mountains, Q. Dr. Farquharson; A. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 17, 846
Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act—Alleged Perjury, Q. Mr. Keay; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 5, 6

SCOTLAND—cont.

Crofters

Crofters' Commission Report, Q. Dr. Clark; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 26, 1686
Fair Rents, Q. Dr. Clark; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 26, 1685

Distress in South Uist and Barra, Q. Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 23, 1346

Education

Ardchattan and Muckairn School Board, Qs. Mr. Caldwell; As. The Ld. Adv. Feb 5, 8; Feb 6, 147; Feb 10, 307
Leaving Certificates, Q. Mr. E. Robertson; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 13, 604
Private School Registers, Q. Mr. Caldwell; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 13, 612
Public Schools—Children's Term of Attendance, Q. Mr. Buchanan; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 23, 1350
School Board Elections—Franchise Qualification, Q. Mr. M. Stewart; A. The Ld. Adv. Mar 2, 1939

Fisheries—Herring Fishery Act, Q. Mr. A. Sutherland; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 9, 201
Highlands and Islands—Royal Commission, Q. Colonel Malcolm; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 19, 1073

Law and Justice

Reid, Andrew—Case of, Q. Dr. Cameron; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 17, 834

Miscellaneous

Glasgow

Cattle Market — Weighbridges, Q. Mr. Mahony; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 18, 670

Pottery Works, Q. Mr. Caldwell; A. The Sol. Gen. for Scotland Feb 27, 1833

Inspectors of Weights and Measures, Q. Mr. Esslemont; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 5, 11
Roads in Western Highlands and Islands, Q. Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; A. The Home Sec. Feb 12, 498

Post Office

Mail Service, Qs. Captain M'Calmont, Mr. Sexton; As. The Sec. to Treas., The P.M. Gen. Feb 5, 14

Scotch-American Mails, Q. Sir G. Trevelyan; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 9, 203; Qs. Sir T. Sutherland, Mr. Sinclair, Mr. Flynn; As. The P.M. Gen. Feb 19, 1061

Sorting Clerks, Q. Mr. J. Rowlands; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 26, 1701

Strome Ferry and Lochmaddy, Postal Service between, Q. Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; As. The P.M. Gen. Feb 23, 1349

Telegraph Supervising Classes, Q. Mr. Wallace; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 26, 1688

Telegraphists and Bank Holidays, Q. Mr. Wallace; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 26, 1688

Post Offices in Licensed Premises, Return ordered Feb 5, 2

Presumption of Life Limitation Act, Q. Mr. Buchanan; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 6, 145

Private Bills (Scotland) [Fees], Return ordered Feb 9, 218

SCOTLAND—cont.Railways

Glasgow and South-Western and other Railways (Weekly-Paid) Servants, Return ordered Feb 5, 111

Servants (Hours of Labour), Select Com. (see title Board of Trade, sub-heading Railways)

Shetland Islands—Oological Expedition, Qs. Mr. W. James, Colonel Dawnay; As. The Ld. Adv., The First Lord of Treas. Feb 17, 836

SEALE-HAYNE, Mr. C., Devon, Ashburton
Ceylon—Paddy Tax, 1344
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 61

Seed Supply (Ireland) Act (see title IRELAND—Distress)

SELBORNE, Earl of

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 1038, 1039; Com. 1622, 1628, 1635, 1638, 1639, 1641, 1644, 1646, 1647, 1650, 1651, 1654, 1656, 1660, 1672, 1674, 1675, 1676

SEXTON, Mr. T., Belfast, W.

Capital and Labour, Royal Commission on, 1702, 1851

Custody of Children Bill, 2R. 1799

Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act

Administration—Tipperary Trials, Res. 800

Castlereagh Inquiry—Arrests, 22, 610, 686

Dillon and O'Brien, Messrs. 1472, 1709
Distress—Relief Works, 164, 1081, 1473, 1836

Financial Relations between England and Ireland, 1850

Gold Mining Royalties, 1839

Magistracy—Magan, Mr. P., 1086, 1087

Pawnbrokers, 311

Police

Belfast Police Station, 1369, 1947

Shadowing—Father Humphries, 150

Tarbert Democratic Labour Federation, 1705

Uniforms, 211

Poor Law—Death of Mary M'Gee, 1370

Post Office

Mails

England, Scotland, and Ireland, 15
Larne and Stranraer Route, 1386

Prisons

Belfast Gaol—Proposed Alterations, 1083, 1368, 1944

Downpatrick Gaol—Joseph Mullett, 151
Local Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Bill, 2R. 1534; Com. 2044

Museums and Gymnasiums Bill, Com. 1615
Nelson's Pillar (Dublin) Bill, 2R. 592, 593, 594, 595, 596

Parliament

Business of the House, 158, 848, 1852

Debate on Mr. Morley's Motion, 693

Penal Servitude Bill, 2R. 2:39

SHEEHY, Mr. D., Galway, S.

Ireland

Cattle in County Galway, 684

Criminal Law, &c. Act—Administration
—Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 772

SHETLAND ISLANDS (see SCOTLAND)

SINCLAIR, Mr. W. P., Falkirk, &c.

Currency—Notes, 303, 1358

Railway Rates, 672

Scotch-American Mails, 1061

SINGAPORE

Ports and Coaling Stations, Control of, Res. Mar 2, 1985

SMITH, Mr. J. P., Lanark, Partick

Law and Justice—Bertillon Anthropometric System, 197

SMITH, Mr. S., Flintshire

Africa (West)—Intemperance, &c. 1684

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1755

India—Opium Smoking in Burma, 1680

Labour Statistics, 1826

Law and Justice—Cunningham, Luke—
Alleged Inadequate Punishment, 1683

Navy—Torpedo Gunboats, 1698, 1936

SMITH, Right Hon. W. H. (First Lord of the Treasury), Strand, Westminster

Access to Mountains, Res. 846

America—"Alabama" Indemnity, 846

Army Estimates

Land Forces, 1450, 1451

Officers, Seamen, &c.—Wages, &c. 2038

District Councils and Public Health Bills, 847

Factory Acts Amendment Bill, 1362

Income Tax, Res. 1495, 1499

India

Berlin Conference—Recommendations, 844

Financial Statement, Res. 871

Stores, Overcharges on, 1849

Indian Councils Bill, 139

Ireland, Criminal Law, &c. Act—Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c. Res. 737, 798

Labour and Capital, Royal Commission on, 1474, 1475, 1702, 1703, 1850, 1851, 1944

Law and Justice

High Sheriffs of Counties—Allowances, 1362

Queen's Bench Division—Dissatisfaction with a Judge, 1362, 1702

Vice Chancellors' Courts at Oxford and Cambridge, 1942

Metropolis

Fogs—Smoke Annihilation, 845, 1941

Mines (Eight Hours) Bill, 1848, 1849

[cont.]

SMITH, Right Hon. W. H.—cont.

Parliament

Answers to Questions, 846

Business of the House, 156, 158, 216, 691, 848, 1797, 1851, 1852, 1944

Motion to give Precedence to the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 312, 328

Mr. Morley's Motion—Vote of Censure, 499, 688

Private Bill Legislation, 1711

Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 1380

Russia—Jews, Treatment of—Memorial of the Lord Mayor and Citizens of London, 499

Wild Birds Protection Act (1890) Amendment Bill, 837

Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis) Bill

l. Read 2^d and referred to Select Com. Mar 2, 1901

SOLICITOR GENERAL (see CLARKE, Sir E.)

SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (see PEARSON, Sir C. J.)

SOMERVELL, Mr. J., Ayr, &c.

Cheap Trains (London) Bill, 2R. 1527

Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1588, 1590

South Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill

c. Read 2^d, and Motion for Instruction to Com. Feb 12, 455

South Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill

Qs. Mr. Baumann, Mr. Cobb, Sir H. Roscoe, Mr. Picton; As. The First Com. of Works Feb 27, 1844

South Kensington Museum Buildings

Return ordered Feb 10, 299

SOUTH PACIFIC ISLANDS

British Trade (see Colonies)

SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. ARTHUR WELLESLEY PEEL), Warwick and Leamington

COMMITTEES

A Clause that could not have been moved in Com. without an Instruction cannot be brought on on Report Feb 9, 260

It is competent to the House to Re-Commit a Bill before the Third Reading Feb 10, 345

Unless the Government make the Motion, it is impossible to move the Adjournment of the House before the Orders of the day are disposed of. The Standing Order provides that after any business exempted from the Standing Order "Sittings of the House" is disposed of, the business remaining on the Paper shall be dealt with under rules applicable to the ordinary proceedings of the House after 12 o'clock. That is to say, business will proceed unless objection is taken, such objection being sufficient to arrest further progress. When an Order of the Day stands for Com. the Speaker is bound to leave the Chair without putting any Question. Therefore, a Bill which goes into Com. for the first time is advanced a stage. A Member may move the adjournment of the House between two Orders of the Day after 12 o'clock

SPEAKER, The—cont.

When a Motion that the Chairman leave the Chair is objected to, the next Question would be to report Progress, and on that the Bill would be deferred, if objection were taken Feb 16, 805, 806, 807

A Bill can only be discussed on the Motion for Instruction to Com. as far as it is affected by the Instruction Mar 2, 1822

MISCELLANEOUS

Feb 9, 250, 269, 270, 280, 351; Feb 10, 317; Feb 12, 490, 521, 557, 570, 573; Feb 13, 648; Feb 17, 832, 944; Feb 19, 1167; Feb 24, 1506; Feb 26, 1744; Feb 27, 1825, 1826

RULES AND ORDER OF DEBATE

A Member who allows an Amendment to pass without Challenge, and then moves the adjournment of the Debate to counter-act what has been done, is not entitled to re-discuss that Amendment Feb 9, 270

The Mover and objector to Motions are permitted to make short explanatory statements, but if there is opposition to the Motion, the discussion cannot proceed—it is then within the Speaker's authority to put the Question for the Adjournment Feb 10, 329

An Amendment to include in a Schedule that which the House has negatived is out of order Feb 10, 355, 356

A Schedule of Fees cannot be amended so as to include costs associated with fees; but an independent Amendment can be brought forward, to the effect that the costs shall not exceed a certain amount Feb 10, 357

Clauses or Amendments which would be violating the previous decisions of the House cannot be moved Feb 9, 260; Feb 10, 370

SUPPLY

When the Motion "That the Speaker leave the Chair" has been superseded by the acceptance of an Amendment, it is not a matter of imperative obligation on the part of the Government to re-set up Supply, but for their discretion. When the Government refrain from setting up Supply again they generally do exercise their discretion at a later hour than half past 7

[cont.

[cont.

SPEAKER, The—cont.

But the Motion being made that Supply be taken on Monday, and no reply reaching the Speaker to the Question "Is this with the consent of the House?" the Speaker has no other course than to say "Supply—Monday" Feb 16, 690, 691

SPENCER, Mr. E., West Bromwich
Chili Revolution, 1712STACK, Mr. J., *Kerry, N.Ireland

Distress—Relief Works, 1377
Police—Tarbert Democratic Labour Federation, 1705

STANHOPE, Earl

Local Government Act, 1888 — Medical Officers of Health, Res. 814
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 1044; Com. 1643

STANHOPE, Right Hon. E. (Secretary of State for War), *Lincolnshire, Horn-castleArmy

Africa—British Possessions, Map of, 476
Barracks—Fulwood, Preston, 205

Education

Classics—Examinations, &c. 497, 1381; Res. 1170
Musketry Instruction, 605
Imperial Defence Act and Barracks Act, Expenditure under, 1357

India

Magazine Rifles, 204, 301
Presidential Government, Res. 901

Ireland

Enniskillen Barracks, 613, 687
Manchester Regiment at Tipperary, 607, 1077
Pensions—Case of Thomas Black, 681
Soldiers' Children in Kilkenny, 20
Militia—Camp Equipment, 1061

Miscellaneous

Bandmasters—Directorship of Music at Kneller Hall, 486
Coast Defences and Submarine Mines, Res. 1167
"Coffin" Targets, 49, 1348
Discharged and Reserved Soldiers, 3, 1069
Range Accommodation, Res. 1151
Sentry Duty at Public Buildings, 1356, 1925
Soldiers on March—Rations, 1935
Tower Wharf, 670
Wall Marsh, Sheerness, 144

Officers

Baccarat Scandal, 677
New Military Promotion Board, 1065
Ordnance and Manufacturing Department Magazine Rifles, 471, 1160, 1355
(Refer also to sub-heading India)
Recruiting, 1931; Res. 1093, 1095, 1117, 1118, 1119, 1120, 1124, 1137, 1149
Regiments—Leicestershire, 474

STANHOPE, Right Hon. E.—cont.Volunteers

Musketry Instruction, 1345

Officers

Sergeant Mason, Case of, 603
Vacancies for Officers, 1061

Position Artillery, 1936

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1173, 1184, 1384, 1388, 1397, 1404, 1407, 1413, 1414, 1422, 1445, 1447
Army Schools Bill, 2R. 2039

STANHOPE, Hon. P. J., Wendnesbury

Great Northern Railway Company (Rates and Charges) Provisional Orders Bill, 298
Manchester Ship Canal, 302

STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, Lord

Intermediate Schools, &c. Sites Bill, Com. 1342, 1343
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1624, 1630, 1677

STANSFELD, Right Hon. J., Halifax

Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill, 2R. 541, 542, 543; Com. 2041

STEPHENS, Mr. H. C., Middlesex, Hornsey

Petroleum, Trade in, 674
Stallions, Thoroughbred, 1932

STEVENSON, Mr. F. S., Suffolk, Eye

Armenia, Papers Relating to, 205
Parliament—Business of the House, 689
Perak—Ex-Sultan Abdullah, 1057
Post Office—Fressingfield—Telegraphic Communication, 1687
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 101, 230, 235, 259, 266, 272, 341, 378; Motion to give Precedence, 321

STEWART, Mr. H., Lincolnshire, Spalding

Marriages of Nonconformists (Attendance of Registrars) Bill, 2R. 1555

STEWART, Mr. M. J., Kirkcudbright

Navy—Missing Vessels and the Crozet Islands, 199
Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1570, 1573, 1575, 1576, 1583, 1591
Scotland—School Board Elections—Franchise Qualification, 1939

STOREY, Mr. S., Sunderland

Inhabited House Duty, 1072
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 98, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 279, 280, 282, 287

STRAITS SETTLEMENTS

Ex-Sultan Abdullah of Perak (see title PERAK)

STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL, Lord

Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis) Bill, 2R. 1901, 1908, 1909, 1919

Strikes (see Labour, Trade, and Commerce)

STUART, Mr. J., Shoreditch, Hoxton
Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill,
2R. 533
Government Contracts, Res. 646
Land, Taxation of, Res. 1866
Liverymen of the City of London, Res. 190
Parliament—Business of the House, Res.
322

SUDELEY, Lord
Navy—Admiral Colomb's Invention, 194,
1920, 1924

SULLIVAN, Mr. T. D., Dublin, College Green
Nelson's Pillar (Dublin) Bill, 2R. 598, 600

Summary Jurisdiction (Youthful Offenders) Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1st * Feb 9, 218

SUMMERS, Mr. W., Huddersfield
Armenia—Zeitoun—Salih Pasha, 1934
Army—Officers—Baccarat Scandal, 677
Cemetery at Hyde, 1063
Religious Disabilities, 206
Russia—Jews, Treatment of—Memorial of the Lord Mayor and Citizens of London, 429
Vice Chancellors' Courts at Oxford and
Cambridge, 1942

SUPPLY

Questions on the Estimates (see Parliament—Business of the House)

SUTHERLAND, Mr. A., Sutherland
Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 201
Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1611

SUTHERLAND, Sir T., Greenock
Scotch-American Mails, 1061

SWINBURNE, Sir J., Staffordshire, Lichfield

Africa—British Possessions, Map of, 476
Ireland—Police at Falcarragh Evictions, 487
Labour Commission, 1475
Navy—Zambesi River, 475
Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 2033
Parliament—Business of the House, Res.
325
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 82,
228, 273, 279, 343, 349, 350, 352, 364,
390

TALBOT, Mr. J. G., Oxford University
Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, 2R. 567
New Scotland Yard, 604
School Board for London (Superannuation)
Bill, Res. 329
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 380

TANNER, Dr. C. K., Cork Co., Mid Ireland
Distress—Relief Works, &c. 1374, 1375,
1378, 1379
Law and Justice—"Heffernan v. Carter," 483
Post Office—Inchigeola, 477
Newfoundland Fisheries, 490

TAPLING, Mr. T. K., Leicestershire, Harborough
Army—Leicestershire Regiment, 473
Leicester Extension Bill, Instruction to Com.,
Res. 295, 296, 298

TAYLOR, Mr. F., Norfolk, S.
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 268

Teachers' Registration Bill
c. 2R. Feb 18, 1000

Technical Instruction Bill
c. 2R. deferred Feb 26, 1799
Read 2nd Mar 2, 2045

Telegraphs (see POST OFFICE)

TEMPLE, Sir R., Worcester, Evesham
India
Financial Statement, Res. 860
Presidential Government, Res. 891
School Board for London (Superannuation)
Bill, Res. 330

Thames Watermen and Lightermen Bill
Q. Sir E. Grey; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade
Feb 23, 1354

THEOBALD, Mr. J., Essex, Romford
Cheap Trains (London) Bill, 2R. 1510

THOMAS, Mr. A., Glamorgan, E.
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 70,
110, 239

THOMAS, Mr. D. A., Merthyr Tydvil
Bangor Training College, 834
District Councils and Public Health Bill, 847

THRING, Lord
Custody of Children Bill, Com. 116
Local Government Act, 1888—Medical
Officers of Health, Res. 815, 816

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill
c. As Amended Con. Feb 5, 51; Feb 9, 218
Motion to give Precedence Feb 10, 312
Con., and Schedule read first and second time and added Feb 10, 330
As Amended to be printed Feb 11, 428
Read 3rd and passed Feb 12, 500
l. Read 1st * Feb 13, 581
Read 2nd and com. to Com. of the Whole
House Feb 19, 1010
Com. and Re-Com. to Standing Com. Feb
26, 1617

TOMLINSON, Mr. W. E. M., *PrestonArmy

Barracks, Fulwood, 205

Range Accommodation, Res. 1154

Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill, Com. 2041

Factories and Workshops Bill, 2R. 1778

Factory and Workshops Act Amendment Bill, 2R. 998

Railway Rates, 13

Technical Instruction Bill, 2R. 2045

Trading Registration Bill

c. Order for 2R. read and deferred Feb 11, 427; Feb 12, 574

TramwaysLondon Tramway Men (see Labour, Trade, and Commerce)Tramways Order in Council (Ireland) (Athenry and Tuam Railway) Bill

l. Royal Assent Feb 10, 289

TREASURY—First Lord (see SMITH, Right Hon. W. H.)TREASURY—Financial Secretary to (see JACKSON, Rt. Hon. W. L.)*TREASURY—Patronage Secretary to (see AKERS-DOUGLAS, Mr. A.)*Treaties of Commerce (see Colonies)*TREVELYAN, Right Hon. Sir G. O., *Glasgow, Bridgeton

Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, 2R. 566

Electoral Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 557

Liverymen of the City of London, Res. 179

Parliament—House of Lords Papers, 1699

Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1598, 1600

Scottish-American Mails, 203

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 235, 376

Trust Fund Investments (see Colonies)Trust Investment Act (1889) Amendment Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o Feb 17, 851Trustee Savings Banks

Return ordered Feb 12, 577

Trusts Amendment (Scotland) Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o Feb 11, 428TUITE, Mr. J., *Westmeath, N.Civil Service

Clerks, 10, 146, 1468

Writers, 10

TURKEYAsiatic Turkey, Papers Relating to (see ARMENIA)Zeitoun—Salih Pasha (see ARMENIA)TYLER, Sir H. W., *Great Yarmouth

Cheap Trains (London) Bill, 2R. 1516, 1517

London Fogs, 1941

UNITED STATES (see AMERICA)UniversitiesVice Chancellors' Courts at Oxford and Cambridge (see Law and Justice and Police)Vaccination (see Local Government Board)*VINCENT, Mr. C. E. H., *Sheffield, CentralArmy

Musketry Instruction, 605

Range Accommodation, Res. 1149

Volunteers

Musketry Instruction, 1345

Vacancies for Officers, 1061

Civil Servants—Volunteers—Easter Review, 1927

Colonies

British Trade—Conference, &c. 490; Res. 908, 920, 921, 942, 944

VIVIAN, Sir H. Hussey, Swansea, District

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 76, 364

Voters' Successive Occupation Bill

c. Order for 2R. read; Bill withdrawn Feb 25, 1616

WADDY, Mr. S. D., Lincolnshire, Brigg

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Con. 256

WALES

Bangor Training College, Q. Mr. D. Thomas;

A. The Vice Pres. Feb 17, 834

Cardiff Strike, Qs. Sir E. J. Reed; As. The Home Sec. Feb 10, 308; Feb 27, 1829

Factory and Workshop Act—Welsh Version, Q. Mr. Randell; A. The Home Sec. Feb 5, 9

Gold and Silver Mines—Royalties, &c. (see title Woods and Forests and Land Revenues of the Crown)

Holyhead Harbour—Platters Rocks, Q. Mr. T. Lewis; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Feb 27, 1829

Llanerch Colliery Explosion, Q. Mr. Pickard; A. The Home Sec. Feb 17, 840

Post Office—Welsh Postmasters, Q. Mr. G. O. Morgan; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 12, 482

WALLACE, Mr. R., *Edinburgh, E.Scotland—Post Office

Telegraph Supervising Classes, 1688

Telegraphists on Bank Holidays, 1688

